3. Of Cnidos, a son of Theopompos, and a friend of Julius Caesar (Strab. xiv. p. 656), was a rhetorician, and taught the Greek language at Rome. At the time when the plot was formed against the life of Caesar, n. c. 43, Artemidorus, who had heard of it, cautioned Caesar by a letter, and urged him to take care of himself; but the warning was not heeded. (Plut. Cæs. 65; Zonaras, vol. i. p. 491, ed. Paris.)

4. Daldianus, was a native of Ephesus, but is usually called Daldianus (Δαλδιάνος), to distinguish him from the geographer Daldianus (Orniac. iii. 66), which seems to have been a matter of pride with him, as the Daldian Apollo Mystes gave him the special commission to write a work on dreams. (Orniac. ii. 70.) He lived at Rome in the reign of Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius, as we may infer from several passages of his work (i. 28, 66, iv. 1), though some writers have placed him in the reign of Constantine, and others identify him with the friend of Pliny the younger, and son-in-law of Musonius. (Plin. Epist. iii. 11.) But the passages of Artemidorus’s own work cited above, place the question beyond all doubt. Artemidorus is the author of a work on the interpretation of dreams (Ὀνειροκηνωτικά), in five books, which is still extant. He collected the materials for this work by very extensive reading (he asserts that he had read all the books on the subject), on his travels through Asia, Greece, Italy, and the Grecian islands. (Orniac. Proeom. lib. i.) He himself intimates that he had written several works, and from Suidas and Eudocia we may infer that one was called ὀνειροσκοτικά, and the other χειροσκοτικά. Along with his occupations on these subjects, he also practised as a physician. From his work on dreams, it is clear that he was acquainted with the principal productions of more ancient writers on the subject, and his object is to prove, that in dreams the future is revealed to man, and to clear the science of interpreting them from the abuses with which the fashion of the time had surrounded it. He does not attempt to establish his opinion by philosophical reasoning, but by appealing to facts partly recorded in history, partly derived from oral tradition of the people, and partly from his own experience. On the last point he places great reliance, especially as he believed that he was called to his task by Apollo. (ii. 70.) This makes him conceited, and raises him above all fear of censure. The first two books are dedicated to Cassius Maximus. The third and fourth are inscribed to his son. The fifth book, properly speaking, an independent work, the title of which is περὶ οἴπλεγμαν σουκαίνησες, and which contains a collection of interesting dreams, were believed to have been realized. The style of the work is simple, correct, and elegant; and this, together with the circumstance that Artemidorus has often occasion to allude to or explain ancient manners and usages, give it to a peculiar value. The work has also great interest, because it shews us in what manner the ancients symbolized and interpreted certain events of ordinary life, which, when well understood, throws light on various points of ancient mythology. The first edition of the Oneirica is that of Aldus, Venice, 1516, 8vo.; the next is that of Rigaltius (Paris, 1603, 4to.), which contains a valuable commentary; however, it goes down only to the 68th chapter of the second book. The last edition is that of J. G. Reiff, Leipzig, 1805. 2 vols. 8vo. It contains the notes of Rigaltius, and some by Reiske and the editor.

5. A MEGARIC philosopher, who, according to Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 53), wrote a work against Chrysippus.

6. Of EPHESUS, a Greek geographer, who lived about B.C. 100. He made voyages round the coasts of the Mediterranean, in the Red Sea, and apparently even in the southern ocean. He also visited Iberia and Gaul, and corrected the accounts of Erastothenes respecting those countries. We know that in his description of Asia he pointed the distances of places from one another, and that the countries beyond the river Tanaïs were unknown to him. The work in which he gave the results of his investigations, is called by Marcianus of Heraclea, a τερπιταύ, and seems to be the same as the one more commonly called τα γεωγραφικα, στοιχεία. It consisted of eleven books, of which Marcianus afterwards made an abridgment. The original work, which was highly valued by the ancients, and is quoted in innumerable passages by Strabo, Stephanus of Byzantium, Pliny, Isidorus, and others, is lost; but we possess many small fragments and some larger ones of Marcianus' abridgment, which contain the periphs of the Pontos Euxinus, and accounts of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. The loss of this important work is to be regretted, not only on account of the geographical information which it contained, but also because the author entered into the description of the manners and costumes of the nations he spoke of. The fragments of Artemidorus were first collected and published by D. Hübchel in his Geography, Aug. Vindel. 1600, 4to. The best collection is that in Hudson's Geographici Minores, vol. i. Two small fragments, not contained in Hudson, have been published by Van Goess in his edition of Porphyrius' Antorum Nympheum, p. 97, and a third, containing a description of the Nile is printed in Artelin's Beschreib der Gesch. und Eid. vol. ii. p. 49, &c. (Vossius, de Hist. Germaniae, p. 185, with the notes of Westcrmann.) Artemidorus (iii. 111) ascribes to this Artemidorus a work entitled τανώπια ὑπόμνημα. (Comp. Uberti, Geogr. der Griech. u. Röm. i. 2, p. 141, &c., 250.)

7. A son-in-law of Musonius, the philosopher, was himself likewise a philosopher, and a friend of Pliny the younger, one of whose letters (iii. 11) is full of his praise.

8. OF PARION, an astronomer, whose views of his science are recorded by Seneca. (Quoq. Nat. i. 4, vii. 13.)

9. OF TARSUS, a grammarian, whom Strabo (xiv. p. 675) mentions as one of the distinguished persons of that place. It is not impossible that he may be the same as the one to whose grammatical or lexicographical works reference is made by the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Vesp. 1159, 1164, 1231; Comp. Phot. s. v. ποιητής; Etym. M. s. v. κῦκαν χρηστός and δυομ, though the work or works here referred to may also belong to No. 1.

10. Of TRALLAS, a celebrated pupilist, who lived about A. D. 69. (Paus. vi. 14 § 1; Martial, vi. 77.)

11. The author of elegies on love, (Ipsi ἀρτάρως, Erosth. Catull. 31.) There are many more persons of the name of Artemidorus who are mentioned in ancient writers; but as nothing is known about them, we refer to the list in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. v. p. 263), to which some supplements are given by Van Goess, (l. c.)

[ARTEMIDORUS ('Αρτεμιδόρος). 1. A Greek physician, quoted by Caecilius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acad. ii. 31, iii. 14, 15, pp. 146, 224, 227), who was a native of Side in Pamphylia, and a follower of Erasistratus. He must have lived some time between the third century B.C. and the second century after Christ. He may perhaps be the person quoted by Galen without any distinguishing epithet (De Compos. Medicum, sec. Loc., v. 3, vol. xii. p. 828), but he is probably not the same person as the Artemidorus ὑπομνήματος who is mentioned by the same author. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Vct. in Morb. Ac." i. 15, vol. xv. p. 444.)

2. ARTEMIDORUS CAPITO ('Αρτεμιδόρου κατίτο) was a Greek physician and grammarian at Rome, in the reign of the emperor Hadrian, A. D. 117—138, who published an edition of the works of Hippocrates, which Galen tells us (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." vol. xv. p. 21) was not only much valued by the emperor himself, but was also much esteemed even in Galen's time. He is, however, accused of making considerable changes in the text, and of altering the old readings and modernizing the language. He was a relation of Dioscorides, who also edited the works of Hippocrates, and he is frequently mentioned by Galen. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." vol. xvi. p. 2; Gloss. Hippocr. vol. xix. p. 83, &c.) He may perhaps be the person sometimes quoted simply by the name of Capito. (CAPITO.)

3. ARTEMIDORUS CORNELIUS, a physician, who was born at Perga in Pamphylia, or, according to some editions of Cicero, at Pergamus in Mysia. He was one of the unprincipled agents of Verres, whom he first assisted in his robbery of the temple of Diana at Perga, when he was legatus to Cn. Dolabella in Cilicia, b.c. 79 (Cic. Vet. ii. 20, iii. 21); and afterwards attended him in Sicily during his praetorship, b.c. 72—69, where, among other infamous acts, he was one of the judges (recensores) in the case of Nympho. His original name appears to have been Artemidorus; he was probably at first a slave, and afterwards, on being freed by his master, (perhaps Cn. Cornelius Dolabella,) took the name of Cornelius. Cicero calls him in one place "Cornelius medicus" (2 Vet. iii. 11), in another "Artemidorus Pergaeus" (c. 21), and in a third "Artemidorus Cornelius" (c. 49); but it is plain that in each passage he refers to the same individual, though Ernesti has in his Index Historicos considered them as three different persons. (W. A. G.)

ARTEMIDORUS, a painter, who lived at the close of the first century after Christ. (Martial, v. 40.)

[G. F. M.]
ARTEMIS (Ἀρτέμις), one of the great deities of the Greeks. Her name is usually derived from ἀρτέμις, uninjured, healthy, vigorous; according to which she would be the goddess who is herself inviolate, without infection, and so grants strength and health to others. (Plat. Cratyl. p. 406, b.; Strab. xiv. p. 635; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 32, 577, 1732.) According to the Homeric account and Hesiod (Thog. 918) she was the daughter of Zeus and Leto, whence Aeschylus (Sept. 148) calls her ἀργοτένεα. She was the sister of Apollo, and born with him at the same time in the island of Delos. According to a tradition which Pausanias (viii. 37, § 5) found in Aeschylus, Artemis was a daughter of Demeter, and not of Leto, while according to an Egyptian story (Herod. ii. 156) she was the daughter of Dionysus and Isis, and Leto was only her nurse. But these and some other legends are only the results of the identification of the Greek Artemis with other local or foreign divinities. The place of her birth is for the same reason not the same in all traditions: some say that it was the grove of Ortygia near Ephesus (Tact. Anth. iii. 61; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 1), others that it was Crete (Diod. v. 72), and others again, that she was the sister of Apollo, but born somewhat earlier, so that she was able to assist Leto in giving birth to Apollo. (Orph. Hymn. 34. 5; Spanheim, ad Callim. p. 476, &c.) In the description of the nature and character of this goddess, it is necessary to distinguish between the different points of view from which the Greeks regarded her, and also between the really Greek Artemis and certain foreign divinities, who for some resemblance or another were identified by the Greeks with the Greek Artemis.

1. Artemis as the sister of Apollo, is a kind of female Apollo, that is, she is a female divinity representing the same idea that Apollo did as a male divinity. This relation between the two is in many other cases described as the relation of husband and wife, and there seems to have been a tradition which actually described Artemis as the wife of Apollo. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1197.) In the character of sister of Apollo, Artemis is like her brother armed with a bow, quiver, and arrows, and sends plague and death among men and animals: she is a σείσαννα, Sudden deaths, but more especially those of women, are described as the effect of her arrows. (Hom. ii. 205, 427, &c.; xxi. 59, xxii. 485, &c.; Od. xi. 172, &c.; 324, xvii. 478, xviii. 202, xx. 61, &c., v. 124, &c.) She also acts sometimes in conjunction with her brother. (Od. xv. 410; II. xxiv. 606.) As Apollo was not only a destructive god, but also averted the evils which it was in his power to inflict, so Artemis was at the same time a σείσατρι that is, she cured and alleviated the sufferings of mortals. Thus, for instance, she healed Aeneas, when he was wounded and carried into the temple of Apollo. (II. v. 417.) In the Trojan war she sided, like Apollo, with the Trojans. The man whom she looked graciously upon was prosperous in his fields and flocks, his half-field was thriving, and he died in old age. (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 129, &c.) She was not only the protector of the young, whence the epithets παιδοτρόφος, κοιοτρόφος, and φαλετραχ (comp. Diod. v. 78); and Aeschylus (Agam. 142) calls her the protectress of young sucking-animals, and of the game ranging through the forests of the mountains. Artemis thus also came to be regarded as the goddess of the flocks and the chase: she is the huntress among the immortals: she is called the stag-killer (ἐλακτροκόρη), she is the lover of the chase, and was connected with the chase (ἐλακτρίνου), and ἀφριάς. (Il. xx. 511, 405, &c.; Hom. Hymn. in Dian. 10.) Artemis is moreover, like Apollo, unmarried; she is a maiden-divinity never conquered by love. (Soph. Elect. 1290.) The priests and priestesses devoted to her service were bound to live pure and chaste, and transgressions of their vows of chastity were severely punished. (Paus. vii. 19, § 1. viii. 13, § 1.) She was worshipped in several places together with her brother; and the worship of both divinities was believed to have come from the Hyperboreans, and Hyperborean maidens brought sacrifices to Delos. (Herod. ii. 92, 35.) The laurel was sacred to both divinities, and both were regarded as the founders and protectors of towns and streets. (Paus. i. 38. § 6. iii. 24. § 6, vii. 26, in fin.; Aeschyl. Sept. 450; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 34.)

There are, however, some points also, in which there is no resemblance between Artemis and Apollo: she has nothing to do with music or poetry, nor is there any trace of her having been regarded as an oracular divinity like Apollo. Respecting the real and original character of Artemis as the sister of Apollo, we encounter the same difficulties as those mentioned in the article Apollo, viz. as to whether she was a purely spiritual and ethical divinity, as Müller thinks, or whether she was the representative of some power in physical nature; and the question must be decided here in the same manner as in the case of Apollo. When Apollo was regarded as identical with the sun or Helios, nothing was more natural than that his sister should be regarded as Selene or the moon, and accordingly the Greek Artemis is, at least in later times, the goddess of the moon. Butmann and Hermann consider this idea of Artemis being the moon as the fundamental one from which all the others are derived. But, at any rate, the idea of Artemis being the goddess of the moon, must be confined to Artemis the sister of Apollo, and is not applicable to the Arcadian, Taurian, or Ephesian Artemis.

2. The Arcadian Artemis is a goddess of the nympha, and was worshipped as such in Arcadia in very early times. Her sanctuaries and temples were more numerous in this country than in any other part of Greece. There was no connexion between the Arcadian Artemis and Apollo, nor are there any traces here of the ethical character which is so prominent in Artemis, the sister of Apollo. These circumstances, together with the fact, that her surnames and epithets in Arcadia are nearly all derived from the mountains, rivers, and lakes, shew that here she was the representative of some part or power of nature. In Arcadia she hunted with her nympha on Taygetus, Erymanthus, and Maenalus; twenty nympha accompanied her during the chase, and with sixty others, daughters of Oceanus, she held her dances in the forests of the mountains. Her bow, quiver, and arrows, with which she was provided, were amongst the golden antlers. (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 18, 81, 90, &c.; Apollo. i. 5. § 3; Pind. Ol. iii. 51.) Her temples and sanctuaries in Arcadia were usually near lakes or rivers, whence she was called Ανυθή or Αρνηα, (Paus. ii. 7, § 6, iii. 23, § 6, iv. § 2, iii. 3, viii. 53, § 5.) In the precincts of her sanctuaries there were often sacred walls, as at Corinth. (Paus. iii. 3, § 5, iii. 20, § 7.)

As a nymph, Artemis also appears in connexion with river gods, as with Alpheius [Alpheus], and thus it is intelligible why fish were sacred to her. (Dod. v. 3.)

3. The Taurian Artemis. The legends of this goddess are mystical, and her worship was orgiastic and connected, at least in early times, with human sacrifices. According to the Greek legend there was in Tauris a goddess, whom the Greeks for some reason identified with their own Artemis, and to whom all strangers that were thrown on the coast of Tauris, were sacrificed. (Eurip. Iph. Taur. 36.) Iphigenia and Orestes brought her image from thence, and landed at Brauron in Attica, whence the goddess derived the name of Brauronia. (Paus. i. 23, § 9, 33, § 1, iii. 16, in fin.) The Brauronian Artemis was worshipped at Athens and Sparta, and in the latter place the boys were scourged at her altar in such a manner that it became sprinkled with their blood. This cruel ceremony was believed to have been introduced by Lycurgus, instead of the human sacrifices which had until then been offered to her. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Βραυρώνια and Λαμπαστριώνια.) Her name at Sparta was Orthia, with reference to the phalanx, or because her stature stood erect. According to another tradition, Orestes and Iphigenia concealed the image of the Taurian goddess in a bundle of brushwood, and carried it to Aria in Latium. [Aricina.] Iphigenia, who was at first to have been sacrificed to Artemis, and then became her priestess, was afterwards identified with the goddess (Herod. iv. 103; Paus. i. 43, § 1), who was worshipped in some parts of Greece, as at Hermione, under the name of Iphigenia. (Paus. ii. 35, § 1.) Some traditions stated, that Artemis made Iphigenia immortal, in the character of Hecate, the goddess of the moon. [Hecate.] A kindred divinity, if not the same as the Taurian Artemis, is Artemis τωρωσθαι, whose worship was connected with bloody sacrifices, and who produced madness in the minds of men, at least the chorus in the Ajax of Sophocles, describes the madness of Ajax as the work of this divinity. In the legends about the Taurian Artemis, it seems that separate local traditions of Greece are mixed up with the legends of some Asiatic divinity, whose symbol in the heaven was the moon, and on the earth the cow.

4. The Ephesian Artemis was a divinity totally distinct from the Greek goddess of the same name. She seems to have been the personification of the fructifying and all-nourishing powers of nature. It is an opinion almost universally adopted, that she was an ancient Asiatic divinity whose worship the Greeks found established in Ionia, when they settled there, and that, for some resemblance they discovered, they applied to her the name of Artemis. As soon as this identity of the Asiatic goddess with the Greek Artemis was recognised, other features, also originally peculiar to the Greek Artemis, were transferred to her; and thus she is called a daughter of Leto, who gave birth to her in the neighbourhood of Ephesus. Her original character is sufficiently clear from the fact, that her priests were eunuchs, and that her image in the magnificent temple of Ephesus represented her with many breasts (πολυμαστῆ). The whole figure of the goddess resembled a mummy; her head was surmounted with a mural crown (corona muralis), and the lower part of her body, which ended in a point, like a pyramid upside down, was covered with figures of mystical animals. (Strab. xiv. p. 641; Paus. iv. 31, § 6, vii. 5, § 2.) The symbol of this divinity was a bee, and her high priest bore the name of king (κοσινος). Her worship was said to have been established at Ephesus by the Amazons. (Paus. ii. 7, § 4, viii. 12, § 1; Hesych. and Susid. s. v. κοσινος.)

Respecting some other deities, or attributes of divinities, which were likewise regarded as identical with Artemis in Greece, see Brotomartis, Dictyna, and Eileithyia. The Romans identified their goddess Diana with the Greek Artemis, and at a comparatively early time they transferred to their own goddess all the peculiar features of the Greek Artemis. [Diana.] The worship of Artemis was universal in all Greece, in Delos, Crete, Sicily, and southern Italy, but more especially in Arcadia and the whole of the Peloponnesus. The sacrifices offered to the Brauronian Artemis consisted of stags and goats; in Thrace dogs were offered to Artemis. Among the animals sacred to the Greek Artemis we may mention the stag, boar, dog, and others; the fir-tree was likewise sacred to her.

It is impossible to trace the various relations in which Artemis appears to us to one common source, or to one fundamental idea: the very manner in which such a complicated mythos was formed renders the attempt futile, or, to say the least, forced. In the case of Artemis it is evident, that new elements and features were added in various places to the ancient local mythos; the worship of one divinity is identified with that of another, and the legends of the two are mixed up into one, or those of the one are transferred to the other, whose legends then sink into oblivion.

The representations of the Greek Artemis in works of art are different accordingly as she is represented either as a huntress, or as the goddess of the moon; yet in either case she appears as a youthful and vigorous divinity, as becomes the sister of Apollo. As the huntress, she is tall, nimble, and has small hips; her forehead is high, her eyes glancing freely about, and her hair tied up behind in such a manner, that some locks float down her neck; her breast is covered, and the legs up to the knees are naked, the rest being covered by the chlamys. Her attributes are the bow, quiver, and arrows, or a spear, stag, and dogs. As the goddess of the moon, she wears a long robe which reaches down to her feet, a veil covers her head, and above her forehead rises the crescent of the moon. In her hand she often appears holding a torch. (Mitschele, de Diana Sospita, Göttingen, 1821; Müller, Dorians, book ii. c. 6; Museo Pio-Clement. i. 30; Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. i. p. 37.)

ARTEMISIA (Αρτεμίσια). I. A queen of Halicarnassus, Cos, Nisyros, and Calydia, who ruled over these places as a vassal of the Persian empire in the reign of Xerxes I. She was a daughter of Alcmaeon, and at the death of her husband, she succeeded him as queen. When Xerxes invaded Greece, she voluntarily joined his fleet with five beautiful ships, and in the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480) she distinguished herself by her prudence, courage, and perseverance, for which she was afterwards highly honoured by the Persian king. (Herod. vii. 99, viii. 68, 37, &c., 93, 101, &c.; Polyben. viii. 53; Paus. iii. 11. § 3.) According to a tradition preserved in Photius (Bibl. p. 153, a., ed. Bekker), she put an end to her life in a romantic manner. She was in love, it is said, with Dardanus, a youth of Abydos, and as her passion was not returned, she avenged herself by putting his eyes out while he was asleep. This excited the anger of the gods, and an oracle commanded her to go to Leucas, where she threw herself from the rock into the sea. She was afterwards highly honoured by the Persian prince Mausolus. She was the daughter of Hccaemon, and after the death of her husband, she erected a monument to her success in making herself mistress of the island. The Rhodians, after recovering their liberty, made it inaccessible, whence it was called MautwmAos. (Fabricius.) Another celebrated monument was raised by his virtues above all others, and that God had made use of him for the good of mankind. (Euseb. H. E. v. 28; Theodoret. Huct. fidal. Epit. i. 4.)

3. Of CLAZOMENAE, is mentioned by Aelian (Hist. An. xii. 38) as the author of ἰόν Καίαδου, in which he mentioned that, at one time, the territory of Clazomenea was ravaged by a winged sow. Suidas (s. v. Ἀρτέμωνος) ascribes to him a work on Homer (ἱόν ὀμηροῦ), of which, however, not a trace is now extant.

3. Of HERETIC, who seems to have lived about the beginning of the third century of our era. It is also probable that he resided in or near Rome, since we read in Photius (Bibl. p. 12, a., ed. Bekker), that the celebrated presbyter Calus (about a. d. 210) wrote against Artemon and his heresies. From the synodal letter of the bishops assembled at Antioch in a. d. 203, who deposed the heretic Paul of Samosata (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), it seems clear that Artemon was regarded in the 3rd cent. as the precursor of the heresies of Paul, and perhaps also that Artemon was still alive; at any rate, however, that his sect was still in existence. Artemon and his friend Theodotus denied the divinity of Christ, and asserted, that he was merely a prophet raised by his virtues above all others, and that God had made use of him for the good of mankind. (Euseb. H. E. v. 28; Theodoret. Huct. fidal. Epit. ii. 4.) These opinions were probably supported by Artemon and his followers, the Artemonites, by philosophical arguments; for Eusebius states, that they occupied themselves very much with philosophy and mathematics, and that they made use of them in their interpretation of Scripture. They are charged with having introduced forged readings into the text of the Bible, and to have omitted certain passages from the copies they used. These accusations, however, rest on rather weak grounds. (C. H. Stimmer Diádóro de Secl, Arizmonitarum, Leipzig, 1730; Schaffhausen, Historia Artemonis et Arizmonitarum, Leipzig, 1737, 4to.)

4. A LACEDÆMONIAN, who built the military engines for Pericles in his war against Samos in b. c. 441. (Plut. Peric. 27; Did. xii. 28; Schol. ad Aristoph. Acharn. 802.) There was a celebrated statue of this Artemon made by Polyclitus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19. § 2.) Servius (ad Aen. ix. 505) confounds him with Artemon of Clazomenea.

5. Of MAGNÈSIA, is known only as the author of a work on the virtues of women (περὶ τῶν κατ' ἀνδρὸς γυνών περιγραφῆς ηγεμονικῶν), of which Sopater made an abstract (Phot. Bibl. p. 103, a.); but both the original and the abstract are lost.

6. Called Μελενοῦτος, from his being a melic poet, appears to have been a contemporary of the comic poet Aristophanes. (Acharch. 830, with the Schol.; Suid. s. v. Μελενοῦτος.) It is usually believed, that he is the author of the two epigrams still extant in the Anthologia Graeca. (xii. 35. 124.)

7. Of MILGETUS, wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams (ἐννεπεριστημένον), in twenty-two books, which is now lost. (Artemid. Oneir. ii. 49; Eustath. ad Hom. Il. xvi. p. 1119; Tertull. de Anim. 46; Fulgent. I. 13.)

8. Of PURGAS, a Greek rhetorician, who wrote a history of Sicily, which is now lost, but is often mentioned by the grammarians. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 1, 32, iii. 49; Ov. ii. 16. v. 1; Isid. ii. Argum.; Schol. ad Lycophr. 177.)

9. A RHETORICIAN, who seems to have lived during the early period of the Roman empire, and is mentioned several times by Seneca, who has also preserved some fragments of his. (Senee, Suiis, i. 6, 7; Costro. i. 9, 11, ii. 16, iv. 25, v. 30, 33.)

10. A Syrian of royal descent, who lived in and after the reign of Antiochus the Great. He resembled the king so much, that when, in the C. 187, Antiochus was killed, the queen Laodice put Artemon into a bed, pretending that he was the king, and dangerously ill. Numbers of persons were admitted to see him; and all believed that they were listening to their king when he recommended to them Laodice and her children. (Plin. H. N. vii. 10; Val. Max. x. 14, ext. 1.) [L. S.]

ARTEMUS. 378. Artius, a physician, in Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 3) to have made use of cruel and superstition remedies, and who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ARTÉMON. 1. A painter mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 11, s. 40), who enumerates some of his works. His country is not known. With regard to his age, we can only say, that he seems to have lived after the time of Alexander the Great, as one of his works was a statue of queen Statonice, a name not unfrequent in the Asiatic kingdoms after that time.

2. A sculptor, in the first century after Christ, and, in conjunction with Pythodorus, carved in palaces of the Caesars on the Palatine with statues. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5, s. 4. § 11.) [C. P. M.]

ARTÔCIES (Artôkês), king of the Iberians, against whom Pompey marched in n. c. 65. Pompey crossed the Cydnus and defeated Artoces; and when he also crossed the Pelorus, Artoces sent to him his sons as hostages, and concluded a peace with him. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 1, 2; Appian, Mithr. 108, 117; Flor. iii. 5, who calls Artoces; Plut. Pomp. 36.)

ARTONIS. [Artaratus, No. 4.]

M. ARTÔR'US (Artôros), a physician at Rome, who was one of the followers of Asclepiades (Cael. Aurel. De Mób. Aust. iii. 14, p. 224), and afterwards became the friend and physician of Caesar Octavianus. He attended him in his campaign against Brutus and Cassius, n. c. 42, and it was by his advice, in consequence of a dream, that he was persuaded to leave his camp and assist in person at the battle of Philippi, notwithstanding a severe indisposition. This was probably the means of saving his life, as that part of the army was cut to pieces by Brutus. (Vell. Patre. ii. 70; Plut. Brut. c. 41, where some editions have Antonius instead of Artorius; Lactant. Divin. Instil. ii. 8; Dion Cass. xvii. 41; Valer. Max. i. 7, § 1; Tertull. De Anim. c. 46; Sueton. Aug. c. 91; Appian, De Bell. Cívil. iv. 110; Florus, iv. 7.) He was drowned at sea shortly after the battle of Actium, n. c. 31. (S. Hieron. in Euseb. Chron.) St. Clement of Alexandria quotes (Paedag. ii. 2, p. 153) a work by a person of the same name, Rép Maqépòrias. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 26, ed. ver.; Carolini Comed. in Aris, Cestor. M. Artorius, in Poloni Thes. Antiq. Rom. et Gr. Supplement. vol. ii. p. 1133.) [W. A. G.]

ARTYBIUS (Arýbius), a Persian general in the reign of Dareius Hystaspis, who, after the Ionian revolt had broken out, sailed with a fleet to Cyprus to conquer that island. He was killed in battle by Onesilus, the principal among the chiefs of Cyprus. (Herod. v. 108—110.) [L. S.]

ARTYSTONE (Arútstonos), a daughter of the great Cyrus, was married to Dareius Hystaspis, who loved her more than any other of his wives, and had a golden statue made of her. She had by Dareius a son, Arabas or Arsames. (Herod. iii. 88, vii. 69.) [Arsames.] [L. S.]

ARVINA, a cognomen of the Cornelia gens.

1. A. Cornelius P. F. A. Cossus Arvina, whom Livy sometimes calls A. Cornelius Cossus, and sometimes A. Cornelius Arvina, was magister equitum in n. c. 355, and a second term in 349. (Livy. viii. 19, 26.) He was consul in n. c. 345, the first year of the Samnite war, and was the first Roman general who invaded Samnium. While Brutus was marching to conquer that province, the mountain passes of Samnium, his army was surprised in a valley by the enemy, and was only saved by the heroism of P. Docius, who seized with a body of troops a height which commanded the road. The consul then conquered the Samnites, and triumphed on his return to Rome. (vii. 28, 32, 34—36, x. 31; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. iii. p. 120, &c.) Arvina was consul again in n. c. 322 (A. Cornelius Sero, Liv. vii., 17), and dictator in 320, in the latter of which years he defeated the Samnites in a hard-fought battle, though some of the ancient authorities attributed this victory to the consuls of the year. (Livy. viii. 36, 39; Niebuhr, iii. p. 200, &c.)

2. A. Cornelius A. f. P. Arvina, who, as Artaratus, the sentias, sent to restore to the Samnites the prisoners who had been set free by them after the battle of Caudium, n. c. 321. (Livy. ix. 10.)

3. P. Cornelius A. F. P. N. Arvina, apparently a son of No. 1, consul in n. c. 306, commanded in Samnium. He was censor in n. c. 294, and consul a second time in 288. (Livy. ix. 42, &c., x. 47; Fos.)

ARULÉNUS RUSTICUS. [Rusticus.]

ARUNS. 1. The son of Demeterus of Corinth, and the brother of Luccum, afterwards L. Tarquinius Priscus, died in the life-time of his father. (Livy. i. 34; Dionys. iii. 46.)

2. The brother of L. Tarquinius Superbus, married to the young Titia, was murdered by his wife, who despised her husband's want of ambition and was anxious to marry his brother. (Livy. i. 46.)

3. The son of Tarquinius Superbus, went with Brutus to consult the oracle at Delphi, and after the expulsion of the Tarquins killed, and was at the same time killed by Brutus in battle. (Livy. i. 56, ii. 6; Cic. Tusc. iv. 22.)

4. The son of Persena, accompanied his father to the Roman war, and was afterwards sent to besiege Aricia, before which he fell in battle. (Livy. ii. 14; Dionys. v. 30, 36, vii. 5, 6.)

5. Of Clusium, according to the legend, invited the Gauls across the Alps. He had been guardian to a wealthy Lucumo, who, when he grew up, seduced the wife of Aruns. The husband in revenge carried wine, oil, and figs, across the Alps, and by these tempted the Gauls to invade Italy. (Livy. x. 33; Plut. Cest. in Aruns; Aruntius, [Arvinius].)

ARUSIANUS. [Arvinius.]

ARUSIANUS, MEUSSSUS or MESSIUS, a Roman grammarian, who lived under one of the later emperors. He wrote a Latin phrase-book, entitled "Quadriga, vel Exempla Elucidorum ex Virgilio, Sallustio, Terentio, et Cicero et littera digesta." It is called Quadriga from its being composed from four authors. The work is valuable.
ASANDER. 737

as preserving many passages from some of Cicero's lost writings, and from Sallust's History. He first gives a phrase generally, then an example, thus: "Firmatus illius rei, Sallust. Hist. iii. Ad Cyriam perevit firmatus animi. — Prudens illarum rerum, Sall. Hist. i. Prudens omnium quae sensatus snoopuerat." The following words he arranges under the letter K: — Kares, kureo, koptes, khoo (abl. of chao) kasseus, klausius, kaltes, kalco, kanaus, klem.

In some MSS. the work is called "M. Frontonis Exemplum Elocutionum," &c.; in others, "Aruniani (or Volusiani) Mec. Quaest. Quae..." On the other hand, in other MSS. it has often passed under the name of Fronto, and under his name it was published by Angelo Mai, from a MS. much mutilated, especially in the latter part. But after what Fronto says on Cicero and other authors, it seems highly improbable that he would have employed himself in composing such a work from these authors. He would have chosen some of his favourite writers, Ennius, &c. It is possible that the work may be an extract by Arusianus from a larger work by Fronto, which larger work would have been composed from a greater number of authors, including those which Fronto most admired. The best edition is that by Lindemann, in his Corpus Graecorum Latinorum Lat. Vet. vol. i. p. 199, from a MS. in the Wolfenbüttel collection, in excellent condition, and which, with the exception of a few passages, gives the work complete. It contains more than half as much again as Mai's edition. This new part contains many of the most valuable passages, those from Cicero's lost writings and from Sallust's History. The transcriber has prefixed the following remark: — "In aliquibus Codicibus pro Arusiani Male irrepsit Cornelli Fronto..." Lindemann gives in the notes the exact references to the passages which in the MS. are referred to only by the book. [FRONTO.] (Niebuhr, in his edit. of Fronto, Berlin, 1816, p. xxxi., &c.; Lindemann, Praefat. in Corp. Gramm. Lat. Vet. i. p. 201, &c.) [A.A.]

ARYANDES (Ἀριάνδης), a Persian, who was appointed by Cambyses governor of Egypt. During his administration Phraortes, the mother of Arsaces of Cyrene, is said to have come to Aryandes as a suppliant, and to have solicited his assistance in avenging the death of her son, who had been murdered at Barea, as she pretended, because he had been a friend of the Persians. Aryandes accordingly placed an army and a fleet at her command. Herodotus thinks that this whole affair was a mere pretext under which the Persian satrap concealed his desire of conquering Libya. After the conquest of Barea, some of the Persians wanted to take possession of Cyrene also, but before they came to any determination, Aryandes sent a messenger to call the troops back to Egypt. Daricus Hyystapis wished to perpetuate his own memory in a monument in which no king had yet done, and for this purpose he struck gold coins of the purest metal. Aryandes imitated the king by coinage money of the purest silver; but Daricus, indignant at such presumption, had him put to death. (Herod. iv. 165—167, 200—203.) [L.S.]

ARYBAS or ARYMBAS. [ARRIBAS.]

ARYENIS. [ASTYAGES.]

ASANDER (Ἀσανδέρ). 1. A son of Philotas and brother of Parmenion. Alexander the Great appointed him in B.C. 334, governor of Ly-despair at seeing his troops desert to Scolionius. Strabo (vii. p. 311) speaks of a wall or a ditch which Asander constructed across the Isthmums of the Crimea, of 360 stadia in length, to protect the peninsula against the incursions of the nomadic tribes. (Manuert. Geogr. der Griech. u. Röm. iv. p. 293.)

ASBAMAEUS (Ἀσβαμαίος), a surname of Zeus, the protector of the sanctity of oaths. It was derived from a well, Asbamaeon near Tyana, in Cappadocia, the water of which was said to be beneficial and pleasant to honest persons, but pestilential to those who were guilty of perjury. When perjured persons drank of the water, it produced a disease of the eyes, dropsy, and lameness, so that the guilty persons were unable to walk away from the well, and were obliged to own their crime. (Philost. Vii. Apollon. i. 6.; Pseudo-Aristot. Mirab. Ascall. 168; Ammian. Marcellin. xxiii. 6.)

A'SBOLUS (Ἀσβόλος), a centaur, whom Hesiod (Stat. Hym. 185) calls ὁ ἄνιττρις, probably from his skill in observing or prophesying from the flight of birds. He fought against the Lapithae at the nuptials of Peirithous, and was subsequently killed. (Antonin. Lib. 24; Ov. Met. v. 447, [L. S.]

ASCALAPUS (Ἀσκαλάπος), a son of Misme. When Demeter on her wanderings in search of her daughter Persephone came to Misme in Attica, the goddess was received kindly, and being exhausted and thirsty, Misme gave her something to drink. Ascalaphus laughed at her, and ordered a whole cask to be brought. Demeter indignant at his conduct, sprinkled the few remaining drops from her vessel upon him and thereby changed him into a lizard. (Antonin. Lib. 24; Ov. Met. v. 447, [L. S.]

ASCALAPHUS (Ἀσκαλάφος), a surname of Demeter; the protector of the sanctity of oaths. It was derived from a well, Ascalaphaeon near Tyana, in Cappadocia, the water of which was said to be beneficial and pleasant to honest persons, but pestilential to those who were guilty of perjury. When perjured persons drank of the water, it produced a disease of the eyes, dropsy, and lameness, so that the guilty persons were unable to walk away from the well, and were obliged to own their crime. (Philost. Vii. Apollon. i. 6.; Pseudo-Aristot. Mirab. Ascall. 168; Ammian. Marcellin. xxiii. 6.)

ASCALAPIUS (Ἀσκαλαπίος). (ad Acn. i. 5, § 3) or by Orphne. (Ov. Met. v. 540.) Servius (ad Aen. iv. 462) calls him a son of Styx. When Persephone was in the lower world, and Pluto gave her permission to return to the upper, provided she had not eaten anything, Ascalaphus declared that he had eaten part of a pomegranate. Demeter (according to Apollodorus, l.c., ii. 5, § 12) punished him by burying him under a huge stone, and when subsequently this stone was removed by Heracles, she changed Ascalaphus into an owl. According to Ovid, Persephone herself changed him into an owl by sprinkling him with water of the river Phlegethon. There is an evident resemblance between the myths of Ascalaphus and that of Ascalaphus. The latter seems to be only a modification or continuation of the former, and the confusion may have arisen from the resemblance between the words ἄσκαλαβος, a lizard, and ἄσκαλαπος, an owl.

ASCALAPIUS (Ἀσκαλάπιος), a son of Hymenacus, and a famous centaur of the Lydian king Ascanius. It is said to have built the town of Ascalon in Syria.

(Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Ἀσκάλαπος.)

ASCALAPIUS (Ἀσκάλαπιος), a son of Aeneas by Creusa (Virg. Aen. ii. 666), or by Lavinia. (Liv. i. 1, 3; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 760.) From Livy it would seem that some traditions distinguished between an earlier and a later Ascanius, the one a son of Creusa, and the other of Lavinia. After the fall of Troy, Ascanius and some Phrygian allies of the Trojans were sent by Aeneas to the country of Dasylytis, whose inhabitants made Ascanius their king; but he soon returned to Troy, and ruled there after the death of his father, who, according to some traditions, had likewise returned to Troy. (Dionys. Hal. i. 47, 53.) Another legend made Ascanius found a new kingdom at Scepsis in Tros, in conjunction with Scamanderus, the son of Hector. (Strab. xiii. p. 607.) Others again, according to whom his original name was Euryleon, made him accompany his father to Italy and succeed him as king of the Latins. (Dionys. i. 65.) Livy states that on the death of his father Ascanius was yet too young to undertake the government, and that after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Latium in the hands of his mother, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. According to Dionysius (i. 70); Silvius was a younger brother of Ascanius, and disputed the succession with Julianus, a son of Ascanius. The dispute was decided in favour of Silvius. Silvius (ad Aen. i. 271) states, that Ascanius was also called Iulus, Julianus, Danthus, and Leontodamus. The gens Julia at Rome traced its pedigree up to Julianus and Ascanius. (Hayne. Euseb. viii. ad Aen. i.) In the stories about Troy there occur three other personages of the name Ascanius. (Apollod. iii. 12, § 5; Hom. ii. 862, 873. 792.)

ASCALLAPOS, a Thessalian centaur, who made a statue of Zeus, dedicated by the Thessalians at Olympia. (Paus. v. 24. § 1.)

ASCAMOS, a Thessalian centaur, who made a statue of Zeus, dedicated by the Thessalians at Olympia. (Paus. v. 24. § 1.)

THIERSCH (Epochen der bild. Kunst, p. 160, &c. Anm.) endeavours to shew that he was a pupil of Ageladas of Sicyon. [ASCALAPUS.] [C. F. P.]

ASCALPO, a physician of Patrae, in Achaia, who attended on Cicero's freedman, Tiro, during an illness, b. c. 51. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 9.) Cicero was so much pleased by his kindness and his medical skill, that he wrote a letter of recommendation for him to Servius Sulpicius, b. c. 47. (xiii. 20.)

[ W. A. G. ]

ASCLEPIADES. [ASCALAPIUS.]

ASCLEPIADES (Ἀσκληπιάδης). 1. Of Alexander, seems to have been a grammarian, as the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Nub. 37) quotes him
2. Of ANAZARBA in Cilicia, is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Anazarba), as the author of many works, of which however only one, on rivers (περὶ ποταμῶν), is specified.

3. A son of ARBUS, wrote a work on Demetrius Phalerus. (Athen. xiii. p. 567.) It is not quite certain whether he is the same as Asclepiades of Myrleia, who is also called a native of Nicaea. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Nicaea.)

4. A Cynic philosopher, a native of Phlius, and a contemporary of Crates of Thebes, who must consequently have lived about 430. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 91; Tertull. c. Nat. ii. 14.) Whether he is the same as the one whom Cicero (De nat. vi. 39) states to have been blind, is uncertain.

6. Of CYPRUS, wrote a work on the history of his native island and Phoenicia, of which a fragment is preserved in Porphyrins. (De Abstin. iv. 15; comp. Hieronym. ad Jostus. 2.)

7. An EGYPTIAN, possessed, according to Suidas (s. v. Ασκληπιάς), a profound knowledge of Egyptology, and wrote hymns on his native gods. He also composed a work upon the agreement among the different religions, a second on the history of Egypt, and a third on Ogyges. Of the history of the different religions, a second on the history of Egyptian, and a third on Ogyges. Of the history of Egypt the sixtieth book is quoted by Athenaeus.

8. A work as that on the agreement among the different religions. Suetonius calls him Asclepiades Mendes, and of whom he quotes a fragment. This Asclepiades must be distinguished from an earlier Christian writer, to which Strabo occasionally refers. (iii. p. 167, &c.) Asclepiades of Myrleia is also mentioned as the author of several other works, of which, however, we possess only a few fragments.

1. On grammarians or grammars (περὶ γραμματικῶν), Suidas, s. v. Ορισταίοις; Anonymous. Vit. Arati; S. Empir. adv. Grammat. 47, 72, 253.

2. A work on the agreement among the different religions. (Athen. xi. p. 501.) A work called περὶ Νεστορίδος. (Athen. xi. pp. 477, 488, &c., 498, 503.)

11. Of ASCLEPIADES of Nicomedia. (Etym. M. s. v. Ασκληπιάς; Schol. ad Hom. Od. x. 2. xi. 269, 326, xii. 69, ed. Buttmann.) A work on the study of Bithynia (Bithyniad), which consisted of at least ten books. (Parthen. Enchir. 35; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 722, 791; Athen. h. p. 50.) He is usually believed to be the author of a history of Alexander the Great mentioned by Arrian. (Aen. vii. 15; comp. Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pp. 97, 158, 161, 187, ed. Westermann; F. X. Werder, Acta Philol. Monac. iii. p. 551, where the fragments of Asclepiades are collected.)

12. Of TRAJANUS in Thrace, a contemporary and disciple of Isocrates. (Phot. Bibl. p. 486, b. ed. Bekker.) He is called a tragic writer, but was more probably a sophist or a grammarian.

9. A lyric poet, from whom a certain species of verse, resembling the choriambic, is said to have derived its name; but the ancient themselves were not agreed whether the Asclepiatic verse was invented by Asclepiades, or whether he used it only more frequently than others. He lived after the time of Alcaeus and Sappho. (Haphestas, Echich. p. 34; Attilius Fortunianus, p. 2700, ed. Putsch.)

10. Of MENDEL. See No. 7.

11. Of MYRLEIA in Bithynia, or of Nicaea, a son of Diomannus. He was a pupil of Apollonius Rhodius, and lived about the time of Pompey the Great. Suidas places him nearly a century earlier, from which some modern critics have inferred, that ASCLEPIADES.

History and of his practice, it would appear that he may be fairly characterized as a man of natural talents, acquainted with human nature (or rather with human weakness), possessed of considerable shrewdness and address, but with little science or professional skill. He began (upon the plan which is so generally found successful by those who are conscious of their own ignorance) by vilifying the professional skill. He began (upon the plan which shrewdness and address, but with little science or with human weakness), possessed of considerable dious and effective mode of treating diseases than had been before known to the world. As he was ignorant of anatomy and pathology, he decried the labours of those who sought to investigate the structure of the body, or to watch the phenomena of disease, and he is said to have directed his attacks more particularly against the writings of Hippocrates. It appears, however, that he had the discretion to refrain from the use of very active and powerful remedies, and to trust principally to the efficacy of diet, exercise, bathing, and other circumstances of this nature. A part of the great popularity which he enjoyed depended upon his prescribing the liberal use of wine to his patients (Plin. H. N. vii. 37, xxvii. 22), and upon his not only attending in all cases, with great assiduity, to everything which contributed to their comfort, but also upon his flattering their prejudices and indulging their inclinations. By the due application of these means, and from the state of the people among whom he practised, we may, without much difficulty, account for the great eminence at which he arrived, and we cannot fail to recognise in Asclepiades the prototype of more than one popular physician of modern times. Justice, however, obliges us to admit, that he seems to have possessed a considerable share of acuteness and discernment, which on some occasions he employed with advantage. It is probable that to him we are indebted, in the first instance, for the arrangement of diseases into the two great classes of Acute and Chronic (Gael. Aurel. De Medicin. Chron. iii. 8. p. 469), a division which has a real foundation in nature, and which still forms an important feature in the most improved modern nosology. In his philosophical principles Asclepiades is said to have been a follower of Epicurus, and to have adopted his doctrine of atoms and pores, on which he attempted to build a new theory of disease, by supposing that all morbid action might be reduced into obstruction of the pores and irregular distribution of the atoms. This theory he accommodated to his division of diseases, the acute being supposed to depend essentially upon a constriction of the pores, or an obstruction of them by a superfluity of atoms; the chronic, upon a relaxation of the pores, or a deficiency of the atoms. Nothing remains of his writings but a few fragments, which have been collected and published by Gumpert in the little raccolta da Varii Frammenti Grcci e Lutiniy Firenze, 1758, 4to.; G. F. Bianchini, La Medicina d'Asclepiades per ben curare Ie Malaltie Acute, raccolta da Varii Frammenti Greci e Latini, Venezia, 1769, 4to.; K. F. Burdach, Asclepiades and John Brown, eine Parallele, Leipzig, 1800, 8vo.; Id. Scrittorum de Asclepiades Indice, Lips. 1800, 4to.; Bostock's Hist. of Med., from which work part of the preceding account has been taken.

2. ASCLEPIADES PHARMACON (Φαρμακων) or JUNIOR, a physician who must have lived at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century after Christ, as he quotes Andromachus, Dioscorides, and Sebonius Largus (Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. vii. 2, x. 2, vol. xii. pp. 51, 53, 342; De Compos. Medicin. sec. Gen. vii. 6, vol. xiii. p. 965), and is himself quoted by Galen. He derived his surname of Pharmacion from his skill and knowledge of pharmacy, on which subject he wrote a work in ten books, five on external remedies, and five on internal. (Gal. Hist. viii. 3. p. 442.) Galen quotes this work very frequently, and generally with approbation.

3. M. ARTORIO ASCLEPIADES. [Artorius.] 4. ASCLEPIADES PHILOPHYSICUS (Φιλοφυσικός), a physician, who must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Andromachus, Dioscorides, and Sebounius Largus (Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. vii. 5, viii. 5, vol. xiii. pp. 102, 179.) 5. L. SCRIBIONUS ASCLEPIADES, whose name occurs in a Latin inscription of unknown date, is supposed by Rhodius (ad Serv. Land. p. 4) to be Scribonius Largus Designianus [Largus], but this is very doubtful.

6. ASCLEPIADES TITIENSES, a physician, who must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsus Aurelianus. (De Morb. Accunt. iii. 5, p. 201.) 7. ASCLEPIADES JUNIOR (Θεοθεόπουλος), a physician quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. i. 1. vol. xii. p. 410), who is the same person as Asclepiades Pharmacion.

8. AREUS ASCLEPIADES (Ἀρεύς) is sometimes inserted in the list of physicians of the name of Asclepiades, but this appears to be a mistake, as in the passage of Galen where the names occur (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. viii. 5, vol. xii. p. 185, 186) the name of 'Areus' should probably read 'Areou Ασκληπιάδου'. [Areus.] 9. M. GALLUS ASCLEPIADES seems to be a similar mistake, as in Galen, De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos. viii. 5, vol. xii. p. 179, instead of Αρεον Μάρκου τοῦ Ασκληπιάδου we should probably read Αρεον Μάρκου τοῦ Ασκληπιάδου. [Gallus.]

There are several other physicians of the name of Asclepiades mentioned in inscriptions, of whom nothing worth recording is known. A list of them is given in the works mentioned above. [W.A.C.]

ASCLEPIODORUS (Ἀσκληπιόδωρος). 1. A Macedonian, son of Timander, was one of the genera of Alexander the Great, and after the conquest of Syria was appointed by Alexander satrap of that country. In a. c. 328, he led reinforcements from Syria to Alexander in eastern Asia, and there became involved in the conspiracy which was formed by Hermolaus against the life of the king. (Arrian, Anab. iv. 13; Ind. 18; Curtius, vi. 10.) He soon afterwards, as the story of whom Antigonus, in a. c. 317, made satrap of Persia (Diod. xiii. 48); but he must be distinguished from an Asclepiodotus, a general of Cassander, mentioned by Diodorus. (xix. 60.)

2. The author of a small work on tactics (ταξιν καθόλου), who is in some MSS. called Asclepiodotus. His work exists in several MSS. at Leyden, Paris, and Rome, but has not yet been published. [L. S.]

ASCLEPIODOTUS. 1. An Athenian painter, a contemporary of Apelles, who considered him to excelled him in the symmetry and correctness of his drawing. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10. a. 36. § 21.) Plutarch (de Glorios Athen. 2) ranks him with Euphranor and Nikias.

2. Of Alexandria, the most distinguished among the disciples of Proclus, and the teacher of Damascius, one of the most zealous champions of Paganism. He wrote a commentary on the Timaeus of Plato, which however is lost. (Olympiod. Meteorol. 4; Suidas, s. v. Άσκληπιόδωτος; Damascius, Vit. Isid. ap. Phot. pp. 344, b. 345, b.)

3. An author who lived in the time of Diocletian, and seems to have written a life of this emperor. (Vopisc. Aurelian. 44.) He seems to be the same as the one who is mentioned as a general in the reign of Probus. (Vopisc. Prob. 22.)

4. A pupil of Posidonius, who, according to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vi. 17), wrote a work called "Questionum Naturalium cause." (Seneca, De Differ. Mori. 4. A pupil of Posidonius, who, according to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vi. 17), wrote a work called "Questionum Naturalium cause."

5. A commander of the Gallic mercenaries in the army of Persius, king of Macedonia. (Liv. xii. 51, xiiiv. 2.) [L. S.]

ASCLEPIODOTUS (Ἀσκληπιόδωτος), a physician, who was also well versed in mathematics and music, and who grew famous for reviving the use of white heliochrome, which in his time had grown quite out of vogue. He lived probably about the end of the 5th century after Christ, as he was the pupil of Jacobus Psychrestus, and is mentioned by Damascius. (Damascius, ap. Phot. Cod. 242, p. 344, b., ed. Bekk.; Suidas, s. v. Σωρανος; Freund’s Hist. of Physic.)

6. Situated on the coast of Istria. (W. A. G.)

ASCLEPIODOTUS, CASSIUS, a man of great wealth among the Bithynians, showed the same respect to Soranus, when he was under Nero’s displeasure, as he had when Soranus was in prosperity. He was accordingly deprived of his property and driven into exile, a. d. 67, but was restored by Galba. (Tac. Ann. xi. 39; Dion Cass. lxi. 26.)

ASCLEPIODOTUS (Ἀσκληπιόδωτος). 1. A fabulous person, said to have been a disciple of Hermes, the Egyptian Thot, who was regarded as the father of all wisdom and knowledge. There existed in antiquity a Greek dialogue (λόγος τέλειος) between Asclepius and Hermes on God, man, and the universe; we now possess only a Latin translation of it, which in former times used to be attributed to Appuleius. It is entitled Hermetis Trismegisti Asclepius, seu de Natura Deorum Dialogus, and is evidently the production of a very late time, that is, of the age in which a reconciliation was attempted between the polytheism of antiquity and Christianity through the medium of the views of the New Platonists. (Boschin in Oudendorp’s edition of Appuleius, iii. p. 517; Hildbrand, de Vita et Scriptis Appuleii, p. 26, &c.) To the same Asclepius is also ascribed a work still extant, entitled διὸς ΄Ασκληπιόδωτος της Ἁμμων βασιλείας, which is printed together with a Latin translation by A. Turnebus in his edition of the Poems ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus (Paris, 1554, 4to.), and in F. Patrieix’s Nova de Universis Philosophis, Ferrara, 1591, fol. The Latin translation of the work is contained in vol. ii. of the works (Opera) of Marsilius Ficinus, Basel, 1561.

2. A Greek grammarian of uncertain date, who wrote commentaries upon the orations of Demosthenes and the history of Thucydides; but both works are now lost. (Ulpian, ad Dom. Philip. 1; Schol. Bavar. ad Dom. de fidei legg. pp. 375, 378; Marcellin. Vii. Thucyl. 57; Schol. ad Thucyl. i. 56.)

3. Of Tralles, a Peripatetic philosopher and a disciple of Ammonius, the son of Hermias. He lived about a. d. 500, and wrote commentaries on the first six or seven books of Aristotle’s Metaphysics and on the διαλεκτική of Nicomachus of Gerasa. These commentaries are still extant in MS., but only a portion of them has yet been printed in Brandis, Scholia Graeca in Aristot. Metaph. p. 518, &c.; comp. Fabr. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 258; St. Croix in the Magna Synagog. Cypriote Annexe, vol. iii. p. 359. [L. S.]

ASCLEPIUS (Ἀσκληπιός), a physician, who must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galen. (De Differ. Morb. c. 9, vol. vi. p. 389.) A person of the same name is quoted by the Schoolist on Hippocrates (Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 458, n. 470, n.) as having written a commentary on the Aphorisms, and probably also on most of the other works of Hippocrates, as he is said to have undertaken to explain his writings by comparing one part with another. (Ibid.; Littre, OEuvres d’Hippocr. vol. i. p. 125.) Another physician of the same name is said by Fabricius to be mentioned by Aretius. [W. A. G.]

ASCLETARIO, an astrologer and mathematician in the time of Domitian. On one occasion he was brought before the emperor for some offence. Domitian tried to put the knowledge of the astrologer to the test, and asked him what kind of death he was to die, whereupon Ascletario answered, "I know that I shall soon be torn to pieces by the dogs." To prevent the realisation of this assertion, Domitian ordered him to be put to death immediately, and to be buried. When his body lay on the funeral pile, a vehement wind arose, which carried the body from the pile, and some dogs, which had been near, immediately began devouring the half-roasted body. Domitian, on being informed of this, is said to have been made more moved and perplexed than he had ever been before. This tale, which is related in all its simplicity by Sartonius (Domit. 15), is much distorted in the accounts which Cedrenus, Constantine Marandites, and others give of it. [L. S.]

fore the commencement of the Christian era, and in the accounts which Cedrenus, Constantine Marandites, and others give of it. [L. S.]

Asconius, the one the companion of Virgil and the expounder of Cicero, the other an historian who flourished at a later epoch, is in opposition to the clear testimony of antiquity, which recognises one only. He wrote a work, now lost, on the life of Sullust; and another, which has likewise perished, against the censurers of Virgil, of which Donatus and other grammarians have availed themselves in their illustrations of that poet; but there is no ground for ascribing to him the tract entitled "origo gentis Romanae," more commonly, but with as little foundation, assigned to Aurelius Victor.

But far more important and valuable than the above was his work on the speeches of Cicero; and fragments of commentaries, bearing his name, are still extant, on the Divinatio, the first two speeches against Verres and a portion of the third, the speeches against Cornelius (L. B.), the speech in toga candida, for Scarrus, against Piso, and for Milo. The remarks which were drawn up for the instruction of his sons (Comm. in Milou. 14) are conveyed in very pure language, and refer chiefly to points of history and antiquities, great pains being bestowed on the illustration of those constitutional forms of the senate, the popular assemblies, and the courts of justice, which were fast falling into oblivion under the empire. This character, however, does not apply to the notes on the Verrine orations, which are of a much more grammatical cast, and exhibit not unfrequently traces of a declining Latinity. Hence, after a very rigid and minute examination, the most able modern critics have decided that these last are not from the pen of Asconius, but must be attributed to some grammarian of a much later date, one who may have been the contemporary or successor of Servius or Donatus. It is impossible here to analyse the reasoning by which this conclusion has been satisfactorily established, but those who wish for full information will find everything they can desire in the excellent treatise of Madvig. (De Asconii Pedianti, &c. Commentaritis, Hafniae, 1828, 8vo.)

The history of the preservation of the book is curious. Poggio Bracciolini, the renowned Florentine, when attending the council of Constance in the year 1416, discovered a manuscript of Asconius in the monastery of St. Gall. This MS. was transcribed by him, and about the same time by Bartolomeo di Montelpulciano, and by Sosomen, a canon of Pistoia. Thus three copies were taken, and these are still in existence, but the original has long since disappeared. All the MSS. employed by the editors of Asconius seem to have been derived from the transcript of Poggio exclusively, and their discrepancies arise solely from the conjectural emendations which have been introduced from time to time in the purpose of correcting the numerous corruptions and supplying the frequently-recurring blanks. Poggio has left no description of the archetype, but it evidently must have been in bad order, from the number of small gaps occasioned probably by edges or corners having been torn off, or words rendered illegible by dust. Indeed the account given of the place where the monks had deposited their literary treasures is sufficient to account fully for such imperfections, for it is represented to have been "a most foul and dark dungeon at the bottom of a tower, into which not even criminals convicted of capital offences would have been thrust down."

The first edition of Asconius was taken directly from the transcript of Poggio, and was published at Venice in 1477, along with sundry essays and dissertations on the speeches of Cicero. The work was frequently reprinted in the early part of the sixteenth century, and numerous editions have appeared from time to time, either separately or attached to the orations themselves; but, notwithstanding the labours of many excellent scholars, the text is usually exhibited in a very corrupt and interpolated form. By far the best is that which is to be found in the fifth volume of Cicero's works as edited by Orelli and Baiter; but many improvements might yet be made if the three original transcripts were to be carefully collated, instead of reproducing mere copies of copies which have been disfigured by the carelessness or presumption of successive scribes.

ASCUS ('Arros'), a giant, who in conjunction with Lycurgus chained Dionysus and threw him into a river. Hermes, or, according to others, Zeus, rescued Dionysus, conquered (ebúarccro) the giant, flayed him, and made a bag ('Arros) of his skin. From this event the town of Damascus in Syria was believed to have derived its name. (Etym. M. and Steph. Byz. s. v. yuaúrós.) [L. S.]

ASDRUBAL. [HANDRUBAL.]

ASELLIO, P. SEMPRO'NIIUS, was tribune of the soldiers under P. Scipio Africanus at Numantia, u. c. 133, and wrote a history of the affairs in which he had been engaged. (Gell. ii. 13.) His work appears to have commenced with the Punic wars, and it contained a very full account of the times of the Gracchi. The exact title of the work, and the number of books into which it was divided, are not known. From the great superiority which Asellio assigns to history above annals (ap. Gell. v. 18), it is pretty certain that his own work was not in the form of annals. It is sometimes cited by the name of libri rerum gestarum, and sometimes by that of historiarum; and it contained at least fourteen books. (Gell. xii. 3, 21; Charis. ii. p. 193.) It is cited also in Gell. l. 13, iv. 9, xiii. 3, 21; Priscian, v. p. 668; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. xii. 121; Nonius, s. v. gladiator.

Cicero speaks (de Leg. i. 2) slightly of Asellio. P. Sempronius Asellio should be carefully distinguished from G. Sempronius Testamenti, who was a cousin of Varro. [TUDI] Comp. Krause, Vite et Frugm. Historiarum Latinarum, p. 216, &c.

ASELLUS, a cognomen in the Aemilian and Claudian gentes. The Aemilin gens was a plebeian one; and the Aselli in the Cornelii gens were also plebeians.
2. Ti. Claudius Aesselus, tribune of the soldiers in the army of the consul, C. Claudius Nero, n. c. 207, praetor in n. c. 206, when he obtained Sardinia as his province, and plebeian aedile in n. c. 204. (Liv. xxvii. 41, xxviii. 10, xxix. 11.) Appian (de Bell. Afr. ii. 37) relates an extraordinary adventure of this Claudius Aesselus in n. c. 212.

3. Ti. Claudius Aesselus, of the equestrian order, was deprived of his horse, and reduced to the condition of an aerarian, by Scipio Afric anus, the younger, in his censorship, b. c. 142. When Aesselus boasted of his military services, and complained that he had been degraded unjustly, Scipio replied with the proverb, "Agas asellum," i. e. "Agas asellum, si bovem non agere queas" (Cic. de Dell. Annib. iv. 37) relates an extraordinary adventure of this Claudius Asullos in u. c. 207, praetor in B. c. 142. (Liv. Epit. 73; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Appian, B. c. i. 40; Butot, v. 3.)

2. Cn. Asinius, only known as the father of C. Asinius Pollio. (Pollio.)

3. Asinius, a friend of Antony, who surrendered to C. Asinius Pollio, at the command of the commander of the Marrucini in the Marsic war, fell in battle against Marius, b. c. 90. (Liv. Epit. 73; Valerius. See Cn. Asinii.)

ASI'NIUS QUADRATUS. [Quadratus.]

ASIUS ('Aeos). 1. A son of Hytaleus of Aries, and father of Aemamus and Phaeonos. He was one of the allies of the Trojans, and brought them auxiliaries from the several towns over which he ruled. He was slain by Idomeneus. (Hom. II. ii. 833, xii. 140, xiii. 389, &c., xvi. 582.)

2. A son of Dymas and brother of Hecebe. Apollo assumed the appearance of this Asius, when he wanted to stimulate Hector to fight against Patroclus. (Hom. II. xvi. 715, &c.; Eustath. p. 1062.) According to Dicytus Cretensis (iv. 12), Asius was slain by Ajax. There are two more mythical personages of this name, which is also used as a surname of Zeus, from the town of Aeos or Oases inCrete. (Virg. Aen. x. 123; Tacit. ad Lyocr. 355; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Aeos.)

ASIUS ('Aeos), one of the earliest Greek poets, who lived, in all probability, about b. c. 700, though some critics would place him at an earlier and others at a later period. He was a native of Samos, and Athenaeus (iii. p. 125) calls him the old Samian poet. According to Pansanius (vii. 4. § 2), his father's name was Amphitoelemon. Asius wrote epic and elegiac poems. The subject or subjects of his epic poetry are not known; and the few fragments which we now possess consist of genealogical statements or remarks about the Samians, whose luxurious habits he describes with great satyvet and humour. The fragments are preserved in Athenaeus, Pausanius, Strabo, Apollodorus, and a few others. His elegies were written in the regular elegiac metre, but all have perished with the exception of a very brief one which is preserved in Athenaeus. (I. c.) The fragments of Asius are collected in N. Bach, Collin, Tyrtaci et Asii Samii quae superant, &c., Leipzig, 1831, 8vo.; in Dübner's edition of Hesiod, &c., Paris, 1840, and in Dümster, Die Fragm, der Epischen Poes. p. 66, &c., Nachtrag, p. 31. [L. S.]

ASIUS ('Aeos'), a work, two mythical personages, one a daughter of Antiphilus, who became by Hercules the mother of Mentor (Apollod. ii. 7. 2 c.)

A'SI'NIA GENs, plebeian. The Asini came by Japetus the mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Calchas, where a temple was built to her at Las. (Pans. iii. 24. § 5.)

A'SI A ('A e), the name of a variety of plants, of which Pliny says (vii. 17) has preserved two verses of Lucilius referring to this change:

"Scipiade magno improbus objiciebat Asielus.\"

A'SI A ('A eia), a surname of Athena in Crete. (Virg. Aen. x. 123; Tacit. ad Lyocr. 355; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Aeos.)

ASOPITUS (Ἀσοπῖτος). 1. Father of Phormion (Thuc. i. 64), called Asopichus by Pausanias. (i.
24. § 12.)

2. Son of Phormion, was, at the request of the Acranyians who wished to have one of Phormion's family in the command, sent by the Athe nians in the year following his father's naval victories, n. c. 428 (the 4th of the Peloponnesian war), with some ships to Naupactus. He fell shortly after in an unsuccessful attempt on the Leucanidian coast. (Thuc. iii. 7.) [A. H. C.]

ASOPODORUS, a statuary, possibly a native of Argos (Thiersch, Epoch. d. bild. Kunst. p. 275, Anm.), was a pupil of Polycleitus. (Plin. xxxiv.
8. s. 19.) [C. P. M.]

ASOPUS (Ἀσωπός), the god of the river Asopus, was a son of Oceanus and Tethys, or according to others, of Poseidon and Pero, of Zeus and Eurynome, or last of Poseidon and Cegluse.
(Plut. 124. s. 2, &c.; Schol. 12. § 4.) He was married to Metope, the daughter of the river god Ladon, by whom he had two sons and twelve, or, according to others, twenty daughters.
Their names differ in the various accounts. (Apoll.
lod. i. c.; Diod. iv. 72.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vi.
144, Isl. viii. 37.; Paus. ix. 1. § 2.; Herod. ix.
51.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 278.) Several of these daughters of Asopus were carried off by gods, which is commonly believed to indicate the coloni established by the people inhabiting the banks of the Asopus, who also transferred the name of Asopus to other rivers in the countries where they settled. Aegina was one of the daughters of Asopus, and Pindar mentions a river of this name in Aegina.
(Nem. iii. 4, with the Schol.) In Greece there were two rivers of this name, the one in Achaia in Peloponnesus, and the other in Boeotia, and the legends of the two are frequently confounded or mixed up with each other. Hence arose the dif ferent accounts about the descent of Asopus, and the difference in the names of his daughters. But as these names have, in most cases, reference to geographical circumstances, it is not difficult to perceive to which of the two river gods this or that particular daughter originally belonged. The more celebrated of the two is that of Peloponnesus.
When Zeus had carried off his daughter Aegina, and Asopus had searched after her everywhere, he was at last informed by Silanus of Corinth, that Zeus was the guilty party. Asopus now revolted against Zeus, and wanted to fight with him, but Zeus was the guaranty. Asopus now revolted against Zeus, and wanted to fight with him, but Zeus struck him with his thunderbolt and confined him to his original bed. Pieces of charcoal which were found in the bed of the river in later times, were believed to have been produced by the light ning of Zeus. (Paus. ii. 5. § 1., &c.; Apollod. iii.
12. § 6.) According to Pausanias (ii. 12. § 5.)
the Peloponnesian Asopus was a man who, in the reign of Aras, discovered the river which was sub sequently called by his name. [L. S.]

ASPALIS (Ἀσπάλη), a daughter of Argus, considered an interesting and a popular legend is preserved in Antoninus Liberalis. (13.) [L. S.]

ASPAR, a Numidian, sent by Jugurtha to Bocchus in order to learn his designs, when the latter had sent for Sulla. He was, however, de ceived by Bocchus. (Sall. Jug. 108, 112.)

ASPASIA (Ἀσπασία). 1. The celebrated Miletian, daughter of Aichion, came to reside at Athens, and there gained and fixed the affections of Pericles, not more by her beauty than by her high mental accomplishments. With his wife.
who was a lady of rank, and by whom he had tw sons, he seems to have lived unhappily; and, hav ing parted from her by mutual consent, he attached himself to Aspasia during the rest of his life as closely as was allowed by the law, which forbade marriage with a foreign woman under severe penal Nor can there be any doubt that she acquired over him a great ascendancy; though this perhaps comes before us in an exaggerated shape in the statements which ascribe to her influence the war with Samos on behalf of Miletus in n. c. 440, as well as the Peloponnesian war itself. (Plut. Peric. l. c.; Arist.
oph. Pax. 587, &c.; Thuc. iii. 115.) The con nection, indeed, of Pericles with Aspasia appears to have been a favourite subject of attack in Athenian Schol. ad Plat. Menex. p. 293, &c.) as well as with certain writers of philosophical dialogues, between whom and the comic poets, in respect of their abusive propensities, Athenaeus remarks a strong family likeness. (Athen. v. p. 220; Casaub. ad loc.) Nor was her bitterness satisfied with the vent of satiety; for it was Hermippus, the comic poet, who brought against Aspasia the double charge of im punity and of infamous pandering to the vices of Pericles; and it required all the personal in fluence of the latter with the people, and his most earnest entreaties and tears, to procure her acquittal. (Plut.
Peric. 32.; Athen. xiii. p. 389; comp. Thirl wall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 57, &c., and Appendix ii.)
The house of Aspasia was the great centre of the highest literary and philosophical society of Athens, and the intellectual influence which she ex ercised was undoubtedly considerable, even though we reject the story of her being the preceptor of Socrates, on the probable ground of the irony of those passages in which such statement is made 14, Memor. ii. 6. § 36.; Herrn. de Soc. magist.

ver of the administration of Pericles (Corg. p.
515, &c.), and thought perhaps that the refine ment introduced by Aspasia had only added a new temptation to the licentiousness from which it was not disconnected. (Athen. xiii. p. 569, &c.) On the death of Pericles, Aspasia is said to have attached herself to one Lysicleus, a dealer in cattle, and to have made him by her instructions a first-rate ora

2. A Phocian, daughter of Heromitius, was married away from her country to the seneglio of Cyrus the Younger, who so admired, not her beauty only, but her superior qualities of mind and character, that he made her his favourite wife, giving her the name of "wise." She is said to have frequently aided him with her advice, the adoption of which he never regretted; and they lived together with great mutual affection till the death of the prince at the battle of Cumana. She then fell into the hands of Artaxerxes, and became his wife. (Plut. Artax. 24, Artax. 36; Ael. V. H. xii. 1.; Xen. Anab. i. 10, § 2.) When Dareius, son of Artaxerxes, was appointed successor to the throne, he asked his father to surrender Aspasia to him. The request, it seems, could not be refused, as coming from the king elect; Artaxerxes, therefore, gave her up, on finding that she herself consented to the transfer; but he soon after took her away again, and made her priestess of a temple at Eleutherai, where strict celibacy was requisite; and this gave rise to that conspiracy of Dareius against his father, which was detected, and cost him his life. (Plut. Artax. 27—29; Just. x. 2.) Her name is said to have been "Milto," by some called her "Aspasia," after the mistress of Pericles (Plut. Peric. 24; Athen. xiii. p. 576, d.); but "Milto" itself seems to have been a name expressive of the beauty of her complexion. (Ael. V. H. xii. 1; Schol. Phot. Peric. 24, &c.) Aspasia was also secretary to the emperor, but his letters were censured by his opponent Pausanias, for their declamatory character and their want of precision and clearness. He is said to have written several orations, which, however, are now lost. They are praised for their simplicity and originality, and for the absence of all pompous affectation in them. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 33; Budoc. p. 66; Suidas, s. v. 'Avar¬dos.)

4. Of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and historian of uncertain date, who, according to Suidas (s. v. 'Avar¬dos), wrote a history of Euphras and of the things remarkable in that country, in twenty books, theoretical works on rhetoric, and some others. (Comp. Budoc. p. 66.)

ASPATHINES ('Astrapheinos), one of the seven Persian chiefs, who conspired against the Magi. He was wounded in the thigh, when the latter were put to death. (Herod. iii. 70, &c. 78.) He was the father of Praxaspes. (vii. 97.)

ASPASUS or ASPHALLUS. A Roman grammarian, who wrote commentaries on Terence (Schopen, de Terentio et Donato, &c. p. 32, Bonn, 1821) and Virgil. (Macrob. iii. 5; Hayne's account of the ancient Commentators on Virgil, prefixed to his edition of Virgil.) Asper is also quoted in the Scholia on Virgil, discovered by A. Mai. (Virgil. Interp. Fed. Mediol. 1818.) This Asper must be distinguished from another grammatical of the same name, usually called Asper Junior, but who is equally unknown. The latter is the author of a small work entitled "Ars Grammatica," which has been printed in the collections of Grammatici Illustres XII., Paris, 1516; Treas Artis Grammatic. Authoris, Lips. 1527; Grammat. Lat. Audores, by Putschius, Hanov. 1605; Corpus Grammat. Lat. by Lindemann, vol. i. Lips. 1831.

ASPER, JU Li Us, had been raised to the consulship, as had also his sons, by Caracalla, but was afterwards, without any apparent cause, deprived of all his honours, and driven out of Rome by the same emperor, A. d. 212. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 5.) We learn from an inscription (op. Fabret. p. 494.), that the consuls in A. d. 212 were both of the name of Julius Asper. Either the father or one of his sons was appointed governor of Asia by Macrinus, but was deprived of this dignity on his journey to the province, on account of some insinuating words which offended the emperor. It is usually stated, on the authority of Dion Cassius, that Asper was killed by Elagabalus; but Dion Cassius does not say this. (Dion Cass. lxxxvii. 22, lxxxix. 4.)

ASPHALLUS, a centurion, one of the conspirators against Nero, a. d. 66, met his fate with great firmness, when he was put to death after the detection of the conspiracy. (Tac. Ann. xv. 49, 50, 68; Dion Cass. lxxi. 24.)

ASPHALUS or ASPHALLUS (Ἀσφάλης or Ἀσφάλειος), a surname of Poseidon, under which he was worshipped in several towns of Greece. It describes him as the god who grants... safety to ports and to navigation in general. (Strab. i. p. 57; Paus. viii. 21. § 3; Plut. Them. 35; Suid. s. v.)

[LS.]

ASPLE'DON (Ἀσπλέδων), a son of Poseidon and the nymph Midea (Cher. st. Paus. ix. 35. § 6); according to others, he was a son of Orchomenus and brother of Clymenus and Amphidicus (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀσπλέδων), or a son of Presbon and Sterope (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 272.) He was regarded as the founder of Aspledon, an ancient town of the Minyans in Boeotia. [L. S.]

ASPRE'NAS, a surname of the Nonii, a consul family under the early emperors. (Comp. Plin. H. N. xxx. 20.) 1. C. Nonius Asprenas, a performer in the Trojan lusus under Augustus, and in consequence of an injury which he sustained from a fall in the game, he received a golden chain from Augustus, and was allowed to assume the surname of Torquatius, both for himself and his posterity. (Suet. Oct. 43.)

2. L. Asprenas, a legate under his maternal uncle. Varus, a legate under Augustus, A.D. 19, preserved the Roman army whom she had by the father of the gods. (Apollod. ii. 9.)

[LS.]

ASTEAS or ASTEAS, a painter, whose name succeeded Eulalius as prknas (Ἀστέας), a surname of Athena, who became by Bellerophontes the mother of Hydippus, whence Ovid calls the last of the genuine and more general tradition, she was probably the same as the L. Nonius Asprenas who was consul a. d. 6, and as the L. Nonius Asprenas mentioned by Tacitus, who was preeminent in Africa at the death of Augustus, a. d. 14, and who, according to some accounts, sent soldiers, at the command of Tiberius, to kill Sempronius Gracchus. (Tact. Ann. 1. 53.) He is mentioned again by Tacitus, a. d. 20. (Ann. iii. 18.)

3. P. Nonius Asprenas, consul, a. d. 38. (Dion Cass. lix. 9; Frontinus, de Aqu. Cist. 35.)

4. L. Nonius Asprenas and P. Nonius Asprenas are two orators frequently introduced as speakers in the Controversiae (1-4, 8, 10, 11, &c.) of M. Seneca.

ASPLE'NAS, CAL'PURNIUS, appointed governor of Galatia and Phrygia by Gallus, a. d. 70, induced the partisans of the counterfeiter Nero to put him to death. (Tact. Hist. ii. 9.)

ASSAON. [Norse.]

ASSALECTUS, a Roman sculptor, whose name is found upon a vase of his workmanship, discovered at Paestum, and now preserved in the Royal Museum at Naples. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. K. viii. 4. § 5) speaks slightly. [C. P. M.]

ASSA'RACUS (Ἀσσάρακος), a son of Tros and Callirhoe, the daughter of Scamander. He was king of Troy, and husband of Hieromneme, by whom he became the father of Cepys, the father of Anchises. (Hom. Il. ii. xxiv. 22, &c.; Apoll. ii. 12. § 2; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iii. 35; Theog. ix. 139.)

[LS.]

ASSETIA (Ἀσσετία), a surname of Athena, derived from the town of Asecess in Ionia, where she had a temple. (Herod. i. 19.)

ASSE'AS or ASSE'AS, a painter, whose name is found upon a vase of his workmanship, discovered at Paestum, and now preserved in the Royal Museum at Naples. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. K. iii. Ann. 778.)

[LS.]

ASTacus (Ἀστάκος). 1. A son of Poseidon and the nymph Olbia, from whom the town of Astacus in Bithynia, which was afterwards called Nicomedea, derived its name. (Arrian, op. Seph. Byz. s. v.; Paus. v. 12. § 5; Strab. xii. p. 563.)

2. The father of Ismarus, Leades, Asphodicus, and Melanippus, whence Ovid calls the last of these heroes Astacides. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; Ovid, Ibis, 515.)

[LS.]

ASTER'IA, [Ἀστερία], a daughter of the Titan Ceus (according to Hygin. Fab. Prof. of Polus) and Phoebe. She was the sister of Loto, and, according to Hesiod (Theog. 409), the wife of Perses, by whom she became the mother of Ismarus, Leades, Asphodicus, and Melanippus (de Nat. Decor. iii. 16) makes her the mother of the fourth Heracles by Zeus. But according to the genuine and more general tradition, she was an inhabitant of Olympus, and beloved by Zeus. In order to escape from his embraces, she got metamorphosed into a quail (ὄφρυς), threw herself into the sea, and was here metamorphosed into the island Asteria (the island which had fallen from heaven like a star), or Ortygia, afterwards called Deles. (Apollod. i. 2. § 2, 4. § 1; Athen. ix. p. 392; Hygin. Fab. 53; Callimach. Hymn. in Del. 37; Serv. ad Aen. ill. 73.) There are several other mythical personages of this name,—one a daughter of Alcyoneus (Ἀλκυόνειδης); a second, one of the Danaids (Apollod. i. § 5); a third, a daughter of Atlas (Hygin. Fab. 290, where, perhaps, Asteria is to be read); and a fourth, a daughter of Hydissus, who became by Bellerophon the mother of Hydissus, the founder of Hydissus in Caria. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Θυβίρις.)

ASTER'ION or ASTERIUS (Ἀστέριον or Ἀστερίος). 1. A son of Teuantus, and king of the Cretans, who married Europa after she had been carried to Crete by Zeus. He also brought up the three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanths whom she had by the father of the gods. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2, &c.; Diod. iv. 60.)

2. A son of Cometes, Pyrmus, or Priscus, by Antigone, the daughter of Phereus. He is mentioned as one of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 35; Paus. v. 17. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 14; Valer. Plac. i. 355.) There are two more mythical personages of this name, one a river-god (Ἀχαρά), and the second a son of Minos, who was slain by Theseus. (Paus. ii. 31. § 1.)

ASTERION (Ἀστέριον), a statuary, the son of a man named Ascyclus. Pausanias (vi. 3. § 1) mentions a statue of Chares, a Sicilian pupilist, which was of his workmanship. [C. P. M.]

ASTERIUS (Ἀστέριος), a son of Annax and grandson of Ge. According to a Milesian legend, he was buried in the small island of Lade, and his body measured ten cubits in length. (Paus. iii. 35. § 5, vii. 2. § 5.) There are four other mythical personages of this name, who are mentioned in the following passages:— Apollod. iii. 1. § 4; Apollon. Rhod. i. 176; Apollod. i. 9. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 170.

ASTERIUS (Ἀστέριος), succeeded Eulalius as bishop of Amasia in Pontus, in the latter part of the fourth century. He had been educated in his youth by a Scythian slave. Several of his homilies are still extant, and extracts from others, which have perished, have been preserved by Photius. (Cod. 271.) He belonged to the orthodox party in the Arian controversy, and seems to have lived to a great age.

Fabricius (Bibl. Grac. ix. p. 519, &c.) gives a list of 25 other persons of this name, many of whom are prelates or dignitaries of the church, and lived about the end of the fourth or the beginning of the fifth century. Among them we may notice Asterius, a Cappadocian, who embraced Christianity, but apostatized in the persecution under Diocletian and Maximian (about a. d. 304). He subsu-quently returned to the Christian faith, and joined the Arian party, but on account of his apostasy was excluded from the dignity of bishop to which he aspired. He was the author of several theological works. There was also an Asterius of Synophylus, whom St. Jerome (Epist. 88, ad Magnun Oult.) mentions as one of the most celebrated ecclesiastical writers. [C. P. M.]

ASTERIUS, TURCIUS RUFUS APRONI-A NUS, was consul a. d. 494, devoted himself to literary pursuits, and emended a MS. of Suidusus, and one of Virgil, on which he wrote an epigram.

(Auth. Lat. No. 281, ed. Meyer.) [C. P. M.]

ASTERODIA. [EPISTODIAJ.

ASTEROPEAIUS (Asteropaios), a son of Pes-legon, and grandson of the river-god Axius, was the commander of the Paeonians in the Trojan war, and an ally of the Trojans. He was the tallest among all the men, and fought with Achilles, whom he at first wounded, but was afterwards killed by him. (Hom. H. xxi. 139, &c.; Philostr. Heroic. xix. 7.) [L. S.]

ASTEROPHE (Asteroph), two mythical personages: see ACRAGAS and AESACUS. [L. S.]

ASTEROPHEIA (Asterophia), two mythical personages, one a daughter of Pelias, who in conjunction with her sisters murdered her father (Paus. viii. 11. § 2) and the second a daughter of Delion and Diomedon (Apolod. i. 9. § 4.) [L. S.]

ASTRAEUS (Asteraios), a son of Neptunus, a son of Niobe, and brother of Alœoces, was a Laconian hero of the royal house of Agis. He and his brother found the statue of Artemis Orthia in a bush, and be-made mad at the sight of it. He is said to have been the father of Damaratus by the wife of Ariston.
He had a sanctuary at Sparta, and was worshipped there as a hero. (Herod. vi. 69; Paus.
iii. 16. § 5, &c.) [L. S.]

ASTRAEA (Astraios), a daughter of Zeus and Themis, or according to others, of Astraenus by Eos.

During the golden age, this star-bright maiden lived on earth and among men, whom she blessed; but when that age had passed away, Astraæa, who tarried longest among men, withdrew, and was placed among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 25; Eratost. Cat. Astr. ii. 1. 140.) [L. S.]

ASTRAEUS (Astraios), a Titan and son of Cronus and Eurybia. By Eos he became the father of the winds Zephyrus, Bores, and Notus, Eosphorus (the morning star), and all the stars of heaven. (Hesiod. Theog. 576, &c.) Ovid (Met.
xiv. 545) calls the winds fratre Astræi, which does not mean that they were brothers of Astraenus, but brothers through Astraenus, their common father. [L. S.]

ASTRAMPSYCHUS, a name borne by some of the ancient Persian Magians. (Diog. Laërt. proem. 2; Suidas, s. v. Mâvô.) There is still extent under this name a Greek poem, consisting of 101 iambic verses, on the interpretation of dreams (Oigounoprosou), printed in Rigault's edition of Artemidorus, in the collections of Obsopocus and Servais Galle, and in J. C. Bulenger, de Ration. Divinit. v. 5. The poem is a comparatively modern composition (not earlier than the fourth century after Christ), and the name of the author is perhaps an assumed one. Suidas (s. v.) also ascribes to the same author a treatise on the diseases of asses, and their cure. (Fabric. Bibl.

ASTRATEIA (Astrateia), a surname of Arteris, under which she had a temple near Pyrrhichus in Lacedonia, because she was believed to have stopped there the progress of the Amazons. (Paus. iii. 25.
§ 2.) [L. S.]

ASTYAGES (Astraixes), king of Media, (called by Ctesias Astraixys, and by Diodorus Astraixus), was the son and successor of Cyaxares. The accounts of this king given by Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon, differ in several important particulars. We learn from Herodotus (i. 74), that in the compact made between Cyaxares and Aly-attes in n. c. 610, it was agreed that Astyages should marriy Arysteu, the daughter of Alyattes. According to the chronology of Herodotus, he succceeded his father in n. c. 595, and reigned 35 years (i. 120.) His government was harsh. (i.
123.) Astyages, in accordance with a dream, gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyses, a Persian of good family. (i. 107.) Another dream induced him to send Harpagus to destroy the offspring of this marriage. The child, the future conqueror of the Medes, was given to a herdsman to expose, but he brought it up as his own. Years afterwards, circumstances occurred which brought the young Cyrus under the notice of Astyages, who, on inquiry, discovered his parentage. He inflicted a cruel punishment on Harpagus, who waited his time for revenge. When Cyrus had grown up to man's estate, Harpagus induced him to instigate the Persians to sell a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane as the grandchild of the Median forces, he deserted with the greater part of them to Cyrus. Astyages was taken prisoner, and Cyrus mounted the throne. He treated the captive monarch with mildness, but kept him in confinement till his death.

Ctesias agrees with Herodotus in making Astyages the last king of the Medes, but says, that Cyrus was in no way related to him till he married his daughter Amytis. When Astyages was attacked by Cyrus, he fled to Ecbatana, and was concealed in the palace by Amytis and her husband Spitamas, but discovered himself to his pursuers, to prevent his daughter and her husband and children from being put to the torture to induce them to reveal where he was hidden. He was loaded with chains by Oebarnus, but discovered himself to his pursuers, and was put to death by the orders of Cyrus, who treated him with great respect, and made him governor of the Barcanii, a Parthian people on the borders of Hyrcania. Spitamas was subsequently put to death by the orders of Cyrus, who married Amytis. Some time after, Amytis and Cyrus were desirous of seeing Asty-ages, a cunning named Petiasces was sent to escort him from his satrapy, but, at the instigation of Oebarnus, left him to perish in a desert region.
The crime was revealed by means of a dream, and Amytis took a cruel revenge on Petiasces. The body of Astyages was found, and buried with all due honours. We are told that, in the course of his reign, Astyages had waged war with the Be-72. p. 36, ed. Bekker.)

Xenophon, like Herodotus, makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says, that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyaxares II., on whose death Cyrus succeeded to the vacant throne. (Cyp. i.
§ 2.) This account seems to tally better with the notices contained in the book of Daniel. (v. 31, vi. 1, ix. 1.) Dareius the Mede, mentioned there and by Josephus (xii. § 4), is apparently the same with Cyaxares II. (Compare the account in the and Cyrus against the Assyrians.) In that case, Cyropaedeia of the joint expedition of Cyaxares and succeeded in bringing about an alliance between the Romans and his countrymen. (Polyb. xxiii. 14.) [C. P. M.]

ASTYMEDES. (Cypariciae of the joint expedition of Cyrus and against the Assyrians.) In that case, Cyrus according to Aeschylus, Pers. 766. But the question is by no means free from difficulty. [C. P. M.]

ASTY'AGES, a grammarian, the author of a commentary on Callimachus, and some other treatises on grammatical subjects. (Suidas, s. v. Eudocia, p. 64.) [C. P. M.]

ASTYANASSA ('Aστυανάσσα), said to have been a daughter of Muses and a slave of Helen, and to have composed poems on immodest subjects. (Suidas, s. v. Photius, Biblioth. p. 142, ed. Bekk.) Her personal existence, however, is very doubtful. [C. P. M.]

ASTY'ANAX ('Αστύαναξ), the son of Hector and Andromache; his more common name was Semmachus. After the taking of Troy the Greeks hurled him down from the walls of the city to prevent the fulfilment of a decree of fate according to which he was to become the king of Troy. (Hom. ii. vi. 400, &c.; Od. Met. xiii. 415; Hygin. Fab. 109.) A different mythical person of the name occurs in Apollodorus. (ii. 7, § 8.) [L. S.]

ASTY'DAMAS ('Αστύδαμας). 1. A tragic poet, the son of Morsimus and a sister of the poet Aeschylus, was the pupil of Isocrates, and according to Suidas (s. v. 'Aστυδαμας) wrote 240 tragedies and gained the prize fifteen times. His first tragedy was brought upon the stage in Ol. 93. 2. (Diod. xiv. p. 676.) He was the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (An. 2. 330), which gave rise to the proverb Σαονής Σαονίου Σαονικας ἀστυνάδαμας ποι. (Suidas, s. v. Αστύναδαμας κ. η.; Dieg. Laert. ii. 43.)

2. A tragic poet, the son of the former. The names of some of his tragedies are mentioned by Suidas (s. v. 'Αστυνάδαμας). [C. P. M.]

ASTY'DAMEIA ('Αστύδαμεια), a daughter of Amyntor, king of the Dolopians in Thessaly, by Cleobule. She became by Heracles the mother of Theopolemus. (Pind. Ol. vii. 24, with the Schol.) Other accounts differ from Pindar, for Hyginus (Fab. 162) calls the mother of Theopolemus Astyche, and Apollodorus (ii. 7, § 8) calls the son of Astydamia Cleippus. (Comp. Muncker, ad Hort. ii. 512, &c.; Paus. x. 37. § 3.) Astydamia was a seer among the centaurs, who is said to have composed the first poem in verse in Greek. (Met. vi. 400, &c.; Ov. Met. vii. 24; Paus. x. 37.)

A daughter of Phylus, king of Ephyra, by whom Heracles, after the conquest of Ephyrn, begot Tlepolemus. (Apollod. ii. 7, §§ 6, 8; Hom. ii. ii. 688, &c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 24; Astydamia.)

3. A daughter of Laomedon by Strymo, Placia, or Lencippus. (Apollod. ii. 12, § 3.) According to other traditions in Enestus (ad Hom. p. 1697) and Dictys (ii. 2), she was a daughter of Priam, and married Telephus, by whom she became the mother of Euryalus. Three other mythical personages of this name occur in Apollod. ii. 12, § 2, iii. 5, § 6; Hygin. Fab. 117. [L. S.]

ASTY'OCHUS ('Αστυώχος), succeeded Melanbrids as Lancademonian high admiral, in the summer of 412, n. c., the year after the Syracusan defeat, and arrived with four ships at Chios, late in the summer. (Thuc. viii. 20, 23.) Lesbos was now the seat of the contest: and his arrival was followed by the recovery to the Athenians of the whole island. (ib. 23.) Astyochochus was eager for a second attempt; but compelled, by the refusal of the Chians and their Spartan captain, Pedaritus, to forgo it, he proceeded, with many threats of revenge, to take the general command at Miletus. (31—33.) Here he renewed the Persian treaty, and remained, notwithstanding the entreaties of Chios, then hard pressed by the Athenians, wholly inactive. He was at last starting to relieve it, when he was called off, about mid-winter, to join a fleet from home, bringing, in consequence of complaints from Pedaritus, commissioners to examine his proceedings. Before this (ἐτὶ βότα τοστὶ ὠρείς Μιλετοῦς, cc. 36—42,) Astyochochus it appears had sold himself to the Persian interest. He had received, perhaps, the first coming to Miletus, orders from the Persian king for the destruction of Alcibiades on his death: but finding him in refuge with the satrap Tissaphernes, he not only gave up all thought of the attempt, but on receiving private intelligence of his Athenian negotiations, went up to Magnesia, betrayed Phrynichus his informant to Alcibiades, and there, it would seem, pledged himself to the satrap, (cc. 45 and 50.) Henceforward, in pursuance of his patron's policy, his efforts were employed in keeping up his great forces inactive, and inducing submission to the reduction in their Persian pay. The acquisition of Rhodes, after his junction with the new fleet, he had probably little to do with; while to him, must, no doubt, be ascribed the neglect of the opportunities afforded by the Athenian dissensions, after his return to Miletus (cc. 60 and 63), 411 B.C. The discontent of the troops, especially of the Syracusans, was great, and broke out at last in a riot, where his life was endangered; shortly after which his successor Mindarius arrived, and Astyocles sailed home (cc. 84, 85), after a command of about eight months. Upon his return to Sparta he bore testimony to the truth of the charges which Herocrates, the Syracusan, brought against Tissaphernes. (Xen. Hell. i. 1, § 31.) [A. H. C.]

ASTYPALAEA ('Arystpalaia), a daughter of Phoenix and PerimeDE, the daughter of Oeneus. She was a sister of Europe, and became by Poseidon the mother of the Argonaut Aeneas and of Kepryppus, king of the island of Cos. The island Astypalaea among the Cyclades derived its name from her. (Apollod. ii. 7 § 1; Paus. vii. 4 § 2; Apollod. Rhod. ii. 860; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L.S.]

ASYCHIS ('Ayxhis), a king of Egypt, who, according to the account in Herodotus (ii. 136), succeeded Mycerinus (about a. d. 1012 according to Larcher's calculation), and built the pyloplexa on the east side of Pyramid-which had been begun by Menes, and also a pyramid of brick. Herodotus likewise mentions some laws of his for the regulation of money transactions. [C. P. M.]

ATABY'RIUS ('AraBvrius), a surname of Zeus derived from mount Atabyris or Atabyrion in the island of Rhodes, where the Cretan Althaemences was said to have built a temple to him. (Apollod. iii. 2 § 1; Appian, Mithrid. 26.) Upon this mountain there were, it is said, brazen bulls which roared when anything extraordinary was going to happen. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. viii. 159.) [L.S.]

ATALANTE ('Atalante).—In ancient mythology there occur two or three personages of this name, who have been the subject of many writings by poets who have reported them by writers as identical, while others distinguish between them. Among the latter we may mention the Scholast in Theocritus (ii. 40), Burmann (ad Od. Met. x. 565), Spanheim (ad Callimach. p. 275, &c.), and Muncier (ad Hygin. Fab. 99, 173, 185). K. O. Müller, on the other hand, who maintains the identity of the two Atalantes, has endeavoured to show that the distinction cannot be carried out satisfactorily. But the difficulties are equally great in either case. The common accounts distinguish between the Arcadian and the Boeotian Atalante. 1. The Arcadian Atalante, who was the daughter of Zeus (Jasion or Jasus) and Clymene, (Aelian, V. H. xiii. 1; Hygin. Fab. 99; Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 216.) Her father, who had wished for a son, was disappointed at her birth, and exposed her on the Parthenian (virgin) hill, by the side of a well and at the entrance of a cave. Pan-sias (iii. 24 § 2) speaks of a spring near the ruins of Cyphanta, which gushed forth from a rock, and which Atalante was believed to have called forth by striking the rock with her spear. In her infancy, Atalante was suckled in the wilderness by a she-bear, the symbol of Artemis, and after she had grown up, she lived in pure maidenhood, slew the centaurs who pursued her, took part in the Cnidian hunt, and in the games which were celebrated in honour of Pelias. Afterwards, her father recognized her as his daughter; and when he desired her to marry, she made it the condition that every suitor who wanted to win her, should first of all contend with her in the foot-race. If he conquered her, he was to be rewarded with her hand, if not, he was to be put to death by her. This she did because she was the most swift-footed among all mortals, and because the Delphic oracle had cautioned her against marriage. Melianon, one of her suitors, conquered her in this manner. Aphrodit had given him three golden apples, and during the race he dropped them one after the other. Their beauty charmed Atalante so much, that she could not abstain from gathering them. Thus she was conquered, and became the wife of Melianon. Once when the two, by their embraces in the sacred grove of Zeus, profaned the sanctity of the place, they were both metamorphosed into lions. Hyginus adds, that Atalante was by Ares the mother of Parthenopaeus, though, according to others, Parthenopaeus was her son by Melianon. (Apollod. iii. 9 § 2; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 518; Athen. iii. p. 82.)

2. The Boeotian Atalante. About her the same stories are related as about the Arcadian Atalante, except that her parentage and the localities are described differently. Thus she is said to have been a daughter of Schoenus, and to have been married to Hippomenes. Her footrace is transferred to the Boeotian Orchestus, and the sanctuary which the newly married couple profaned by their love, was a temple of Cybele, who metamorphosed them into lions, and yoked them to her chariot. (Ov. Met. x. 565, &c., viii. 318, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 185.) In both traditions the main cause of the metamorphosis is, that the husband of Atalante neglected to thank Aphrodit for the gift of the golden apples. Atalante has in the ancient poets various surnames or epithets, which refer partly to her descent from Schoenus, and partly to her swiftness. There was a temple of Cybeleus holding a hind, and by her side stood Melianon. She also appeared in the pediment of the temple of Athena Alea at Tegena among the Cadydonian hunters. (Paus. v. 19 § 1, viii. 45 § 4; Comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 214.) [L.S.]

ATALANTE (Atalante), the sister of Perdicles, married Attalus, and was murdered a few days after her brother, Perdicles. (Diod. xvii. 37.)

ATARRHIAS (Atarhias), mentioned several times by Q. Curtius (v. 2, vii. 1, viii 1), with a slight variation in the orthography of the name, in the transactions of the East. It appears to have been the same who was sent by Cassander with a part of the army to oppose Aecides, king of Epeirus, in B.C. 317. (Diod. xix. 36.)

ATAULPHUS, ATAUULPHUS, ADAOULPHUS (c. Athaulf, "sworn helper," the same name as that which appears in later history under the form of Adolf or Adolphus), brother of Alaric's wife. (Olympiod. op. Phot. Cod. 80, p. 57, a, ed Bekk.) He first appears as conducting a reinforcement of Goths and Huns to aid Alaric in Italy after the termination of the first siege of Rome. (A. 403.) In the same year he was after the second siege raised by the mock emperor Attalus to the office of Count of the Dominics; and on the death of Alaric in 410, he was elected to supply his place as king of the Visigoths. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 32.) From this time the accounts of his history vary exceedingly. The only undisputed facts are, that he retired with his nation into the south of Gaul,—that he married Placidia, sister of Honorius,—and that he finally withdrew into Spain, where he was murdered at Barcelona. According to Jornandes (de Reb. Got. 32), he took Rome a second time after Alaric's death, carried off Placidia, formed a treaty with Honorius, which was cemented by his marriage with Placidia at Forum Livii or Cornelli, remained a faithful ally in Gaul, and went into Spain for the purpose of suppressing the agitations of the Suevi and Vandalis against the empire. But the other authorities for the time agree on the whole in giving a different representation. According to them, the capture of Placidia had taken place before Alaric's death (Philostorg. xii. 4; Olympid. l. e.; Marcellin. Chronicon); the treaty with the empire was not concluded till after Ataulphus's retreat into Gaul, where he was implicated in the insurrection of Jovinus, and set up Attalus, whom he detained in his camp for a musician, as a rival emperor; he then endeavoured to make peace with Honorius by sending him the head of the usurper Sebastian, on which being refused, he attacked Massilia, from which he was repulsed by Bonificius; finally, the marriage with Placidia took place at Narbo (Idat. Chronicon), which so exasperated her lover, the general Constantius, as to make him drive Ataulphus into Spain. (Orosius, vii. 43; Idat. Chronicon; Philostorg. xii. 4.) He was remarkable as being the first independent chief who entered into alliance with Rome, not for pay, but from respect. His original ambition had been (according to Orosius, viii. 43, who appears to record his very words), "that what was now Romania should become Gothia, and what Caesar Augustus was now, that for the future should be Ataulphus, but that his experience of the evils of lawlessness and the advantages of law had changed his intention, and that his highest glory now would be to be known as an ally against the emperor." And thus his marriage with Placidia—the first contracted between a barbarian chief and a Roman princess—was looked upon by his contemporaries as a marked epoch, and as the fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel, that the king of the North should wed the daughter of the king of the South. (Idat. Chronicon.)

He was a man of striking personal appearance, and of middle stature. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 32.) The details of his life are best given in Olympiodorus (ap. Phot.), who gives a curious description of the scene of his nuptials with Placidia in the house of Ingenius of Narbo (p. 59, b. ed. Bekker).

His death is variously ascribed to the personal anger of the assassin Vernulf or (Olympiod. p. 60, a.) Dobhius (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 32), to the intrigues of Constantius (Philostorg. xii. 4), and to a conspiracy occasioned in the camp by his having put to death a rival chief, Sarus (Olympiod. p. 58, b.). It is said to have taken place in the palace at Barcelona (Idat. Chronicon), or whilst, according to his custom, he was looking at his stables. (Olympiod. p. 60, a.) His first wife was a Sarmanthian, who was divorced to make way for Placidia (Philostorg. xii. 4), and by whom he had six children. The only offspring of his second marriage was a son, Theodosius, who died in infancy. (Olympiod. p. 59, b.)

[ATR] ATE (Arp.), according to Hesiod (Theog. 230), a daughter of Erin; and according to Homer (II. xix. 91) of Zeus, was an ancient Greek divinity, who led both gods and men to rash and inconsiderate actions and to suffering. She once invaded Zeus, at the birth of Heracles, to take a oath by which Hera was afterwards enabled to give to Eurystheus the power which had been destined for Heracles. When Zeus discovered her rashness, he hurled Ate from Olympus and banished her for ever from the abodes of the gods. (Hom. Il. xix. 126, &c.) In the tragic writers Ate appears in a different light: she avenges evil deeds and inflicts just punishments upon the offenders and their posterity (Aeschyl. Choep. 381), so that her character here is almost the same as that of Nemesis and Erinyes. She appears most prominent in the dramas of Aeschylus, and least in those of Euripides, with whom the idea of Dike (justice) is more fully developed. (Büchner, Ueber die Idee des Schicksals, &c. p. 64, &c.) [L.S.]

ATEIUS, surnamed Proculeius, and also Philologus, the latter of which surnames he assumed in order to indicate his great learning, was born at Athens, and was one of the most celebrated grammarians at Rome, in the latter half of the first century B.C. He was a freedman, and was perhaps originally a slave of the juris Ateius Capito, by whom he was characterized as a rhetorician among grammarians, and a grammarian among rhetoricians. He taught many of the Roman nobles, and was particularly intimate with the historian Sallust, and with Asinius Pollio. For the former he drew up an abstract of Roman history (Brevarium verum omnium Romanarum), that Sallust might select from it for his history such subjects as he chose; and for the latter he compiled precepts on the art of writing. Asinius Pollio believed that Ateius collected for Sallust many of the peculiar expressions which we find in his writings, but that a large part was composed by Suetonius. The commentary of Ateius were exceedingly numerous, but only a very few were extant even in the time of Suetonius. (Sueton. de Illustr. Grammat. 10; comp. Osann, Analecta Crit. p. 64, &c.; Madvig, Opuscula Academica, p. 97, &c.)

ATERIANUS, JULIUS, wrote a work upon the Thirty Tyrants (a. d. 259—268), or at least upon one of them, Victorinus. Trebellius Pollio (Trig. Tyr. 6) gives an extract from his work.

ATHAMAS ('Aδάμας), a son of Aeolus and Enarete, the daughter of Deimachus. He was thus a brother of Cretheus, Sisyphus, Salmoneus, &c. (Apollod. i. 7, § 3.) At the command of Hera, Athamas married Nephele, by whom he became the father of Phrixus and Helle. But he was secretly in love with the mortal Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he begot Lear¬chus and Melicertes, and Nephele, on discovering that Ino had a greater hold on his affections than herself, disappeared in her anger. Misfortunes and ruin now came upon the house of Athamas, for Nephele, who had returned to the gods, demanded that Athamas should be sacrificed as an atonement to her. Ino, who hated the children of Nephele and endeavoured to destroy them, caused a famine by her arts, and when Athamas sent messengers to Delphi to consult the oracle about mine by her artifices, and when Athamas sent messengers to Delphi to consult the oracle about what he should settle where he should settle. The answer was, that he should settle where he should settle. The oracle, he consulted the oracle where he should settle. The others a son of Aeolus and DOMITIUS, the author of a work on Sicily (Goller, de Situ, p. 161, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 1–5.

The accounts about Athamas, especially in their details, differ much in the different writers, and it seems that the Thessalian and Orchoemenian traditions are here interwoven with one another. According to Pausanias (ix. 34, § 4), Athamas wished to sacrifice Phrixus at the foot of the Boeotian mountain Laphystius, on the altar dedicated to Zeus Laphystius, a circumstance which suggests some connexion of the myths with the worship of Zeus Laphystius. (Müller, Orchom. p. 161, &c.) There are two other mythical personages of this name, the one a grandson of the former, who led a colony of Minyanis to Teos (Paus. viii. 3, § 3; Stephan. Byz. v. 6), and the other a son of the Cretan, who had emigrated to Chios. (Paus. vii. 4, § 6. [L.S.] ATHANADAS (Ἀθανάδας), a Greek writer, the author of a work on Ambraecia (Ἀμβρακική). (Antonin. his birth cannot be ascertained with exactness; but it is assigned by Montfaucon, on grounds sufficiently probable, to A.D. 296. No particulars are recorded of the lineage or the parents of Athanasius. The dawn of his character and genius seems to have given fair promise of his subsequent eminence; for Alexander, then primate of Egypt, brought him up in his own family, and superintended his education with the view of dedicating him to the Christian ministry. We have no account of the studies pursued by Athanasius in his youth, except the vague statement of Gregory Nazianzen, that he devoted comparatively little attention to general literature, but acquired an extraordinary knowledge of the Scriptures. His early proficiency in Biblical knowledge is credible enough; but though he was much inferior in general learning to such men as Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, and Eusebius, his Oration against the Greeks, itself a juvenile performance, evinces no contemptible acquaintance with the literature of heathen mythology. While a young man, Athanasius frequently visited the celebrated hermit St. Antony, of whom he eventually became the biographer; and this early acquaintance laid the foundation of a friendship which was interrupted only by the death of the aged recluse. [Antonius, Str.] At what age Athanasius was ordained a deacon is nowhere stated; but he was young both in years and in office when he vigorously supported Alexander in maintaining the orthodox faith against the earliest assaults of the Arians. He was still only a deacon when appointed a member of the famous council of Nice (A.D. 325), in which he distinguished himself as an able opponent of the Arian doctrine, and assisted in drawing up the creed that takes its name from that assembly.

In the following year Alexander died; and Athanasius, whom he had strongly recommended as his successor, was raised to the vacant see of Alexandria, the voice of the people as well as the suffrages of the ecclesiastics being decisively in his favour. The manner in which he discharged the duties of his new office was highly exemplary; but he had not long enjoyed his elevation, before he encountered the commencement of that long series of trials which darkened the eventful remainder of his life. About the year 331, Arius, who had been banished by Constantine after the condemnation of his doctrine by the council of Nice, made a professed submission to the Catholic faith, which satisfied the emperor; and shortly after, Athanasius received an imperial order to admit the heresiarch once more into the church of Alexandria. We are informed that the bishop held the courage to disobey, and justified his conduct in a letter which seems, at the time, to have been satisfactory to Constantine. Soon after this, complaints were lodged against Athanasius by certain enemies of the primate's innocence, his enemies renewed their attack in an aggravated form; accusing Athanasius himself of the acts previously imputed to Macarius, and charging him moreover with the murder of Arsenius, bishop of Hesperis in Upper Egypt. To give colour to this latter accusation Arsenius absconded, and lay concealed for a considerable time. The emperor before whom the charges were laid, already knew that those relating to Ischyras were utterly unfounded. He referred it to his brother Dalmatius, the Censor, to inquire into the alleged murder of Arsenius. Dalmatius wrote to Athanasius, commanding him to prepare his defence. The primate was at first inclined to leave so monstrous a calumny to its own fate; but finding that the anger of the emperor had been excited against him, he instituted an active search after Arsenius, and in the end learned that he had been discovered and identified at Tyre. The Arians meanwhile had urged the convention of a council at Caesarea, for the purpose of inquiring into the crimes imputed to Athanasius. But he, unwilling to trust his cause to such a tribunal, sent to the emperor a full account of the expenses of the pretended homicide. On this, Constantine ordered Dalmatius to stay all proceedings against Athanasius, and commanded the Arian bishops, instead of holding their intended synod at Caesarea, to return home.

Undeterred by this failure, the enemies of Athanasius, two years after, prevailed upon Constantine to summon a council at Tyre, in which they repeated the old accusations concerning Ischyras and Arsenius, and urged new matter of crimination. The pretended sacrilege in the church of Ischyras was disproved by the bishops who were present from Egypt. The murder of Arsenius was satisfactorily disposed of by producing the man himself alive and well, in the midst of the council. The pretended actions of Athanasius were entirely procured; he was entirely provoked by his uncompromising opposition to the tenets of the Arians, who had secured a maority in the council. Undismayed by the triumph of his enemies, the deposed archbishop returned to Tyre, and presenting himself before Constantine as he was entering the city, entreated the emperor to do him justice. His prayer was so far granted as that his accusers were summoned to confront him in the imperial presence. On this, they abandoned their previous grounds of attack, and accused him of having threatened to prevent the exportation of corn from Alexandria to Constantinople. It would seem that the emperor was peculiarly sensitive on this point; for, notwithstanding the intrinsic improbability of the charge, and the earnest denials of Athanasius, the good prelate was banished by Constantine to Gaul. It is not unlikely that, when the heat of his indignation had subsided, Constantine felt the sentence to be too rigorous; for he prohibited the filling up of the vacant see, and declared that his motive in banishing the primate was to remove him from the machinations of his enemies.

Athanasius went to Treses (A. D. 336), where he was not only received with kindness by Maximinus, the bishop of that city, but loaded with favours by Constantine the Younger. The Alexandrians petitioned the emperor to restore their spiritual father, and Antony the hermit joined in the request; but the appeal was unsuccessful.

In the year 357, Constantine died. In the following year, Athanasius was replaced in his see by Constantine II. He was received by the clergy and the people with the liveliest demonstrations of joy. But he had scarcely resumed the dignities and duties of his office, when the persevering hostility of his Arian opponents began to disturb him afresh. They succeeded in prejudicing the mind of Constantius against him, and in a council held at Antioch proceeded to the length of appointing Pistus archbishop of Alexandria. To counteract their movements, Athanasius convoked a council at Alexandria, in which a document was prepared setting forth the wrongs committed by the adverse party, and vindicating the character of the Egyptian primates. Both parties submitted their statements to Julius, the bishop of Rome, who signified his intention of bringing them together, in order that the case might be thoroughly investigated. To this proposition Athanasius assented. The Arians refused to comply. In the year 340, Constantine the Younger was slain; and in him Athanasius seems to have lost a powerful and zealous friend. In the very next year, the Arian bishops convened a council at Antioch, in which they condemned Athanasius for resuming his office while the sentence of deposition pronounced by the council of Tyre was still unappealed. They accused him of disorderly and violent proceedings on his return to Alexandria, and even revived the old exploded stories about the broken chalice and the murder of Arsenius. They concluded by appointing Eusebius Emisenus to the archiepiscopal throne; and when he declined the dubious honour, Gregory of Cappadocia was advanced in his stead. The new primiate entered on his office (A. D. 341) amidst scenes of atrocious violence. The Christian population of Alexandria were loud in their complaints against the removal of Athanasius; and Philagrius, the prefect of Egypt, who had been sent with Gregory to establish him in his new office, let loose against them a crowd of ferocious assailants, who committed the most frightful excesses. Athanasius fled to Rome, and addressed to the bishops of every Christian church an energetic epistle, in which he details the cruel injuries inflicted upon himself and his people, and entreats the aid of all his brethren. At Rome he was honourably received by Julius, who despatched messengers to the ecclesiastical opponents of Athanasius, summoning them to a council to be held in the imperial city. Apparently in dread of exposure and condemnation, they refused to comply with the summons. When the council met (A. D. 342), Athanasius was heard in his own vindication, and honourably restored to the communion of the church. A synodical letter was addressed by the council to the Arian clergy, severely reproving them for their disobedience to the summons of Julius and their unrighteous conduct to the church of Alexandria.

In the year 347, a council was held at Sardica, at which the Arians at first designed to attend. They insisted, however, that Athanasius and all whom they had condemned should be excluded. As it was the great object of this council to decide upon the merits of that very case, the proposition was of course resisted, and the Arians left the assembly. The council, after due investigation, affirmed the innocence of those whom the Arians had deposed, restored them to their offices, and condemned their adversaries. Synodical epistles, exhibiting the decrees of the council, were duly prepared and issued. Delegates were sent to the emperor Constantius at Antioch, to notify the decision of the council of Sardica; and they were also entrusted with a letter from Constans to his brother, in which the cause of the orthodox clergy was strongly recommended. At Antioch an infamous plot was laid to blast the reputation of the delegates. Its detection seems to have wrought powerfully upon the mind of Constantius, who had previously supported the Arians; and he commanded that those of the orthodox whom he had banished, and sent letters to Alexandria forbidding any further molestation to be offered to the friends of Athanasius.

In the following year (A. D. 349), Gregory was murdered at Alexandria; but of the occasion and manner of his death no particulars have reached us. It prepared the way for the return of Athanasius. He was urged to this by Constantius himself, whom he visited on his way to Alexandria, and on whom he made, for the time, a very favourable impression. He was once more received at Alexandria with overflowing signs of gladness and affection. Restored to his see, he immediately proceeded with those of the orthodox whom he had banished, and, on their side, renewed against him the charges which had been so often disproved. Constans, the friend of Athanasius, was now dead; and though Constantius, at this juncture, professed great friendship for the primiate, he soon attached himself once more to the Arian party. In a council held at Arles (A. D. 353), and another at Milan (A. D. 355), they succeeded by great exertions in procuring the condemnation of Athanasius. On the latter occasion, the whole weight of the imperial authority was thrown into the scale against him, and those of the bishops who resolutely vindicted his cause were punished with exile. Among these (though his banishment occurred some time af-after the synod of Milan had closed) was Liberius, bishop of Rome. Persecution was widely directed against those who sided with Athanasius; and he himself, after some abortive attempts to remove him in a more quiet manner, was obliged once more to flee from Alexandria in the midst of his last exile, however, was short. In the space of a few months, he was recalled by Valens himself,

for reasons which it is now impossible to penetrate;
and after a delay occasioned by the importunate prayers of the people on behalf of their beloved teacher, Athanasius was for the fifth time expelled from Alexandria. His last exile, however, was short. In the space of a few months, he was recalled by Valens himself,
for reasons which it is now impossible to penetrate;
and after this time to the date of his death, A. D.
375, he seems to have remained unmolested. He continued to discharge the laborious duties of his office with unabated energy to the last; and after holding the primacy for a term of forty-six years, during which he sustained unexampled reverses with heroic fortitude, and prosecuted the great purpose of his life with singular sagacity and resolution, he died without a blemish upon his name, full of years and covered with honour.

The following eulogium was extorted by his merit from the pen of an historian who seldom lavish praises upon ancient or modern defenders of orthodoxy:—"Amidst the storms of persecution, the Archbishop of Alexandria was patient of labour, jealous of fame, careless of safety; and though he sustained reverses which had already began to multiply in the deserts of Egypt; and ho employed his leisure in composing some of his principal works. His place of retreat was diligently sought for by his enemies; but, through his own activity and the unswerving fidelity of his friends, the monks, the prose of his exile was always unsuccessful. In the year 361, Constan-tius, the great patron of the Arians, expired.
He was succeeded by Julian, commonly called the Apostate, who, at the commencement of his reign, ordered the restoration of the bishops banished by Constantius. This was rendered the easier in the case of Athanasius, inasmuch as George the Cappad-docian was slain, at that very juncture, in a tumult raised by the heathen population of the city. Once more reinstated in his office, amidst the joyful acclamations of his friends, Athanasius behaved with lenity towards his humbled opponents, while he vigorously addressed himself to the restoration of ecclesiastical order and sound doctrine. But, after all his reverses, he was again to be driven from his charge, and again to return to it in triumph. The heathens of Alexandria complained against him to the emperor, for no other reason, it would seem, than his successful zeal in extending the Christian faith.
Julian was probably aware that the superstition he was bent upon re-establishing had no enemy more formidable than the thrice-exiled archbishop; he therefore banished him not only from Alexandria, but from Egypt itself, threatening the prefect of that country with a heavy fine if the sentence were not carried into execution. Theodoret, indeed, affirms, that Julian gave secret orders for inflicting
the last penalties of the law upon the hated prelate.
He escaped, however, to the desert (A. D. 362), having predicted that this calamity would be but of brief duration; and after a few months' concealment in the monasteries, he returned to Alexandria on receiving intelligence of the death of Julian.

By Jovin, who succeeded to the throne of the empire, Athanasius was held in high esteem.
When, therefore, his inveterate enemies endeavoured to persuade the emperor to depose him, they were repeatedly repulsed, and that with no little aspirity. The speedy demise of Jovin again deprived Athanasius of a powerful protector. During the first three years of the administration of Valens, the orthodox party seem to have been exempt from so much vexation as during his predecessor's time.

Athenagoras, the archdeacon, in this interval Athanasius wrote the life of St. Antony, and two treatises on the Trinity. In the year 367, Valens issued an edict for the deposition and banishment of all those bishops who had returned to their seats at the death of Constantius. After a delay occasioned by the importunate prayers of the people
on behalf of their beloved teacher, Athanasius was for the fifth time expelled from Alexandria. His last exile, however, was short. In the space of a few months, he was recalled by Valens himself,
for reasons which it is now impossible to penetrate;
and soon after his return to Alexandria, he was again banished at the instance of his enemies, who were now bent upon re-establishing the Arianism which they had previously persecuted with so much success. Athanasius had now passed his sixty-second year, and the vigor which he formerly displayed was now declining. Such was his condition of life at the time of the death of Valens, in the year 369. It is said that the emperor, who had been a great admirer of Athanasius, died without leaving the place of his banishment;
and that the solemn and affecting address which he composed some time after his departure to comfort and strengthen his beloved flock, was never read. The news of his death, it is related, was received with universal regret by the people of Alexandria; and the authority of the napisał primates of the East, who had been long accustomed to his uninterrupted and powerful influence, was now transferred to the hand of Liberius, who had been already for some time the obsequious minister of Julian. In the synod of Milan (which was held in the year 367) the following three clergy were appointed to the vacant see of Constantinople:—"Oratio contra Gentes;" "Epistola deb Christi evangeli, reditum, et c. Arianos."

The earliest edition of the collected works of Athanasius appeared, in two volumes, folio, at Heidelberg, ex officina Commineliana, a. d. 1600. The Greek text was accompanied by the Latin version of Peter Nanning (Nannius); and in the following year an appendix issued from the same press, containing notes, various readings, indices, &c., by Peter Fieckmann. Those who purchase this edition should take care that their copies contain the appendix. The Paris edition of 1627, and the Leipzig of 1686 (which professes, but untruly, to have been published at Cologne), are not held in much estimation; and the latter is very inaccurately printed. The valuable Benedictine edition of Athanasius was published at Paris, a. d. 1698, in three volumes, folio. The learned editor, Montfaucon, was at first assisted in preparing it by James Loppinus; but his coadjutor dying when no more than half of the first volume was finished, the honour of completing the edition devolved upon Montfaucon. Many of the episcopals of Athanasius were printed, for the first time, in the second volume of Montfaucon's "Collectio Nova Patrum et Scriptorum Graecorum," Paris, a. d. 1706.

The most complete edition of the works of Athanasius is that published at Padua, a. d. 1777, in four volumes, folio. The first three volumes contain all that is comprised in the valuable Benedictine edition of 1698; the last includes the supplementary collections of Montfaucon, Wolf, Malfei, and Antonelli.

The following list includes the principal English translations from the works of Athanasius:—St. Athanasius's Four Orations against the Arians; and his Oration against the Gentiles. Translated from the original Greek by Mr. Sam. Parker, Oxford, 1718. Athanasius's intire Treatise of the Incarnation of the Word, and of his bodily appearance to us, translated into English by W. Whiston, in his "Collection of ancient Monuments relating to the Trinity and Incarnation," London, 1713. The same collection also contains a translation of Athanasius's Life of Antony the Monk, which was first published in 1687. The Epistles of Athanasius in defence of the Nicene definition, and on the Councils of Ariminum and Seleucia, together with his first Oration against the Arians, have been recently translated, with notes, by the Rev. J. H. Newman, Oxford, 1842. The other three Orations, translated by the same writer, are shortly to appear; and other works of Athanasius on the Arian controversy are advertised as preparing for publication.

For a complete list of the genuine, doubtful, and supposititious works of Athanasius, see Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, vol. viii. pp. 184—215, ed. Haries. The most important of his genuine writings are those (both historical and doctrinal) which relate to the Arian controversy. It is hardly necessary to observe that the creed commonly called Athanasian was not composed by the archbishop of Alexandria. (See Gerard Vossius, Dissertation de Symbolo Athanasianus, Opp. vol. vi. pp. 516—522; W. E. Tentzelii, Justin us ertuillorum de Symbolo Athanasiano.) It has been ascribed to Philipus Theopistus, Vincent of Lerins, Hilary of Poictiers, and others; but its real author is unknown. The "Synopsis Sacrae Scripturae," which is included in the writings of this eminent father, has no claim to be considered his; though, in itself, it is a valuable relic of antiquity.

The chief sources of information respecting the life of Athanasius are found in his own writings; next to these, in the ecclesiastical histories of Sozomen, Sozomen, and Theodoret. The materials afforded by these and other writers have been collected, examined, and digested with great learning and fidelity by Montfaucon, in his "Vita Sancti Athanasii," prefixed to the Benedictine edition of the works of this father, and by Tillemont, in his Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique, vol. viii., Paris edition of 1713. [J. M. M.]

ATHANASIUS (Ἀθανάσιος), of Alexandria, a presbyter of the church in that city, was a son of Isidora, the sister of Cyril of Alexandria. He was deprived of his office and driven out of Alexandria and Egypt by the bishop, Diocletian, from whom he suffered much persecution. There is extant a small work of his, in Greek, against Diocletian, which he presented to the council of Chalcedon, a. d. 451. (Concil. vol. iv. p. 405.)

There were various other ecclesiastical writers of the name of Athanasius, of whom a list is given in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 174. [J. T. G.]

ATHANASIUS SCHOLASTICUS. 1. A Graeco-Roman jurist, who practised as an advocate at Eneeia, and was contemporary with and survived Justinian. He published in Greek an epitome of Justinian's Novellae; and this work, long known to the learned to exist in manuscript in the royal libraries of Vienna and Paris, was first given to the world by G. E. Heimbach, in the first volume of his 'Arbeia, Leipzig, 1838. It was probably the same Athanasius who wrote a book de Criminalibus, of which there was a manuscript in the library of Ant. Augustinianus. (G. E. Heimbach, De Criminalibus Scriptorum Fossilium Scholast. &c., Leipzig, 1826. p. 41.)

ATHENA (Ἀθηνα), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. Homer (II. v. 880) calls her a daughter of Zeus, without any allusion to her mother or to the manner in which she was called into existence, while most of the later traditions agree in stating that she was born from the head of Zeus. According to Hesiod (Theog. 886, &c.), Metis, the first wife of Zeus, was the mother of Athena, but when Zeus was pregnant with her, Zeus, on the advice of Gaia and Uranus, swallowed Metis up, and afterwards gave birth to Athena, who sprang from his head. (Hesiod, l. c. 924.) Pindar (Ol. vii. 35, &c.) adds, that Hephastus split the head of Zeus with his axe, and that Athena sprang forth with a mighty war-shout. Others relate, that Prometheus or Hermes or Palammon assisted Zeus in giving birth to Athena, and mentioned the river Triton as the place where the event took place. (Apollod. i. 4. § 6; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 66.) Other traditions again relate, that Athena sprang from the head of Zeus in full armour, a statement for which Stechiarius is said to have been the most ancient authority. (Tacit. Ann. 535; Philost. In Jos. ii. 27; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 1310.) All these traditions, however, agree in making Athena a daughter of Zeus; but a second set regard her as the daughter of Pallas, the winged giant, whom she afterwards killed on account of his attempting to violate her chastity, whose skin
ATHENA.

Athena (παρθένος, παρθένος for her as a goddess, and whose wings she fastened to her own feet. (Tzetza, ad Lycoph. l. c.; Cit. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23.) A third tradition carries us to Libya, and calls Athena a daughter of Poseidon and Tritonis. Athena, says Herodotus (iv. 180), on one occasion became angry with her father and went to Zeus, who made her his own daughter. This passage shews more clearly than any other the manner in which genuine and ancient Hellenic myths were transplanted to Libya, where they were afterwards regarded as the sources of Hellenic ones. Respecting this Libyan Athena, it is farther related, that she was educated by the riversgod Triton, together with his own daughter Pallas. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 3.) In Libya she was also said to have invented the flute; for when Perseus had cut off the head of Medusa, and Athena and Euryale, the sisters of Medusa, lamented her death, while plaintive sounds issued from the mouths of the serpents which surrounded their heads, Athena is said to have imitated these sounds on a reed. (Pind. Pyth. xii. 19.) compare the other accounts in Hygin. Fab. 165; Apollod. i. 4. § 2; Paus. i. 24. § 1.) The connexion of Athena with Triton and Tritonis caused afterwards the various traditions about her birth-place, so that wherever there was a river or a well of that name, as in Crete, Thessaly, Boeotia, Arcadia, and Egypt, the inhabitants of those districts asserted that Athena was born there. It is from this birth-places on a river Triton that she seems to have been called Tritonis or Tritogeneia (Paus. ix. 34. § 5), though it should be observed that this surname is also explained in other ways; for some derive it from an ancient Cretan, Aeolic, or Boeotian word, πρόσωπον, signifying "head," so that it would mean "the goddess born from the head," and others think that it was intended to commemorate the circumstance of her being born on the third day of the month. (Tzetza, ad Lycoph. 519.) The connexion of Athena with Triton naturally suggests, that we have to look for the most ancient seat of her worship in Greece to the banks of the river Triton in Boeotia, which emptied itself into lake Copais, and on which there were two ancient Pelasgian towns, Athenae and Eleusis, which were according to tradition swallowed up by the lake. From thence her worship was carried by the Minyans into Attica, Libya, and other countries. (Müller, Or. ch. 535.) We must lastly notice one tradition, which made Athena a daughter of Triton and sister of Islanda, who was killed by Athena (Paus. ix. 34. § 1; Tzetza, ad Lycoph. 355), and another according to which she was the daughter of Hephaestus. (Paus. ix. 33. § 5; Tzetza, ad Lycoph. 494.)

These various traditions about Athena arose, as in most other cases, from local legends and from identifications of the Greek Athena with other divinities. The common notion which the Greeks entertained about her, and which was most widely spread in the ancient world, is, that she was the daughter of Zeus, and if we take Metis to have been her mother, we have at once the clue to the character which she bears in the religion of Greece; for, as her father was the most powerful and her mother the wisest among the gods, so Athena was a combination of the two, that is, a goddess in whom power and wisdom were harmoniously blended. From this fundamental idea may be derived the various aspects under which she appears in the ancient writers. She seems to have been a divinity of a purely ethical character, and not the representative of any particular physical power manifested in nature; her power and wisdom appear in her being the protectress and preserver of the state and of social institutions. Everything, therefore, which gives to the state strength and prosperity, such as agriculture, inventions, and industry, is attributed to her. Thus she preserves and protects it from injurious influence from without, such as the defence of the walls, fortresses, and harbours, is under her immediate care.

As the protectress of agriculture, Athena is represented as the inventor of the plough and rake: she created the olive tree, the greatest blessing of Attica, taught the people to yoke oxen to the plough, took care of the breeding of horses, and instructed men how to tame them by the bridle, her own invention. Allusions to this feature of her character are contained in the epitheis δασιάρης, δασιάρης, δασιάρης, δασιάρης, or χαλκινης. (Bustath. ad Hom. p. 1076; Tzetza, ad Lycoph. 520; Heav. p. 445, 930, 643; Pind. Ol. xii. 79.) At the beginning of spring thanks were offered to her in advance (προχαρισσειν, Suid. s. v.) for the protection she was to afford to the fields. Besides the inventions relating to agriculture, others also connected with various kinds of science, industry, and art, are ascribed to her, and all her inventions are not of the kind which men make by chance or accident, but such as require thought and meditation. We may notice the invention of numbers (Liv. vii. 3), of the trumpet (Böckh, ad Pind. p. 344), the chariot, and navigation. (Atehna.) In regard to all kinds of useful arts, she was believed to have made men acquainted with the means and instruments which are necessary for practising them, such as the art of producing fire. She was further believed to have invented nearly every kind of work in which women were employed, and she herself was skilled in such work: in short Athena and Hephæstus were the great patrons both of the useful and elegant arts. Hence she is called ὑπήργος (Paus. i. 24. § 3), and later writers make her the goddess of all wisdom, knowledge, and art, and represent her as sitting on the right hand side of her father Zeus, and supporting him with her counsel. (Hom. Od. xxii. 100, xviii. 199; Ilium. in Ven. 4. 7, &c.; Plut. Chim. 10; Ovid. Fast. iii. 693; Orph. Hygian. xxxiii. 8, Spanh. ad Cath. p. 643; Hom. Cerau. i. 12. 19; comp. Dict. of Ant. under Ἀθηναία and Χαλκινή.) As the goddess who made so many inventions necessary and useful in civilized life, she is characterized by various epithets and surnames, expressing the keenness of her sight or the power of her intellect, such as ἀντίλατος, ἀντίλατος, ἀντίλατος, ἀντίλατος, ἀντίλατος, ἀντίλατος, and ἀντίλατος. As the patron divinity of the state, she was at Athens the protectress of the phratries and houses which formed the basis of the state. The festival of the Apaturia had a direct reference to this particular point in the character of the goddess. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Apaturia.) She also maintained the authority of the law, and justice, and order, in the courts and the assembly of the people. This notion was as ancient as the Homeric poems, in which she is described as assisting Odysseus against the lawless conduct of the suitors. (Od. xliii. 394.) She was believed to have instituted the ancient court of the Areiopagus, and in cases where the votes of the judges were equally divided, she gave the casting vote in favour of the accused. (Aeschyl. *Esat. 735; comp. Paus. i. 28, § 5.) The epithets which have reference to this part of the goddess's character are δυστοιχος, the avenger (Paus. iii. 15, § 4), βουλαία, and δύναμις. (iii. 11, § 8.)

As Athena promoted the internal prosperity of the state, by encouraging agriculture and industry, and by maintaining law and order in all public transactions, so also she protected the state from outward enemies, and thus assumes the character of a warlike divinity, though in a very different sense from Ares, Eris, or Enyo. According to Homer (II. v. 736, &c.), she does not even bear arms, but borrows them from Zeus; she keeps men from slaughter when prudence demands it (II. i. 199, &c.), and repels Ares's savage love of war, and conquers him. (v. 840, &c., xxi. 406.) She does not love war for its own sake, but simply on account of the advantages which the state gains in engaging in it; and she therefore supports only such warlike undertakings as are begun with prudence, and are likely to be followed by favourable results. (x. 244, &c.) The epithets which she derives from her warlike character are ἄγελεια, λαφρία, ἀλαιμάχη, ἀλοκότος, and others. In times of war, towns, fortresses, and harbours are under her especial care, whence she is designated as ἄρεστοις, ἀλαιμακοδίνω, πολιά, πολιοχώ, δεραία, δεραία, κλαδοχώ, χαλκόφωνος, περικερύχω, and the like. The attributes which characterize the goddess of war, she is also the protector of all heroes who are distinguished for prudence and good counsel, as well as for their strength and valour, such as Heracles, Perseus, Bellerophon, Achilles, Diomedes, and Odysseus. In the war of Zeus against the giants, she assisted her father and Heracles with her counsel, and also took an active part in it, for she buried Enceladus under the island of Sicily, and slew Pallas. (Apollod. i. 6, § 1, &c.; comp. Spanheim, ad Callim. p. 643; Horat. Carm. i. 12. 19.) In the Trojan war she side with the more civilized Greeks, though on their return home she visited them with storms, on account of the manner in which the Locrian Ajax had treated Cassandra in her temple. As a goddess of war and the protectress of heroes, Athena usually appeared with a golden staff, formed of the head of Medusa. 4. Objects which distinguished the goddess in these representations of Athena in statues, colossal busts, and paintings, are the spear, the bow and arrow, the helmet, the shield, the aegis, the round Argolic shield, in the centre of which is represented the head of Medusa, the aegis, and the shield also was always dressed, and when it was carried about at the Attic festivals, it was entirely covered. But, notwithstanding the common opinion of her virgin character, there are some traditions of late origin which describe her as a mother. Thus, Apollo is called a son of Hephæstus and Athena—

a legend which may have arisen at the time when the Ionians introduced the worship of Apollo into Attica, and when this new divinity was placed in some family connexion with the ancient goddess of the country. (Müller, *Dor. ii. 2, § 13.) Lychnus also is called a son of Hephæstus and Athena. (Spanheim, *ad Callim. p. 644.)

Athena was worshipped in all parts of Greece, and from the ancient towns on the lake Copais her worship was introduced at a very early period into Attica, where she became the great national divinity of the city and the country. Here she was afterwards regarded as the Παίαν ἡ σῶτερα, γυλίς, and πανωίη, and the serpent, the symbol of perpetual renovation, was sacred to her. (Paus. i. 28, § 5, § 8. P. 644.) At Lindus in Rhodes her worship was likewise very ancient. Respecting its introduction into Italy, and the modifications which her character underwent there, see MINERVA. Among the things sacred to her we may mention the owl, serpent, cock, and olive-tree, which she was said to have created in her contest with Poseidon about the possession of Attica. (Plut. de Is. et Os.; Paus. vi. 26, § 2, i. 24, § 3; Hygin. *Fab. 164.) At Corone in Messenia her statue bore a crown in its hand. (Paus. iv. 54, § 3.) The sacrifices offered to her consisted of bulls, whence she probably derived the surname of ταυρωδῆς (Suid. s. v.), rams, and cows. (Horn. II. ii. 559; Od. Med. iv. 754.) The church of Athena on Mount Lycabettus was consecrated to the goddess of war. The most celebrated of the statues of Athena were those at Athens, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Panthenea and Arthaepheus.

Athena was frequently represented in works of art; but those in which her figure reached the highest ideal of perfection were the three statues on Mt. Phidias. The first was the celebrated colossal statue of the goddess, of gold and ivory, which was erected on the acropolis of Athens; the second was a still greater bronze statue, which came out of the spoils taken by the Athenians in the battle of Marathon; the third was a small bronze statue called the beautiful or the Lemnian Athena, because it had been dedicated at Athens by the Lemnians. The first of these statues represented the goddess in a standing position, bearing in her hand a Nike four cubits in height. The shield stood by her feet; her robe came down to her feet, on her breast was the head of Medusa, in her right hand she bore a lance, and at her feet there lay a serpent. (Paus. i. 24, § 7, § 28. &c.) We still possess a great number of representations of Athena in statues, colossal busts, relief, coins, and in vase-paintings. Among the attributes which characterize the goddess in these works of art, we mention—1. The helmet, which she usually wears on her head, but in a few instances carries in her hand. It is usually ornamented in the most beautiful manner with griffins, heads of rams, horses, and sphinxes. (Comp. Horn. II. v. 743.) 2. The aegis. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Aegis.) 3. The round Argolic shield, in the centre of which is represented the head of Medusa. 4. Objects sacred to her, such as an olive branch, a serpent, an owl, a cock, and a lance. Her garment is usually the Spartan tunic without sleeves, and over it... she wears a cloak, the peplus, or, though rarely, the chlamys. The general expression of her figure is thoughtfulness and earnestness; her face is rather oval than round, the hair is rich and generally combed backwards over the temples, and floats freely down behind. The whole figure is majestic, and rather strong built than slender: the hips are freely down behind. The whole figure is majestic, combed backwards over the temples, and floats ther oval than round, the hair is rich and generally

2. A lieutenant of Antigonus, who was sent against the Nabataeans, an Arabian people. (b. c. 312.) He surprised the stronghold of Petra, but afterwards suffered himself to be surprised in the night, and his army was almost entirely destroyed. (Diod. xix. 94.)

3. A general in the service of Antiochus VII. He accompanied him on his expedition against the Parthians, and was one of the first to fly in the battle in which Antiochus lost his life, b. c. 128. He, however, perished with hunger in his flight, as in consequence of some previous excesses, none of those to whom he fled would furnish him with the necessaries of life. (Diod. Exc. de VirL et Hist. p. 603, ed. Wess.)

4. Son of Attalus I, king of Pergamus. [Eumenes; Attalus.] His name occurs not un¬frequently in connexion with the events of his time. He was on various occasions sent as amb¬assador to Rome by his brothers Eumenes and Attalus. (Polyb. xxiv. 1, xxxi. 9, xxxii. 26, xxxiii. 11; Liv. xxxviii. 12, 13, xlii. 55, xlv. 27.)

ATHENAEUS ('A6b^4wos), literary. 1. A contemporary of Archimedes, the author of an extant work Πεπλο Μαυξαυματων (on warlike engines), addressed to Marcellus (probably the conqueror of Syracuse). He is perhaps the same with Athenaeus of Cyzicus, mentioned by Proclus (in Enucod. p. 19) as a distinguished mathematician. The above-mentioned work is printed in Thevenot's Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. iv. p. 222, &c.)

2. An epigrammatic poet, mentioned by Diogenes Laertius. (vi. 14, viii. 30.) He was the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Bruck, Anal. H. p. 257.)

3. A rhetorician, the contemporary and opponent of Hermagoras. He defined rhetoric to be the art of deceiving. (Quintil. iii. 1 § 16, li. 15, § 23.)

4. Of Seliuticus, a philosopher of the Peripatetic school, mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 670) as a contemporary of his own. He was for some time the leading demagogue in his native city, but afterwards came to Rome and became acquainted with L. Licinius Varro Murmenna. On the discovery of the plot which the latter, with Funinus Caepio, had entered into against Augustus, Athenaeus accompanied him in his flight. He was retaken, but pardoned by Augustus, as there was no evidence of his having taken a more active part in the plot. He is perhaps the same with the writer mentioned by Diodorus. (ii. 26.)

5. A Stoic philosopher, mentioned by Porphyrius in his life of Plotinus. (c. 20.) There was also an Epicurean philosopher of this name. (Dio¬lat. xii. 22, 12.)

ATHENAEUS ('A6b^4wos), a native of Nauc¬ratis, a town on the left side of the Canopic mouth of the Nile, is called by Suidas a γραταικος, a term which may be best rendered into English, a literary man. Suidas places him in the “times of Marcus,” but whether by this is meant Marcus Aurelius is uncertain, as Caracalla was also Marcus Antoninus. We know, however, that Oppian, who wrote a work called Haliaeetica inscribed to Curnella, was a little anterior to him (Athen. i. p. 13), and that Commodus was dead when he wrote (xii. p. 537), so that he may have been born in the reign of Aurelius, but flourished under his successors. Part of his work must have been written after b. c. 228, the date given by Dion Cassius for the death of Ulpian the lawyer, which event he mentions. (xv. p. 686.)

His extant work is entitled the Deipnosophaieia, i.e. the Banquet of the Learned, or else, perhaps, as has lately been suggested, The Controvers of Feasts. It may be considered one of the earliest collections of what are called Ama, being an immense mass of anecdotes, extracts from the writings of poets, historians, dramatists, philosophers, orators, and physi¬cians, of facts in natural history, criticisms, and discussions on almost every conceivable subject, especially on Gastronomy, upon which noble science he mentions a work (now lost) of Archestratus [ARCHESTRATUS], whose place his own 15 books have probably supplied. It is in short a collection of stories from the memory and common-place book of a Greek gentleman of the third century of the Christian era, of enormous reading, extreme love of good eating, and respectable ability. Some notion of the materials which he had amassed for the work, may be formed from the fact, which he tells us himself, that he had read and made extracts from 800 plays of the middle comedy only. (viii. p. 336.)

Athenaeus represents himself as describing to his friend Timocrates, a banquet given at the house of Laurentius (Απαθηραυος), a noble Roman, to several guests, of whom the best known are Galen, a physician, and Ulpian, the lawyer. The work is in the form of a dialogue, in which these guests are the interlocutors, related to Timocrates: a double machinery, which would have been inconvenient to an author who had a real talent for dramatic writing, but which in the hands of Athenaeus, who had none, is wholly unmanageable. As a work of art the failure is complete. Unity of time and dramatic probability are utterly violated by the supposition that so immense a work is the record of the conversation at a single banquet, and by the absurdity of collecting at it the produce of every season of the year. Long quotations and intricate discussions introduced apropos of some trifling incident, entirely destroy the form of the dialogue, so that before we have finished a speech we forget who was the speaker. And when in addition to this confusion we are suddenly brought back to the tiresome Timocrates, we are quite provoked at the clumsy way in which the book is put together. But as a work illustrative of ancient manners, as a collection of curious facts, names of authors and fraguments, which, but for Athenaeus, would utterly be perished; in short, as a body of amusing antiquarian research, it would be difficult to praise the Deipnoephistes too highly.

The work begins, somewhat absurdly, considering the difference between a discussion on the Immortality of the Soul, and one on the Pleasures of the Stomach, with an exact imitation of the opening of Plato's Phaedo.—Athenaeus and Timocrates being substituted for Phaedo and Echecrates. The praises of Laurentins are then introduced, and the conversation of the savans begins. It would be impossible to give an account of the contents of the book; a few specimens therefore must suffice. We have anecdotes of gastronomic, as of Apicius (the second of the three illustrious gluttons of that name), who is said to have spent many thousands on his stomach, and to have lived at Minturnae in the reign of Tiberius, whence he sailed to Africa, in search of good lobsters; but finding, as he approached the shore, that they were not more abundant than those which he ate in Italy, he turned back without landing. Sometimes we have anecdotes to prove assertions in natural history, e. g. it is shown that water is nutritious (1), by the statement that it nourishes the τέττις, and (2) because fluids generally are so, as milk and honey, by the latter of which Democritus of Abdera allowed himself to be kept alive over the Thesmophoria (though he had determined to starve himself), in order that the mourning for his death might not prevent his maidservants from celebrating the festival. The story of the Pinna and Pinnotees (πινοφόδες καὶ πινοτόθυμον) is told in the course of the disquisitions on shell-fish. The pinna is a bivalve shell-fish (βάττεροφ), the pinnotee a small crab, who inhabits the pinna's shell. As soon as the small fish on which the pinna subsists have swum in, the pinnoteer bites the pinna as a signal to him to close his shell and secure them. Grammatical discussions are mixed up with gastronomic; e. g. the account of the δαρβίδην begins with the laws of itsaconcentration; of eggs, by an inquiry into the spelling of the word, whether toiov tScor, the word, whether µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέν, or µελέ

Among the authors, whose works are now lost, from whom Athenaeus gives extracts, are Alcmenes, Agathon the tragic poet, Antisthenes the philosopher, Archilochus the inventor of iambics, Empedocles of Crete, Empedocles of Agrigentum, Cratinus, Eupolis (Hor. Sat. i. 4.1), Alcmian, Epicurus (whom he represents as a wasteful glutton), and many others whose names are well known. In all, he cites nearly 800 authors and more than 1200 separate works. Athenaeus was also the author of a lost book περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἀθήναις βασιλευσόντων, which probably, from the specimen of it in the Deipnoephistes, and the obvious uinitness of Athenaeus to be a historian, was rather a collection of anecdotes than a connected history.

Of the Deipnosophistes the first two books, and parts of the third, eleventh, and fifteenth, exist only in an Epitome, whose date and author are unknown. The original work, however, was rare in the time of Eustathius (latter part of 12th cent.); for Bentley has shewn, by examining nearly a hundred of his references to Athenaeus, that his only knowledge of him was through the Epitome. (Plethor, p. 180, &c.) Perizonius (preface to Aelian quoted by Schweighäuser) has proved that Aelian transferred large portions of the work to his Various Histories (middle of 3rd cent.), a robbery which has been committed almost in the life-time of the Deipnosophistes. The Deipnosophistes also furnished to Macrobius the idea and much of the matter of his Saturnalia (3rd of 4th cent.); but no one has availed himself so largely of Athenaeus's erudition as Eustathius. Only one original MS. of Athenaeus now exists, called by Schweighäuser the Codex Veneto-Parisiensis. From this all the others which we now possess are copies; so that the text of the work, especially in the poetical parts, is in a very unsettled state. The MS. was brought from Greece by cardinal Bessarion, and after his death was placed in the library of St. Mark at Venice, whence it was taken to Paris by order of Napoleon, and there for the first time collated by Schweighäuser's son. It is probably of the date of the 10th cen-Athenagoras was a Greek philosopher converted to the Christian religion, flourished in the second century of our era. His name is unaccountably passed over by Eusebius and Jerome; and the only ancient biographical notice of him is contained in a fragment of Philippus Sidetes, published by Henry Dodwell along with his Disquisitiones in Irenaeum. In this document it is stated, that Athenagoras was the first master of the catechetical school at Alexandria, and that he flourished in the days of Hadrian and Antoninus, to whom he addressed an Apology on behalf of the Christians. It is added that he had, before Celsius, intended to write against the Christians; but when he examined the Holy Scriptures with this view, he became a convert to the faith he had purposed to destroy. It is further asserted by this writer, that Clemens Alexandrinus was the disciple of Athenagoras, and Pantaenus the disciple of Clemens. The authority of Philippus Sidetes was lightly esteemed, even in ancient times; and there are some manifest inaccuracy in the foregoing statement. Athenagoras's defence of the Christians was certainly not addressed to Hadrian and Antoninus. It has been contended by some modern scholars, that it was presented to Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus; but it has been shewn by irrefragable proofs, that the emperors to whom it was addressed were Marcus Aurelius and Pius. And that he was an Athenian by birth, a proselyte to Christianity, and the author of the above-mentioned Apology, and of a treatise in defence of the...

Aquillus, who succeeded in subduing the insurgents, and slew Athenion with his own hand. (Did. Fargm. xxxvi.; Florus, iii. 19; Cic. in Verr. iii. 28, 54.)

The nickname Athenio was given to Sex. Clo- dius. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 12.)

2. A comic poet, from one of whose plays (the Σαυροβάρες) Athenaeus (xiv. p. 660) has a long extract.

3. A tragic poet, the instructor of Leonteus the Argive. (Athen. viii. p. 543.)

[Ann.]

5. A mythographer referred to in the Scholia on Apollonius i. 917 and Hübner (P. iv. 719). (Comp. Leonic. Adag. ii. p. 1220.) (C. P. M.)

Athenion (Ἀθηνίων), a Greek physician, who is mentioned by Sosinus (De Arte Obieter. p. 210) as being a follower of Eriatinnus, and who must therefore have lived some time between the third century before and the first century after Christ. He may very possibly be the same physician, one of whose medical formulae is preserved by Celsus. (De Medic. v. 25, p. 55.) (W. A. G.)

Athenion. 1. A painter, born at Maroneia in Thrace. He was a pupil of Phaedon of Corinth, and a contemporary probably of Nicias, whom he resembled and excelled, though his style was harsher. He gave promise of the highest excellence in his art, but died young. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40, 29.)

2. The engraver of a celebrated cameo, in the Royal Museum at Naples, representing Zeus contending with the giants. (Bruce, Mon. degli Ant. Inac. i. 30; Müller, Arch. d. Kunz. p. 498, Anm. 2.) (C. P. M.)

Athenippus (Ἀθηνίππος), a Greek physician (judging from his name), who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, as one of his medical prescriptions is quoted by Scribonius Largus. (De Compso, Medicum. c. 3. § 26, p. 196.) He may perhaps be the same person mentioned by Galen. (De Compso, Medicum, sec. Lecce, iv. 8. vol. xii. p. 786.) (W. A. G.)

Athenocles (Ἀθηνόκλεας). 1. The leader of an Athenian colony, who settled at Amissa in Pontus, and called the place Peiraeeus. The date of this event is uncertain. (Strab. xii. p. 547.)

2. Of Cyzicus, a commentator upon Homer, who, according to the judgment of Athenaeus (v. p. 177, e.), understood the Homeric poems better than Aristarchus. Whether the commentator upon Homer is the same Athenocles who wrote upon the early history of the Assyrians and Medes (Agath. ii. 24), is uncertain.

Athenocles (Ἀθηνόκλεας), a celebrated embross or charger, mentioned by Athenaeus. (C. A. L. p. 781, c. 762, h.) (C. P. M.)

Athenodorus (Ἀθηνόδορος). 1. Of Am- nos, a rhetorician, who lived in the time of Polybius. He had been a disciple of Aristocles and Chrestus. (Philost. Vit. Sophist. i. 14; Eudocia, p. 51.)

2. The father and brother of the poet Aetas. The latter defended Homer against the attacks of Zosimus. (Suidas, s. a. Ἀρατος.)

3. A Stoic philosopher, surmamed Cananites (Κανανιτης) from Cana in Cilicia, the birthplace of his father, whose name was Sandon. Athenodorus was himself a native of Taras. It is the same person probably whom Cicero (ad Att. xvi. 11) calls Athenodorus Calvus. In Rhodes he became acquainted with Poseidonius, by whom probably he was... instructed in the doctrines of the Stoics. He afterwards went to Apollonia, where he taught, and attracted the notice of Octavius, whom he followed to Rome. He stood high in the favour of the emperor, and was permitted to offer him advice, which he did on some occasions with considerable freedom. (Dion Cass. lib. 36, iv. 43; Zonaras, p. 544, b.) Zosimus (i. 6) tells us, that the government of Augustus became milder in consequence of his attending to the advice of Athenodorus. The young Claudius was placed under his instruction. (Suet. Claud. 4.) In his old age he returned to Tarsus, which was at that time misgoverned by Boethus, a favourite of Antonius. Athenodorus procured his expulsion and that of his party, and restored order. Through his influence with Augustus, he procured for his native city a remission of the vectigalia. He died at the age of eighty-two, and his memory was honoured by an annual festival and sacrifice. (Strab. xiv. p. 674; Locian, Macrob. xiv. p. 674; Cic. de Fam. iii. 7, xvi. p. 14.) He was the author of a work against the Categories of Aristotle (Porphyr. In Categ. p. 21, a.; Simplic. Categ. p. 15, b.; Stobaeus, Serm. 33) attributed by some to Athenodorus; Stoic. p. 21, a.; Simplic. iii. 7, ad AU. xvi. 14.) He was the author of a work called nephraroi (Diog. Laert. iii. 3, v. 17); of a work addressed to Octavia (Plut. Ayxu&v); of an account of Tarsus (Steph. Cordylio; of an account of one Aegos-potami. He was also famed for his writings on the problems of death and immortality, which he did on some occasions with considerable freedom. (Photius, 119.) He maintained, in opposition to the Stoics, that all offences were not equal. (Sympos. vii. 38,121.) He was a pupil of Aegon at Athens, where he taught, and founded cities in Lydia, which were called by the name of Aegon-theos, and of some others. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 543; Hoffmann, Dissert. de Athen. Tarsenz., Lips. 1732; Sevin, in the Mémóires de l'Acad. des Insér. xiv. p. 77.)

4. Surnamed Cordylio (Kopbv|wv), a Stoic philosopher, born at Tarsus. He was the keeper of the library at Pergamus, and in his anxiety to preserve the doctrines of his sect in their original purity, used to cut out from the works of the Stoic writers such parts as appeared to him erroneous or inconsistent. He removed from Pergamus to Rome, and lived with M. Cato, at whose house he died. (Strab. xiv. p. 674; Diog. Laerit. vii. 34; Plut. Cat. Min. 10; Senec. de Tranquill. Anim. c. 3, Ep. x. 4.)

5. An Eretrian, the author of a work entitled ἦθος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου. (Photius, Cod. 119.)

6. Of Rhodes, a rhetorician spoken of by Quintilian. (lil. 17.)

7. Of Soll, a disciple of Zenon. (Diog. Laerit. vii. 38,121.) He maintained, in opposition to the other Stoics, that all offences were not equal.

8. Of Taras. [See Nos. 3 and 4.]

9. Of Tros, a player on the cithara, was one of the performers who assisted at the festivities celebrated at Susa in c. 324, on the occasion of the marriage of Alexander with Statira. There was also a tragedian of the same name, whose services were called into requisition on the same occasion. (Athen. xii. p. 538.)

ATHENODORUS ('Aθηνόδωρος), a Greek physician in the first century after Christ or the beginning of the second. He was probably a contemporary of Plutarch, by whom the first book of his treatise On Epidemic Diseases, Ἐρατίμος, is quoted. (Sympos. vii. 9, § 1.)

ATHENODORUS ('Αθηνόδωρος). 1. A statue of Ares, in a doorway in Athens, executed by Glaucon and Euphranor, which was dedicated by the Laconodemonians at Delphi after the battle of Aegos-potami. He was also famed for his statues of distinguished women. He was a pupil of the elder Polycleitus, and flourished at the end of the fifth century b. c. (Paus. x. 9, § 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 13, init., and § 36.)

2. A sculptor, the son and pupil of Agesander of Thasos, addressed to an emperor, in expounding the group of Laocoon. [AEGESANDER.] [C. P. M.]

ATHENOGONES ('Αθηνόγωνη), the author of a work, probably a poem, entitled Cephaliion. (Athen. iv. p. 164, a.)

ATHENOGONES ('Αθηνόγωνη), a Christian martyr, of whom nothing more is known with certainty than that, when he was proceeding to the stake, he left, as a parting gift to his friends, a hymn in which the divinity of the Holy Spirit was acknowledged. We learn this fact from St. Basil, by whom it is incidentally recorded. (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 28.) On the supposed authority of this testimony, some have erroneously attributed to Athenogenes the morning hymn (σωμα πρωμ.) beginning Δόξα τής ειπψαν Θεό, and the evening hymn (σωμα τεραμα) beginning Φασὶ μαρτυρίς διάπε. (For the hymns themselves, see Uster, Diss. de Symbolo-Apostolico, &c. p. 33; Thomas Smith's Miscellanea priora, p. 152; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. pp. 171-2.) But Basil in this passage makes no mention whatever of the morning hymn, while he expressly distinguishes the evening hymn from that of Athenogenes, and says that he does not know who was its author. Cave falls into the above-mentioned error in the first volume of his Historia Literaria (ed. 1639), but corrects it in the dissertation de Libris et Officis Ecclesiasticis Graecorum, appended to the second volume, published in 1698. Legnay makes Athenogenes contemporary with Clemens Alexandrinus, and represents him as suffering under the emperor Severus. In this chronology Cave and Lumper correct. Garnier, in a note upon the above-cited passage in Basil, identifies this Athenogenes with one whom the martyrologists represent as suffering under Diocletian. Baronius and Tillenmont strangely suppose that Athenogenes is one and the same with Athenonagon, whose apology for the Christians was addressed to M. Aurelius Antoninus and his son Commodus. (Le Moyne, Varia Sueva, ii. pp. 1093-6; Tillemont, Mémoires, &c. ii. p. 632; Lumper, Historia Theol. Critica, &c. iv. pp. 39, 40; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. pp. 170-2.)

ATHOUS ('Αθώς), a surname of Zeus, derived from mount Athos, on which the god had a temple. (Hexyeh. s. v.; Aeschyl. Agam. 270.)

ATHYBILATUS ('Αθυβίλατος), a Greek physician of Thasos, introduced by Plutarch as one of the speakers in his Symposiaca (iii. 4.), and who must therefore have lived at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ATHYMBRUS ('Αθυμβρός), ATHYMBRUS ('Αθυμβρός), and HYDRELUS (Ὑδρέλος), three brothers, who came from Lacedaemon, and founded cities in Lydia, which were called by their names. These cities were afterwards deserted by their inhabitants, who founded together the town of Nysa, whence the latter regarded Athymbus as its founder. (Strab. xiv. p. 650; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αθυμβρος.)

ATHYMBRUS ('Αθυμβρός) was the son of M. Atius Balbus of Aricia, and of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar. She was married to C. Octavius, and became by him the mother of Augustus Caesar. (Suet. Oct. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 59.) She pretended that Augustus was the son of Apollo, who had intercourse with her in the form of a dragon, while she was sleeping one occasion in the temple of the god. (Dion Cass. xiv. 1; Suet. Oct. 94.) She carefully attended to the education of her son, and is on this account classed by the author of the Dialogue on Orators (c. 29) along with Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and Aurelia, the mother of C. Julius Caesar. Her husband died in B.C. 59, when her son was only four years of age, and she afterwards married L. Marcus Philippus, who was consul in B.C. 56. On the death of Julius Caesar, she and her husband tried to dissuade her son from accepting the inheritance which his great-uncle had left him. (Plut. Oct. 44; Suet. B. c. 56. On the death of Julius Caesar, she and his son were only four years of age, and she afterwards married L. Marcias Philippas, who was consul in B.C. 59, when her husband died. (Plut. Oct. 44; Suet. B. c. 56.)

B. c. 304, it would appear that he wrote tragedies as well as comedies. (Gell. iv. 1.) He wrote Commentaries on the laws of the Twelve Tables. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 23; Heinec. Hist. Jur. Rom. § 125.)

M. ATILIIUS, one of the early Roman poets, is classed among the comic poets of Rome by Valerius Seditius, who assigns him the fifth place among them in order of merit. (Ap. Gell. xv. 24.) But as Attilius translated into Latin the Spectre of Sophocles (Cic. de Palaest. 1. comp. Suet. Cass. 84), it would appear that he wrote tragedies as well as comedies. The latter, however, may have been both superior to, and more numerous ATILICI\[C]US, a Roman jurist, who probably lived about the middle of the first century of the Christian era. He seems to have been attached to the sect of Proculus (Heinec. Hist. Jur. Rom. § 280), to whom he addressed a letter, which is contained in the Digest in an extract from Proculus. (Dig. 23. tit. 4. s. 17.) He is several times referred to in the Digest, and is also cited in the Institutes (2. tit. 14. pr.) as an authority; but there is no direct extract from him, and the names of his works have not been preserved, though Bach (Hist. Jur. Rom. p. 411) seems to infer from Dig. 12. tit. 4. s. 7. pr., that he published responsa. [J. T. G.] than, the former; and this would be a sufficient reason why Sedigius classed him among the comic poets, but having recourse to the improbable conjecture of Weichert (Poet. Latin. Reliquiae, p. 139), that he had turned the Electra of Sophocles into a comedy. Among his other plays we have the titles of the following: Μπατάκως (Cic. Tus. Disp. iv. 11), Βοτθίας (Varr. L. L. vi. 89, ed. Müller), Απρετος, and Κομινιφέρις. (Varr. ap. Cels. iii. 3.) According to another reading the last three are attributed to a poet Aquilius. With the exception of a line quoted by Cicero (ad Att. xiv. 29), and a few words preserved in two passages of Varro (L. L. vii. 96, 166), nothing of Attilus has come down to us. Cicero (ad Att. l. c.) calls him poeta durissimus, and Licinius describes him as ferreus scrip. (Cic. de Fin. l. c.) ATTIUS, FORTUNATIA'NUS. [FORTUNATIANUS] LILLA, the mother of Lucan, was accused by her own son, in A. D. 66, as privy to the conspiracy against Nero, but escaped punishment, though she was not acquitted. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 56, 71.) ATIMETUS, a freedman and paramour of Domitia, the aunt of Nero, accused Agrrippina of plotting against her son Nero, A.D. 56. Agrrippina, however, on this occasion, obtained from Nero the punishment of her accusers, and Atimetus accordingly was put to death. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, 21, 22.) ATIMETUS, P. ATTIUS, a physician, whose name is preserved in an ancient inscription, and who was physician to Augustus. Some writers suppose that he is the same person who was a contemporary of Scribonius Largus, in the first century after Christ, and who is said by him (De Compos. Medicam. c. 29. § 120) to have been the slave of a physician named Cassius, and who is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 771), under the name of Altimetos (Ατιμίτως). A physician of the same name, who is mentioned in an ancient inscription with the title Archiuter, is most probably a different person, and lived later than the reign of Augustus. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 94, ed. vet.; Rhodius, Note on Scribon. Larg. pp. 188-83.) In a later epitaph on Claudia Homonoea, the wife of an Atimetus, who is described as the freedman of Pamphilus, the freedman of the emperor Tiberius, which has been published by Burnmann (Auth. Lat. vol. ii. p. 90), Meyer (Auth. Lat. n. 1274), and Wernsdorf (Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 213), and is in the form of a dialogue, partly in Latin and partly in Greek, between Homonoea and her husband. This Atimetus is supposed by some writers to have been the same as the slave of Cassius, mentioned by Scribonius (Wernsdorf, vol. iii. p. 139); and Lipsius (ad Tac. Ann. xiii. 19) imagines both to be the same as the freedman of Domitia spoken of above; but we can come to no certainty on this point. ATILIUS, GENSIUS, plebeian. None of the members of this gens ever attained the consulship; and the first who held any of the higher offices of the state was C. Atius Labeo, who was praetor b. c. 138. All the Atini bear the cognomen Labeo.

ATIUS. 1. L. ATIUS, the first tribune of the second legion in the war with the Istri, b. c. 178. (Liv. xii. 7.) 2. C. ATIUS, the Pelignian, belonged to the Pompayan party, and had possession of Salmo, when Caesar invaded Italy, b. c. 49. Caesar despatched M. Atius Epictetus to the town, the inhabitants of which opened the gates as soon as they saw Antony's standards, while Atius cast himself down from the wall. At his own request he was sent to Caesar, who dismissed him unhurt. (Caes. B. C. i. 18.) Cicero writes (ad Att. viii. 4) as if Atius himself had surrendered the town to Antony.

ATLAS (Ἀτλας), according to Hesiod (Theog. 507, &c.), a son of Japetus and Clymene, and a brother of Menestes, Prometheus, and Epimetheus; according to Apollodorus (i. 2. § 8), his mother's name was Asia; and, according to Hyginus (Fab. 256), he was a son of Aether and Asia. For other accounts see Diod. iii. 60, iv. 27; Plat. Crat. p. 114; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 247. According to the description of the Homeric poems, Atlas knows the depth of all the sea, and bears the long columns which keep asunder, or carry all around (άπλως άκουρς), earth and heaven. (Od. i. 82.) Hesiod only says, that he bore heaven with his head and hands. (Comp. Aeschyl. Prom. 547, &c.; Paus. v. 18. § 1, 11. § 2.) In these passages Atlas is described either as bearing heaven alone, or as bearing both heaven and earth; and several modern scholars have been engaged in investigating which of the two notions was the original one. Much depends upon the meaning of the Homeric expression άπλως άκουρς; if the signification is "the columns which keep asunder heaven and earth," the columns (mountains) must be conceived as being somewhere in the middle of the earth's surface; but if they mean "bear or support all around," they must be regarded as forming the circumference of the earth, upon which the vault of heaven rests apparently. In either case, the meaning of keeping asunder is implied. In the Homeric description of Atlas, the idea of his being a superhuman or divine being, with a personal existence, seems to be blended with the idea of a mountain. The idea of heaven-bearing Atlas is, according to Latercine, a mere personification of a cosmogonic notion, which arose from the views entertained by the ancients respecting the nature of heaven and its relation to the earth; and such a personification, when once established, was further and more easily connected with other myths, such as that of the Titans. Thus Atlas is described as the leader of the Titans in their contest with Zeus, and, being conquered, he was condemned to the labour of bearing heaven on his head and hands. (Hesiod, i. c.; Hygin. Fab. 130.) Still later traditions distort the original idea still more, by putting rationalistic interpretations upon it, and make Atlas a man who was metamorphosed into a mountain. Thus Ovid (Met. iv. 630, &c., comp. ii. 296) relates, that Perses came to him and asked for shelter, which he was refused, whereupon Perses, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into mount Atlas, on which rested heaven with all its stars. Others go still farther, and represent Atlas as a powerful king, who possessed great knowledge of the courses of the stars, and who was the first who taught men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as a mere figurative mode of speaking. (Diod. iii. 60, iv. 27; Paus. iv. 20. § 3; Serv. ad Aen. i. 745; Tzetza, ad Lyophor. 873.) At first, the story of Atlas referred to one mountain only, which was believed to exist on the extreme boundary of the earth; but, as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was transferred to other places, and thus we read of a Mauritanian, Italian, Arcadian, and even of a Caucasian, Atlas. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Dionys. i. 61; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 134.) The common opinion, however, was, that the heaven-bearing Atlas was in the north-western part of Africa, and the range of mountains in that part of the world bears the name of Atlas down to this day. Atlas is said to have been the father of the Phleades by Pleione or by Hesperis, of the Hyades and Hesperides by Aethra, and of Ocnomaus and Maca by the name of Atlas down to this day. Atlas is the range of mountains in that part of the world in the north-western part of Africa, and even of a Caucasian, Atlas. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Diod. iv. 27; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 150.) Dione and Calypso, and Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. (Hom. Od. vii. 245; Hygin. Fab. 83.)

Atlas was painted by Panaeus on the parapet surrounding the statue of the Olympian Zeus (Paus. v. 11. § 2); on the chest of Cypselus he was seen carrying the golden apples of Hesperides; and on the throne of Apollo at Delphi he was likewise represented. (Paus. v. 11. § 2; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 150; Dione and Calypso, and Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. (Hom. Od. vii. 245; Hygin. Fab. 83.)

Atlas was likewise represented. (Paus. v. 11. § 2; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 150; Dione and Calypso, and Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. (Hom. Od. vii. 245; Hygin. Fab. 83.)

the son of Pelops and the nymph Aixoche or Damis. (Hygin. Fab. 85; Schol. ad Hom. ii. 104.) According to the Scholiast on Thucydides (i. 9), who seems himself to justify the remark of his commentator, it was Pelops himself who killed Chrysippus. Atreus and Thyestes hereupon took to flight, dreading the consequences of their deed, or, according to the tradition of Thucydides, to escape the fate of Chrysippus. Sthenelus, king of Mycenae, and husband of their sister Nicippe (the Schol. on Thucyd. calls her Astydameia) invited them to come to Midea, which he assigned to them as their residence. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 6.) When afterwards Eurystheus, the son of Sthenelus, marched out against the Hesceleds, he entrusted the government of Mycenae to his uncle Atreus; and after the fall of Eurystheus in Attica, Atreus became his successor in the kingdom of Mycenae. From this moment, crimes and calamities followed one another in rapid succession in the house of Tantalus. Thyestes seduced Aërope, the wife of Atreus, and robbed him also of the lamb with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes. (Eustath. ad Hor. ii. 104.) For this crime, Thyestes was expelled from Mycenae by his brother; but from his place of exile he sent Pleisthenes, the son of Atreus, whom he had brought up as his own child, commanding him to kill Atreus. Atreus however slew the emissary, without knowing that he was his own son. This part of the story contains a manifest contradiction; for if Atreus killed Pleisthenes under these circumstances, his wife Aërope, whom Thyestes had seduced, cannot have been the widow of Pleisthenes. (Hygin. Fab. 86; Schol. ad Hor. ii. 249.) In order to obtain an opportunity for taking revenge, Atreus feigned to be reconciled to Thyestes, and invited him to Mycenae. When the request was complied with, Atreus killed the two sons of Thyestes, Tantalus and Pleisthenes, and had their flesh prepared and placed it before Thyestes as a meal. After Thyestes had eaten some of it, Atreus ordered the arms and bones of the children to be brought in, and Thyestes, struck with horror at the sight, cursed the house of Tantalus and fled, and Helios turned away his face from the frightful scene. (Aeschyl. Agam. 1598; Soph. Ag. 1266.) The kingdom of Atreus was now visited by scarcity and famine, and the oracle, when consulted about the means of averting the calamity, advised Atreus to call back Thyestes. Atreus, who went out in search of him, came to king Thesprotus. Pelopia was at the time with child of whom very little more is known than that he died at Rome in n. c. 78, and was buried at the second milestone on the Phaccnestinc road. (Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Ol. 175, 3.) His surname Atta was given him, according to Festus (s. v.), from a defect in his feet, to which circumstance many commentators suppose that Horace alludes in the lines (Ep. ii. 1. 79), but the joke is so poor and far-fetched, that we are unwilling to father it upon Horace. It appears, however, from this passage of Horace, that the plays of Atta were very popular in his time. Atta is also mentioned by Fronto (p. 95, ed. Rom.); but the passage of Cicero (pro Sestio, 51), in which his name occurs, is evidently corrupt. The comedies of Atta belonged to the class called by the Roman grammarians toga tobarumia (Dionedes, iii. p. 487, ed. Putsch), that is, comedies in which Roman manners and Roman persons were introduced. The titles and a few fragments of the following plays of Atta have come down to us: Aesidicia (Gell. v. 9; Dionied. iii. p. 487); Agade Calidiae (Non. Marc. p. 133. 11, 139. 7); Conclavitra (Gell. vii. 9); Lucubratior (Non. Marc. p. 468. 22); Materivera, though this was probably written by Afranius, and is wrongly ascribed to Atta (Schol. Cuar. ad Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 80); Mytophilia (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vii. 32); Scorpius (Priscian, vii. p. 764); Supplicatio (Macrobi. Sat. ii. 14).

ATTALUS.

ATTAGNUS (Ἀτταγνος), the son of Phrynny, one of the leading men in Thebes, betrayed Thebes to Xerxes on his invasion of Greece (Paus. vii. 10. § 1), and took an active part in favour of the Persians. He invited Mardonius and fifty of the noblest Persians in his army to a splendid banquet at Thebes, shortly before the battle of Plataea, n. c. 479. After the battle, the Greeks marched against Thebes, and required Attagnus, with the other partisans of the Median party, to be delivered up to them. This was at first refused; but, after the city had been besieged for twenty days, his fellow-citizens determined to comply with the demands of the Greeks. Attagnus made his escape, but his family were handed over to Pausanias, who dismissed them without injury. (Herod. ix. 15, 86, 88; Athen. iv. p. 148, e.)

ATTALIATA, MICHAEL, a judge and proconsul under Michael Ducas, emperor of the East, at whose command he published, a. d. 1073, a work containing a system of law in 95 titles, under the name ποιμαι κυωνων ήτο πραγματικα. This work was translated into Latin by Leunclavius, and edited by him in the beginning of the second volume of his collection, Jus Graeco-Romanum. If it is a poem, as might be inferred from the title, no one has yet observed the fact or discovered the metre in which it is written. Ποιμαι κωμων is usually translated ὁποῖος ἄρα νομός. The historians of Roman law before Ritter (Bitter, ad Heinic. Hist. J. R. § 406) wrote ποιμαν to ποιμαν. There are many manuscripts of the work in existence, which differ considerably from the printed edition of Leunclavius. (Bach, Hist. J. R. p. 682.) It may be mentioned that extracts from a similar contemporary work, σύνοψις τῶν νόμων, by Michael Psellus, are given by Leunclavius as scholia to the work of Attalata, and printed, as if they were prose, whereas they are really specimens of the ποιμαι γνώμων, or popular verses, in which accent or emphasis is supposed to supply the place of quantity. [Psellus.] (Heimbach, Anecdota, i. 125-6; C. E. Zachariae, Historiae Juris Graeco-Romani delineatio, p. 71, Heidelberg, 1839.)

ATTALION (Ἀτταλίων), a physician, who wrote a commentary on the Aphorisms falsely ascribed to Hippocrates, which amounted to as much as 800 folios, is spelled 'Ατταλίωνος. It is derived from the place Attala.

The marriage of his niece, Attalus, when the guests were heated with wine, called upon the company to beg of the gods a legitimate (τριβήσων) successor to the throne. This roused the wrath of Alexander, who was present, and a brawl ensued, in which Philip drew his sword and rushed upon his son. Alexander and his mother Olympias withdrew from the king and his mother Olympias withdrew from the kingdom (Plut. Alex. 7; Justin, ix. 7; Athen. xiii. p. 557, d. e.;) but though they soon afterwards returned, the influence of Attalus does not appear to have been weakened. Philip's connexion with Attalus not only thus involved him in family dissensions, but eventually cost him his life. Attalus had inflicted a grievous outrage upon Pausanias, a youth of noble family, and one of Philip's bodyguard. Pausanias complained to Philip; but, as he was unable to obtain the punishment of the offender, he resolved to be revenged upon the king himself, and accordingly assassinated him at the festival at Aegae in n. c. 396. [Philip.] (Arist. Pol. v. 8. § 10; Plut. Alex. 10; Justin, ix. 6.) Attalus was in Asia at the time of Philip's death, as he had been previously sent thither, along with Parmenion and Amyntas in the command of some troops, in order to secure the Greek cities in Western Asia to the cause of Philip. (Diod. xvi. 91; Justin, ix. 5.) Attalus could have little hope of obtaining Alexander's pardon, and therefore entered very readily into the proposition of Democles to rebel against the new monarch. But, mistrusting his power, he soon afterwards endeavoured to make terms with Alexander, and sent him the letter which he had received from Democles. This, however, produced no change in the purpose of Alexander, who had previously sent Hecataeus into Asia with orders to arrest Attalus, and convey him to Macedon, or, if this could not be accomplished, to kill him secretly. Hecataeus thought it safer to adopt the latter course, and had him assassinated privately. (Diod. xvii. 2, 3, 5.)

2. Son of Andromenes the Stymphaean, and one of Alexander's officers, was accused with his brothers, Amyntas and Simias, of having been engaged in the conspiracy of Philotas, n. c. 330, but was acquitted, together with his brothers. [Amyntas, No. 4.] In n. c. 328, Attalus was left with Polyperchon and other officers in Bactria with part of the troops, while the king himself marched against the Segidians. (Arrian, iv. 16.) He accompanied Alexander in his expedition into India, and was employed in several important duties. (Arrian, iv. 27, v. 12.) In Alexander's last illness, n. c. 323, he was one of the seven chief officers who passed the night in the temple of Serapis at Babylon, in order to learn from the god whether Alexander should be carried into the temple. (Arrian, vii. 26.)

After the death of Alexander, Attalus joined Perdiccas, whose sister, Atalante, he had married. He accompanied his brother-in-law in his unfortunate campaign against Egypt in n. c. 321, and had the command of the fleet. After the murder of Perdiccas, he was condemned to death by the army; Atalante, who was in the camp, was immediately executed, but Attalus escaped his wife's fate in consequence of his absence with the fleet at Palusium. He afterwards sailed to Tyre, where the treasures of Perdiccas had been deposited. These, which amounted to as much as 800 talents, were surrendered to him by Archelaus.
ATTALUS.

ATTAIUS, the name of three kings of Pergamus.

1. L. was the son of Attalus, the brother of Philetaracus, and Antiochis, daughter of Achaeus, not the cousin of Antiochus the Great. He succeeded his cousin, Eumenes L., in B.C. 241.

He was a friend of the Asiatic princes who ventured to make head against the Gauls, over whom he gained a decisive victory. After this success, he assumed the title of king (Strab. xiii. p. 624; Paus. ii. 8. § 11, x. § 18; Liv. xxxvii. 16.) and, dedicated a sculptured representation of his victory in the Acropolis at Athens. He met a Roman embassy, and war was formally declared against Philip. (Polyb. xvi. 25, 26; Liv. xxxi. 14, 15; Paus. i. 5. § 5, 6. § 1.) In the same year, Attalus made some ineffectual attempts to repel the aggressions of Antiochus III., who had taken the opportunity of his absence to attack Pergamus, but was induced to desist by the remonstrances of the Romans. (Liv. xxxi. 45—47, xxxii. 8, 27.)

In 198, Attalus again joined the Romans, and, after the campaign, wintered in Aegina. In the spring of 197, he attended an assembly held at Thebes for the purpose of detaching the Boeotians from the cause of Philip, and in the midst of his speech was struck with apoplexy. He was con-vowed to Pergamus, and died the same year, in the seventy-second year of his age, after a reign of forty-four years. (Livy. xxxvi. 16, 19, 23, 24, 33, xxxii. 2, 21; Polyb. xvii. 2, 8, 16, xviii. 24, xxxii. 2, &c.) As a ruler, his conduct was marked by wisdom and justice; he was a faithful ally, a generous friend, and an affectionate husband and father. He encouraged the arts and sciences. (Diog. Laert. iv. 81; Athen. xv. p. 607; Plin. H. N. viii. 74, xxxiv. 19, § 24, xxxv. 49.) By his wife, Apollonia or Apollonis, he had four sons: Eumenes, who succeeded him, Attalus, Philometor, and Atheneus.

II. Surnamed Philometor, was the son of Attalus I., and was bom in B. c. 200. (Lucian. Macrob. 12; Strab. xiii. p. 624.) Before his accession to the crown, we frequently find him employed by his brother Eumenes in military operations. In B. c. 190, during the absence of Eumenes, he resisted an invasion of Selcucus, the son of Antiochus, and was afterwards hailed as king at the battle of Mount Sipylus. (Livy. xxxvii. 18, 43.) In B. c. 198, he accompanied his brother to Galatia. (Livy. xxxiv. 12; Polyb. xxii. 22.) In 182, he served his brother in his war with Phraates. (Polyb. xxxv. 4, 6.) In 171, with Eumenes and Atheneus, he joined the consul P. Licius Crassus in Greece. (Livy. xliii. 55, 58, 65.) He was several times sent to Rome as ambassador: in B. c. 192, to announce that Antiochus had crossed the Hellespont (Livy. xxxv. 23); in 181, during the war between Eumenes and Phraates (Polyb. xxxv. 6); in 167, to congratulate the Romans on their victory over Pheres. Eumenes being in ill-favour at Rome at this time, Attalus was encouraged with hopes of getting the kingdom for himself; but was induced, by the remonstrances of a physician named Stratus, to abandon his designs. (Livy. xlv. 19, 20; Polyb. xxx. 1—3.) In 164 and 160, he was again sent to Rome. (Polyb. xxxi. 9, xxxii. 3, 5.)

Attalus succeeded his brother Eumenes in B. c. 159. His first undertaking was the restoration of Arianthas to his kingdom. (Polyb. xxxii. 23.) In 156, he was attacked by Prusias, and found himself compelled to call in the assistance of the Romans and his allies, Arianthas and Mithridates. In B. c. 154, Prusias was compelled by the threats of the Romans to grant peace, and indemnify Attalus for the losses he had sustained. (Polyb. iii. 5, xxxii. 23, &c., xxxiii. 1, 6, 10, 11; Appian. Mithr. 5, &c., Diod. xxxii. Exe. p. 589.) In 152, he sent some troops to aid Alexander Balas in usurping the throne of Syria (Porphyr. ap. Euseb. p. 187; Just. xxviii. 2; Polyb. xxx. 1—3.) In 149 he assisted Nicomedes against his father Prusias. He was also engaged in hostilities with, and conquered, Diegylas, a Thracian prince, the father-in-law of Prusias (Diod. xxxiii. Exc. p. 595, &c.; Strab. xiii. p. 624), and sent some auxiliary troops to the Romans, which assisted them in expelling the pseudo-Philip and in taking Corinth. (Strab. l. c.; Paus. vii. 16. § 8.) During the latter part of his life, he resigned himself to the guidance of his minister, Philopheon. (Plut. Mor. p. 792.) He founded Philadelphia in Lydia (Séphy. Byz. x.r.,) and Attalicia in Pamphylia. (Strab. xiv. p. 667.) He encouraged the arts and sciences, and was himself the inventor of a kind of embroidery. (Plin. H. N. vii. 39, xxxv. 36, § 19, viii. 74; Athen. viii. p. 346, xiv. p. 634.) He died n. c. 135, aged eighty-two.

III. Surnamed Philometor, was the son of Eumenes II. and Stratonice, daughter of Arianthas, king of Cappadocia. While yet a boy, he was brought to Rome (B. c. 152), and presented to the senate at the same time with Alexander Balas. He succeeded his uncle Attalus I. n. c. 135. He is known to us chiefly for the extravagance of his conduct and the murder of his relations and friends. At last, seized with remorse, he abandoned all public business, and devoted himself to sculpture, statuary, and gardening, on which he wrote a work. He died n. c. 133 of a fever, with which he was seized in consequence of exposing himself to the sun's rays while engaged in erecting a monument to his mother. In his will, he made the Romans his heirs. (Strab. xiii. p. 624; Polyb. xxxii. 16; Justin. xxxvi. 14; Diod. xxxiv. Exc. p. 601; Varro, R. R. Praef.; Columell. i. 1. § 8; Plin. H. N. xviii. 5; Liv. Epit. 56; Plut. Tib. Grcecol. 14; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Florus, ii. 20; Appian. Mithr. 62, Bell. Civ. v. 4.) His kingdom was claimed by Aristobulus. [Aristobulus.] [C. P. M.]

After Attalus the West for one year (A. D. 409, 410), the first mixed to that office purely by the influence of barbarians. He was born in Ionia, brought up as a Pagan (Philostorgius, xiii. 3), and received baptism from an Arian bishop. (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 9.) Having become senator and proconsul of the city at the time of Alaric's second siege of Rome, he was, after the surrender of the place, deposed emperor by the Gothic king and his army, in the place of Honorius, and conducted by them in state to Ravenna, where he sent an insulting message to Honorius, commanding him to vacate the throne, amputate his extremities, and retire to a desolate island. (Philostorgius, xiii. 3.) But the union of pride and folly which he had shewn in the first days of his reign, by proposing to reunite Egypt and the East to the empire (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ix. 8), and later by adopting measures without Alaric's advice, induced the Gothic chief to depose him on the plain of Ariminum. (Zosimus, vi. 6—13.) After the death of Alaric, he remained in the camp of Ataulphus, whom, as emperor, he had made count of the domestics, and whose triumph with Placidia he celebrated as a musician. He was again put forward by Ataulphus as a rival emperor, during the insurrection of Jovinus, but on being abandoned by him (Olymp. apud Phot. p. 56), was taken prisoner, and on being brought before the tribunal of Honorius, was condemned to a sentence with which he had himself threatened Honorius in his former prosperity, viz. the amputation of his thumb and forefinger, and perpetual banishment to the island of Lipari, A. D. 416. (Philostorgius, xiii. 4, with Godfrey's Dissertations.)

There is in the British Museum a silver coin of this emperor, once in the collection of Cardinal Albano, and supposed to be unique. It is remarkable as exceeding in size all known ancient silver coins, and weighs about 1203 grains, and in the usual numismatic language would be represented by the number 163.

The obverse is, PRIEESC. ATTALVS. P. F. AUG., a protome of Attalus, turned to the right, wearing a fillet ornamented with pearls round his forehead, and the filum catinum traced across the right shoulder with the usual battle.

The reverse is, INVICTA. ROMA. AETERNA. R. M. Rome, helmeted and draped to the feet, sitting in front on a chair ornamented on each side with lions' heads; in the right hand she holds a globe, and in her left the head of the heron in her right hand a crown and in her left a branch of palm; the left rests upon a spear with a long iron head, and inverted. [A. P. S.]

ATTALUS, literary. 1. A Stoic philosopher in the reign of Tiberius, who was deified by Sejanus, and reduced to cultivate the ground. (Senec. Suet. 2. p. 17, ed. Bip.) He taught the philosopher Seneca (Ep. 108), who frequently quotes him, and speaks of him in the highest terms. (Comp. Nat. Quest. ii. 50, Ep. 9, 63, 67, 72, 81, 109.) The elder Seneca describes him (Suet. l.c.) as a man of great eloquence, and by far the acutest philosopher of his age. We have mention of a work of his on lightning (Nat. Quest. ii. 48); and it is supposed that he may be the author of the Παπουατ referred to by Hesychius (s. a. Κόρεννου) as written by one Attalus.

2. A Sophist in the second century of the Christian era, the son of Polemon, and grandfather of the Sophist Icnnocrates. (Philost. Vit. Soph. ii. 25, § 2.) His name occurs on the coins of Smyrna, which are figured in Olearian's edition of Philostorus (p. 600). They contain the inscription ATTALOΣ ΣΟΠΙΣ. ΤΑΣ ΠΑΤΡΙΕΣ ΣΜΥΡΝΑΚΩΝ, which is interpreted, "Attalus, the Sophist, to his native cities Smyrna and Laodicea." The latter is conjectured to have been the place of his birth, the former to have adopted him as a citizen.

ATTALUS (_ATTALOS), a physician at Rome in the second century after Christ, who was a pupil of Soranus, and belonged to the sect of the Methodists. He is mentioned by Galen (de Math. Med. xiii. 15. vol. x. p. 910, &c.) as having mistaken the disease of which the Stoic philosopher Theages died. [W. A. G.]

ATTALUS (_Attalos), an Athenianstatuary, the son of Androgathus. Pausanias (ii. 10. § 6) mentions a statue of Apollo Lykeios, in the temple of that god at Argos, which was made by him. His name has been found on a statue discovered on the site of the theatre at Argos (Böckh, Corp. Ins. No. 1146), and on a bust. (Weecker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 62.) [C. P. M.]

ATTIS or ATTIS (ARIOS or Aris), a daughter of Cranaus, from whom Attica, which was before called Actaea, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 2. § 5.) The two birds into which Philomele and her sister Procne were metamorphosed, were likewise called Attis. (Martini, i. 54. 9. v. 67. 2.) [L. S.]

ATTIANUS, CAE'Llius, a Roman knight, was the tutor, and afterwards the intimate friend, of Hadrian. On the death of Trajan Attianus, in conjunction with Plotina, caused Hadrian to be proclaimed emperor; and the latter after his accession enrolled Attianus in the senate, made him praefectus praetorio, and conferred upon him the insignia of the consulship. He subsequently fell, however, under the displeasure of the emperor. (Spart. Hadr. i. 4. 8, 15; Dion Cass. lax. 1.) [ATTIANUS, CAE'Llius.]

ATTICUS, ANTONIUS, a Roman rhetorician of the age of Seneca and Quintilian. (Senec. Suet. 2. p. 19, ed. Bip.) [L. S.]

ATTICUS, bishop of Constantiopolis, was born at Sebaste, now Sivas, in Armenia Minor. He was educated in the ascetic discipline of the Macedonian monks, under the eye of Eustathius, a celebrated bishop of that sect. However, when Atticus reached the age of manhood, he conformed to the orthodox church. He was ordained a presbyter at Constantiopolis; and in the violent contentsions between the friends and the enemies of the famous Chrysostom, he sided with the latter. After the death of Arcadius, who had been elevated to the see of Constantiopolis on occasion of the second banishment of Chrysostom, Atticus succeeded to the office, although the illustrious exile was still living. The ecclesiastical historians, Sozocrates and Sozomen, describe Atticus as a man of great natural prudence, and both of them testify that he administered the affairs of the church with wisdom and success. His learning seems to have been respectable; his preaching, we are told, was not attractive. His general manner was extremely winning, and he was particularly distinguished for his liberality to the poor. On hearing that distress amounting almost to famine prevailed at Nicaea, he sent a large sum of money for the relief of the suffering population, accompanied by a letter to Callipius, the bishop of the place, which is extant in the Ecclesiastical History of Sozomen. In his treatment of heretics, he is said to have exhibited a judicious combination of kindness and severity. He spoke charitably of the Novatians, and commended their inflexible adherence to the true faith under the persecutions of Constantius and Valens, though he condemned their terms of communion as being in the extreme of rigour. It is recorded, however, by Marius Mercator that when Coelestius, the well-known disciple of Pegaugus, visited Constantiopolis, Atticus expelled him from the city, and sent letters to the bishops of various sees, warning them against him. He was himself laid under sentence of excommunication by the western bishops for refusing to insert the name of the deceased Chrysostom in the diptychs or church registers. In the end, Attius complied with the command, and was again received into the communion of the western churches. He is said by Socrates to have forfot his own death: the prophecy, however, amounted to no more than this—that he told his friend Callipius that he should not survive the ensuing autumn; and the event corresponded with his prognostication. He died in the twenty-first year of his episcopate. Gennadius informs us that he wrote, in opposition to the Nestorian doctrine, an excellent treatise de Fide el Virginitate, which he dedicated ad Regiones, that is, to the daughters of the eastern emperor, Arcadius. This work has perished; and nothing from the pen of Atticus has survived, except the following short pieces: 1. A letter to Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, exhorting him to follow his own example and insert the name of Chrysostom in the sacred tables. This is preserved in the Church History of Nicephorus Calliatus. 2. The above-mentioned letter to Callipius. 3. A few Inconsiderable fragments extant in the writings of Marius Mercator and Theodoret.
and the appendix to the acts of the council of Chalcedon. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 20, vii. 25; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 27; Theodor, Hist. Eccl. v. 3; Marius Mercator, Opera, ed. Balz. pp. 133, 184, 185; Gemniadus, de Viris Illustribus, c. 52; Nicephorus Callistus, xiv. 26.) [J. M. M.]

ATTICUS, CURTIUS, a Roman knight, was one of the few companions whom Tiberius took with him when he retired from Rome to Can- in a.d. 26. Six years afterwards, a.d. 32, Atticus fell a victim to the arts of Sejanus. (Tac. Ann. iv. 68, vi. 10.) He is supposed by Lipsius to be the same as the Atticus to whom two of Ovid's Epistles from Pontus (i. 4, 7) are addressed.

ATTICUS, DIONYSIUS, of Pergamus, a pupil of the celebrated Apollodorus of Pergamus, who was also the teacher of Augustus. [APOLLO- DORUS, No. 22.] He was himself a teacher of rhetoric, and the author of several works, in which he explained the theory of his master. It would appear from his surname that he resided at Athens. (Strab. xiii. p. 625; Quintil. iii. 1. § 18.)

ATTICUS HEROIDES, TERTIUS, CLAUVIUS, the most celebrated Greek rhetorician of the second century of the Christian era, was born about a.d. 104, at Marathon in Attica. He belonged to a very ancient family, which traced its origin to the fabulous Aeacidae. His father, whose name was likewise Atticus, discovered on his estate a hidden treasure, which at once made him one of the wealthiest men of his age. His son Atticus Heroedes afterwards increased this wealth by marrying the rich Annia Regilla. Old Atticus left in his will a clause, according to which every Athenian citizen was to receive yearly one mina out of his property; but his son entered into a composition with the Athenians to pay them once for all five minas each. As Atticus, however, in paying the Athenians, deducted the debts which some citizens owed to his father, they were exasperated against him, and, notwithstanding the great benefits he conferred upon Athens, bore him a grudge as long as he lived.

Atticus Heroedes received a very careful education, and the most eminent rhetoricians of the time, such as Scopelianus, Favorinus, Secundus, and Pomoninus, were among his teachers: he was instructed in the Platonic philosophy by Taurus Tyrinus, and in the critical study of eloquence by Theogenes of Cnidus and Munatius of Tralles. After completing his studies, he opened a school of rhetoric at Athens, and afterwards at Rome also, where Marcus Aurelius, who ever after entertained a high esteem for him, was among his pupils. In a.d. 175, when the emperor Antoninus Pius raised him to the consulship, together with C. Bellicius Torquatus; but as Atticus cared more for his fame as a rhetorician than for high offices, he afterwards returned to Athens, whither he was followed by a great number of young men, and whither L. Verus also was sent as his pupil by the emperor M. Aurelius. For a time Atticus was entrusted with the administration of the free towns in Asia; the exact period of his life when he held this office is not known, though it is believed that it was a.d. 123 when he himself was little more than twenty years of age. At a later time he performed the functions of high priest at the festivals celebrated at Athens in honour of M. Aurelius and L. Verus. The wealth and influence of Atticus Heroedes did not fail to raise up enemies, among whom Theodotus and Demostratus made themselves most conspicuous. His public as well as his private life was attacked in various ways, and numerous calumnies were spread concerning him. Theodotus and Demostratus wrote speeches to irritate the people against him, and to excite the emperor's suspicion respecting his conduct. Atticus Heroedes, therefore, wrote in a later time to his friend Sirmium, where M. Aurelius was staying; he refuted the accusations of the Athenian deputies, and only some of his freedmen were punished. These annoyances at last appear to have induced him to retire from public life, and to spend his remaining years in his villa Cephisia, near Marathon, surrounded by his pupils. The emperor M. Aurelius sent him a letter, in which he assured him of his unaltered esteem. In the case of Atticus Heroedes the Athenians drew upon themselves the just charge of ingratitude, for no man had ever done so much to assist his fellow-citizens and to embellish Athens at his own expense. Among the great architectural works with which he adorned the city, there is one, a race-course, which he intended to dig a canal across the isthmus of white Pentelic marble, of which ruins are still extant; and the magnificent theatre of Regilla, with a roof made of cedar-wood. His liberality, however, was not confined to Attica: at Corinth he built a theatre, at Olympia an aqueduct, at Delphi a race-course, and at Thermopylae a hospital. He further restored with his ample means several decayed towns in Peloponnesus, Boeotia, Euboea, and Epeirus, provided the town of Cnusium in Italy with water, and built Triopium on the Appian road. It also deserves to be noticed, that he intended to dig a canal across the isthmus of Corinth, but as the emperor Nero had entertained the same plan without being able to execute it, Atticus gave it up for fear of exciting jealousy and envy. His wealth, generosity, and still more his skill as a rhetorician, spread his fame over the whole of the Roman world. He is believed to have died at the age of 76, in a. d. 180.

If we look upon Atticus Heroedes as a man, it must be owned that there scarcely ever was a wealthy person who spent his property in a more generous, noble, and disinterested manner. The Athenians appear to have felt at last their own ingratitude; for, after his death, when his freedmen wanted to bury him, according to his own request, at Marathon, the Athenians took away his body, and buried it in the city, where the rhetorician Adrianus delivered the funeral oration over it. Atticus's greatest ambition was to shine as a rhetorician; and this ambition was indeed so strong, that he made no attempt at speaking had been unsuccessful. This failure, however, appears to have proved a stimulus to him, and he became the greatest rhetorician of his century. His success as a teacher is sufficiently attested by the great number of his pupils, most of whom attained some degree of eminence. His own orations, which were delivered extempore and without preparation, are said to have excelled those of all his contemporaries by the dignity, fulness, and elegance of the style. (Geil. l. 2, ix. 2, x. 12.) Philostratus praises his oratory for its pleasing and harmonious flow, as well as for its simplicity and power. The loss of the works of Atticus renders it impossible for us to form an independent opinion, and even if they had come down to us, it is doubtful whether we could judge of them as favourably as the ancients did; for we know, that although he did not neglect the study of the best Attic orators, yet he took Critias as his great model. Among his numerous works the following only are specified by the ancients: 1. Λόγιοι αὐτοκράτορος, or speeches which he had delivered extempore. 2. Διελεξίς, treatises or dialogues, one of which was probably the one mentioned in the Byromecum Magnum (σ. άρπεις) περὶ γάμων συμβάσεως. 3. Επιστήμης, or diaries. 4. Εσποφαλ. All these works are now lost. There exists an oration περὶ πολεμείας, in which the Thebans are called upon to join the Peloponnesians in preparing for war against Archelaus, king of Macedon, and which has come down to us under the name of Atticus Herodes. But the genuineness of this declaration is very doubtful; at any rate it has very little of the character which the ancients attributed to the oratory of Atticus. The "Defensio Palamedis," a declamation usually ascribed to Gorgias the Sophist, has lately been attributed to Atticus Herodes by H. E. Foss in his dissertation De Gorgia Leonitico, &c. Haleae, 1828, 8vo, p. 100, &c.; but his arguments are not satisfactory. The declamation περὶ πολεμείας is printed in the collections of the Greek orators, and also by R. Fiorillo in his Heroides Attici quae supersunt, Ravenna, 1801, 8vo, which work contains a good account of the life of Atticus Herodes. (Compare Philostratus, Vit. Soph. ii. 1; Suid. s. v. Hellen.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredtsa.) § 90.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, 1607, two small columns with inscriptions, and two others of Pentelic marble with Greek inscriptions, were discovered on the site of the ancient Triopion, the country seat of Atticus, about three miles from Rome. The two former are of much importance, but the two latter are of considerable interest. They are written in hexameter verse, the one consisting of thirty-nine and the other of fifty-nine lines. Some have thought, that Atticus himself was the author of these versified inscriptions; but at the head of one of them there appears the name Μακριέλλανος, and, as the style and diction of the other are less similar to that of the former, it has been inferred, that both are the productions of Marcellus of Sida, a poet and physician who lived in the reign of M. Aurelius. These inscriptions, which are known by the name of the Triopian inscriptions, have often been printed and discussed, as by Visconti (Inserzioni grecoe Triopoe, con versioni ed osservazioni, Rome, 1794, fol.), Fiorillo (L.), in Brunnck's Analecta ii. 302), and in the Greek Anthology. (Append. 50 and 51, ed. Tauchnitz.) [L. S.]

ATTICUS, NUMERIUS, a senator and a man of praetorian rank, who swore that after the death of Augustus he saw the emperor ascending up to heaven. (Dion Cass. lvi. 46; Suet. Aug. 100.) ATTICUS, a Platonist philosopher, lived in the second century of the Christian era, under the emperor M. Aurelius. (Sceynell. vol. i. p. 666, ed. Dindorf.) Enesidem has preserved (Prop. R. xv. 4—9, &c.) some extracts from his works, in which he defends the Platonic philosophy against Aristotle. Porphyry (Vit. Plotin. c. 14) makes mention of the ικονομικα of a Platonist Atticus, but they may have been written by Herodes Atticus. ATTICUS, T. POMPONIUS, was born at Rome, b. c. 109, three years before Cicero, and was descended from one of the most ancient equestrian families in the state. His proper name after his adoption by Q. Caecilius, the brother of his mother, was Q. Caecilius Q. F. Pomponianus Atticus, by which name Cicero addressed him when he congratulated him on his accession to the inheritance of his uncle. (Ad Att. iii. 20.) His surname, Atticus, was probably given him on account of his long residence in Athens and his intimate acquaintance with the Greek language and literature.

His father, T. Pomponius, was a man of cultivated mind; and as he possessed considerable property, he gave his son a liberal education. He was educated along with L. Torquatus, the younger C. Marius, and M. Cicer, and was distinguished above all his school-fellows by the rapid progress which he made in his studies. His father died when he was still young; and shortly after his father's death the first civil war broke out. Atticus was connected by ties both of affinity and friendship with the Marian party; for his cousin Anicia had married the brother of the tribune, P. Sulpicius Rufus, one of the chief opponents of Sulla, and Atticus himself was a personal friend of his old school-fellow, the younger Marius. He resolved, however, to take no part in the contest, and accordingly withdrew to Athens in b. c. 85, with the greater part of his moveable property, under the pretext of prosecuting his studies. The determination which he came to on this occasion, he steadily adhered to for the rest of his life. Contented with his equestrian rank, he abstained from suing for public honours, and would not mix himself up with any of the political parties into which all classes were divided for the next fifty years. But notwithstanding this, he lived on the most intimate terms with the most distinguished men of all parties; and there seems to have been a certain charm in his manners and conversation which captivated all who had intercourse with him. Though he had assisted the younger Marius with money in his flight, Sulla was so much pleased with him on his visit to Athens in b. c. 84, after the Mithridatic war, that he resolved to take him with him to Rome; and on Atticus desiring to remain in Athens, Sulla presented him with all the presents he had received during his stay in that city. Atticus enjoyed also the friendship of Caesar and Pompey, Brutus and Cassius, Antony and Octavianus. But the most intimate of all his friends was Cicero, whose correspondence with him, beginning in the year b. c. 68 and continued down to Cicero's death, supplies us with various particulars respecting the life of Atticus, the most important of which are given in the article CICERO. Atticus did not return to Rome till b. c. 65, when political affairs had become more settled; and the day of his departure was one of general mourning among the Athenians, whom he had assisted with loans of money, and befriended in various ways. During his residence at Athens, he purchased an estate at Buthrotum in Epeirus, in which place, as well as at Athens and afterwards at Rome, he spent the greater part of his time, engaged in literary pursuits and commercial undertakings. He died in b. c. 32, at the age of 77, votary starvation, when he found that he was married in the lifetime of her father, probably in B.C. 36, to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, the minister of Augustus; and the issue of this marriage, Vipsania Agrippina, was married to Tiberius, afterwards emperor, by whom she became the mother of Drusus. The sister of Atticus, Pomponia, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator; but the marriage was not a happy one, and the quarrels of Pomponia and her husband gave considerable trouble and vexation to Atticus and M. Cicero.

The life of Atticus by Cornelius Nepos, of which the greater part was composed while Atticus was still alive (Nepos, 19), is to be regarded rather as a panegyric upon an intimate friend (Nepos, 13, &c.; comp. Cic. ad Att. vii. 6, 14), than strictly speaking a biography. According to Nepos, the personal character of Atticus was faultless; and though we cannot trust implicitly to the partial statements of his panegyrist, yet Atticus could not have gained and preserved the affection of so many of his contemporaries without possessing amiable qualities of no ordinary kind.

In philosophy Atticus belonged to the Epicurean sect, and had studied it under Phaedrus, Zenon, and Patroclus, in Athens, and Sannias, in Rome. His studies, however, were by no means confined to philosophy. He was thoroughly acquainted with the whole circle of Greek and Roman literature; he spoke and wrote Greek like a native, and was a thorough master of his own language. So high an opinion was entertained of his taste and critical acumen, that many of his friends, especially Cicero, were accustomed to send him their works for revision and correction, and were most anxious to secure his approbation and favour. It is therefore the more to be regretted that none of his own writings have come down to us. Of those the most important was one in a single book, entitled Annalae, which contained an epitome of Roman history from the earliest period to his own time, arranged according to years. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 26, Orat. 94; Ascon. in Pison. p. 15, in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli; Nepos, Hamid. 15, Attic. 8.) This work was particularly valuable for the history of the ancient Roman families; and he had such an intimate acquaintance with this subject, that he was requested by many of his contemporaries to draw up genealogical tables of their families, specifying with dates the various public offices which each had held. He accordingly drew up such tables for the Junii, Marcelli, Fabii, Aemilii, and others; and he also wrote inscriptions in verse to be placed under the statues of distinguished men, in which he happily described in four or five lines their achievements and public offices. In addition to these, we have frequent mention of his letters, and of a history of Cicero's consulship, in Greek, which was a plain and inartificial style. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 12.)

Atticus was very wealthy. His father left him two millions of sestercii, and his uncle Caecilius about ten (Nepos, 5, 14); and this property he greatly increased by his mercantile speculations, being a member of the equestrian order, he was able to invest large sums of money in the various corporations which farmed the public revenues; and he also derived great profits from advancing his books at a profit. Atticus, in fact, neglected no means of making money. He read, for instance, of his purchasing a set of gladiators, in order to let them out to magistrates and others who wished to exhibit games. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 4, 6.)

ATTICUS, C. QUINCIUS, consul suffectus from the first of November, A.D. 69, declared in favour of Vespasian at Rome, and with the other partisans of Vespasian seized the Capitol. Here they were attacked by the soldiers of Vitellius; the Capitol was burnt down, and Atticus, with most of the other leaders of his party, taken prisoner. Atticus was not put to death by Vitellius; and probably in order to obtain the pardon of the emperor, he admitted that he had set fire to the Capitol, as Vitellius was anxious that his party should not bear the odium of this deed. (Tac. Hist. iii. 73—75; Dion Cass. lxv. 17.)

ATTICUS, M. VESTIUS, was consul in the year (A.D. 65) in which the conspiracy of Piso was formed against Nero. Atticus was a man of fine appearance, and possessed of natural talents; Piso was afraid lest he might restore liberty or proclaim some one emperor. Although innocent he was put to death by Nero on the detection of the conspiracy. Atticus had been very intimate with the emperor, but had incurred his hatred, as he had taken no pains to disguise the contempt in which he held the emperor. He had still further increased the emperor's hatred by marrying Statilia Messallina, although he knew that Nero was among her lovers. (Tac. Ann. xxv. 48, 52, 68, 69.)

ATTICUS, VIPSANIUS, a disciple of Apollodorus of Pergamus. (Seneec. Controv. ii. 18, p. 81.) As he is mentioned only in this passage of Senece, his name has given rise to considerable dispute. Spalding (ad Quintil. iii. 1 § 18) conjectures that he was the son of M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who married the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, and that he had the surname of Atticus in honour of his grandfather, Frandon (M. Vipsanius Agrippa, p. 228), on the other hand, supposed him to have been the father of Vipsanius Agrippa. But both of these conjectures are unsupported by any evidence, and are in themselves improbable. We are more inclined to adopt Weichert's opinion (Casas, Augustus, § 98, 99), that, considering the imperfect state of Senece's text, we ought to read Dionysius in this passage instead of Vipsanius. [ATTICUS, DIONYTIUS.] (Comp. Ederer, De Apollonio, Att. 16, 1.)

as being the most formidable of the invaders of the ancient Roman empire, and (except Radagaisus) the only one of them who was not only a barbarian, but a savage and a heathen, and as the only conqueror of ancient or modern times who has united under his sway the German and Slavonic nations. He was the son of Mundzuk, descended from the ancient kings of the Huns, and with his brother Bleda, in German Bödele (who died, according to Jornandes, by his hand, in a.d. 445), attained in a.d. 434 to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China (see Desagugues, Hist. des Huns, vol. ii. pp. 295-301), and to the command of an army of at least 500,000 barbarians. (Jornandes, Reb. Get. cc. 35, 37, 49.) In this position, partly from the real terror which it inspired, partly from his own endeavours to invest himself in the eyes of Christendom with the dreadful character of the predicted Antichrist (see Herbert, Attila, p. 380), and in the eyes of his own countrymen with the invisible attributes attendant on the possessor of the miraculous sword of the Scythian god of war (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 55), he gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of "the Scourge of God." The word seems to have been used generally at the time to denote the barbarian invaders, but it is not applied directly to Attila in any author prior to the Hungarian Chronicles, which first relate the story of his receiving the name from a hermit in Gaul. The earliest contemporary approaches to it are in a passage in Isidore's Chronicle, speaking of the Huns as "virga Dei," and in an inscription at Aquileia, written a short time before the siege in 451 (see Herbert, Attila, p. 486), in which they are described as "imminenta pecatorum flagella."

His career divides itself into two parts. The first (a.d. 445-450) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic and the negotiations with Theodosius II., which followed upon it, and which were rendered remarkable by the resistance of Azimus (Priscus, cc. 35, 36), by the embassy from Constantinople to the royal village beyond the Danube, and the discovery of the treacherous design of the emperor against his life. (Ib. 57-72.) They were ended by a treaty which ceded to Attila a large territory south of the Danube, an annual tribute, and the claim which he made for the surrender of the deserters from his army, (Ib. 34-37.)

The invasion of the Western empire (a.d. 450-453) was grounded on various pretexts, of which the chief were the refusal of the Eastern emperor, Marcian, the successor of Theodosius II., to pay the above-mentioned tribute (Priscus, 39, 72), and the rejection by the Western emperor Valentinian III. of his proposals of marriage to his sister Honoria. (Jornandes, Regm. Socc. c. 97, Reb. Get. 42.) Its particular direction was determined by his alliance with the Vandals and Franks, whose dominion in Spain and Gaul was threatened by Aetius and Theodoric. With an immense army composed of various nations, he crossed the Rhine at Strasburg, which is said to have been taken by his army without resistance from its inhabitants: a place of thoroughfare (Klemm, Attila, p. 175.), and marched upon Orleans. From hence he was driven, by the arrival of Aetius, to the plains of Chalons on the Marne, where he was defeated in the last great battle ever fought by the Romans, and in which there fell 282,000 (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 42) or 300,000 men. (Idatus and Isidore.) He retired by way of Troyes, Cologne, and Thuringia, to one of his cities on the Danube, and having there recruited his forces, crossed the Alps in a.d. 451, laid siege to Aquileia, then the second city in Italy, and at length took and utterly destroyed it. After ravaging the whole of Lombardy, he was then preparing to march upon Rome, when he was suddenly diverted from his purpose, partly perhaps by the diseases which had begun to waste his army, partly by the fear instilled into his mind that he, like Alaric, could not survive an attack upon the city, but ostensibly and chiefly by his celebrated interview with Pope Leo the Great and the senator Avienus at Peschiera or Govermolo on the banks of the Minusus. (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 42.) The story of the appearence of St. Peter and St. Paul rests on the authority of an ancient MS. record of it in the Roman church, and on Paulus Diaconus, who wrote in the eighth century, and who mentions only St. Peter. (Jornanius, Ann. Eccl. a.d. 452.)

He accordingly returned to his palace beyond the Danube, and (if we except the doubtful story in Jornandes, de Reb. Get. 43, of his invasion of the Alani and repulse by Thorsimund) there remained till on the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, Mycolth, the last of his innumerable wives, possibly by her hand (Marcellin. Chronicon), but probably by the bursting of a blood-vessel, he suddenly expired, and was buried according to the ancient and savage customs of his nation. (a.d. 454.) The instantaneous fall of his empire is well symbolized in the story that, on that same night, the emperor Marcian at Constantinople dreamed that he saw the bow of Attila broken asunder. (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 49.)

In person Attila was, like the Mongolian race in general, a short thickset man, of stately gait, with a large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald with the exception of a few white hairs, his eyes small, but of great brilliancy and quickness. (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 11; Priscus, 55.) He is distinguished from the general character of savage conquerors only by the gigantic nature of his designs, and the critical era at which he appeared, unless we add also the magnanimity which he shewed to the innocent ambassador of Theodosius II. on discovering the emperor's plot against his life, and the awe with which he was inspired by the majesty of Pope Leo and of Rome. Among the few personal traits recorded of him may be mentioned the humorous order to invent the picture at Milan which represented the subjugation of the Scythians to the Caesars (Suidas, s. v. Rókhoos); the command to burn the poem of Marullus at Padua, who had referred his origin to the gods of Greece and Rome (Hungarian Chronicles, as quoted by Herbert, Attila, p. 500); the readiness with which he saw in the flight of the storks from Aquileia a favourable omen for the approaching end of the siege (Jornandes, Reb. Get. 42; Procop. Bcl. Vand. l. 4); the stern simplicity of his diet, and the immensity of his body which he alone maintained amidst the uproar of his wild court, being able to caress and pinch the cheek of his favourite boy, Isac (Priscus, 49-70); the preparation of the funeral pile on which to burn himself, had the ATYMIANUS.

Romans forced his camp at Chalons (Jornandes, Reb. Got. 40); the saying, that a fortress could exist in the empyre, if he wished to raise it; and the speech at Chalons, recorded by Jornandes (Reb. Got. 39), which contains parts too characteristic to have been forged.

The only permanent monuments of his career, besides its destructiveness, are to be found in the great mound which he raised for the defence of his army during the siege of Aquileia, and which still remain at Udine (Herbert, Attila, p. 489); and indirectly in the foundation of Venice by the Italian nobles who fled from his ravages in A.D. 451. The partial descent of the Hungarians from the remnant of his army, though maintained strenuously by Hungarian historians, has been generally doubted by later writers, as resting on insufficient evidence.

The chief historical authority for his life is Priscus, either as preserved in Excerpt. de Legat. 33-76 (in the Byzantine historians), or retailed to us through Jornandes. (Reb. Got. 32-50.) But he has also become the centre of three distinct cycles of tradition, which, though now inseparably blended with fable, furnish glimpses of historical truth.

1. The Hungarian Legends, which are to be found in the life of him by Dalmatius and Nicolaus Olahus, the Enneads of Sabellicus and the Decads of Bonfissus,—none of which are earlier, in their present form, than the twelfth century.

2. The Ecclesiastical Legends, which relate to his invasion of Gaul, and which are to be found in the lives of St. Anianus, St. Servatius, St. Genovefa, St. Lupus, and St. Ursula, in the Acta Sanctorum.

3. The German Legenda, which depart more entirely from history, and are to be found in theNibelungen Lied, in a Latin poem on Attila, published by Fischer, and, as Mr. Herbert supposes (p. 536), in the romances about Arthur. See also W. Grimm's Heiligenagen.

In modern works, a short account is given in Gibbon (cc. 134, 135), Rotteck (in Eorch and Gruber's Encyclopaedia), and a most elaborate one in the Acta Sanctorum. (Comp. J. v. Muller, in Klemm's Heiligenagen. W. Grimm's Heiligenagen. (p. 513), in the romances about Arthur. See also W. Grimm's Heiligenagen.)

2. A son of Manes, king of the Macedonians, from whose son Lydius, his son and successor, the Macedonians were afterwards called Lydians. (Herod. i. 7, vii. 74.) Herodotus (i. 94; comp. Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 26, 29; Tact. Annal. iv. 35) mentions Tyrrhenus as another son of Atys; and in another passage (iv. 45), he speaks of Cotys as the son of Manes, instead of Atys.

3. A Latin chief, the son of Alba, and father of Capys, from whom the Latin gens Atia derived its origin, and from whom Augustus was believed to be descended on his mother's side. (Virg. Aen. v. 569; Liv. i. 3; Suct. Aug. 4.)

A'UDA'TA (A'dara), an Ilyrian, the first wife of Philip of Macedon, by whom he had a daughter, Cyrra. (Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.)

AVENTINENSIs, the name of a plebeian family of the Genucia gens. The name was derived from the hill Aventinum, which was the quarter of the Aventines. The family was descended from the tribune Cn. Genucius, who was murdered in n. c. 473.

1. L. Genucius M. F. CN. A Ver'tinensis, consul n. c. 365, and again in 362, was killed in battle against the Hemicans in the latter of these years, and his army routed. His defeat and death caused the patricians great joy, as he was the first consul who had marched against the enemy with plebeian auspices. (Liv. vii. 1, 4, 6; Diod. xv. 90, xvi. 4; Eutrop. ii. 4; Oros. iii. 4; Lyd. de Mag. i. 46.)

2. CN. Genucius M. F. M. N. AV'entinensis, consul n. c. 363, in which year the senate was chiefly occupied in endeavouring to appease the anger of the gods. (Liv. viii. 3; Diod. xvi. 2.)

3. L. Genucius (Aventinensis), tribune of the plebs, n. c. 342, probably belonged to this family. He brought forward a law for the abolition of usury, and was probably the author of many of the other reforms in the same year mentioned by Livy. (vii. 42.)

4. L. Genucius (L. P. M. N.) AV'entinensis, consul n. c. 303. (Liv. xi. 1; Diod. xx. 102.)

Aventinum, a son of Hercules and the priestess Rhen. (Verg. Aen. vii. 656.) Servius on this passage reads: "Aventus, a name of a mountain, a kind of the Aborigines, who was killed and buried on the hill afterwards called the Aventine." [L. S.]

Aventinum, one of the mythical kings of Alba, who was buried on the hill which was afterwards called by his name. He is said to have reigned thirty-seven years, and to have succeeded by Proclus, the father of Amulius. (Liv. i. 3; Dionys. i. 71; Ov. Fast. iv. 51.)

Avernum, properly speaking, the name of a lake in Campania, which the Latin poets describe as the entrance to the lower world, or as the lower world itself. Here we have only to mention, that Avernus was also regarded as a divine being; for Servius (ad Verg. Georg. ii. 161) speaks of a statue of Avernus, whichperspired during the storm after the death of the hero and woman, and to which expiatory sacrifices were offered. [L. S.]

Averruncus. [Apothropale.

Auffydiana Gens, plebeian, was not known till the later times of the republic. The first member of it, who obtained the consulship, was CN. Aufidius Orestes, n. c. 77. Its cognomina are Luro and Orestes: for those who occur without a family-name, see Auffydianus.

Auffydianus Rufus. [Rufus.]

CN. Auffydius, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 170, accused C. Lucretius Gallus on account of his oppression of the Chalcidians. (Liv. xiii. 10.)

CN. Auffydius, a learned historian and perhaps a jurist, is celebrated in some of the extant works of Cicero for the equanimity with which he bore blindness; and we find from St. Jerome (Epist. 103, p. 218, ed. Benedict) that his patience was also recounted in the lost treatise de Consolatione. His corporeal blindness did not quench his intellectual vision. Bereaved of sight and advanced in age, he still attended his duties, and spoke in the senate, and found means to write a Greek history. Cicero states (Tusc. Disp. v. 38), that he also gave advice to his friends (see ane'si delibertanthea decrral); and, on account of this expression, he has been ranked by some legal biographers among the Roman jurists. In his old age, he adopted CN. Aurelius Orestes, who consequently took the name of Auffius in place of Aurelius. This precedent has been quoted (Cic. pro Dom. 13) to shew that the power of adopting does not legally depend on the power of begetting children. (Cic. de Ins. ii. 38, in quaestor B.C. 119, tribune plebis, B.C. 114, and finally praetor n. c. 108, about two years before the birth of Cicero, who, as a boy, was acquainted with the old blind scholar. (De Fin. v. 19.)

[.J.T.G.]

Sex. AUfydius, was warmly recommended by Cicero to Cornificius, proconsul of Africa, in n. c. 43. (Ad Fam. XII. 26, 27.)

T. Auffydius, a jurist, the brother of M. Virgilius, who accused Sulla B.C. 86. It was probably the jurist who was quaestor B.C. 84, and who was afterwards praetor of Asia. (Cic. pro Place. 19.) He may also have been the Auffius once talked of as one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship, n. c. 63. (Cic. ad Att. i. 1.) In pleading private causes, he imitated the manner of T. Ju-AUGERUS.

VENTUS and his disciple, P. Orbias, both of whom were sound lawyers and shrewd but impassioned speakers. Cicero, in whose lifetime he died at a very advanced age, mentions him rather slightingly as a good and harmless man, but no greatator. (Dr. 43.)

T. AUFI'DIUS, a physician, who was a native of Sicily and a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia, and who therefore lived in the first century B.C. (Steph. Byz. s. c. Aulph. Xpov.) He is probably the same person who is quoted by Caesarius Aurelianus by the name of Titus only, and who wrote a work On the Soul and another On Chronic Diseases, consisting of at least two books. (Auct. Morb. ii. 29, p. 144; Morb. Chron. i. 5, p. 339.) [W.A.G.]

AUFI'DIUS BASUS. [Rassus.]

AUFI'DIUS CHIUS, a jurist, who is known only from the so-called Vatican Fragments, first published by Mai in 1823 along with fragments of Symmachus and other newly-discovered remains of antiquity. In Vat. Prag. § 77, an opinion of Athenaeus, transmitted by his disciple, P. Orbius, both of whom met with her son Telephus, see Telephus. (Stcph. Byz. s. v. Av^dx.) He is probably the same person as the Gew. or Gewes, one of the Ilorae, occurs in Ilyginus. (Fab. 289.) He is more celebrated in ancient story on account of his connexion with Heracles, one of whose lives, imposed upon him by Eurystheus, was to clear in one day the stables of Augeas, who kept in them a large number of oxen. Heracles was to have the tenth part of the oxen as his reward, but when he had accomplished his task by leading the rivers Alpheus and Penes through the stables, Augeas refused to keep his promise. Heracles, therefore, made war upon him, which terminated in his death and that of his sons, with the exception of one, Phlykus, whom Heracles placed on the throne of his father. (Apollod. l. c. ii. 7, § 2; Dion. iv. 13, 33; Theoret. Idyll. 25.) Another tradition preserved in Pausanias (v. 3, § 4, § 1) represents Augeas as dying a natural death at an advanced age, and as receiving heroic honours from Oxytus. (L. S.)

AUG'GEAS or AU'GIAS (Abyles or Abyleas), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy. Suidas (s. e.) and Eudocia (p. 69) mention the following plays of his: Α'ργοςοιων, Δίς, Καρπιδιονων, and Παρεψα. He appears likewise to have written epic poems, and to have borrowed from Antimachus of Teos. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ii. p. 425. [C.P.M.]

AU'GURINUS, the name of families in the Genucia and Minucia gentes. The word is evidently derived from augur. 1. Genuciu Augurini. They must originally have been patricians, as we find consuls of this family long before the consulship was open to the plebeians. But here a difficulty arises. Livy calls (v. 15, 18) Cn. Gcnucius, who was consul tribune in B.C. 399 and again in 396, a plebeian, and we learn from the Capitoline Fasti that his surname was Augurinus. Now if Livy and the Capitoline Fasti are both right, the Genuci Augurini must have gone over to the plebeians, as the Minuci Augurini did. It is possible, however, that Augurinus in the Capitoline Fasti may be a mistake for Aventinensis, which we know was a plebeian family of the same gens. [AVENTINENSI.

1. T. GENUCIUS L. F. L. N. AUGURINUS, consul b. c. 451, abdicated his office and was made a member of the first decemvirates. (Livy. iii. 33; Dionys. x. 54, 56; Zonar. vii. 18.) He was not included in the second. In the contests in 445 respecting the admission of the plebs to the consulship, which ended in the institution of the consular tribunate, Augurinus recommended the patricians to make some concessions. (Dionys. iv. 60.)

2. M. GENUCIUS L. F. L. N. AUGURINUS, brother of the preceding (Dionys. xi. 69), consul b. c. 445, in which year the consular tribunate was instituted, and the lex auches, establishing the comitium between the patres and plebs. (Livy. iv. 1, &c.; Dionys. xi. 52, 58; Dion. xii. 31; Zonar. vii. 19; Var. L. L. v. 150, ed. Müller.)

3. CN. GENICIUS M. F. M. N. AUGURINUS, consul tribune b. c. 399, and again in 386, in the latter of which years he was cut off by an ambuscade in the war with the Faliscans and Capenate. (Livy. v. 13, 18; Dion. xiv. 54, 90.)

11. Minuciu Augurini. They were originally patricians, but a part of the family at least passed over to the plebeians in b. c. 439. [See below, No. 5.]

1. M. MINUCICIUS AUGURINUS, consul b. c. 497, in which year the temple of Saturn was dedicated and the Scauralia instituted. (Livy. ii. 21; Dionys. vi. i.) He was consul again in 492, when there was a great famine at Rome. He took an active part in the defence of Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in this year, but was unable to obtain his acquittal. (Livy. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 20, 27—32, 38, 60, 61.) In the victorious approach of Coriolanus to Rome at the head of the Volscian army, Augurinus was one of the embassy sent to intercede with him on behalf of the city. (Dionys. viii. 22—28.)

2. P. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, consul B. C. 492, was chiefly engaged in his consulship in obtaining a supply of corn from different countries, on account of the famine at Rome. (Livy. ii. 34; Dionys. vii. 1; Oros. ii. 5.)

3. L. MINUCIUS P. F. M. N. ESQUINUS AUGURINUS, consul B. C. 458, carried on the war against the Aequians, but through fear shut himself up in his camp on the Algidus, and allowed the enemy to surround him. He was delivered from his danger by the dictator L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, who compelled him, however, to resign his consulship. In the Fasti Capitolini we have one of the inversions which are so common in Roman history: in the Fasti, Augurinus is represented as consul suffixus in place of one whose name is lost, instead of being himself succeeded by another. (Livy. iii. 25—29; Dionys. x. 22; Dion Cass. Frag. xxxiv. 27. p. 140, ed. Reimar; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 7, v. 2. § 2; Flor. i. 11; Zonar. vii. 17; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. ii. n. 604.)

4. Q. MINUCIUS P. F. M. N. ESQUINUS AUGURINUS, brother of No. 3, consul B. C. 457, had the conduct of the war against the Sabines, but could not do more than ravage their lands, as they shut themselves up in their walled towns. (Livy. iii. 30; Dionys. x. 26, 30.)

5. L. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, was appointed prefect of the corn-market (prefectus comae) in B. C. 439, in order to regulate the price of corn and obtain a supply from abroad, as the people were suffering from grievous famine. Sp. Maelius, who distinguished himself by his liberal supplies of corn to the people, was accused by the patricians of aiming at the sovereignty; and Augurinus is said to have disclosed his treasonable designs to the senate. The ferment occasioned by the assassination of Maelius was appeased by Augurinus, who is said to have gone over to the plebs from the patricians, and to have been chosen by the tribunes one of their body. It is stated, indeed, that he was elected an eleventh tribune, as the number of their body was full; but this seems incredible. That he passed over to the plebs, however, is confirmed by the fact, that we find subsequently members of his family tribunes of the plebs. Augurinus also lowered the price of corn in three market days, fixing as the maximum an ounce of brass. (Liv. iv. 12—16; Plin. H. N. xviii. 4, xxxiv. 11; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. ii. p. 423, &c.) This circumstance is commemorated in the preceding coin of the Minucia gens. The obverse represents the head of Pallas winged: the reverse a column surmounted by a statue, which is not clearly delineated in the annexed cut, with ears of corn springing up from its base. The inscription is C. MINVLI C. F. AUGURINIVS, with Roma at the top. (Eckhel, v. p. 254.)

6. C. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, consul B. C. 305, the last year of the Samnite war, was said in some annals to have received a mortal wound in battle. (Livy. i. 44; Dion. xx. 81.)

7. M. MINUCIUS (AUGURINUS), of the plebs, b. C. 216, introduced the bill for the creation of the triumviri measurari. (Livy. xxii. 21.)

8. C. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, tribune of the plebs, b. C. 187, proposed the imposition of a fine upon L. Scipio Asiacus, and demanded that Scipio should give security (praedes). As Scipio, however, refused to do so, Augurinus ordered him to be seized and carried to prison, but was unable to carry his command into effect in consequence of the intercession of his colleague, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, the father of Tiberius and C. Gracchus. (Dion. vii. 13; A. Gell. vi. 7; Oros. ii. 5.) The account of this affair is given in Livy. (xxxviii. 55—60.)

9. T. MINUCIUS (AUGURINUS) MOLLICULUS, was praetor peregrinus b. C. 180, and died of the pestilence which visited Rome in that year. (Livy. xl. 35, 37.)

AUGURIUS, SEXTIUS, a poet in the time of the younger Pliny, who wrote short poems, such as epigrams, idylls, &c., which he called poetulns, and which were in the style of Catullus and Calvus. He was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny, whom he praised in his verses; and Pliny in return represented Augurinus as one of the first of poets. One of his poems in praise of Pliny is preserved in a letter of the latter. (Plin. Ep. iv. 27, ix. 8.)

AUGUSTINUS, Aurelius, St., the most illustrious of the Latin fathers, was born on the 13th of November, a. D. 354, at Tagaste, an inland town in Numidia, identified by D'Anville with the modern Tajelt. His father, Petrosius, who died about seventeen years after the birth of Augustin, was originally a heathen, but embraced Christianity late in life. Though poor, he belonged to the curiales of Tagaste. (August. Conf. ii. 3.) He is described by his son as a benevolent but hot-tempered man, comparatively careless of the morals of his offspring, but anxious for his improvement in learning, as the means of future success in life. Monnica, the mother of Augustin, was a Christian of a singularly devout and gentle spirit, who exerted herself to the utmost in training up her son in the practice of piety; but his disposition, comparatively ardent and headstrong, seemed to bid defiance to her efforts. He has given, in his Confessions, a vivid picture of his boisterous follies and vices,—his love of play, his hatred of learning, his disobedience to his parents, and his acts of deceit and theft. It would indeed be absurd to infer from this recital that he was a prodigy of youthful wickedness, such faults being unhappily too common at that early age. None, however, but a very shallow moralist will treat these singular disclosures with ridicule, or deny that they open a very important chapter in the history of human nature. When Augustin was still very young, he fell into a dangerous disorder, which induced him to wish for baptism; but on his recovery, the rite was delayed. He tells us that he was exceedingly delighted, from his childhood, with the fabulous stories of the Latin poets; but the difficulty of learning Greek inspired him with a great disgust for that language. He was sent, during his boyhood, to be educated at the neighbouring town of Madaura, and afterwards removed to Carthage in order to prosecute the study of rhetoric. Here he fell into vicious practices; and before he was eighteen, his concubine bore him a son, whom he named Adeodatus. He applied, however, with characteristic ardour, to the study of the great masters of rhetoric and philosophy. In particular, he describes in strong terms the beneficial effect produced upon him by the study of the great masters of rhetoric and philosophy. When Augustin had lost sight of it altogether, and says he does not remember whether it was in two or three books. We agree with Lord Jeffery (Encyc. Brit. art. Beauty) in lamenting the disappearance of this treatise, which was probably defective enough in strict scientific analysis, but could not fail to abound in ingenious disquisition and vigorous eloquence.

About this time Augustin began to distrust the baseless creed of the Manicheans, and the more so that he found no satisfaction from the reasonings of their most celebrated teacher, Faustus, with whom he frequently conversed. In the year 383, he went, against the wishes of his mother, to Rome, intending to exercise his profession as a teacher of rhetoric there. For this step, he assigns as his reason that the students in Rome behaved with greater decorum than those of Carthage, where the schools were often scenes of gross and irreparable disorder. At Rome he had a dangerous illness, from which however he soon recovered; and after teaching rhetoric for a few months, he left the imperial city, in disgust at the mendacious conduct of some of his students, and went to Milan, designing to pursue his profession in that city. At that time Ambrose was bishop of Milan, and his conversation and preaching made a good impression upon Augustin. He was not, however, converted to Christianity at once, but fell, for a time, into a state of general uncertainty and scepticism. The great mystery of all, the origin of evil, especially perplexed and tormented him. By degrees his mind acquired a healthier tone, and the reading of some of the Platonic philosophers (not in the original Greek, but in a Latin version) disposed him still more favourably towards the Christian system. From these he turned, with a delight unfelt before, to the Holy Scriptures, in the perusal of which his earlier doubts and difficulties gave way before the self-evidencing light of divine truth. He was greatly benefited by the religious conversations which he held with Simplician, a Christian presbyter, who had formerly instructed Ambrose himself in theology. After deep consideration, and many struggles of feeling (of which he has given an interesting record in the eighth and ninth books of his Confessions), he resolved on making a public profession of Christianity, and was baptized by Ambrose at Milan on the 25th of April, A. D. 387. His fellow-townman and intimate friend, Alypius, and his natural son, Adeodatus, of whose extraordinary genius he speaks with fond enthusiasm, were baptized on the same occasion. His mother Monica, who had followed him to Milan, rejoiced over this happy event as the completion of all her desires on earth. She did not long survive it; for shortly after his conversion, Augustin set out with her to Africa, and at Ostia, on the banks of the Tiber, his mother died, after an illness of a few days, in the fifty-sixth year of her age. Her son has given, in the ninth book of his Confessions (chs. 8-11) a brief but deeply interesting account of this excellent woman. Augustin remained at Rome some time after his mother's death, and composed his treatises de Moribus Ecclesiasticis et de Moribus Manichaeorum, de Quantitate Animae, de Musica, de Magistro. The latter, however, was not finished until some years after.

In the latter part of the year 388, Augustin returned by way of Carthage to Tagaste. He sold the small remains of his paternal property, and gave the proceeds to the poor; and passed the next three years in seclusion, devoting himself to religious exercises. At this time the death of his friend Ambrose (addressed to his son Adeodatus), and de Vera Religione. The reputation of these works and of their author's personal excellence seems to have been speedily diffused, for in the year 391, Augustin, against his own wishes, was ordained a priest by Valerius, then bishop of Hippo. On this, he spent some time in retirement, in order to qualify himself by the special study of the Bible for the work of preaching. When he entered on this public duty, he discharged it with great acceptability and success. He did not, however, abandon his labours as an author, but wrote his tractate de Utilitate credentis, inscribed to his friend Honoratus, and another entitled de duabus Animabus contra Manichacos. He also published an account of his disputation with Fortunatus, a distinguished teacher of the Manichean doctrine. In the year 393, he was appointed, though still only a presbyter, to deliver a discourse upon the creed before the council of Hippo. This discourse, which is still extant, was published at the solicitation of his friends.

In the year 395, Valerius exerted himself to obtain Augustin as his colleague in the episcopal charge; and though Augustin at first urged his unwillingness with great sincerity, his scruples were overcome, and he was ordained bishop of Hippo. In the year 395, Valerius exerted himself to obtain Augustin as his colleague in the episcopal charge; and though Augustin at first urged his unwillingness with great sincerity, his scruples were overcome, and he was ordained bishop of Hippo. He performed the duties of his new office with zealous fidelity, and yet found time amidst them all for the composition of many of his ablest and most interesting works. His history, from the time of his elevation to the see of Hippo, is so closely implicated with the Donatistic and Pelagian controversies, that it would be impracticable to pursue its details within our prescribed limits. For a full and accurate account of the part which he took in these memoriable contents, the reader is referred to the life of Augustin contained in the eleventh volume of the Benedictine edition of his works, and to the thirteenth volume of Tillemont's "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoiré Eclesiastique,"—a quarto of 1075 pages devoted entirely to the life and writings of this eminent father. Of those of his numerous works which we have not already noticed, we mention the three following, as especially interesting and important: His Confessions, in thirteen books, were written in the year 397. They are addressed to the Almighty, and contain an account of Augustin's life down to the time when he was deprived of his mother by death. The last three books are occupied with an allegorical explanation of the Mosaic account of the creation. His autobiography is written with great genius and feeling; and though the interspersed passages are not intended as profound; its contents are too miscellaneous and desultory, and its reasonings are often more ingenious than satisfactory. Yet, after every due abatement has been made, it will maintain its reputation as one of the most extraordinary productions of human intellect and industry. The "Retractions" of Augustin, written in the year 428, deserve notice as evincing the singular candour of the author. It consists of a review of all his own productions; and besides explanations and qualifications of much that he had written, it is not unfrequently presents acknowledgments of the right errors and mistakes. It is one of the noblest sacrifices ever laid upon the altar of truth by a majestic intellect acting in obedience to the purest conscientiousness.

The life of Augustin closed amidst scenes of violence and blood. The Vandals under the ferocious Genseric invaded the north of Africa, A. D. 429, and in the following year laid siege to Hippo. Full of grief for the sufferings which he witnessed and the dangers he foreboded, the aged bishop prayed that God would grant his people a deliverance from these dreadful calamities, or else supply them with the fortitude to endure their woes: for himself he besought a speedy liberation from the flesh. His prayer was granted; and in the third month of the siege, on the 28th of August, 430, Augustin breathed his last, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. The character of this eminent man is admitted on all hands to have been marked by conspicuous excellence after his profession of the Christian faith. The only faults of which he can be accused are an occasional excess of severity in his controversial writings, and a ready acquiescence in the persecution of the Donatists. His intellect was in a very high degree vigorous, acute, and comprehensive; and he possessed to the last a fund of ingenuous sensibility, which gives an indescribable charm to most of his compositions. His style is full of life and force, but deficient both in purity and in elegance. His learning seems to have been principally confined to the Latin authors; of Greek he knew but little, and of Hebrew nothing. His theological opinions varied considerably even after he became a Christian; and it was during the later period of his life that he adopted those peculiar tenets with regard to grace, predetermination, and free-will, which in modern times have been called Augustinian. His influence in his own and in every succeeding age has been immense. Even in the Roman Catholic Church his authority is professedly held in high esteem; although his later theological system has in reality been proscribed by every party in that communion, except the learned, philanthropic, and devout fraternity of the Jansenists. The early Reformers drank deeply into the spirit of his speculative theology; and many even of those who recoil most shrinkingly from his doctrine of predestination, have done ample justice to his surpassing energy of intellect, and to the warmth and purity of his religious feelings.

The earliest edition of the collected works of Augustin is that of the celebrated Amerbach, which appeared in nine volumes folio, at Basle, 1606, and was reprinted at Paris in 1615. This edition did not, however, contain the Epistolae, the Sermones, and the Enarrationes in Psalmos, which had been previously published by Amerbach. In 1529, the works of Augustin were again published at Basle, from the press of Frobenius, and under the editorship of Erasmus, in ten volumes folio. This edition, though by no means faultless, was a considerable improvement upon that of Amerbach. It was reprinted at Paris in 1531—32; at Venice, with some improvements, in 1552, and again in 1570; at Lyons in 1561—63, and again in 1571. It was also issued from the press of Frobenius at Basle, with various alterations, in 1543, in 1556, in 1569, and in 1596. The edition of Augustin prepared by the learned divines of Louvain, was published at Antwerp, by Christopher Plantin, in ten volumes folio. It far surpasses in critical exactness all the preceding editions; and though, on the whole, inferior to that of the Benedictines, it is still held in high estimation. No fewer than sixteen of the "Theologi Lovanienses" were employed in preparing it for publication. It has been very frequently reprinted:—at Geneva in 1596; at Cologne in 1616; at Lyons in 1664; at Paris in 1686, in 1693, in 1699, in 1614, in 1626, in 1638, and in 1652. The Benedictine edition of the works of Augustin, in eleven volumes folio, was published at Paris in 1672—1706. It was severely handled by Father Simon; but its superiority to all the former editions of Augustin is generally acknowledged. The first volume contains, besides the Retractations and the Confessions, the greater part of the works written by Augustin before his elevation to the episcopal dignity. The second comprises his letters. The third and fourth include his exegetical writings, the fourth being entirely filled up with his Commentary on the Psalms. The fifth volume contains the sermons of Augustin. The sixth embraces his Opera Moralia. The seventh consists of his treatise on the Psalms. The fifth volume contains an appendix consisting of works falsely attributed to Augustin, &c. The eleventh volume is occupied with the life of Augustin, for the preparation of which Tillcmont lent the sheets of his unpublished volume upon this father. This valuable edition was reprinted at Paris, in eleven thick imperial octavo volumes, 1836—39. The edition of Le Clerc (who calls himself Joannes Phereponus) appeared (professedly at Antwerp, but in reality at Amsterdam, in 1700—1703. It is a republication of the Benedictine edition, with notes by Le Clerc, and some other supplementary matter; besides an additional volume containing the poem of Prosper de Ingratia, the Commentary on Pelagius on the Epistles of Paul, and some modern productions referring to the life and writings of Augustin. Of the numerous editions of the separate works of Augustin the following are all that we have space to enumerate:—De Civitate Dei: editio princeps, c monasterio Sublacensi, 1467, fol.; Moguntiae per Petri Schoeffer, cum commentariis Thomas Valois et Nic. Triveth, 1473, fol., reprinted at Basle in 1479 and again in 1518; commentaria illustrato studio et labore Jo. Lud. Vivis, Basileana, 1522, 1555, 1570, fol.; cum commentariis Leon. Coquaei et Jo. Lud. Vivis, Paris, 1613, 1636, fol.; Lips. 1825, 2 vols. 8vo. Confessiones: editio princeps, Mediolani, 1475, 4to.; Lovani, 1563, 12mo. and again 1573, 8vo.; Antverp. 1567, 1568, 1740, 8vo.; Lugd. Batav. 1675, 12mo. apud Else- vir. (Paris, 1776, 12mo. (an edition highly commended); Berol. 1823, ed. A. Neander; Lips. (Taschnitz), 1837, ed. C. H. Bruder; Oxon. (Parkar), 1840, ed. E. B. The principal sources of information respecting the life of Augustin are his own Confessions, Retractions, and Epistles, and his biography written by his pupil Possidius, bishop of Calama. AUGUSTULUS, ROMULUS, the last Roman emperor of the West, was the sun of Orestes, who seized the government of the empire after having driven out the emperor Julius Nepos. Orestes, probably of Gothic origin, married a daughter of the comes Romulus at Petovio or Petavio, in the south-western part of Pannonia; their son was called Romulus Augustus, but the Greeks altered Romulus into Ρωμαύλος, and the Romans, despising the youth of the emperor, changed Augustus into Augustulus. Orestes, who declined assuming the purple, had his youthful son proclaimed emperor in a. d. 475, but still retained the real sovereignty in his own hands. As early as 476, the power of Orestes was overthrown by Odoacer, who defeated his rival at Favia and put him to death; but Orestes, the brother of Orestes, was slain at Ravenne. Romulus Augustulus was allowed to live on account of his youth, beauty, and innocence, but was exiled by the victor to the villa of Lucullus, on the promontory of Misenum in Campania, which was then a fortified castle. There he lived upon a yearly allowance of six thousand pieces of gold:—his ultimate fate is unknown. AUGUSTUS.

The first emperor of the Roman empire, was born on the 23rd of September of the year c. 63, in the consulship of M. Tullius and L. Mummius. His name was Octavius by Atia, a daughter of Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar, who is said to have been descended from the ancient Latin hero Atys. His real name was, like that of his father, C. Octavius, but for the sake of brevity, and in order to avoid confusion, we shall call him Augustus, though this was only an hereditary surname which was given him afterwards by the senate and the people to express their veneration for him, whence the Greek writers translate it by Αὔγουστος. Various wonderful signs, announcing his future greatness, were subsequently believed to have preceded or accompanied his birth. (Suet. Aug. 14; Dion Cass. xlv. 1, &c.)

The education was conducted with great care in the house of his grandmother, Julia, and at the age of twelve (according to Nicolaus Damascenus, De Vit. Aug. 3, three years earlier) he delivered the funeral oration on his grandfather, Julia. After the death of his father his education was conducted with great care in the house of his grandmother, Julia, and at her death he returned to his mother, who, as well as his step-father, henceforth watched over his education with the utmost vigilance. His talents and beauty, and above all his relationship to C. Julius Caesar, drew upon him the attention of the most distinguished Romans of the time, and it seems that J. Caesar himself, who had no male issue, watched over the education of the promising youth with no less interest than his parents. In his sixteenth year (N. Damascenus erroneously says in his fifteenth) he received the toga virilis, and in the same year was made a member of the college of pontiffs, in the place of L. Domitius, who had been killed after the battle of Pharsalus. (N. Damasc. l. c. 4; Vell. Pat. i. 59; Suet. Aug. 14; Dion Cass. xlv. 2.)

From this time his uncle, C. Julius Caesar, devoted as much of his time as his own busy life allowed him to the practical education of his nephew, and trained him for the duties of the public career which he so soon was to enter upon. Dion Cassius relates that at this time Caesar also brought about his elevation to the rank of a patrician, but it is a well attested fact that this did not take place till three years later. In c. 47, when Caesar went to Africa to put down the Pompeian party in that country, Augustus wished to accompany him but was kept back, because his mother thought that his delicate constitution would be unable to bear the fatigues connected with such an expedition. On his return Caesar distinguished him, nevertheless, with military honours, and in his triumph allowed Augustus to ride on horseback behind his triumphal car. In the year following (b.c. 45), when Caesar went to Spain against the sons of Pompey, Augustus, who had then completed his seventeenth year, was to have accompanied his uncle, but was obliged to remain behind on account of illness, but soon joined him with a few companions. During his whole life-time Augustus, with one exception, was unfortunate at sea, and this his first attempt nearly cost him his life, for the vessel in which he sailed was wrecked on the coast of Spain. Whether he arrived in Caesar's camp in time to take part in the battle of Munda or not is a disputed point, though the former seems to be more probable. (Suet. Aug. 14; Dion Cass. xlvii. 4.)

Caesar became more and more attached to his nephew, for he seems to have perceived in him the elements of everything that would render him a worthy successor to himself: he constantly kept him about his person; and while he was yet in Spain he is said to have made his will and to have adopted Augustus as his son, though without informing him of it. In the autumn of n. c. 45, Caesar returned to Rome with his nephew; and soon afterwards, in accordance with the wish of his uncle, the senate made the gens Octavia, to which Augustus belonged, to the rank of a patrician gens. About the same time Augustus was betrothed to Servilia, the daughter of P. Servilius Isauricus, but the engagement appears afterwards to have been broken off.

The extraordinary distinctions and favours which had thus been conferred upon Augustus at such an early age, must have excited his pride and ambition, of which one remarkable example is recorded. In the very year of his return from Spain he was presumptuous enough to ask for the office of magister equitum to the dictator, his uncle. Caesar, however, refused to grant it, and gave it to M. Lepidus instead, probably because he thought his nephew not yet fit for such an office. He wished that Augustus should accompany him on the expedition which he contemplated against the Getae and Parthians; and, in order that the young man might acquire a more thorough practical training in military affairs, he sent him to Apollonia in Illyricum, where some legions were stationed, and whither Caesar himself intended to follow him. It has often been supposed that Caesar sent his nephew to Apollonia for the purpose of finishing his intellectual education; but although this was not neglected during his stay in that city, yet it was not the object for which he was sent thither, for Apollonia offered no advantages for the purpose, as may be inferred from the fact, that Augustus took his instructors—the rhetorician Apollodorus of Pergamus and the mathematician Theogenes, with him from Rome. When Caesar had again to appoint the magistrates in n. c. 44, he remembered the desire of his nephew, and conferred upon him, while he was at Apollonia, the office of magister equitum, on which he was to enter in the autumn of n. c. 43. But things turned out for differently. Augustus had scarcely been at Apollonia six months, when he was surprised by the news of his uncle's murder, in March, n. c. 44. Short as his residence at this place had been, it was yet of great influence upon his future life: his military exercises seem to have strengthened his naturally delicate constitution, and the attentions and flattering speeches which were paid to the nephew of Caesar by the most distinguished persons connected with the legions in Illyricum, stimulated his ambition and love of dominion, and thus explain as well as excuse many of the acts of which he was afterwards guilty. It was at Apol-Ionia, also, that Augustus formed his intimate friendship with Q. Salvidienus Rufus and M. Vibanius Agrippa. When the news of Caesar's murder reached the troops at Philippium, they immediately offered to follow Augustus to Italy and avenge his uncle's death; but fear and ignorance of the real state of affairs at Rome made him hesitate for a while. At last he resolved to go to Italy as a private person, accompanied only by Agrippa and a few other friends. In the beginning of April he landed at Lupiae, near Brundusium, and here he heard of his adoption into the gens Julia and of his being the heir of Caesar. At Brundusium, whither he next proceeded, he was saluted by the soldiers as Augustus, which name he henceforth assumed, for his legitimate name now was C. Julius Caesar Octavianus. After having visited his stepfather in the neighbourhood of Naples, he arrived at Rome, apparently about the beginning of May. Here he demanded nothing but the private property which Caesar had left him, but declared that he was resolved to avenge the murder of his benefactor. The state of parties at Rome was most perplexing; and one cannot but admire the extraordinary tact and prudence which Augustus displayed, and the skill with which a youth of barely twenty contrived to blind the most experienced statesmen in Rome, and eventually to carry all his designs into effect. It was not the faction of the conspirators that placed difficulties in his way, but one of Caesar's own party, M. Antony, who had in his possession the money and papers of Caesar, and refused to give them up. Augustus declared before the praetor, in the usual manner, that he accepted of the inheritance, and promised to give to the people the portion of his uncle's property which he had bequeathed in his will. Antony endeavoured by all means to prevent Augustus from obtaining his objects; but the conduct of Augustus gained the favour of both the senate and the people. [Antonius, p. 215, b.] Augustus had to contend against Dec. Brutus, who was in possession of Cisalpine Gaul, as well as against Antony; but to get rid of one enemy at least, the sword was drawn against the latter, the more dangerous of the two. While Antony was collecting troops for the war against D. Brutus, two of the legions which came from Macedonia, the legio Martia and the fifth, went over to Augustus; and to prevent the remaining troops following the example, Antony hastened with them to the north of Italy. Cicero, who had at first looked upon Augustus with contempt, now began to regard him as the only man capable of delivering the republic from its troubles; and Augustus in return courted Cicero. On the 10th of December, Cicero, in his third Philippic, proposed that Augustus should be entrusted with the command of the army against Antony, and on the first of January, b. c. 43, he repeated the same proposal in his fifth Philippic. The senate now granted more than had been asked: Augustus obtained the command of the army with the title and insignia of a praetor, the right of voting in the senate with the consuls, and of holding the consulship ten years before he attained the legitimate age. He was accordingly sent by the senate, with the two consuls of the year, C. Vibius Pansa and A. Hirtius, to compel Antony to raise the siege of Mutina, for which the soldiers saluted him as imperator. The fall of the two consuls threw the command of their armies into his hands. Antony was summoned and obliged to flee across two ranges of mountains. Various reports were spread in the meantime of disputes between D. Brutus and Augustus, and it was even said that the death of the two consuls was the work of the latter. The Roman aristocracy, on whose behalf Augustus had acted, now determined to prevent him from acquiring all further power. They entrusted D. Brutus with the command of the consular armies to prosecute the war against Antony, and made other regulations which were intended to prevent Augustus gaining any further popularity with the soldiers. He remained inactive, and seemed ready to obey the commands of the senate. Antony had in the meantime become reconciled with the governors in Gaul and Spain through the mediation of Lepidus, and was now at the head of a powerful army. In these circumstances Augustus resolved to seek a power which might assist him in gaining over Antony, or enable him to oppose him more effectually if necessary. This power was the consulship. He was very popular with the soldiers, and they were by promises of various kinds induced to demand the consulship for him. The senate was terrified, and granted the request, though, soon after, the arrival of troops from Africa emboldened them again to declare against him. But Augustus had won the favour of these troops; he encamped on the campus Martius, and in the month of August the people elected him consul together with Q. Pedius. His adoption into the gens Julia was now sanctioned by the equestrian; the sums due to the people, according to the will of Julius Caesar, were paid, the murderers of the dictator outlawed, and Augustus appointed to carry the sentence into effect. He first marched into the north, professedly against Antony, but had scarcely entered Etruria, when the senate, on the proposal of Q. Pedius, repealed the sentence of outlawry against Antony and Lepidus, who were just descending from the Alps with an army of 17 legions. D. Brutus took to flight, and was afterwards murdered at Aquileia at the command of Antony. On their arrival at Bonna, Antony and Lepidus were met by Augustus, who became reconciled with them. It was agreed by the three, that Augustus should lay down his consulship, and that the empire should be divided among them under the title of triumviri rei publicae constituendae, and that this arrangement should last for five years. Antony obtained Spain, Antony Gaul, and Augustus Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily. Antony and Augustus were to prosecute the war against the murderers of Caesar. The first objects of the triumvirs were to destroy their enemies and the republican party; they began their proscriptions even before they arrived at Rome; their enemies were murdered and their property confiscated, and Augustus was no less cruel than Antony. Two thousand equites and three hundred senators are said to have been put to death during this proscription; the lands of whole townships were taken from their owners and distributed among the veteran soldiers. Numbers of Roman citizens took to flight, and found a refuge with Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. Augustus in the latter, because Pompeius had it in his power to cut off all provisions from Rome. The army assembled at Rhebut an attempt to cross over to Sicily was thwarted by a naval victory which Pompeius gained over Q. Salviodenus Rufus in the very sight of Augustus. Soon after this, Augustus and Cassius sailed across the Ionian sea to Greece, as Brutus and Cassius were leaving Asia for the west. Augustus was obliged to remain at Dyrrhachium on account of illness, but as soon as he had recovered a little, he hastened to Philippi in the autumn of B. c. 42. The battle of Philippi was gained by the two triumvirs: Brutus and Cassius in despair put an end to their lives, and their followers surrendered to the conquerors, with the exception of those who placed their hopes in Sext. Pompeius. After this successful war, in which the victory was mainly owing to Antony, though subsequently Augustus claimed all the merit for himself, the triumvirs made a new division of the provinces. Lepidus obtained Africa, and Augustus returned to Italy to reward his veterans with the lands he had promised them. All Italy was in fear and trembling, as every one anticipated the repetition of the horrors of a proscription. His enemies, especially Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and some other of the friends of the latter, increased these apprehensions by false reports in order to excite the people against him; for Augustus was detained for some time at Brundusium by a fresh attack of illness. But he pacified the minds of the people by a letter which he wrote to the senate.

These circumstances not only prevented for the present his undertaking anything fresh against Sext. Pompeius, but occasioned a new and unexpected war. On his arrival at Rome, Augustus found that Fulvia had been spreading these rumours with the view of drawing away her husband from the arms of Cleopatra, and that L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, was used by her as an instrument to gain her objects. Augustus did all he could to avoid a rupture, but in vain. L. Antonius assembled an army at Praeneste, with which he threw himself into the fortified town of Perusia, where he was blockaded by Augustus with three armies, so that a fearful famine arose in the place. This happened towards the end of B. c. 41. After several attempts to break through the blockading armies, L. Antonius was obliged to surrender. The citizens of Perusia obtained pardon from Augustus, but the senators were put to death, and from three to four hundred noble Perusines were butchered on the 15th of March, B. c. 40, at the altar of Caesar. Fulvia fled to Greece, and TibERIUS NerO, with his wife Livia, to Pompeius in Sicily and thence to Antony, who blamed the authors of the war, probably for no other reason but because it had been unsuccessful. Antony, however, sailed with his fleet to Brundusium, and preparations for war were made on both sides, but the news of the death of Fulvia in Greece accelerated a peace, which was concluded at Brundusium, between the two triumvirs. A new division of the provinces was again made: Augustus obtained all the parts of the empire west of the town of Scodra in Illyricum, and Antony the eastern provinces, while Italy was to belong to them in common. Antony also formed an engagement with the noble-minded Octavia, the sister of Augustus and widow of C. Marius, in order to confirm the new friendship. The marriage was celebrated at Rome. Sext. Pompeius, who had had no share in these transactions, continued to cut off the provisions of Rome, which was suffering greatly from scarcity: scenes of violence and outrage at Rome showed the exasperation of the people. Augustus could not hope to satisfy the Romans unless their most urgent wants were satisfied by sufficient supplies of food, and this could not be effected in any other way but by a reconciliation with Pompeius. Augustus had an interview with him on the coast of Misenum, in B. c. 39, at which Pompeius received the proconsulship and the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, together with the province of Achaea. In return for these concessions he was to provide Italy with corn. In order to convince the Romans of the sincerity of his intentions, Augustus betrothed M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia and stepson of Antony, who was present on this occasion, to a daughter of Pompeius.

Peace seemed now to be restored everywhere. Antony returned to the East, where his generals had been successful, and Augustus too received favourable news from his lieutenants in Spain and Gaul. Augustus, however, was anxious for an opportunity of a war, by which he might deprive Sext. Pompeius of the provinces which had been ceded to him at Misenum. A pretext was soon found in the fact, that Pompeius allowed piracy to go on in the Mediterranean. Augustus solicited the aid of the two other triumvirs, but they did not support him; and Antony was in reality glad to see Augustus engaged in a struggle in which he was sure to suffer. The fleet of Augustus suffered greatly from storms and the activity of Demochares, the admiral of Pompeius; but the latter did not follow up the advantages he had gained, and Augustus, as soon as he could, took steps to send Maecenas to Antony to invite him again to take part in the war. Antony hereupon sailed to Tarentum, in the beginning of the year 37, with 300 ships; but, on his arrival there, Augustus had changed his mind, and declined the assistance. This conduct exasperated Antony; but his wife, Octavia, acted as mediator; the two triumvirs met between Tarentum and Metapontum, and the urgent necessity of the times compelled them to lay aside their mutual mistrust. Augustus promised an army to Antony for his Parthian war, while Antony sent 120 ships to increase the fleet of Augustus, and both agreed to prolong their office of triumvirs for five years longer. While Antony hastened to Syria, Octavia remained with her brother. Soon after this, M. Vipsanius Agrippa received the command of the fleet of Augustus, and in July of the year 36, Sicily was attacked on all sides; but storms compelled the fleet of Augustus to return, and Lepidus alone succeeded in landing at Lilybæum. Pompeius remained in his usual inactivity; in a sea-fight off Mylace he lost thirty ships, and Augustus landed at Tauronium. Agrippa at last, in a decisive naval battle, put an end to the contest, and Pompeius fled to Asia. Lepidus, who had on all occasions been treated with neglect, now wanted to take Sicily for himself; but Augustus easily gained over his troops, and Lepidus himself submitted. He was sent to Rome by Augustus, and resided there for the remainder of his life as pontifex maximus. The forces which Augustus had under his command now amounted, according to Appian, to forty-five legions, independent of the light-armed troops and the cavalry, and to 600 ships. Augustus rewarded...
Augustus, to suit his own purpose, imposed only a fine upon the inhabitants, and leaving his legate Publius Cestius behind with a garrison of twenty-five cohorts, he returned to Rome. Octavia had in the meantime been repudiated by Antony; and at the request of Augustus the senate declared Octavia and Livia inviolable, and granted them the right of conducting their own affairs without any male assistance—an apparent reparation for the insult offered to Octavia by her husband, but in reality a means of keeping the recollection of it alive. Augustus intended now to make an expedition against Britain, but the news of fresh revolts in the countries from which he had just returned, altered his plan. His generals soon restored peace, but he himself went to Dalmatia, where Agrippa had the command. Several towns were taken, and neither life nor property was spared. Augustus penetrated as far as Setovia, where he was wounded in his knee. After his recovery, he gave the command to Statilius Taurus, and returned to Rome to undertake the consulship for the year b.c. 33, which he entered upon on the 1st of January together with L. Volcatius Tullus, and laid down on the same day, under the pretext of the Dalmatian war, though his presence there was no longer necessary, since Statilius Taurus had already completed the defeat of the Dalmatians. Out of the spoil made in this war Augustus erected a portico called, after his sister, Octavia. During this year, Agrippa was in the field, and did all he could to gain popularity for his friend Augustus and himself, and Augustus also made several very useful regenerations.

Meantime the arbitrary and arrogant proceedings of Antony in the East were sufficient of themselves to point him out to the Romans as an enemy of the republic, but Augustus did not neglect to direct attention secretly to his follies. Letters now passed between the two triumvirs full of mutual calumnations; and Antony already purchased from Arvanelus cavalry for the impending war against his colleague. The rupture between the two triumvirs was mainly brought about by the ambition of Cleopatra. During the year b.c. 32, while Cleopatra kept Antony in a perpetual state of intoxication, Augustus had time to convince the Romans that the heavy sacrifices he demanded of them were to be made on their own behalf only, as Italy had to fear everything from Antony. War was now declared against Cleopatra, for Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. In b.c. 31, Augustus was consul for the third time with M. Valerius Messalla. Rome was in a state of great excitement and alarm, and all classes had to make extraordinary exertions. An attempt of Augustus to attack his enemy during the winter was frustrated by storms; but, in the spring, his fleet, under the command of the able Agrippa, spread over the whole of the eastern part of the Adriatic, and Augustus himself with his legions landed in Epirus. Antony and Cleopatra took their station near the promontory of Actium in Acarnania. Their fleet had no able rowers, and everything depended upon the courage of the soldiers and the size of their ships. Some persons ventured to doubt the safety of entering upon a sea-fight, but Cleopatra's opinion prevailed, and the battle of Actium was fought in September, 31. As soon as the queen observed that victory was not certain on her side, she took to flight, and Antony soon followed her. His fleet sought in vain
The danger which had threatened to bring Rome under the dominion of an eastern queen was thus removed, the ambition of Augustus was satisfied, and his generosity met with general admiration. After the battle of Actium, he proceeded slowly through Greece and a part of western Asia, where and his generosity met with general admiration. Under the dominion of an eastern queen was thus surrendered.

After the battle of Actium, he proceeded slowly to the last, and, after a long hesitation, the land was closed, as peace was restored throughout the empire. Without going to Rome, he soon after sailed to Corinth, Rhodes, Syria, and Egypt. Cleopatra negotiated with Augustus to betray Antony; but when she found that Augustus only wanted to spare her that she might adorn his triumph, she put an end to her life. [Antonius, No. 12.]

Egypt was beside a Roman province, and the booty which Augustus obtained was so immense, that he could easily satisfy the demands of his army. At Rome the senate and people rivalled each other in devising new honours and distinctions for Augustus, who was now alone at the head of the Roman world. In Samos he entered upon his fifth consulship for the year B.C. 29. The senate sanctioned all his acts, and conferred upon him many extraordinary rights and privileges. The temple of Janus was closed, as peace was restored throughout the empire. In August of the same year, Augustus returned to Rome, and celebrated his threefold triumph over the Pannonians and Dalmatians, Antony and Egypt; and he obtained the title of imperator for ever.

After these solemnities were over, Augustus undertook the consulship for the year 28 together with his friend Agrippa. He was determined from the first not to lay down the power which his own successes and the circumstances of the times had placed in his hands, although he occasionally pretended that he would resign it. He first directed his attention to the restoration of order in all parts of the government; and, as he was invested with the censorship, he began by clearing the senate of all unworthy members; he ejected two hundred senators, and also raised the senatorial census; but these offices were in reality mere forms and titles, like the new offices which he created to reward his friends and partisans. Augustus assumed nothing of the outward appearance of a monarch: he retained the simple familiar intimacy with his friends, and appeared in public without any pomp or pageantry; a kingly court, in our sense of the word, did not exist at all in the reign of Augustus.

His relation to the senate was at first rather undefined: in B.C. 28 he had been made princeps senatus, but in the beginning of the year 24 he was exempted by the senate from all the laws of the state. During the latter years of his life, Augustus seldom attended any meetings of the senate, but formed a sort of privy council, consisting of twenty senators, with whom he discussed the most important political matters. Augustus had no ministers, in our sense of the word; but on state matters, which he did not choose to be discussed in public, he consulted his personal friends, C. Cilnius Maecenas, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, and Asinius Pollio, all of whom contributed, each in his way, to increase the splendour of the capital and the welfare of the empire. The people retained their republican privileges, though they were mere forms: they still met in their assemblies, and elected consuls and other magistrates; but very few persons were elected as had been proposed or recommended by the emperor. The almost uninterrupted festivities, games, and remark, that the wars of the reign of Augustus need not be noticed here. On the whole, we may mention the names of the leaders of these conspiracies: Pompey and Cornelius Cinna, who are treated of in separate articles.

It was a necessary consequence of the dominion acquired by force of arms, that standing armies (contra stativa) were kept on the frontiers of the empire, as on the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates, which in many instances became the foundations of flourishing towns. The veterans were distributed into a number of colonies. For the protection of his own person, Augustus established ten praetorian cohorts, consisting of one thousand men each, which were placed under the command of two equites with the title of praefecti praetorio. For the purpose of maintaining order and security in the city, he instituted a sort of police, under the name of cohorsia urbaea, which were under the command of the praefectus urbi. The fleets were stationed at Ravenna, Misenum, and in various ports of the provinces. In the division of the provinces which Augustus had made in A. D. 27, special regulations were made to secure strict justice in their administration; in consequence of which many, especially those which were not oppressed by armies, enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Egypt was governed in a manner different from that of all other provinces. The division of the provinces was necessarily followed by a change in the administration of the finances, which were in a bad condition, partly in consequence of the civil wars, and partly through all the domain lands in Italy having been assigned to the veterans. The system of taxation was revised, and the taxes increased. The aerarium, out of which the senate defrayed the public expenses, was separated from the fiscus, the funds of the emperor, out of which he paid his armies.

Augustus enacted several laws to improve the moral condition of the Romans, and to secure the public peace and safety. Thus he made several regulations to prevent the recurrence of scarcity and famine, promoted industry, and constructed roads and other works of public utility. The large sums of money which were put into circulation revived commerce and industry, from which the eastern provinces especially and Egypt derived great advantages.

Although Augustus, who must have been startled and frightened by the murder of Caesar, treated the Romans with utter caution and mildness, and endeavoured to keep out of sight every thing that might show him in the light of a sovereign, yet several conspiracies against his life reminded him that there were still persons of a republican spirit. It will be sufficient here to mention the names of the leaders of these conspiracies,—M. Lepidus, L. Murena, Fannius Caepio, and Cornelius Cinnam, who are treated of in separate articles.

After this brief sketch of the internal affairs of the Roman empire during the reign of Augustus, it only remains to give some account of the wars in which he himself took part. Most of them were conducted by his friends and relations, and need not be noticed here. On the whole, we may remark, that the wars of the reign of Augustus were not wars of aggression, but chiefly undertaken to secure the Roman dominion and to protect the frontiers, which were now more exposed than before to the hostile inroads of barbarians. In A. D. 27, Augustus sent M. Crassus to check the incursions of the Dacians, Bastarnians, and Moesians on the Danube; and, in the same year, he himself went to Gaul and Spain, and began the conquest of the warlike Cantabri and Asturii, whose subjugation, however, was not completed till A. D. 19 by Agrippa. During this campaign Augustus founded several towns for his veterans, such as Augusta Emerita and Caesar Augusta. In A. D. 21 Augustus travelled through Sicily and Greece, and spent the winter following at Samos. After this, he went to Syria at the invitation of Tiridates, who had been expelled from his kingdom of Parthia. The ruling king, Phraates, for fear of the Romans, sent back the standards and prisoners which had been taken from Crassus and Antony. Towards the end of the year 20, Augustus returned to Samos, to spend the approaching winter there. Here ambassadors from India appeared before him, with presents from their king, Pandion, to confirm the friendship which had been sought on a former occasion. In the autumn of A. D. 19, he returned to Rome, where new honours and distinctions were conferred upon him. His vanity was so much gratified at those bloodless victories which he had obtained in Syria and Samos, that he struck medals to commemorate them, and afterwards dedicated the standards which he had received from Phraates in the new temple of Mars Ultor. In A. D. 18, the imperium of Augustus was prolonged for five years, and about the same time he increased the number of senators to 600. The wars in Armenia, in the Alps, and on the Lower Rhine, were conducted by his generals with varying success. In A. D. 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; and Augustus, who thought the danger greater than it really was, went himself to Gaul, and spent two years there, to regulate the government of that province, and to make the necessary preparations for defending it against the Germans. In A. D. 13 he returned to Rome, leaving the protection of the frontier on the Rhine to his step-son, Drusus Nero. In A. D. 9 he again went to Gaul, where he received German ambassadors, who sued for peace; but he treacherously detained them, and distributed them in the towns of Gaul, where they put an end to their lives in despair. Towards the end of this year, he returned to Rome with Tiberius and Drusus. From this time forward, Augustus does not appear to have again taken any active part in the wars that were carried on. Those in Germany were the most formidable, and lasted longer than the reign of Augustus.

In A. D. 13, Augustus, who had then reached his 75th year, again undertook the government of the empire for ten years longer; but he threw some part of the burden upon his adopted son and successor, Tiberius, by making him his colleague. In the year following, A. D. 14, Tiberius was to undertake a campaign in Illyricum, and Augustus, though he was bowed down by old age, by domestic misfortunes and cares of every kind, accompanied him as far as Naples. On his return, he was taken ill at Nola, and died there on the 29th of August, A. D. 14, at the age of 76. When he felt his end approaching, he said he had asked his friends who were present whether he had not acted his part well. He died very gently in the arms of his wife, Livia, who kept the event secret, until Tiberius had returned to Nola, where he was immediately saluted as the successor of Augustus. The body of the emperor was carried by the decuriones of Nola to Bovillae, where it was received by the Roman equites and conveyed to Rome. The solemn apotheosis took place in the Campus Martius, and his ashes were deposited in the mausoleum which he himself had built.

As regards the domestic life of Augustus, he was one of those unhappy men whom fortune surrounds with all her outward splendour, and who can yet partake but little of the general happiness which they establish or promote. His domestic misfortunes must have embittered all his enjoyments. Augustus was a man of great caution and moderation—two qualities by which he maintained his power over the Roman world; but in his matrimonial relations and as a father he was not happy, chiefly through his own fault. He was first married, though only nominally, to Clodia, a daughter of Clodius and Fulvia. His second wife, Scribonia, was a relation of Sext. Pompeius: she bore him his only daughter, Julia. After he had divorced Scribonia, he married Livia Drusilla, who was carried away from her husband, Tiberius Nero, in a state of pregnancy. She brought Augustus two step-sons, Tiberius Nero and Nero Claudius Drusus. She secured the love and attachment of her husband to the last moments of his life. Augustus had at first fixed on M. Marcellus as his successor, the son of his sister Octavia, who was married to his daughter, Julia. Agrippa, jealous of Augustus' partiality for him, left Rome, and did not return till Marcellus had died in the flower of his life. Julia was now compelled by her father to marry the aged Agrippa, and her sons, Caius and Lucius Caesar, were raised to the dignity of princes juvenis. At the death of Agrippa, in b.c. 12, Tiberius was obliged to divorce his wife, Vipsania, and, contrary to his own will, to marry Julia. Dissatisfied with her conduct and the elevation of her sons, he went, in b.c. 6, to Rhodes, where he spent eight years, to avoid living with Julia. Augustus, who became at last désigné by her conduct, sent her in b.c. 4 into exile in the island of Pandataria, near the coast of Campania, whither she was followed by her mother, Scribonia. The children of Julia, Julia the Younger and Agrippa Postumus, were likewise banished. The grief of Augustus was increased by the deaths of his friend Maecenas, in b.c. 8, and of his two grandsons, Caius and Lucius Caesar, who are said to have fallen victims to the ambitious designs of Livia, who wished to make room for her own son, Tiberius, whom the deluded emperor was persuaded to adopt and to make his colleague and successor. Tiberius, in return, was obliged to adopt Drusus Germanicus, the son of his late brother, Drusus. A more complete view of the family of Augustus is given in the annexed stemma.

Our space does not allow us here to enter into a critical examination of the character of Augustus; what he did is recorded in history, and public opinion in his own time praised him for it as an excellent prince and statesman; the investigation of the hidden motives of his actions is such a delicate subject, that both ancient and modern writers have advanced the most opposite opinions, and both supported by strong arguments. The main difficulty lies in the question, whether his government was the fruit of his honest intentions and wishes, or whether it was merely a means of satisfying his own ambition and love of dominion; in other words, whether he was a straightforward and honest man, or a most consummate hypocrite. Thus much is certain, that his reign was a period of happiness for Italy and the provinces, and that it removed the causes of future civil wars. Previous to the victory of Actium his character is less a matter of doubt, and there we find sufficient proofs of his cruelty, selfishness, and faithlessness towards his friends. He has sometimes been charged with cowardice, but, so far as military courage is concerned, the charge is unfounded. The principal ancient sources concerning the life and reign of Augustus are: Sueton. Augustus; Nicolaus Damasc. De Vita August.; Dion Cass. xlv. — xlvii.; Tacitus, Annal. i.; Cicero's Epistles and Philippics; Vell. Pat. ii. 59—124; Plut. Augustus. Besides the numerous modern works on the History of Rome, we refer especially to A. Weichert, Imperatoris Caesaris Augusti Scriptorum Collectio Orbis and the Aratea than the feeble, hesitating, dulled meagreness of the fabulist. Making all allowances for numerous corruptions in the text, we can scarcely regard these pieces in any other light than as the early effusions of some unpractised youth, who patched very unskillfully expressions borrowed from the purer classics, especially Virgil, upon the rude disjointed fabric of an unlettered age. Cannegieter, in his erudite but most tedious dissertation, has toiled unsuccessfully to prove that Avianus flourished under the Antonines. Wernsdorf, again, places him towards the end of the fourth century, adopting the views of those who believe that the Theodosius of the dedication may be Aurelius Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius, the grammarian, and adding the conjecture, that the Flavianus of the Saturnalia may have been corrupted by transcribers into Fl. Avianus. These are mere guesses, and may be taken for what they are worth. Judging from the language, we have nothing else whatever to guide us, we should feel inclined to place him a hundred years later. Avianus was first printed independently by Jac. de Breda, at Deventer in Holland, in the year 1494, 4to., Gothic characters, under the title "Apologies Avian civis Romani adolescentulus ad mores et Latinum sermonem capessendos utilissimus;" but the editio princeps is appended to the fables of Asop which appeared about 1460. The earlier editions contain only twenty-seven fables; the whole forty-two were first published by Rigaltius, along with Asop and other opuscula (16mo. Lugd. 1570). The most complete edition is that of Canneaster, 8vo. Amstel. 1751, which was followed by those of Noddell, 8vo. Amstel. 1787, and of C. H. Taschucke, 12mo. Lips. 1790. The "fables of Avian translated into English" are to be found at the end of "The Subetyl Historyes and Fables of Esope, translated out of Frenshe into Englishby, by William Caxton at Westminster. C. AVIENUS, tribune of the soldiers of the tenth legion, was ignominiously dismissed from the army, on account of misconduct in the African war, b. c. 46. (Hist. B. Afr. 46.)

AVIENUS, RUFUS FESTUS. The following poems are ascribed to an author bearing this name:—

1. Descriptio Orbis Terrae, or, as it is variously entitled in different editions and MSS., Multiphrenia Periphrasis Dionysi—Stren Ubbris—Ambitus Orbis—in 382 hexameter lines, derived directly from the _persynthia_ of Dionysius, and containing a succinct account of the most remarkable objects in the physical and political geography of the known world. It adheres too closely in some places, and departs too widely in others, from the text of the Alexandrian, to be called with propriety a translation, or even a paraphrase, and still less does it deserve to be regarded as an independent work, but approaches more nearly to our modern idea of a new edition compressed in certain passages, enlarged in others, and altered throughout. These changes can hardly be considered as improvements, for not unfrequently the anxiety of the writer to expand and embellish his original has made him wander into extravagance and error, while on the other hand the fear of becoming prolix and tedious has led to injudicious curtailments, and induced him to omit the names of nations and districts which ought not to have been passed over. Nor does he attempt to correct the mistakes of his predecessor, nor to take advantage of those stores of knowledge which must have been available at the period when he lived; but the blunders and follies of the old Greek poets, who were profoundly ignorant of all the regions to the West and North of their own country, are implicitly followed, and many things set down which every well-informed man under the empire must have known to be absurd. There is, however, a considerable energy and liveliness of style, which animates the inherent dulness of the undertaking and carries the reader lightly on, while much ingenuity is displayed in varying the expression of constantly-recurring ideas.

2. Ora Maritima, a fragment in 703 Iambic trimeters. The plan comprehended a full delineation of the shores of the Mediterranean, together with those of the Euxine and sea of Azov, and a portion of the Atlantic without the pillars of Hercules; but we know not if this design was ever fully carried out, for the portion which has been preserved is confined almost entirely to the coast stretching from Marseilles to Cadiz. The author professes to have commenced the essay in order to satisfy the intelligent inquiries of a youth named Polus, to whom it is addressed, with regard to the geography of the Pontus and the Meditic littoral; but, if intended for the purposes of instruction, it is impossible to imagine any task executed in a less satisfactory manner. There is an absence of all order and arrangement. Instead of advancing steadily in a given direction, we are carried backwards and forwards, transported abruptly from one spot to another at a great distance, and brought again and again to the same point without completing any circuit, besides being distracted with discussions on localities and objects totally foreign to the matter in hand. Moreover, the different nations and districts are distinguished by their ancient and forgotten names, instead of those by which they were actually known at the time when this guide-book was composed, and all the old and exploded fantasies of half mythical geography revived and gravely propounded. We are led almost irresistibly to the conclusion, that Avienus, possessing no practical or scientific acquaintance with his subject, had read a number of conflicting accounts of the countries in question, written in former times by persons who were as ignorant as himself, and had combined and pieced them together in the hope of elaborating a consistent whole,—neglecting with strange perversity the numerous sources of accurate information opened up by the wars so long waged and the dominion so long exercised by his countrymen in those regions.

3. Aratea Phenomena, and Aratea Prognostica, both in Hexameter verse, the first containing 1325, the second 552 lines. They bear exactly the same relation to the well known works of Aratus as the _Descriptio Orbis Terrae_ does to that of Dionysius. The general arrangement of the Greek original is followed throughout, and several passages are translated more closely than in the versions of Cicero and Germanus. But on the other hand many of the mythical legends are expanded, new tales are introduced, and extracts from the works of celebrated astronomers, scraps of Pythagorean philosophy, and fragments of Egyptian superstition, are combined and worked up with the materials of the old fabric. The result is much more successful than in the two efforts previously examined. Here there was more room for the imagination to dispel itself unencumbered with dry details and stubborn facts, and accordingly the interest is well sustained and the flowing and spirited style of the poet appears to great advantage.

4. Three short fugitive pieces, the first addressed to a friend, _Plenennas Nymyrennas_, &c, requesting a gift of some pomegranates from his estates in Africa, in order to remove an attack of bile and indigestion; the second, _De Cauda Sirenae_, or _Sirenae Allegoria_, on the allusions of the daughters of Acheleus and the device by which Ulysses escaped their wiles; the third, _Ad Amicos de Agro_, enumerating the various occupations which by turns occupied the time and engaged the attention of the writer each day when living in country retirement.

We must remark, that while we can scarcely entertain a doubt that the two Geographical Essays in this section, especially since in the second (171) we find a direct reference to the first, we have no external evidence connecting them with the others, except the fact, that the same name is prefixed in all MSS. to the whole, with the exception of the 2nd and 3rd epigrams. But, on the other hand, the style, manner, and phraseology of the Aratean poems correspond so exactly with what we observe in the rest, that scholars in general have acquiesced in the arrangement which assigns the whole to one person. They evidently belong to an epoch when Latin literature, although fast verging to old age, was still fresh and hale, and far from being paralysed by infirmities;—we still perceive with pleasure a force and freedom of expression in strong contrast with the inflated feebleness and uneasy stiffness which marked the last period of decay.

Assuming that the astronomical Avienus is the same with the geographical Avienus, we can at once determine approximately the age to which he belongs; for Jerome, in his commentary on the Epistle of St. Paul to Titus, mentions that the quotation by the Apostle, in the xvii. chapter of the Acts, " Tuò rép al νέρων δόξην", is to be found in the Phaenomena of Aratus, "quem Cicero in Latham sermonem transitit, et Germanicis Cae¬sar, et nuper Avienus." Now Jerome died in 420; therefore, allowing all fair latitude to the somewhat indefinite super, we may with tolerable certainty place Avienus in the latter half of the fourth century, under Valens, the Valentinians, Gratian, and Theodosius, or even somewhat earlier, under Constantine and Julian.

Our next step leads us upon ground much less firm, but we may venture yet a little further. An inscription, discovered originally, we are told, in the church of St. Nicholas, of the Furbishers, at Rome, and afterwards deposited in the Villa Caesarina, has been published by Fabretti and others, and will be found in Bur¬mann's Anthologin. (i. 79, or Ep. n. 278, ed. Meyer.) It bears a title R. Fes¬sus C. Musonii filius, and its conclusion reads: "si alia scire possimus, quæ non nominatim sit, alias nolimus"; but, on the contrary, wherever he speaks of the Pagan gods we find that he expresses in very unequivocal language a marked reverence for their worship. There is little to be said either for or against the idea, that he is the young Avienus introduced by Macrobius in the Saturnalia as talking with Sym¬machus. So far as dates are concerned there is no anachronism involved, but the name was very common, and we have no clue to guide us to any conclusion.

Servius, in his commentary on Virgil (x. 388), speaks of an Avienus who had turned the whole of Virgil and Livy into Iambi (qui totum Virgilium et Livium iambica scriptus), and refers to him again (x. 272) as the person "qui iambis scripsitVir¬gius." We cannot doubt that Livy the historian must be indicated here, for he was by far the most celebrated of all authors bearing the name, and the context is such as to make the passage more probable than any other. In the Saturnalia as talking with Sym¬machus.

Lastly, all scholars now admit that there are no grounds for supposing, that the prose treatise "Breviarium de Victoriae ac Provinciis Populi Ro¬mani ad Valentinianum Augustum," ascribed to a Sextus Rufus or Rufus Festus, and the topographi¬cal compendium " Sexii Rufi de Regionibus Urbis Ro¬mæ," belong to Avienus, as was at one time main¬tained; while the poem "De Urbibus Hispa¬niae Mediterraneis," quoted as his work by Macrobius, is now known to be a forgery, executed in all probability by a certain Hieronymus Remanus, a Jesuit of Toledo, who was notorious for such frauds.

The Editio Princeps of Avienus was printed at Venice in Roman characters, by Antonius de Venice in Roman characters, by Antonius de Strato, under the care of Victor Pisamus, in 4to., and bears the date of 25th October (9 Kal. Nov.), 1488. It contains the Descripicio Orbis Terrae, the Ora Marinina, the Aratea, and the epigram addressed to Flaccusius Agmecius; besides which we find in the same volume the translation of Aratus by Cicero and Germanicus, and the verses of Sophonis on the cure of diseases.

The most useful edition is to be found in the second part of the fifth volume of the Poetae Latin Minores of Wernsdorf, which, however, does not include the Aratea, Wernsdorf not having lived to complete his work. But this last piece also, which was carefully edited by Buhle and placed at the end of his Amus, is given in the French reprint of Wernsdorf (1825), which forms a portion of the collection of Latin classics published at Paris by Lemaire. AVITOLA, the name of a family of the Acilia gens, which is not mentioned till the very end of the republic.

1. M. ACILUS AVITOLA, consul suffectus in B.C. 33, from the 1st of July, is probably the same Avio who is said to have come to life again on the funeral pile, when it was supposed that he was dead, but to have been nevertheless burnt to death, because the flames could not be extinguished. (Pllin. H. N. vii. 52, s. 53; Val. Max. i. 8. § 12.)

3. M. ACILUS AVITOLA, consul in the last year of the reign of Claudius, a. D. 54. (Tac. Ann. xii. 64; Suet. Claud. 45.)

AVITIANUS, son of Julius Ausonius and Aemilia Asolina, was a young man of great promise, who was being brought up to follow his father’s profession as a physician, but died at an early age, in the fourth century after Christ. He was a younger brother of the poet Ausonius, who in one of his poems (Parent. xiii.) laments his premature death, and gives the above particulars of his life. [W. A. G.]

AVITUS, ALCTMUS ECCLIUS (or ECDIUS), son of Isicius, archbishop of Vienna, was born about the middle of the 5th century. From his earliest days he is said to have devoted himself to literature, and to have given promise of that erudition which subsequently gained for him, among his countrymen at least, the reputation of being the most profound and eloquent scholar of his age. After bestowing an ample inheritance on the poor, he retired into the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, close to the walls of his native city, and remained in the seclusion of the cloister until the death of his father (in a. D. 490), whom he succeeded in the archiepiscopal dignity. His fame as a pious and charitable priest and a powerful controversialist now rose very high. He took part in the celebrated conference at Lyons between the Arians and the Catholic bishops, held in the presence of the Burgundian king, where, as we are told, he silenced the heretics and brought back many wavers to the bosom of the church. Gundebald himself is said to have yielded to his arguments, although from political motives he refused to be openly converted; and all agree, that after his death his son Sigismund publicly declared his adherence to the true faith. Avitus, at the request of his royal admirers, published treatises in confutation of the Nestorians, Eutychians, Sa- bellians, and Pelagians, and was peculiarly successful in gaining over a number of Jews who had settled in his diocese. By pope Hormisdas he was appointed vicar apostolic in Gaul, in the year 517, and president at the council of Ephesus (conde.te Ephes.) annexed P. 525, was buried in the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul, where he had passed so many years of his early life, and in the fulness of time received the honours of canonization.

The works of Avitus are

1. SACRORUM POENEMATUM LIBRI QUINTI, dedicated to his brother, Apollinaris, bishop of Valentia, a renowned worker of miracles. This collection consists of five distinct pieces, all in hexameter verse, extending to upwards of 3500 lines, De Infulo Mund. De Peccato Originali, De Sententia Dei, De Diavolo Mund. De Transita Marius Rubri.

2. De consolatorio Castitatis Locuti, in 668 hexameters, addressed to his sister Fuscina, a nun.

These productions display much imagination and grace; the plan of the different portions is well conceived and skilfully executed, and both in versification and expression they deserve the moderate praise of being much better than could have been expected, belonging as they do to what Funcius has quaintly termed the “inae decr recapitulat.” In the Latin language. Barthele is of opinion that we are prevented from estimating them fairly, in consequence of the numerous deprivations and interpolations which he believes them to have suffered from the monks in ages still more barbarous. Besides his effusions in verse, Avitus is known to have published nine books of epistles, and a great number of homilies; but of these the following only are extant:

3. Eighty-seven letters to and from various persons of distinction in church and state.

4. A homily “De Festo Rogationum et primius Institutione.”

5. Eight fragments of homilies.

6. Fragments of episcopula.

These remains shew that he was well versed in scripture and in theology, and that he possessed some knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and they contain curious and valuable information on various points of ecclesiastical history, discipline, and doctrine.

The poems were first printed at Strasburg in 1507 from a MS. in the possession of Berauldus, and are given in the Corpus Poetarum Latinorum of Maittaire and similar compilations.

The whole works of Avitus were published collectively with notes by Pierre Sirmond, at Paris, 1643, 8vo., in the second volume of his Opuscula of the fathers and other ecclesiastical writers, and also in the works of Sirmond published by Pierre la Baume, Paris, 1629, fol., and reprinted at Venice, 1729, fol. Since that period, a new homily has been discovered, and is included in the fifth vol. of the Theologiae, Auctore, by Dom. Martinne. [W. R.]

AVITUS, ALPHIUS. The Latin poet quoted under this name is believed to have flourished during the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Many suppose him to be the same person with Alphius Flavus—the precocious pupil of Cestius and companion of Seneca, with whom, when yet a boy was so fondled for his eloquence, that crowds flocked to listen to his orations (Senec. Controv. I.)—and with Flavus Alphius, referred to by Pliny (H. N. ix. 8), as an authority for a story about dolphins. Hence Deurne conjectures, that his designation at full length and properly arranged, may have been Flavo Alfius Caesar. All this is very uncertain and very uncertain. We know from Terentianus Maurus (L. 2448), that Alphius Avitus composed a work upon Illustrious Men, in iambic dimeters, extending to several books; and eight lines are cited by Priscian from the second book, forming a part of the legend of the Faliscan schoolmaster who betrayed his pupils to Camillus; besides which, three lines more from the first book are contained in some MSS. of the same grammarian. (Priscian, vol. i. pp. 410, 553, vol. ii. p. 131, ed. Krehl, or pp. 823, 947, 1136, ed. Putsch.) These fragments are given in the Antholoyia Latina of Burmann, ii. p. 297, and Add. ii. p. 730, or Ep. n. 125, ed. Meyer. There is also an "Alpheus philologus," from whom Priscian adduces five words (vol. i. p. 370, ed. Kr., or pp. 792, ed. Putsch), and an Alfius whose work is given in some MSS. of the same grammarian. (Priscian, vol. i. pp. 410, 553, vol. ii. p. 131, ed. Krehl, or pp. 823, 947, 1136, ed. Putsch.) These fragments are given in the Antholoyia Latina of Burmann, ii. p. 297, and Add. ii. p. 730, or Ep. n. 125, ed. Meyer.

AULANUS EVANDER. [Evander.] AULESTES, a Tyrrenian ally of Aeneas in Italy, is called a son of Tiberis and the nymph Manto, and brother of Oenus. He was slain by Messapus, and was regarded as the founder of Persia. (Verg. Aen. x. 207, xii. 290.) [L. S.]

ALUTA GENS, probably plebeian. Persons of this name rarely occur, though one member of the gens, Q. Aulus Ceretanus, obtained the consulship twice in the Samnite war, in B. C. 323 and 319. The name is derived from the praenomen Aulus, as Sextius from Sextus, Marcus from Marcus, and Quintius from Quintus. The only cognomen belonging to this gens is CERETANUS.

AULUS (Αὖλος), a daughter of Ogygus and Thebe, from whom the Boeotian town of Aulis was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. ix. 19. § 5.) Other traditions call her a daughter of Euryonymus, the son of Cephissus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. AULς.) She was one of the goddesses who watched over oaths under the name of σπειδησία. [ALACLEMENIA.]

M. AULUS, praefect of the allies, was killed in the battle in which Marcellus was defeated by Hannibal, B. C. 208. (Liv. xxxvii. 26, 27.)

AULONIUS (Ajax), a surname of Asclepius, derived from a temple he had in Aulis, a valley in Messenia. (Paus. iv. 36. § 5.) [L. S.]

AURA (Αὐρα), a daughter of Lelas and Periboea, was one of the swift-footed companions of Artemis. She was beloved by Dionysus, but fled from him, until Aphrodite, at the request of Dionysus, inspired her with love for the god. She accordingly became by him the mother of twins, but at the moment of their birth she was seized with madness, tore one of her children to pieces, and then threw herself into the sea. (Nonnus, Dionys. 360.) Auma also occurs as the name of a one of the special companions of Dionysus, inspired her with love for the god. She accordingly became by him the mother of twins, but at the moment of their birth she was seized with madness, tore one of her children to pieces, and then threw herself into the sea. (Nonnus, Dionys. 360.)

AURELLIA, the wife of C. Julius Caesar, by whom she became the mother of C. Julius Caesar, the dictator, and of two daughters. It is doubtful who her parents were: Drumm (Gesch. Roms. iii. p. 128) conjectures, that she was the daughter of M. Aurelius Cotta and Rutilia (comp. Cic. ad Att. xii. 20), and that C. M. and L. Cottae, who were consuls in B. C. 75, 74, and 65 respectively,

C. 75, 74, and 65 respectively, were her brothers. She carefully watched over the education of her children (Dial. de Orat. 28; comp. Dion Cass. xiv. 38), and always took a lively interest in the success of her son. She appears to have constantly lived with him; and Caesar on his part treated her with great affection and respect. Thus, it is said, that on the day when he was elected Pontifex Maximus, n. c. 63, he told his mother, as she kissed him upon his leaving his house in the morning to proceed to the comitia, that he would not return home except as Pontifex Maximus. (Suet. Caes. 13.) It was Aurelia who detected Clodius in the house of her son during the celebration of the mysteries of the Bona Dea in n. c. 62. (Plut. Caes. 9, 10; Suet. Caes. 74.) She died in n. c. 54, while her son was in Gaul. (Suet. Caes. 26.)

Aurelia Padilla. [Antonines, p. 211.]

Aurelia Gens, plebeian, of which the family names, under the republic, are Cotta, Orestes, and Scaurus. On coins we find the cognomina Cotta and Scaurus, and perhaps Rufus. (Eckhel, v. p. 147), the last of which is not mentioned by historians. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was C. Aurelius Cotta in n. c. 263, from which time the Aurelii became distinguished in history down to the end of the republic. Under the early emperors, we find an Aurelian family of the name of Fulvius, from which the Roman emperor Antoninus was descended, whose name originally was T. Aurelius Fulvius. (See pp. 210, 211.)

Aurelia Messalina. [Albinus, p. 23, b.]

Aurelia Obestilla, a beautiful but profligate woman, whom Catiline married. As Aurelia at first objected to marry him, because he had a grown-up son by a former marriage, Catiline is said to have killed his own offspring in order to remove this impediment to their union. (Sall. Cat. 15, 35; Appian, B. C. ii. 2; comp. Cic. ad Fam. i. 22.) Her daughter was betrothed to the younger Cornelian in n. c. 49. (Caesil. ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.)

Aurelianus, named twice by Dion Cassius (lxviii. 12, 19), is supposed to be the conspirator against Caius Cædicius, who appears in the text of Suetonius as Rcasius or Retiatus. The soldiers demanded him from Maximus, who at first resisted their importunities, but at length yielded him up to their fury. [W. R.]

Aurelianus. On coins, this emperor is uniformly styled L. Dominitus Aurelianus, but in some fasti and inscriptions he appears as Valerius or Valerianus Aurelianus, the name Valerius being confirmed by a letter addressed to him by his predecessor, Claudius. (Vopisc. c. 17.) He was of such humble origin, that nothing certain is known of his family, nor of the time or place of his nativity. According to the account commonly received, he was born about the year a. d. 212, at Sirmium in Pannonia, or, as others assert, in Dacia, or in Moesia. His father is said to have been a farm servant on the property of Aurelius, a senator, his mother to have officiated as priestess of Sol in the village where she dwelt. It is certain that her son, in after-life, regarded that deity as his tutelary deity. After entering upon the career of arms, he seems to have served in every grade and in every quarter of the world, and became so renowned for promptness in the use of weapons, and for individual prowess, that his comrades distinguished him as "Hand-on-sword." (Aurelianus manu ad ferrum.) In a war against the Sarmatians, he was believed to have slain forty-eight of the enemy in one day, and nearly a thousand in the course of a single campaign. When tribune of the sixth legion in Gaul, he repelled a predatory incursion of the Franks, who had crossed the Rhine near Mayence, and now for the first time appear in history. His fame as a soldier, an officer, and a general, gradually rose so high, that Valerian compared him to the Corvini and Scipios of the olden time, and, declaring that no reward was adequate to his merits, bestowed on him the titles of Liberator of Illyria and Restorer of Gaul. Having been appointed lieutenant to Ulpius Crinitus, captain-general of Illyria and Thrace, he expelled the Goths from these provinces; and so important was this service deemed, that Valerian, in a solemn assembly held at Byzantium, publicly returned thanks to Aurelian for having averted the dangers by which the state was menaced, and after presenting him with a multitude of military decorations, proclaimed him consul elect. At the same time, he was adopted by Ulpius Crinitus, declared his heir, and probably received his daughter in marriage. He is marked in the Fasti as consul successor on the 22nd of May, 257.

We hear nothing of Aurelian during the reign of the indolent and feeble Gallienus; but great successes were achieved by him under Claudius, by whom he was appointed to the command previously held by his adopted father, and was entrusted with the defence of the frontier against the Goths, and nominated commander-in-chief of the cavalry of the empire.

Upon the death of Claudius, which took place at Sirmium in 270, Aurelian was at once hailed as his successor by the legions. Quintillus, the brother of Claudius, at the same time asserted his own claims at Aquileia; but, being abandoned by his soldiers, put himself to death within less than three weeks from the time when he assumed the purple.

The reign of Aurelian, which lasted for about four years and a half, from the end of August, 270, until the middle of March, 275, presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while their ancient lustre to the arms of Rome.

As soon as his authority had been formally recognised in the metropolis, he directed his first efforts against a numerous host of Goths and Vandals, who, led by two kings and many powerful chiefs, had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. These, after sustaining a decisive defeat, were forced to submit, and were permitted to retire upon leaving the sons of the two kings, and other noble youths, as hostages, and furnishing a contingent of two thousand auxiliaries.

A great victory was next gained over the Allemani and other German tribes, which was followed by a serious reverse. For, while the emperor was employing every exertion to cut off their retreat, he failed to watch them in front. The barbarians, taking advantage of this oversight, pressed boldly forwards, outstripped their heavily armed pursuers, and bursting into Italy wasted all of night, they attacked and dispersed the Romans in a thick forest. Issuing from thence under cloud Cisalpine Gaul. When at length overtaken near Placentia, they avoided a battle and sought shelter in a thick forest. Issuing from thence under cloud Cisalpine Gaul. When at length overtaken near Placentia, they avoided a battle and sought shelter. Ammianus distinctly asserts, that the attackers. Numbers suffered death, and many nobles were sacrificed upon the most frivolous charges. Ammianus distinctly asserts, that the wealthiest were selected as victims, in order that their confiscated fortunes might replenish an exhausted treasury.

Aurelian next turned his arms against the famed Zenobia (Zenobia), queen of Palmyra, the widow of Odenathus (Odenathus), who had been permitted by Gallienus to participate in the title of Augustus, and had extended his sway over a large portion of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. The Romans on their march vanquished various barbarous tribes on the Thracian border, who opposed their progress. Passing over the Bosporus, they continued their triumphant course through Bithynia, which yielded without resistance, stormed Tyana, which had closed its gates at their approach, and at length encountered the forces of Zenobia on the banks of the Orontes, not far from Antioch. The Palmyrenians, being driven from their position, retreated to Esmes, where they were a second time overpowered in a bloody battle and forced to retire upon their capital. Aurelian pursed them across the desert, which he passed in safety, although harassed by the constant attacks of the Bedouins, and proceeded at once to invest Palmyra, which surrendered after a long and obstinate defence, the queen herself having been previously captured in an attempt to effect her escape to Persia. A profound sensation was produced by these events, and embassies poured in from all the most powerful nations beyond the Euphrates, bearing letters of congratulation, which were at once carried into effect a measure which, although offensive to the vanity of his countrymen, was dictated by the wisest policy. Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, but for a long series of years had been the seat of constant war, was entirely abandoned, and the garrisons transported to the south bank of the Danube, which was henceforward, as in the time of Augustus, considered the boundary of the empire.

About this time, a formidable disturbance arose among the persons entrusted with the management of the mint, who had been detected in extensive frauds, and, to escape the punishment of their crimes, had incited to insurrection a great multitude. So fierce was the outbreak, that seven thousand soldiers are said to have been slain in a fight upon the Collian hill; but the riot, which almost desolves the name of a civil war, was at length suppressed.

After a short residence in the city, Aurelian repaired to Gaul, and then visited in succession the provinces on the Danube, checking by his presence the threatened aggressions of the restless tribes who were ever ready to renew their attacks. He at this time carried into effect a measure which, although offensive to the vanity of his countrymen, was dictated by the wisest policy. Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, but for a long series of years had been the seat of constant war, was entirely abandoned, and the garrisons transported to the south bank of the Danube, which was henceforward, as in the time of Augustus, considered the boundary of the empire.

A large force was now collected in Thrace in preparation for an expedition against the Persians. But the nature of the warlike prince was drawing to a close. A certain Mnestheus, his freedman and private secretary, had betrayed his trust, and, conscious of guilt, contrived by means of forged documents to organise a conspiracy among some of the chief leaders of the army. While Aurelian was on the march between Heraclea and Byzantium, he was suddenly assailed, and fell by the hands of an officer of high rank, named Mucapor. The treachery of Mnestheus was discovered when it was too late. He was seized and condemned to be cast to wild beasts.

It will be seen from the above sketch that Aurelian was a soldier of fortune; that he possessed of his most conspicuous virtues as a commander; and that to these alone he was indebted for his elevation. One of his most conspicuous virtues as a commander was the rigid discipline which he enforced among legions long accustomed to unbounded license. His rigor, however, was free from caprice, and tempered by stern and inflexible justice; for we find that his soldiers submitted to his rule without a murmur while he was still in a private station, raised him to the throne, served him with fidelity during the period of his dominion, and after his death displayed the most enthusiastic devotion to his memory. His great faults as a statesman were the harshness of his disposition, and the impetuous violence of his passions, which frequently betrayed him into acts of sanguinary cruelty. Diocletian was wont to say, that Aurelian was better fitted to command an army than to govern a state.

The wife of Aurelian, we learn from coins and inscriptions, was Ulpia Severina, and, as was remarked above, is supposed to have been the daughter of his adopted father, Ulpius Crinitus. He had a daughter whose descendants were living at Rome when Vopiscus wrote. (c. 42.) It is worthy of observation, that this humble Pannonian peasant was the first of the Roman princes who openly assumed the regal diadem; and now for the first time we read upon medals struck during the lifetime of an emperor the arrogant and impious titles of Lord and God (Deo et Domino nostro Aureliano Aug.).

Our chief authorities for the life of Aurelian are an elaborate biography by Vopiscus, founded, as he himself informs us, upon Greek memoirs, and especially upon certain journals kept by the order of Ulpian library. We find also some important information in the other writers of the Augustan history, in the minor historians, and in the works of Dexippus and Zosimus. But the chronology is involved in inextricable confusion. Coins, which are usually our surest evidence; it may, however, be concluded, from some disorders which are not to be met with in any other ancient author. He gives us a very ample and minute detail of the practice which was adopted both by himself and his contemporaries; and it must be acknowledged that on these points his remarks display a competent knowledge of his subject, united to a clear and comprehensive judgment.

He divides diseases into the two great classes of acute and chronic, nearly corresponding to diseases of constriction and of relaxation, and upon these supposed states he founds his primary indications; but with respect to the intimate nature of these states of the system, as well as of all hidden or recondite causes generally, he thinks it unnecessary to inquire, provided we can recognise their existence, and can discover the means of removing them. Hence his writings are less theoretical and more decidedly practical than those of any other author of antiquity; and they consequently contributed more to the advancement of the knowledge and actual treatment of disease than any that had preceded them. They contributed in an especial manner to perfect the knowledge of therapeutics, by ascertaining with precision the proper indications of cure, with the means best adapted for fulfilling them. The great defect of Caelius Aurelianus (a defect which was inherent in the sect to which he belonged), was that of placing too much dependence upon the twofold division of diseases, and not sufficiently attending to the minute shades by which they gradually ran into each other; which is the more remarkable in one who shews so much attention to the phenomena of disease, and who for the most part allows himself to be so little warped by prejudice. To compensate for this defect, however, it leads him not unfrequently to reject active and decisive remedies, when he could not reconcile their operation to his supposed indications; so that, although his practice is seldom what can be styled bad, it is occasionally defective.

His work consists of three books On Acute Diseases, "Celerum Passionum," (or "De Morbis Acuti," and five books On Chronic Diseases, "Tar darum Passionum" (or "De Morbis Chronicis"). The books On Chronic Diseases were first published in folio, Basil. 1529; those On Acute Diseases in 8vo, Paris, 1838. The first edition of the whole work was that published at Lyons in 8vo, 1556; perhaps the best is that by Amman, Amsterdam, 1709, 4to, which was several times reprinted. The last AURELIUS.

Edition of the whole work is that by Haller, Laus.-sian, 1774, 8vo. 2 vols. A new edition was begun at Paris by Delattre, 1826, 8vo., but only one volume was published. Some academic dissertations on Caelsius Aurelianus were published by C. G. Kühn, which are reprinted in his Opera Academica Medica et Philologica, Lips. 1827-1828, 8vo., vol. ii. p. 1, &c. For further information respecting Caelsius Aurelianus, see Haller’s Biblioth. Medica. Pract. vol. i.; Sprengel’s Hist.de la Méd. vol. ii.; Bostock’s Hist. of Med.; and Choulant’s Handbuch der Bückerkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, Leipzig, 8vo. 1841, from which two latter works the preceding account has been taken. AURELIA/NUS FESTIVUS. [Festivus.]

AURELIUS, one of the names of several Roman emperors, of whom an account is given under ANTONINUS, AURELIUS, CARACALLA, CAE- RINUS, CARUS, CLAUDIUS, COMMODUS, MAXEN-TIUS, MAXIMIANUS, NUMERIANUS, PROBUS, QUINTILLUS, ROMULUS, SEVERUS, VERUS.

M. AURELIUS ANTONIUS, commonly distinguished by the epithet of “the philosopher,” was born at Rome, on the Caelian hill, on the 20th of April, a. d. 121. From his paternal ancestors, who for three generations had held high offices of state and claimed descent from Numus, he inherited the name of M. Annius Verus, while from his great-grandfather on the mother’s side he received the appellation of Catilius Severus. The principal members and connexions of the family are represented in the following table:—

Aelius Aurelius, both of whom, it is probable, older than Commodus, and died young. (See Tillemont.)

The father of young Marcus having died while praetor, the boy was adopted by his grandfather, Annius Verus, and from a very early period enjoyed the favour of Hadrian, who bestowed on him the appellation of Catilius Severus. rious other honours and privileges befitting his station. From this time forward he was the constant companion and adviser of the monarch, and the most perfect confidence subsisted between the son and his adopted father until the death of the latter, which happened on the 7th of March, 161.

The first act of the new ruler was the admission of Ceionius Commodus to a full participation in the sovereign power, and these emperors henceforward bore respectively the names of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. When the double adoption by Antoninus Pius took place, it was settled that the son of Aelius Caesar should be considered as the younger brother. Thus, on the coins struck before the death of Pius, M. Aurelius alone bears the appellation of Caesar, to him alone Pius committed the empire with his dying breath, and to him alone did the senate formally offer the vacant throne. Hence his conduct towards L. Verus was purely an act of grace. But the alliance promised to prove advantageous both to the parties themselves, and also to the general interests of the state. Marcus was weak in constitution, and took more delight in philosophy and literary pursuits than in politics and war, while Lucius, young, active, and skilful in all manly exercises, was likely to be better fitted for the toils of a military life. His aptitude for such a career was soon put to the proof. The war, which had been long threatening the east, at length burst forth. Verus, after being betrothed to Lucilla, the daughter of the ill-fated emperor, passed his winters at Laodiceia, and the rest of his time at Daphne or at Antioch, abandoning himself to gaming, drunkenness, and dissolute pleasures of every kind. All the achievements of the war were performed by his legates, and all the general arrangements conducted by M. Aurelius at Rome.

A still heavier danger was now impending, which threatened to crush Italy itself. A combination had been formed among the numerous tribes, dwelling along the whole extent of the northern limits of the empire, from the sources of the Danube to the Illyrian border, including the Marcomanni, the Alani, the Jazyges, the Quadi, the Sarmatæ, and many others. In addition to the danger from without, the city was hard pressed by numerous calamities from within. Inundations had destroyed many buildings and much property, among which were vast granaries with their contents, the poor were starving in consequence of the deficiency thus caused in the supplies of corn, and many others, were perishing by a fearful pestilence, said to have been brought from the east by the troops of Verus. So great was the panic, that it was resolved that both emperors should go forth to encounter the foe. Previous to their departure, in order to restore confidence to the populace, priests were summoned from all quarters, a multitude of expiatory sacrifices were performed, many of them according to strange and foreign rites, and victims were offered to the gods with the most unsparing profusion.

The contest which had now commenced with the northern nations was continued with varying success during the whole life of M. Aurelius, whose head-quarters were generally fixed in Pannonia; but the details preserved by the historians who treat of this period are so confused and so utterly destitute of all chronological arrangement, that it becomes impossible to draw up anything like a regular and well-connected narrative of the progress of the struggle. Medals are our only sure guide, and the information afforded by these is necessarily meagre and imperfect. It would appear that the barbarians, overawed by the extensive preparations of the Romans and by the presence of the two Augusti, submitted for a time and sued for peace, and that the brothers returned to Rome in the course of 168. They set out again, however, in 169, but before they reached the army, L. Verus was seized with apoplexy, and expired at Antioch; and the conqueror, L. Aurelius, now having united his forces with those of his general Cassius, compelled the Parthians to retreat, invaded Mesopotamia, plundered and burnt Seleucia, razed to the ground the royal palace at Ctesiphon, and penetrated as far as Babylon; while Statius Priscus, who was sent into Armenia, stormed Artaxata, and, rescuing the country from the usurper, reinstalled the lawful and dethroned monarch Saxenus. Vologeses III., who had been induced to abandon a meditated attack upon Armenia by the remonstrances of Antoninus Pius, thinking that a fitting season had now arrived for the execution of his long-cherished schemes, had destroyed a whole Roman legion quartered at Elagabal, and advancing at the head of a great army, had spread devastation throughout Syria. Lucius having collected his troops, proceeded to Antioch, where he determined to remain, and entrusted the command of his armies to the custody of his general Cassius. Cassius compelled the Parthians to retreat, invaded Mesopotamia, plundered and burnt Seleucia, razed to the ground the royal palace at Ctesiphon, and penetrated as far as Babylon; while Statius Priscus, who was sent into Armenia, stormed Artaxata, and, rescuing the country from the usurper, reinstalled the lawful and dethroned monarch Saxenus. Vologeses was thus constrained to conclude an ignominious peace, in virtue of which Mesopotamia was ceded to the Romans. These events took place in 162 and the three following years. In 165, Lucius returned home, and the two emperors celebrated jointly a magnificent triumph, assuming the titles of Augusti, Parthica Maxima, and Medicae. But although this campaign had terminated so gloriously, little praise was due to the commander-in-chief. Twice he was unwillingly prevailed upon to advance us as far as the Euphrates, and he made a journey to Ephesus (in 164) to meet his bride on her arrival from Italy; but with these exceptions he passed his winters at Laodicea, and the rest of his time at Daphne or at Antioch, abandoning himself to gaming, drunkenness, and dissolute pleasures of every kind. All the achievements of of the Thundering Legion. Those who may desire to investigate this question will find the subject fully discussed in the correspondence between King and Moyle. (Moyle's Works, vol. ii. Lond. 1726.)

There is an excellent summary of the whole argument in Lardner's "Jewish and Heathen Testimonies" (chap. xv.), and many useful remarks are to be found in Milman's History of Christianity (chap. vi.), and in the Bishop of Lincoln's "Illustrations, &c. from Tertullian" (p. 105). An attempt has been made recently to restore the credit of the supposed miracle, in the essay by Mr. Newman, prefixed to a portion of Fleury's "Ecclesiastical History," published at Oxford in 1842.

Whatever opinion we may form upon the subject of debate, we may feel certain of the fact, that the Roman men were rescued from a very critical situation by a sudden storm, and gained an important victory over their opponents. That they attributed their preservation to the direct interposition of heaven is proved by the testimonies of the ancient historians, and also by the sculptures of the Antonine column, where a figure supposed to represent Jupiter Pluvius is seen sending down streams of water from his arm and head, which the Roman soldiers below catch in the hollow of their shields.

This success, and the circumstances by which it was accompanied, seem to have struck terror into the surrounding nations, who now tendered submission or claimed protection. But the fruits were in a great measure lost, for the emperor was prevented from following up the advantage gained, in consequence of the alarm caused by unexpected disturbances which had broken out in the East, and had quickly assumed a very formidable aspect.

Faustina had long watched with anxiety the declining health of her husband, and anticipating his speedy death, was filled with alarm lest, from the youth and incapacity of her son Commodus, the empire might pass away into other hands. She had, therefore, opened a correspondence with Avadius Cassius, who had gained great fame in the Parthian war commemorated above, who had subsequently suppressed a serious insurrection in Egypt, and had acted as supreme governor of the Roman provinces after the departure of Lucius Verus. Her object was to persuade him to hold himself in readiness to aid her projects, and she offered him her hand and the throne as his rewards.

While Cassius was meditating upon these proposals, he suddenly received intelligence that Marcus was dead, and forthwith, without waiting for a confirmation of the news, caused himself to be proclaimed his successor. The falseness of the rumour soon became known, but deeming that his offence was beyond forgiveness, he determined to prosecute the enterprise; within a short period he made himself master of all Asia within Mount Taurus, and resolved to maintain his pretensions by force. A report of these transactions was forthwith transmitted to Rome by M. Verus, the legate commanding in Cappadocia. Aurelius, who was still in Pannonia, summoned his son to his presence in all haste, and bestowed on him the manly gown, intending to set out instantly for the seat of war. But in the midst of active preparations for a campaign Cassius was assassinated by two of his own officers, after having enjoyed a nominal sovereignty for three months and six days. His son soon after shared the same fate. The conduct of Marcus throughout the whole of this rebellion can scarcely fail to excite the warmest admiration. In the mournful address delivered to his soldiers, he bitterly deplores that he should be forced to engage in a contest so revolting to his feelings as civil strife. His chief dread was that Cassius, from shame or remorse, might put an end to his own life, or fall by the hand of some loyal subject—his fondest wish, that he might have an opportunity of granting a free pardon. Nor did this forgiving temper exhaust itself in words. When the head of the traitor was laid at his feet, he rejected with horror the bloody offering, and refused to admit the murderers to his presence. On repairing to the East, where his presence was thought necessary to restore tranquillity and order, he displayed the greatest lenity towards those provinces which had acknowledged the usurper, and towards those senators and persons of distinction who were proved to have favoured his designs. Not one individual suffered death; few were punished in any shape, except such as had been guilty of other crimes; and finally, to establish perfect confidence in all, he ordered the papers of Cassius to be destroyed without suffering them to be read. During this expedition, Faustina, who had accompanied her husband, died in a village among the desolations of Taurus.

According to some, her end was caused by an attack of gout; according to others, it was hastened by her own act, in order to escape the punishment which she feared would inevitably follow the discovery of her negotiations with Cassius. Her guilt in this matter is spoken of by Dion without any expression of doubt; it is mentioned by Capitolinus as a report only, and positively denied by Valentinus; but the arguments employed by the latter are of no weight.

After visiting Egypt, the emperor set out for Italy, touched at Athens on his homeward journey, reached Brundusium towards the end of the year 176, and celebrated a triumph along with Commodus, now consul elect, on the 23rd of December. Scarcely was this ceremony concluded, when fresh tumults arose upon the Danube, where the presence of the emperor was once more required. Accordingly, after concluding somewhat earlier than he had intended the nuptials of Commodus and Crispina, he quit Rome along with his son, in the month of August (177), and hastened to Germany. During the two following years his operations were attended with the most prosperous results. The Marcomanni, the Hermunduri, the Sarmatae, and the Quadi, were repeatedly routed, their confederacy was broken up, and everything seemed to promise that they would at length be effectually crushed. But the shattered constitution of Marcus now sunk beneath the pressure of mental and bodily fatigue. He died in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirium, on the 17th of March, 180, in the 59th year of his age and the 20th of his reign. A strong suspicion prevailed that his death had been accelerated by the machinations of his son, who was accused of having tampered with the physicians, and persuaded them to administer poison.

The leading feature in the character of M. Aurelius was his devotion to philosophy and literature. When only twelve years old he adopted the dress and practised the mysterious exercises of the Stoics, whose doctrines were imparted to him by the most celebrated teachers of the day—Diogenetus, Apollonius, and Junius Rusticus. He studied the principles of composition and oratory under Herodes Atticus and Cornelius Fronto, and by his close and unremitting application laid the foundation of the bad health by which he was so much oppressed in after life. While yet Caesar he was addressed by Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. init.) as Verissimus * the philosopher,* an epithet by which he has been commonly distinguished from that period down to the present day, although no such title was ever publicly or formally conferred. Even after his elevation to the purple, he felt neither reluctance nor shame in resorting to the school of Sextus of Chaeroneia, the descendant of Plutarch, and in listening to the extemporaneous declamations of Hermogenes. From his earliest youth he lived upon terms of the most affectionate familiarity with his instructors, as we may gather from his correspondence with Fronto [Fronto]; the most worthy were, through his influence, promoted to the highest dignities; after their death he placed their images in the chapel of his laves, and was wont to strew flowers and offer sacrifices on their graves. Nor was his liberality confined to his own preceptors, for learned men in every quarter of the world enjoyed substantial proofs of his bounty. Philosophy was the great object of his zeal, but the other branches of a polite education were by no means neglected; music, poetry, and painting, were cultivated in turn, and the severer sciences of mathematics and law engaged no small portion of his attention. In jurisprudence especially, he laboured throughout life with great activity, and his Constitutions are believed to have filled many volumes. These are now all lost, but they are constantly quoted with great respect by later writers. (See Westenberg, Dissertations ad Constitutiones M. Aurelli Imperatoris, Lug. Bat. 1736.)

With the exception of a few letters contained in the recently discovered remains of Fronto, the only production of Marcus which has been preserved is a volume composed in Greek, and entitled Ἀρωματία, τοῦ Ἀνθρώπων τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων ταύτα εἰς ἐαυτὸν μεθέλειας. It is a sort of commonplace book, in which were registered from time to time the thoughts and feelings of the author upon moral and religious topics, together with striking maxims extracted from the works of those who had been most eminent for wisdom and virtue. There is no attempt at order or arrangement, but the contents are valuable, in so far as they illustrate the system of self-examination enjoined by the discipline of the Stoics, and present a genuine picture of the doubts and difficulties and struggles of a speculative and reflecting mind.

The education and pursuits of M. Aurelius exercised the happiest influence upon a temper and disposition naturally calm and benevolent. He succeeded in acquiring the boasted composure and self-command of the disciples of the Porch, without imbibing the harshness which they were wont to exhibit. He was firm without being obstinate; he steadfastly maintained his own principles without manifesting any overweening contempt for the opinions of those who differed from himself; his justice was tempered with gentleness and mercy; his gravity was devoid of gloom. In public life, he sought to demonstrate practically the truth of the Platonic maxim, ever on his lips, that those states only could be truly happy which were governed by philosophers, or in which the kings and rulers were guided by the tenets of pure philosophy. poisoned L. Verus never seems to have obtained or deserved the slightest credit, we may perhaps by a close scrutiny detect a few weaknesses. The deep sorrow expressed upon the death of Faustina, and the eagerness with which he sought to heap honor on the memory of a wicked woman and a faithless wife, who rivalled Messalina in shameless and promiscuous profligacy, if sincere, betoken a degree of carelessness and blindness almost incredible; if feigned, a strange combination of apathy and dissimulation. Nor can we altogether forgive his want of discernment or of resolution in not discovering or restraining the evil propensities of his son, whose education he is said to have conducted with the most zealous care. Making every allowance for the innate depravity of the youth, we can scarcely conceive that if he had been trained with judicious firmness, and his evil passions combated and dissimulated. tion. In what has been said above we have followed the accounts of Aurelius Victor and Zonaras in preference to that of Pollio, who places the usurpation of Aureolus early in 261; but on this supposition the relations which are known to have subsisted afterwards between Gallienus and Aureolus become quite unintelligible. AURIUS. [Aurius, No. 4]

AURUS, the name of a family at Larinum, frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius.

1. M. AURUS, the son of Dinaea, was taken prisoner at Aesculum in the Italian war. He fell into the hands of Q. Sergius, who confined him in his ergastulum, where he was murdered by an emissary of Oppianicus, his brother-in-law. (cc. 7, 8.)

2. NUM. AURUS, also the son of Dinaea, died before his brother, M. AURUS. (c. 7.)

3. A. AURUS MELINUS, a relation of the two preceding, threatened to prosecute Oppianicus, on account of the murder of M. AURUS. Oppianicus thereupon fled from Larinum, but was restored by Sulla, and obtained the procuration and death of M. AURUS Melinus and his son, Caius. (c. 8.) Melinus had married Cluentia, the daughter of SASSIA; but as his mother-in-law fell in love with him, he divorced Cluentia and married SASSIA. (c. 9, 26.)

4. AURIA, the wife of the brother of Oppianicus, was killed by the latter. (c. 11.)

AURIA. [Eos.]

AURUNCULEIA GENS, plebeian, of which COCCA is the only family-name mentioned: for those who have no cognomen, see AURUNCULEUS.

None of the members of this gens ever obtained the consulship: the first who obtained the praetorship was C. AURUNCULEIUS, in B.C. 209.

AURUNCULEIUS. 1. C. AURUNCULEIUS, praetor B.C. 209, had the province of Sardinia. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 7.)

2. C. AURUNCULEIUS, tribune of the soldiers of the third legion in B.C. 207. (Liv. xxvii. 11.)

L. AURUNCULEIUS, praetor urbanus B.C. 190. He was one of the ten commissioners sent to arrange the affairs of Asia at the conclusion of the war with Antiocbus the Great, B.C. 188. (Liv. xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 55.)

4. C. AURUNCULEIUS, one of the three Roman ambassadors sent into Asia, B.C. 155, to prevent Prusias from making war upon Attalus. (Polyb. iii. xxxii. 1.)

AURUNCUS, POST. COMONIUS, consul B.C. 801, in which year a dictator was first appointed on account of the conspiracy of the Latin states against Rome. (Liv. ii. 18; Dionys. v. 59; Zonar. viii. 13.) According to some accounts, he is said to have dedicated the temple of Saturn, in 437, in accordance with a decree of the senate. (Dionys. vi. 1.) AURUNCUS was consul again, in 493, and entered upon his office during the accession of the plebs, who had occupied the Aventine. He carried on war successfully against the Volscians, and took several of their towns. It was during this campaign that C. Marcus first distinguished himself at Corduli, whence he obtained the surname of CORIOLANUS. (Liv. ii. 33; Dionys. vi. 49, 91, 94; Cic. de Rep. lat. 33, pro Balb. 23; Plut. Coriol. 8.) It was probably on account of Coriolanus having served under him that AURUSUS is represented as one of the ambassadors sent to Coriolanus when the latter was marching against Rome. (Dionys. viii. 22.)

AUSONIUS. AUSON (Abou), a son of Odysseus either by Calypso or Circe. (Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 44, 696; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 553; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 171; Suidas, s. v. AUSONIUS.) The country of the Auruncans was believed to have derived from him the name of AUSONIA. DIONYSIUS (i. 72), in enumerating the sons of Odysseus by Circe, does not mention AUSON. LIPARUS, from whom the name of the island of Lipara was derived, is called a son of AUSON. (Steph. Byz. s. v. AUSONIUS.)

AUSONIUS, who in the earliest MSS. is entitled DIONYSIUS MAGNUS AUSONIUS, although the first two names are found neither in his own poems, nor in the works of any ancient author, was born at Bourdeaux in the early part of the fourth century. His father, JULIUS AUSONIUS, who followed the profession of medicine, appears to have been a person of high consideration, since he was at one period invested with the honorary title of praefect of Illyricum: but there is no ground for the assertion of Scaliger, frequently repeated even in the most recent works, that he acted as physician in ordinary to the emperor Valentinian. If we can trust the picture of the parent drawn by the hand of the son, he must have been a very wonder of genius, wisdom, and virtue. (Dionys. vi. 25; Parental. i. 9, &c.) The maternal grandfather of our poet, CAECILIUS ARGICIUS ARBORICUS, being skilled in judicial astrology, erected a scheme of the majesty of young AUSONIUS, and the horoscope was found to promise high fame and advancement. (Parental. iv. 17, &c.) The prediction was, in all probability, in some degree the cause of its own accomplishment. The whole of his kindred took a deep interest in the boy whose career was to prove so brilliant. His infant years were sedulously watched by his grandmother, AEIMILIA CORINTHIA MAMA, wife to Caecilius Arboricus, and by his maternal aunts, AEIMILIA HILARIA and AEIMILIA DRYADIA, the former of whom was a holy woman, devoted to God and chastity. (Parental. vi. and vii.; SchoL iv. 171.) The two first figures of the Greek and Latin languages from the most distinguished masters of his native town, and his education was completed under the superintendence of Aeimilias Magnus Arboricus, his brother's mother, who taught rhetoric publicly at Toulouse, and who is named as the author of an elegy still extant, Ad Nympham nimis cultum. (Parental. viii. 12, &c.; x. 16, iii. 1, 11; Parental. iii. 12, &c.; Wernsdorf, Post. Lat. Minoras, vol. iii. p. 217.) Upon his return to Bourdeaux he practised for a while at the bar; but at the age of thirty began to give instructions as a grammarian, and not long after was promoted to be professor of rhetoric. The duties of this office were discharged by him for many years, and with such high reputation that he was summoned to court in order that he might act as the tutor of Granius, son of the emperor Valentinian. (Prag. ad Sog. 15, &c.) Judging from the honours which were now rapidly showered down upon him, he must have acquitted himself in his important charge to the entire satisfaction of all concerned. He received the title of count (comes) and the post of quasestor from Valentinian, after whose death he was appointed by his pupil praefectus of Latium, of Libiya, and of Gaul, and at length, in the year 379, was elevated to the consulsiphip, thus verifying to the letter, as Bayle has observed, the apodictic words of Juvenal: [AUSONIUS.]

AURO'RA. [Eos.]

The country of the Auros, who are said to have been the earliest inhabitants of Libya, and of Gaul, and at length, in the year 379, was elevated to the consulsiphip, thus verifying to the letter, as Bayle has observed, the apodictic words of Juvenal: [AUSONIUS.]
The life of Ausonius, conferring the dignity, and the grateful reply of Ausonius, are both extant. After the death of Gratian he retired from public life, and ended his days in a country retreat at no great distance from his native city (Epist. xxiv.), without losing, however, his court favour, for we have direct evidence that he was patronised by Theodosius. (Præfationes, l.)

The precise dates of the birth and of the death of Ausonius are alike unknown. That he was born about the beginning of the fourth century, as stated above, is evident from the fact, that he speaks of himself as far advanced in years when invested with the consulship (Grat. Act.), and he was certainly alive in 383, since he refers to the victory of Theodosius over Maximiun, and the death of the "Rutupian robber." (Clar. Urb. vii.)

Judging from the fond terms in which Ausonius speaks of his relations, the kindly feeling which appears to have been maintained between himself and several of his pupils, and the warm gratitude expressed by him towards his benefactors, we should be led to conclude that he was gentle, warm-hearted, and affectionate; but it is so very easy to be amiable upon paper, that we have perhaps no right to form any decided opinion upon his character. His religious faith has been the subject of keen controversy, but there seems to be little difficulty in determining the question. From his cradle he was surrounded by Christian relatives, and no difficulty in determining the question. From these Vinet has extracted a very complete catalogue of the kindred of Ausonius, and constructed a genealogical tree. (Professores, notices of the Professors of Bourdeaux, or of those who were natives of Bourdeaux gave instructions elsewhere. 5. Epist. Epitopiius Heroum, epitaphs on the heroes who fell in the Trojan war and a few others. 6. A metrical catalogue of the first twelve Caesars, the period during which each reigned, and the manner of his death. 7. Tetraetides, on the Caesars from Julianus to Elagabalus. 8. Clarae Urbes, the praises of fourteen illustrious cities. 9. Lucus Septimæ Superbientium, the doctrines of the seven sages expounded by each in his own person. 10. Idyllica, a collection of twenty poems on different subjects, to several of which dedications in prose are prefixed. The most remarkable are, Epitesdion in patrem Julianum Ausoniu ; Ausov Villula; Capite orae affinis; Mosella; and the too celebrated Centu Nepisthesis. 11. Eclogarium, short poems connected with the Calendar and with some matters of domestic computation. 12. Epistoleæ, twenty-five letters, some in verse, some in prose, some partly in verse and partly in prose, addressed to various friends. 13. Gratienian Actio pro Consulatu, in verse, addressed to the emperor Gratian. 14. Periochac, short arguments to each book of the Iliad and Odyssey. 15. Tres Præfationes, one of them addressed to the emperor Theodosius. The Edito Princeps of Ausonius appeared at Venice in folio, without a printer's name, in a volume bearing the date 1472, and containing Probat Caeliææ, the elegies of Calpurnius, in addition to which some copies have the Epitaph on the death of Drusus and some obituary of Pallaidus Gregorius Tisermus. It is extremely scarce. The first edition, in which Ausonius is found separately, is that edited by J. A. Ferrarius, fol. Mediolan. 1490, printed by Ulricus Scrnemzeller. The first edition, in which the whole of the extant works are collected in a complete form, is that of Tadænus Ugoletus, printed by his brother Anguila, at Parma, 4to. 1499. The first edition, which exhibits a tolerable text, is that of Phil. Junta, 8vo, Florent. 1517; and the best edition is the Varia- cum of Palladus, 8vo. Amstel. 1671. [W. R.]

AUSONIUS, JULIUS, an eminent physician, who, however, is chiefly known by his being the father of the poet of the same name, from whose works almost all the events of his life are to be learned. He was a native of Cosso Vasatinum (the modern Bazas), but removed to Burdigala (Bour- deau). He married Aemilia Acenia, with whom he lived thirty-six years, and by whom he had four children, two sons, Decius Magnus Ausonius and Avitians, and two daughters, Aemilia Melanija and Julia Dryadia. He was appointed praefect of Illyricum by the emperor Valentinian. (a. p. 364—375.) He died at the age either of eighty-eight (Auson. Parent. i. 4) or ninety (Id. Epiced. v. 61), after having enjoyed perfect health both of body and mind. If he at all resembled the ancient historian Tachus, he must have been a most remarkable man, as almost every intellectual and moral excellence is attributed to him. He wrote some medical works, which are not now extant. (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 96, ed. rec.; Scaliger, Vita Auson.; Ausonius, Parent. i. and Epiced.) [W. A. G.]

AUTARIUS (Avtropos), the leader of the Gallic mercenaries in the Carthaginian army in Africa, took an active part in the rebellion against Carthage at the end of the first Punic war. He was of great age and invincible. He rose up in rebellion against Carthage, and was killed in battle against the Carthaginians.

AUTEION (Avtwpros), a son of Tisamenus, grandson of Thersander, and great-grandson of Polyneices. He is called the father of Theras and Polyneices. He is called the father of Theras and Polyneices.

AUTE'SION (Awtoioi), a son of Tisamenus, grandson of Thersander, and great-grandson of Polyneices. He is called the father of Theras and Polyneices. He is called the father of Theras and Polyneices.

AUTOCLEUS (Avtoklous), a native of Thebes, where he had succeeded his father as king, but at the command of an oracle he went to Peloponnesus and joined the Dorians. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2; Paus. iii. 15. § 4, 3. § 3, ix. 5. § 8; Herod. iv. 147; vi. 52; Strab. viii. p. 347.)

AUTOCRATES (Avtokratos), a son of Areus, who found and brought up the infant Asclepius when exposed in Thebuse. (Paus. viii. 4. § 2, 25. § 6.)

AUTOLEON (Avtolios), an ancient hero of Epirus, whom the oracle advised him to conciliate the shade of Ajax by offering sacrifices to him in the island of Leuce. This was done accordingly, and Autoleon was cured.

AUTOLYCUS (Avtolios), a young Athenian of singular beauty, the object of the affection of the Ophiantor Locrians, whenever they drew up their army in battle array, to leave one place in the lines open for their national hero Ajax. [Ajax.] Once in a battle between the Locrians and Crotonians in Italy, Autoleon wanted to penetrate into this vacant place, hoping thus to conquer the Locrians. But the shade of Ajax appeared and inflicted on Autoleon a wound from which he suffered severely. The oracle advised him to conciliate the shade of Ajax by offering sacrifices to him in the island of Leuce. This was done accordingly, and Autoleon was cured. While in the island of Leuce, Autoleon also saw Helen, who gave him a commission to Stesichorus. This poet had censured Helen in one of his poems, and had become blind in consequence. Helen now sent him the message, that if he would recant, his sight should be restored to him. Stesichorus composed a poem in praise of Helen, and recovered his sight. (Conon, Narr. 18.) Pausanias (iii. 19. § 11) relates precisely the same story of one Leonymus. [L. S.]

AUTOLYCUS (Avtolios), 1. A son of Hermes or Daedalion by Chion, Phoroneus or Teleus. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9; Hygin. Fab. 201.) Rustath. ad Hom. p. 804.) He was the husband of Nearea (Paus. viii. 4. § 3), or according to Homer (Od. xix. 394, &c.), of Amphithoe, by whom he became the father of Anticlea, the mother of Odysseus and Aeneas. He had his residence on mount Parnassus, and was renowned among men for his cunning and oaths. (Comp. Hygin. l. c.; Ov. Met. xi. 311.) Once when he came to Ithaca as a guest, the nurse placed his newly-born grandson Odysseus on his knees, and gave him to the child the name Odysseus. Afterwards, when Odysseus was staying with him, he was wounded by a boar during the chase on Parnassus, and it was by the scar of this wound that Odysseus was subsequently recognized by his aged nurse, when he returned from Troy. (Paus. x. 8. § 4; Ov. Met. xi. 295, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 200.) Polyomed, the mother of Jason, was, according to Apollodoros, a daughter of this Autolycus, and the same writer (ii. 4. § 9) not only describes him as the teacher of Hercules in the art of wrestling, but mentions him among the Argonauts; the latter of which statements arose undoubtedly from a confusion of this Autolycus with the Thessalian of the same name. Autolycus is very famous in ancient story as a successful robber, who had even the power of metamorphosing both the stolen goods and himself. (Hom. Ili. x. 267; Hygin. Fab. 201; Apollod. ii. 6. § 2; Strab. ix. p. 439; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 409; Serv. ad Aen. i. 75.)

2. A Thessalian, son of Daimachus, who together with his brothers Deileon and Phlogius joined Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons. But after having gone astray the two brothers dwelt at Sinope, until they joined the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 955, &c.; Valer. Flacc. v. 115.) He was subsequently regarded as the founder of Sinope, where he was worshipped as a god and had an oracle. After the conquest of Sinope by the Romans, his statue was carried from thence by Lucullus to Rome. (Strab. xii. p. 510.) It must be noticed, that Hyginus (Fab. 14) calls him a son of Phrixus and Chalciope, and a brother of Phronius, Demophon, and Phlegyas.

AUTOLYCUS (Avtolios), a young Athenian of singular beauty, the object of the affection of Callias. It is in honour of a victory gained by him in the pentathlon at the Great Panathenaea that Callias gives the banquet described by Xenophon. (Comp. Athen. v. p. 187.) [C. P. M.]

AUTOLYCUS (Αὐτόλυκος). 1. An Areopagite, who was accused by the orator Lycurgus on account of removing his wife and children from Athens after the battle of Chaeronea, b. c. 338, and was condemned by the judges. The speech of Lycurgus against Autolycus was extant in the time of Harpocration, but has not come down to us. (Lycurg. c. Lecor. p. 177, ed. Reiske; Harpocr. c. 19, ed. Reiske, θῆς; Plut. V. X. Orat. p. 842, c. d.)

AUTOLYCUS (Αὐτόλυκος), a mathematician, who is said to have been a native of Pitane in Aeolis, and the first instructor of the philosopher Arceius. (Diog. Laer. iv. 29.) From this it would follow, that he lived about the middle of the fourth century B.C., and was contemporary with Aristotle. We know nothing more of his history. He wrote two astronomical treatises, which are still extant, and are the most ancient existing specimens of the Greek mathematics. The first is on the Motus of the Sphere (περὶ κυματίων σφαιρών). It contains twelve propositions concerning a sphere which with its principal circles is supposed to revolve uniformly about a fixed diameter, whilst a fixed great circle (the horizon) always divides it into two hemispheres (the visible and invisible). Most of them are still explicitly or implicitly included amongst the elements of astronomy, and they are such as would naturally result from the first systematic application of geometrical reasoning to the apparent motion of the heavens. This treatise may be considered as introductory to the second, which is on the risings and settings of the fixed stars, περὶ έκτασίων καὶ διάστασεως, in two books. Autolycus first defines the true risings and settings, and then the apparent. The former happen when the sun and a star are actually in the horizon together; and they cannot be observed, because the sun's light makes the star invisible. The latter happen when the star is in the horizon, and the sun just so far below it that the star is visible, and there are in general four such phenomena in the year in the case of any particular star; namely, its first visible rising in the morning, its last visible rising in the evening, its first visible setting in the morning, and last visible setting in the evening. In a favourable climate, the precise day of each of these occurrences might be observed, and such observations must have constituted the chief business of practical astronomy in its infancy; they were, moreover, of some real use, because these phenomena afforded a means of defining the seasons of the year. A star when rising or setting is visible according to its brilliance, if the sun be from 10 to 18 degrees below the horizon. Autolycus supposes 15 degrees, but reckons them along the ecliptic instead of a vertical circle; and he proceeds to establish certain general propositions concerning the intervals between these apparent risings and settings, taking account of the star's position with respect to the ecliptic and equator. It was impossible, without trigonometry, to determine beforehand the absolute time at which any one of them would happen; but one having been observed, the rest might be roughly predicted, for the same star, by the help of these propositions. The demonstrations, and even the enunciations, are in some cases not easily understood without a globe; but the figures used by Autolycus are simple. There is nothing in either treatise to shew that he had the least conception of spherical trigonometry.

There seems to be no complete edition of the Greek text of Autolycus. There are three Greek manuscripts of each treatise in the Bodleian and Savilian libraries at Oxford. The propositions without the demonstrations were printed in Greek and Latin by Dusaypodius in his "Spharicæ Doctrinae Propositiones," Argent. 1677. The works were translated into Latin from a Greek MS. by Jos. Auria, Rom. 1587 and 1588; and a translation of the first by Maurolycus, from an Arabic version, is given, without the name of Autolycus, at p. 345 of the "Universae Geometricæ, etc. Synopsis" of Mercenarius, Paris, 1645.

A full account of the works of Autolycus may be found in Delambre's "Hist. de l'Astronomie Ancienne." Brucker quotes an essay by Cypriovius, de Autolyc. Pitanæ Diatrise, Lips. 1744. Sec also Schaubach, Geschichte der Griechischen Astronomie, p. 338; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 69. [W. J. D.]

AUTOMATE (Αὐτόματη), one of the Daughters, who, according to Apollodorus (i. 5. § 5) and others, killed Busiris, who was betrothed to her; whereas, according to Pausanias (vii. 1. § 3), she was married to Archites, the son of Acheus, who emigrated from Phthisia in Thessaly to Argos with Archander. [L. S.]

AUTOMATIA (Αὐτόματια) a surname of Tyche or Fortuna, which seems to characterize her as the goddess who manages things according to her own will, without any regard to the merit of man. Under this name Timoleon built to the goddess a sanctuary in his house. (Plut. De Sly Lunde, p. 542, e; Nepos, Timol. 4.) [L. S.]

AUTOMEDON (Αὐτόμεδων), a son of Dioere, was, according to Homer, the charioteer and companion of Achilles, whereas Hyginus (Fab. 169) makes him the son of Aites; by him he has Rhesus taken to Troy. According to Virgil (Aen. ii. 476), he fought bravely by the side of Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. (Hom. Il. i. 209, xvi. 148, 219, xix. 429, &c., xix. 392, xxiv. 474.) [L. S.]

AUTOMEDON (Αὐτομέδων), of Cyzicus, a Greek epigrammatic poet, twelve of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. (v. 129, x. 23, xi. 29, 46, 50, 319, 324—326, 346, 361, xii. 34.) He must have lived in the first century of the Christian era, as one of his poems is addressed to Nicetes, a distinguished orator in the reign of Nerva. One of the epigrams usually attributed to Theocritus (Anth. Græc. vii. 334; No. 9, in Kieslings's edition of Theocritus, p. 774) has in the manuscript the inscription Αὐτομέδων Αἰγίαλω: if this is correct there must have been an Aetolian poet of the name of Automedon.

AUTOMÉDUSA. [Alcathous.]

AUTONE (Αὐτών), a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, was the wife of Aristaeus, by whom she became the mother of Polydorus. (Hesiod, Theog. 977; Paus. x. 17, § 3.) According to Apollodorus (iii. 4. § 2, &c.), Polydorus was a brother of Autonoe, and Actaeon was her son. (Comp. Dion. iv. 81.) Autone together with her sister Agave tore Penthesilea to pieces in their Bacchic fury. (Hygin. Fab. 184.) At last grief and sadness at the lamentable fate of the house of her father induced her to quit Thebes, and she went to Epirus in the territory of Mogara, where her tomb was shown as late as the time of Pausanias. (i. 44 § 8.) There are five other mythical personages of this name. (Hesiod. Theog. 258; Apollod. i. 2 § 7, ii. 1 § 5, 7 § 9; Paus. viii. 9 § 2; Hom. Od. xvii. 182.)

AUTOPHRADATES (Ἀυτοφράδατας), a Persian who distinguished himself as a general in the reign of Artaxerxes III. and Darius Codomannus. In the reign of the former he made Artabazus, the revolted satrap of Lydia and Ionia, his prisoner, but afterwards set him free. (Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 671.) [ARTABAZUS, No. 4.] After the death of the Persian admiral, Memnon, in n. c. 333, Autophradates and Phamabazus undertook the command of the fleet, and reduced Mytilene, the siege of which had been begun by Memnon. Phamabazus now sailed with his prisoners to Lycia, and Autophradates attacked the other islands of the Aegaean, which exposed the cause of Alexander the Great. But Phamabazus soon after joined Autophradates again, and both sailed against Tenedos, which was induced by fear to surrender to the Persians. (Arrian, Anab. ii. 1.) During these expeditions Autophradates also laid siege to the town of Atarneus in Myasis, but without success. (Aristot. Politi. i. 4 § 10.) Among the Persian satraps who appeared before Alexander at Zadracarta, Arrian (Anab. iii. 23) mentions an Autophradates, satrap of the Tapuri, whom Alexander left in the possession of the satrapy. But this satrap is undoubtedly a different person from the Autophradates who commanded the Persian fleet in the Aegaean.

AUTHONIA GENS, of which the only family-name mentioned is PAVRUS. Persons of this gens first came into notice in the last century of the republic: the first member of it who obtained the consulship was P. Autronius Paetus, in n. c. 65.

AUXESIA (Αὔξεσια), the goddess who grants growth and prosperity to the fields, a surname of Persephone. According to a Troezenian legend, there came once during an insurrection at Troezen two Cretan maidens, Auxesia and Damia, who was probably Demeter, and who, in our editions of Pausanias, is called Lamia (perhaps only an incorrect reading for Damia). During the tumult, the two maidens were stoned to death, whereupon the Troezeniens paid divine honours to them, and instituted the festival of the Lithobolia. (Paus. ii. 52 § 3.) According to an Epidaurian and Aegean tradition, the country of Epidaurus was visited by a season of scarcity, and the Delphic oracle advised the Epidaurians to erect statues of the two statues of Auxesia and Damia, which were to be made of olive-wood. The Epidaurians therefore asked permission of the Athenians to cut down an Attic olive-tree. The request was granted, on condition that the Epidaurians should every year offer up sacrifices to Athena Agraulos and Erechtheus. When the condition was complied with, the country of Epidaurus again bore fruit as before. Now when about n. c. 540 Aegina separated itself from Epidaurus, which had till then been regarded as its metropolis, the Athenians asked the Epidaurians to make the same sacrifice in common with the Epidaurians, took away the two statues of Auxesia and Damia, and erected them in a part of their own island called Oea, where they offered sacrifices and celebrated mysteries. When the Epidaurians, in conseqvence of this, ceased to perform the sacrifices at Aigina and the Athenians heard of the statues being carried to Aegina, they demanded their surrender of the Aeginetans. The islanders refused, and the Athenians threw ropes round the sacred statues, to drag them away by force. But thunder and earthquakes ensued, and the Athenians engaged in the work were seized with madness, in which they killed one another. Only one of them escaped to carry back to Athens the sad tidings. The Aeginetans added to this legend, that the statues, while the Athenians were dragging them down, fell upon their knees, and that they remained in this attitude ever after. (Herod. v. 82-86; Paus. ii. 30 § 5; Hom. Hygn. in Cer. 122; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 10 § 4, note f., iv. 6 § 11, Aeginit, p. 171.) [L. S.] AXO (Ἀξός). 1. [HORAE.] 2. An ancient Attic divinity, who was worshipped, according to Pausanias (ix. 35 § 1), together with Hegemone, under the name of Charites. [CHARITES.] [L. S.]

AXOGENA GENS, plebeian, of which very little is known, as there are only two or three persons of this name mentioned by ancient writers. There is a coin of this gens bearing on the obverse the cognomen NASSO, and on the reverse the inscription L. Axios L. F. (Eckhel, v. p. 140): Axios being instead of Axius, in the same way as we find Maxumannus for Maximianus and Alexsandra for Alexandrea. We do not know who this L. Axios Nasso was; as the Axios mentioned by ancient writers have no cognomina. [AXIUS.]

AXTEROS (Ἀξτέρος), a daughter of Cadmus, and one of the three Samothracian Cabeiri. According to the Paris-Scholia on Apollonius (l. 915-921), she was the same as Demeter. The two other Cabeiri were Axioctera (Persephone), and Axioxenous (Hades). [CABERI.] [L. S.]

AXILLA, the name of a family of the Servilia gens, which is merely another form of AHALA. Axilla is a diminutive of Alai. [Comp. Cic. Orol. 45.] We have only one person of this name mentioned, namely,

C. SERVILIUS Q. F. C. N. (STRUCTUS) AXILLA, consular tribune in B.C. 419 and again in 418, in the latter of which he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas. This is the account of the Fasti Capitolini; but Livy calls the consular tribune in B.C. 418 only C. Servilius, and says that he was the son of the dictator Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas. He also tells us that some annals related, that the magister equitum was the son of the dictator, while others called him Servilius Ahala (Axilla). (Livy. iv. 45, 46.)

AXION (Αξίον). 1. A son of Phegun of Psophis, and brother of Tenemus and Arisinoe or Alphesiboeon. (Paus. viii. 24 § 4.) Apollodorus (iii. 7 § 5) calls the two sons of Phegun, Aenigor and Pronous. [AGENER, No. 5; ALGMARON, ACARMAN.] 2. A son of Prian, who was slain by Eurypylus, the son of Eumemon. (Hygin. Fab. 90; Paus. xii. 27.) [L. S.]

AXIONICUS (Ἀξιονίκος), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy. Some unimportant fragments of the following plays have been preserved by Athenaeus: the Τυφλός and Τυφλότητα (iv. p. 168, vi. p. 244); Φαένορδησα (iv. p. 175, viii. p.
AXIOPHENOS (Ἀξιόφηνος), a surname of Demeter and Persephone, which is derived either from ἀξιόορος.

yea κατάρτι, to dry fruits, or from ἀρίστος, to seek. [Zenob. iv. 20 ; Suid. s. v. ; Heuvel. s. v.; Spwinn. ad Callim, p. 740.] [L. S.]

AZEUS (Ἀζέος), a son of Clymenus of Orchomenos, was a brother of Erginus, Statius, Arrhon, and Pylius, father of Actor and grandfather of Astyoche. (Hom. R. ii. 513 ; Paus. ix. 37, § 2.) He went with his brothers, under the command of Erginus, the eldest, against Thebes, to take vengeance for the murder of his father, who had been slain by the Thebans at a festival of the Ochestian Poseidon. [ERGINUS, CLYMENUS.] [L. S.]

AZOBUS (Ἀζόβος), according to Hesychius (c. s. v. Κόλπος), is said to have built the Pelagonian town of Azoros. (Steph. Bryz. s. v.)

B.

BA'BILUS, an astrologer at Rome, in the reign of Nero (Suet. Ner. c. 36), is perhaps the same as Barbillus. [BARBILLUS.]

BABRIUS (Βαβρίος), or BABRIAS (Βαβρίας), sometimes also called GABRIUS (Γαβρίας), who is not a different person from Babrius, as Bentley supposed, a Greek poet, who after the example of Socrates turned the AESOP fables into verse. The emperor Julian (Ep. 96) is the first writer who mentions Babrius; but as some of Babrius's verses are quoted by Apollonius in his Homeric Lexicon (s. v. δαίμων), though without mentioning his name, he lived in all probability before the time of Augustus. [APOLLONIUS, No. 5.] This is in accordance with the account of Avianus, who speaks (Prof. 9) of Babrius before Phaedrus.

The work of Babrius, which was in Choliambic verses [see p. 47, h.], was called Μόδος καὶ Μοθέανδ, and was comprised in ten books according to Suidas (s. v. Βαβρίος), or two volumes (volumina) according to Avianus. His version, which is one of no ordinary merit, seems to have been the basis of all the AESOPean fables which have come down to us in various forms. Later writers of AESOPean fables, such as MAntiha Panaides, probably turned the poems of Babrius into prose, but they did it in so clumsy a manner, that many choliambic verses may still be traced in their fables, as Bentley has shewn in his dissertation on AESOP's fables. [AESOPUS, p. 48, a.] Bentley was the first writer who called the attention of the learned to this fact, which was proved still more clearly by Tyrwhitt in his dissertation "De Babrio, Fabularum AESOPeanorum Scriptoris," Lond. 1776, reprinted at Erlangen, 1785, ed. Harles. To this treatise Tyrwhitt added the fragments of Babrius, which were but few in number and chiefly taken from Suidas; but several of his complete poems have been discovered in a Florentine and Vatican MS., and were first published by de Purius under the title of "Fabulæ AESOPICÆ, quæ ante Plautum fæderunt," Flor. 1809. They have also been edited by J. Gl. Schneider, "Æsopi Fabulæ, cum Fabulis Babrii," Vratisl. 1812; by Berger, Babrii Æsopi μικροὶ χωριανικοί νεωταί διάλεξαι, &c., Monach. 1816; and by Knob, "Babrii Fabulæ et Fabularum Fragmenta," Halis Sax. 1835.

XIOPISTUS (Ἄξιοπιστός), a Locrian or Eorian, who was the author of a poem entitled xίαν καὶ πολίμπον, which was commonly ascribed to Epicarmus. (Athen. xiv. p. 468, d. e.)

AXIOPOENOS (Ἄξιόπονος), the avenger, a surname of Athena. Under this name Heracles had chastised Hippocoon and his sons for the surname of Athena. Under this name Heracles bestowed his name, he lived in all probability before the time of Augustus. [APOLLONIUS, No. 5.] This is in accordance with the account of Avianus, who speaks (Prof. 9) of Babrius before Phaedrus.

BABYS (Βαβυς). 1. The same according to HELLENECAUS (ap. Athen. xv. p. 689, a.) as the Egyptian Typhon. [TYPHON.]
2. The father of Pherecydes. (Strab. x. p. 467; Diog. Laer. i. 116. [PHERECYDES].

3. A flute-player, who gave occasion to the proverb against bad flute-players, "He plays worse than Bacchus." (Athen. xiv. p. 624, b.; comp. Zeno, iv. 81.)

BACCHAEIDAE (Bac'x€a'idi), of Sicyon, a dancer and teacher of music, in honour of whom there is an ancient epitaph of four lines preserved by Athenaeus. (xiv. p. 629, a.)

BACCHAEUS or BACCHI'US, of Miletus, the author of a work on agriculture (Var. R. H. i. 1), who is referred to by Piny as one of the sources of his Natural History. (Glencens, lib. xiii. xiv. xv. xvii. xviii.)

BACCHIUS (Ba'kéq), surnamed Senior (άγιος), the author of a short musical treatise in the form of a catechism, called ἀναγωγή μουσικής. We know nothing of his history. Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. ii. p. 260, &c.) gives a list of persons of the same name, and conjectures that he may have been the Bacchaeus mentioned by M. Aurelius Antoninus (de Robus suis, i. 6) as his first instructor. The treatise consists of brief and clear explanations of the principal subjects belonging to Harmonics and Rhythm. Bacchaeus reckons seven modes (pp. 12, 18), corresponding to the seven species of octave anciently called by the same names. Hence Meibomius (proef. in Arist. Quint.) supposes that he lived after Ptolemy, who adopts the same system, and before Manuel Bryennius, in whose time an eighth (the Hypermixolydian) had been added. But the former supposition does not seem to rest on satisfactory grounds.

The Greek text of Bacchaeus was first edited by Marinus Mersennus, in his Commentary on the first six chapters of Genesis. (Paris, 1623, fol., p. 1837.) It was also printed in a separate form, with a Latin version, by Frederic Morel, Paris, 1633, 8vo., and lastly by Meibomius, in the Antiq. Musicæ Ancestor Septem, Amst. 1652. An anonymous Greek epigram, in which Baccheius is mentioned, is printed by Meibomius in his preface, with a Latin version, by Frederic Morel, Paris, 1633, 8vo., and lastly by Meibomius, in the Antiq. Musicæ Ancestor Septem, Amst. 1652. An anonymous Greek epigram, in which Bacchaeus is mentioned, is printed by Meibomius in his preface, from the same manuscript which contained the text; also by Fabricius. (l.c.) [W. F. D.]

BACCHAEIUS (Ba'kéi'us), one of the earliest commentators on the writings of Hippocrates, was a native of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Erat. Gloss. Hippoc. p. 8.) He was a follower of Herophilus (Gal. Comment. in Hippoc. "Aphor." vii. 70, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 137, and a contemporary of Phyllus, and must therefore have lived in the third century n. c. Of his writings (which were both valuable and interesting) nothing remains but a few fragments preserved by Erotianus and Galen, by whom he is frequently mentioned. (Erat. Gloss. Hippoc. pp. 8, 32, 38, &c.; Gal. Comment. in Hippoc. "Epid. VI." i. proem. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 794; Comment. in Hippoc. "de Med. Oific." i. proem. vol. xviii. p. ii. p. 631.) [W. A. G.]

BACCHIADAE (Bac'xiadai), a Heracleid clan, derived their name from Bacchis, who was king of Corinth from 926 to 891 b. c. (Strabo. xiii. 1253, 1256; Müller. Dor. Append. i. note x.) It was indeed of too narrow and exclusive a kind to be of any very long duration; the members of the ruling clan intermarried only with one another (Herod. v. 92); and their downfall was moreover hastened by their excessive luxury (Ael. V. H. i. 19), as well as by their insolence and oppression, of which the atrocious outrage that drove Archias from Corinth, and led to the founding of Syracuse and Corcyra, is probably no very unfair specimen. (Diod. Ec. de Vitr. et. Vili. 220; Plut. Amat p. 772, c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1212.) On their deposition by Cypselus, with the help of the lower orders (Herod. v. 92; Aristot. Polit. v. 10, 12, ed. Bekk.), they were for the most part driven into banishment, and are said to have taken refuge in different parts of Greece, and even Italy. (Plut. Lycurg. c. 1; Liv. i. 34; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 366, &c.) Some of them, however, appear to have still remained at Corinth, if we may consider as a Bacchid the Hemided Philus, who led the colony to Epidaurus in a. c. 627. (Thuc. i. 24.) As men of the greatest distinction among the Bacchidae, may be mentioned Philolaus, the legislator of Thebes, about a. c. 728 (Aristot. Polit. ii. 12, ed. Bekk.), and Eumelus, the cyclic poet (Paus. ii. 3, iv. 33; Athen. i. p. 22, &c.; Schol. ad Pind. Olymp. xviii. 30; Mull. Hist. of Greek Lit. c. x. § 2.) Strabo tells us also (vi. p. 326), that the Lycasteid kings claimed descent from the Bacchidae. (B. E. v. 213.)

BACCHIDES (Ba'kéi), an eunuch of Mithridates. After the defeat of the latter by Lucullus, Mithridates in despair sent Bacchides to put his wives and sisters to death, n. c. 71. (Plut. Lucull. 18, &c.) Appian (Mith. 82) calls the eunuch Bacchus. The Bacchides, who was the governor of Sinope, at the time when this town was besieged by Lucullus, is probably the same as the above. (Strab. xiii. p. 346.)

BACCHUS. [DIONYSUS.]

BACCHYLIDES (Bac'hylidz), 1. One of the great lyric poets of Greece, was a native of Iulis in the island of Cees, and the nephew as well as fellow-townsmen of Simonides. (Strab. x. p. 426; Steph. Byz. s. v. Εουριάς.) His father is variously called either Bacchylides or Bucacondes. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Εουριάς.) Melion (Epigr. in novum Lyr. ap. Bechh. Schol. Pind. p. 8), or Meidylus (Steph. Byz. M. p. 582, 20) ; his paternal grandfather was the athlete Bacchylides. We know nothing of his life, except that he lived in the court of Hiero in Syracuse, together with Simonides and Pindar. (Aclian, V. iv. 15.) Eusebius makes him flourish in n. c. 450; but as Hiero died n. c. 467, and Bacchylides obtained great fame at his court, his poetical reputation must have been established as early as n. c. 470. The Scholiast on Pindar frequently states (ad Ol. ii. 154, 155, ad Pyth. ii. 131, 161, 165, 167, 171) that Bacchylides and Pindar were jealous of and opposed to one another; but whether this was the fact, or the story is to be attributed to the love of scandal which distinguishes the later Greek grammarians, it is impossible to determine.

The poems of Bacchylides were numerous and of various kinds. They consisted of Kpinici (songs, like Pindar's, in honour of the victors in the public games), Hymnus, Paschas, Dithyrambs, Prosodia, Hymnus, Erotica, and Paroenia or Drinking-songs: but all of these have perished with the exception of a few fragments. It is, therefore, difficult to form an independent opinion of their poetical value; but as far as we can judge from what has come down to us, Bacchylides was distinguished, like Simonides, for the elegance and finish of his compositions. He was inferior to his predecessors in Lyric poetry, and there seems no reason to doubt their genuine-ness. The fragments of Bacchylides have been published by Neue, "Bacchylidiae Cei Fragmenta," Berol. 1835, and by Börg, "Poëne Lyric Encracc," p. 620, &c.

2. Of Opus, a poet, whom Plato, the comic lished in the second volume of Muratori's Annales vol. vi. The treatise "de Fide" was first published in the Cologne edition, 1654, vol. iii.; in the Lyon's edition, 1677, vol. vi. The valuable, prolegomena and notes. In 1748, a manuscript of great antiquity, and is accompanied in the fifteenth volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum a voluminous collection in thirty-four volumes quarto, Madrid, 1747-84. From the scanty remains of this author it is hardly possible to form a very exact judgment of his character, learning, and abilities. So far as may be collected from the above-named treatises, he appears to have possessed an understanding somewhat above mediocrity, and well exercised in the current theological erudition of the Latin church during the fifth century. His spirit and temper seem to have been singularly amiable. [J. M. M.] L. Bacillus, praetor n. c. 48, to whom Caesar would not assign a province, but gave a sum of money instead. Bacillus felt the indignity so hard to bear, and thus quashed the investigation. (Dion Cass. xliii. 47.) It is conjectured that Babullius, whose death Cicero mentions in this year (ad Att. xiii. 48), may be the same as the above.

BACIS (Bacis), seems to have been originally only a common noun derived from ba- to speak, and to have signified any prophet or speaker. In later times, however, Bacis was regarded as a proper noun, and the ancients distinguish several seers of this name.

1. The Boeotian, the most celebrated of them, who lived and gave his oracles at Helicon in Boeotia, being inspired by the nymphs of the Corycian cave. His oracles were held in high esteem, and, from the specimens we still possess in Herodotus and Pausanias, we see that, like the Delphic oracles, they were composed in hexameter verse. (Paus. iv. 27, § 2, ix. 17, § 4, x. 12, § 6, 14, § 3, 32, § 6; Herod. viii. 20, 77, ix. 48; Aristoph. Pax, 1009 with the Schol., Euph. 123, Av. 907.) From these passages it seems evident, that in Boeotia Bacis was regarded as an ancient prophet, of whose oracles there existed a collection made either by himself or by others, similar to the Sibyline books at Rome; and, in fact, Cicero (de Divin. i. 18), Aelian (V. H. xii. 29), Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 1278), and other writers, mention this Bacis always as a being of the same class with the Sibyls.

2. The Aegyptian, is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria as the only one besides the Boeotian. (Strom. i. p. 333.) According to Suidas, he belonged to the town of Caphya, and was also called Cydias and Alcetas. (Comp. Tzetzes, ad Lycoph. i. 4.)

3. The Athenian, is mentioned along with the two others by Aelian, Suidas, Tzetzes, and the Scholastix on Aristophanes. (Pax, 1009; comp. Perizon. ad Aelian. V. H. xii. 25.) [L. S.]

BACIS or PACIS, is only another name for the Egyptian Omphis, the sacred bull, who was worshipped at Hermouthis in Upper Egypt, just as Apis was at Memphis. In size Bacis was required to excel all other bulls, his hair to be bristly, and his colour to change every day. (Macrob. Sat. i. 21; Aelian, Hist. An. xii. 11.) [L. S.]

BADIUS, a Campanian, challenged his master T. Quinctius Crispinus, to single combat when the Romans were besiegling Capua, n. c. 212. Crispinus at first refused, on account of the friendship subsisting between him and Badius, but was at length induced by his fellow-soldiers to accept the challenge. In the combat which ensued, he wounded Badius, who fled to his own party. (Liv. xxv. 18; Val. Max. v. 1. § 3.)

BADRES (Badrpi), or BARIES (Badii), a Persian, of the tribe of the Pasargadae, was appointed to the command of the naval portion of the force which Aryandes, governor of Egypt, sent against the Barcens on the pretext of avenging the murder of Arscyllus III. [Battiadak.] After the capture of Barca (about 512 n. c.), the Persians were allowed to pass through Cyrene, and Badius was anxious to take the city; but through the refusal of Amasia, who commanded the land force, the opportunity was lost. (Herod. iv. 167, 203.) This is perhaps the same Badius whom Herodotus mentions as commanding a portion of the Persian army in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. (Herod. vii. 77.) [E. K.]

BAEBIA GENS, plebeian, of which the cognomina are dives, herrninus (see Liv. xxiii. 34), sulca, Tamphilius: is the last is only surname which appears on coins, where it is written Tamphilus. (Eckhel, v. p. 149.) The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was Cn. Baebius Tamphilus, in n. c. 182. For those whose cognomina is not mentioned, see BAEBIIUS.

BAEBIDIUS. 1. L. Baebius, one of the ambassadors sent by Scipio to Carthage, n. c. 202. He was afterwards left by Scipio in command of the camp. (Liv. xxx. 25; Polyb. xvi. i. 4.)

2. Q. Baebius, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 200, endeavoured to persuade the people not to engage in the war against Philip of Macedon. (Liv. xxxi. 6.)

3. M. Baebius, one of the three commissioners sent into Macedonia, n. c. 186, to investigate the charges brought by the Mardonitac and others against Philip of Macedon. (Polyb. xxxiii. 6.)

4. L. Baebius, one of the three commissioners sent into Macedonia, n. c. 168, to inspect the state of affairs there, before Aemilius Paullus invaded the country. (Liv. xlv. 18.)

5. A. Baebius, caused the members of the Aetolian senate to be killed in n. c. 167, and was in consequence afterwards condemned at Rome. Livy calls him praesidem, a term which is applied in later times by the jurists to a governor of a province. Whether, however, Baebius had the government of Aetolia, or only of the town in which the murder was perpetrated, is uncertain. (Liv. xliii. 31.)

6. C. Baebius, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 111, was bribed by Jugurtha when the latter came to Rome. When Nummias commanded Jugurtha to give answers to certain questions, Baebius bore him so silent, and thus quashed the investigation. (Sall. Jug. 23, 34.)

7. C. Baebius was appointed by L. Caesar (called Sext. Caesar by Appian), n. c. 89, as his successor in the command in the social war. (Appian, B. C. i. 48.)
8. M. BAEBIUS was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome in B. C. 87. Instead of being killed by any weapon, Baebius was literally torn to pieces by the hands of his enemies. (Appian, B. C. i. 72; Florus, iii. 21; Lucan, ii. 119.)

9. M. BAEBIUS, a brave man, slain by order of L. Piso in Macedonia, B. C. 57. (Cic. in Piso 36.)

10. A. BAEBIUS, a Roman eques of Asta in Spain, deserted the Pompeian party in the Spanish war, and went over to Caesar, B. C. 45. (Bell. Hisp. 26.)

11. BAEBIUS, a Roman senator, served under Vatinius in Illyria. On the murder of Caesar, B. C. 44, the Illyrians rose against Vatinius, and cut off Baebius and five cohorts which he commanded. (Appian, Mor. 13.)

BAEBIUS MARCELLINUS. [MARCELLINUS.]

BAETON (Balro/v), was employed by Alexander the Great in measuring distances in his marches, where he is called άδέλετδον δηματίτης, who wrote a work upon the subject entitled έσταθι τήν 'Αδέλετδον πολετα. (Athen. x. p. 422, b.; Plin. H. N. vi. 17, s. 21, 19, s. 22, 22; Solin. 55.)

BAETYLOS (Balro/vos), is in reality the name of a peculiar kind of conical shaped stones, which were erected as symbols of gods in remarkable places, and were from time to time anointed with oil, wine, or blood. The custom of setting up such stones originated, in all probability, in meteors or meteor-like bodies such as stones, or even large blocks of rock, which were transported and cast down by storms. BAH'TYLUS (BaruAos), is in reality the name of a third part of the Greek mercenaries. (Diod. xvi. 47.)

2. Or Bagoas (Baya'sacus?), a half-brother of the satrap Pharnabazus, is mentioned by Xenophon as one of the commanders of a body of Persian cavalry, which, in a skirmish near Duscyllium, defeated the cavalry of Agesilaus, in the first year of his invasion of Asia, B. C. 396. (Xen. Hel. iii. 4. § 13; Plut. Aeg. 8.)

BAGI STANES (Bauo'stur'stun's), a distinguished Greek warrior, with Bagoas and Bessus and the conspirators, when Alexander was in pursuit of them and Dareius, B. C. 330, and informed Alexander of the danger of the Persian king. (Arrian, ii. 21; Curt. v. 13.)

remarkable beauty. Alexander was passionately fond of him, and is said to have kissed him public- ly in the theatre on one occasion. (Curt. vi. 5, x. 1; Plut. Alex. 67; Athen. xiii. p. 603, b.)

3. A general of Tigranes or Mithridates, who together with Midmus expelled Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia in n. c. 92. (Appian, Mithr. 10; comp. Justin, xxxviii. 3.)

The name Bagaeus frequently occurs in Persian history. According to Pliny (H. N. xiii. 9), it was the Persian word for an eunuch; and it is sometimes used by Latin writers as synonymous with an eunuch. (Comp. Quintil. v. 12; Ov. Am. ii. 2. 1.)

BALGO/PHANES, the commander of the citadel at Babylon, who surrendered it and all the royal treasures to Alexander after the battle of Guagamela, n. c. 331. (Curt. v. 1.)

BALGRACUS (BdAexopos). 1. The son of Nicander, one of Alexander's body-guard, was appointed satrap of Cilicia after the battle of Issus, n. c. 333. (Arrian, ii. 12.) He fell in battle against the Persians in the lifetime of Alexander. (Diod. xviii. 22.) It was probably this Balgracus who married Phila, the daughter of Antipater, and subsequently the wife of Craterus. (Phot. p. 111. b. 3, ed. Bekker.)

2. The son of Amyntas, obtained the command of the allies in Alexander's army, when Antigonus was appointed satrap of Phrygia, n. c. 334. After the occupation of Egypt, n. c. 331, he was one of the generals left behind in that country with a part of the army. (Arrian, i. 30, iii. 5; Curt. viii. 11.)

3. The commander of the javelin-throwers (deour- tata) in the army of Alexander the Great. (Arrian, iii. 12, iv. 4, 24.)

BALGARUS (BdAexopos), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work on Macedonia (Ma- xe- donia) in two books at least. (Steph. Byz. s. v. *Αριθμός, *Ολυμπίας, Αρηρίδικος.)

BALANUS, a Gaulish prince beyond the Alps, who sent ambassadors offering to assist the Romans in their Macedonian war, b. c. 169. (Liv. xlv. 14.)

BALAS. [ALEXANDER BALAS, p. 114.]

BALBATIUS, who was in Spain, n. c. 44 (Cic. ad Att. xv. 18), is conjectured by Monge to be a diminutive of Cornelius Balbus, the younger, a friend of Cicero's, but this is very improbable.

C. BALBILLUS, governor of Egypt in the reign of Nero, a. d. 55 (Tac. Ann. xiii. 22), and a man of great learning, wrote a work respecting Egypt and his journeys in that country. (Senec. Quest. Nat. iv. 2; Phil. H. N. xix. proem.)

BALBINUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, but restored with Sec. Pompeius in n. c. 39, and subsequently advanced to the consul- ship. (Appian, iv. 50.) No other author but Appian, and none of the Fasti, mention a consul of this name; but as we learn from Appian that Balbinus was consul in the year in which the consularship of the younger Aeolines Lepidus was detected by Museus, that is n. c. 30, it is conjectured that Balbinus may be the cognomen of L. Saenius, who was consul suffectus in that year.

BALBINUS. When intelligence reached Rome that the elder Gordian and his son had both perished in Africa, and that the savage Maximin, thirsting for vengeance, was advancing towards Italy at the head of a powerful army, the senate resolved upon elevating two rulers with equal power, one of whom should remain in the city to direct the civil administration, while the other should march against Maximin. The choice fell upon Decimus Caecilius Balbinus and Marcus Claudius Pupienus Maximus, both consuls who were stricken in years, the one a sagacious statesman, the other a bold soldier and an able general. Balbinus, who was of noble birth, and traced his descent from Cornelius Balbus of Cadiz, the friend of Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar, had governed in succession the most important among the peaceful provinces of the empire. He was celebrated as one of the best orators and poets of the age, and had gained the esteem and love of all ranks. Maximus, on the other hand, was of lowly origin, the son, according to some, of a blacksmith, according to others, of a cook-maker. He had acquired great renown as an imperial legate by his victories over the Saracens in Illyria and the Germans on the Rhine, had been eventually appointed prefect of the city, and had discharged the duties of that office with a remarkable firmness and strictness.

The populace, still clinging with affection to the family of Gordian, and dreading the severity of Maximus, refused for a while to ratify the decision of the senate, and a serious tumult arose, which was not quelled until the grandson of Gordian, a boy of fourteen, was presented to the crowd and proclaimed Caesar. While Pupienus was hastening to encounter Maximin, now under the walls of Aquileia, a formidable strife broke out at Rome between the citizens and the praetorians. The camp of the praetorians was closely invested, and they were reduced to great distress in consequence of the supply of water being cut off, but in retaliation they made desperate sallies, in which whole regions of the town were burned or reduced to ruins. These disorders were repressed for a time by the glad tidings of the destruction of Maximin, and all parties joined in welcoming with the most lively demonstrations of joy the united armies and their triumphant chief. But the calm was of short duration. The hatred existing between the praetorians and the populace had been only smothered for a while, not extinguished; the soldiers of all ranks, generally lamented that they had lost a prince chosen by themselves, and were obliged to submit to those nominated by the civil power. A conspiracy was soon organized by the guards. On a day when public attention was engrossed by the exhibition of the Capitoline games, a strong band of soldiers forced their way into the palace, seized the two emperors, stripped them of their royal robes, dragged them through the streets, and finally put them to death.

The chronology of this brief reign is involved in much difficulty, and different historians have contracted or extended it to periods varying from twenty-two days to two years. The statements of ancient writers are so irreconcilable, that we have no sure resource except medals; but, by studying carefully the evidence which these afford, we may repose with considerable confidence on the conclusion of Eckhel, that the accession of Balbinus and Maximus took place about the end of April, a. d. 238, and their death before the beginning of August in the same year.

We ought to notice here a remarkable innovation which was introduced in consequence of the circumstances attending the election of these princes, BALBUS.

Up to this period, although several individuals had enjoyed at the same time the appellation of Augustus, it had been held as an inviolable maxim of the constitution, that the office of chief pontiff did not admit of division, and could be vacated by death only. But the senate, in this case, anxious to preserve perfect equality between the two emperors, departed from a rule scrupulously observed from the earliest ages, and invested both with the office and appellation of Pontifex Maximus. The precedent thus established was afterwards generally followed; colleagues in the empire became generally, as a matter of course, colleagues in the chief priesthood; and when pretenders to the purple arose at the same time in different parts of the world, they all assumed the title among their other designations.

COIN OF BALBUS.

BALBUS, a family-name in several gentes. It was originally a surname given to some one who had an impediment in his speech.

I. Acilius Balbus, plebeian.
1. M. Acilius L. f. K. n. Balbus, consul B. C. 60. (Cic. de Suet. 5, ad Att. xii. 5; Plin. H. N. ii. 96.)
2. M. Acilius M. f. L. n. Balbus, consul B. C. 114. (Obsequ. 97; Plin. H. N. ii. 29, 56, s. 57.) It is doubtful to which of the Acilii Balbi the annexed coin is to be referred. The obverse has the inscription BA(L)BVls, with the head of Pallas, before which is X. and beneath ROMA, the whole within a laurel garland. On the reverse we have MV. ACIL, with Jupiter and Victory in a quadriga.

II. T. Ampius Balbus, plebeian, tribune of the plebs B. C. 63, proposed, in conjunction with his colleague T. Labienus, that Pompey, who was then absent from Rome, should, on account of his Asiatic victories, be allowed to wear a laurel-crown and all the insignia of a triumph in the Circensian games, and also a laurel crown and the praetexta in the scenic games. (Vell. Pat. ii. 40.) He failed in his first attempt to obtain theaedileship, although he was supported by Pompey (Schol. Bob. pro Plauto. p. 527, ed. Orelli); but he appears to have been praetor in B. C. 59, as we find that he was governor of Cilicia in the following year. (Comp. Cic. ad Pom. i. 3.) On the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49, he sided with the Pompeian party, and took an active part in the levy of troops at Capua. (Ad Att. viii. 11.) He no doubt left Italy with the rest of his party, for we find him in the next year endeavouring to obtain money by plundering the temple of Diana in Ephesus, which he was prevented from doing only by the arrival of Caesar. (Caes. B. C. iii. 165.) Balbus was one of those who was banished by Caesar; but he afterwards obtained his pardon through the intercession of his friend Cicero (comp. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 70), who wrote him a letter on the occasion, B. C. 46. (Ad Fam. vi. 12.) Balbus appears to have written some work on the history of his times; for Suetonius (Caes. 77) quotes some remarks of Caesar's from a work of T. Ampius. Balbus was also mentioned in the fourth book of Varro "De Vita Populi Romani." (Varr. Progn. p. 249, ed. Bip.)

III. Q. Antonius Balbus, plebeian, is supposed to be the same as Q. Antonius who was praetor in Sicily in B. C. 82 and was killed by L. Philippus, the legate of Sulla. (Liv. Epit. 86.) The annexed coin was struck either by, or in honour of, this Balbus. The obverse represents the head of Jupiter; the reverse is Q. A(n)yro. BA(L)BVs. Prx. with Victory in a quadriga.

IV. M. Atius Balbus, plebeian, of Aricia, married Julia, the sister of Julius Caesar, who bore him a daughter, Atia, the mother of Augustus Caesar. (Atia.) He was praetor in B. C. 62, and obtained the government of Sardinia, as we learn from the annexed coin (copied from the Theasur. Morell.), of which the reverse is ATTUS BALBUS PR., with the head of Balbus; and the obverse, SARD PATH, with the head of Sardus, the father or mythical ancestor of the island. In B. C. 59, Balbus was appointed one of the vigintiviri under the Julian law for the division of the land in Campania; and, as Pompey was a member of the same board, Balbus, who was not a person of any importance, was called by Cicero in joke Pompey's colleague. (Suet. Oct. 4, Phil. iii. 6, ad Att. ii. 4.)

V. Cornelius Balbis, plebeian. The Cornelii Balbi were, properly speaking, no part of the Cornelia gens. The first of this name was not a Roman; he was a native of Gades; and his original name probably bore some resemblance in sound to the Latin Balbus. The reason why he assumed the name of Cornelius is mentioned below. (No. 1.)

I. L. Cornelius Balbus, sometimes called Major to distinguish him from his nephew [No. 3], was a native of Gades, and descended from an illustrious family in that town. Gades, being one of the federate cities, supported the Romans in their war against Sertorius in Spain, and Balbus thus had an opportunity of distinguishing himself. He served under the Roman generals, Q. Metellus Pius, C. Lentulus, and Pompey, and was present at the battles of Turia and Sucro. He distinguished himself so much throughout the war, that Pompey conferred the Roman citizenship upon him, his brother, and his brother's sons; and this act of Pompey's was ratified by the law of the consuls, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Gellius, b.c. 72. (Cic. pro Balb. 8.) It was probably in honour of these consuls that Balbus took the gentile name of the one and the praenomen of the other; though some modern writers suppose that he derived his name from L. Cornelius, consul in b.c. 199, who was the hospes of the inhabitants of Gades. (Pro Balb. 18.)

At the conclusion of the war with Sertorius, b.c. 72, Balbus removed to Rome. He obtained admission into the Crustuminian tribe by accusing a member of this tribe of bribery, and thus gaining the place which the guilty party forfeited on conviction. Balbus had doubtless brought with him considerable wealth from Gades, and supported by the powerful interest of Pompey, whose friendship he assiduously cultivated, he soon became a man of great influence and importance. One of Pompey's intimate friends, the Greek Theophaernes of Mytilene, adopted him; and Pompey himself shewed him marks of favour, which not a little offended the Roman nobles, who were indignant that a man of Gades should be preferred to them. Among other presents which Pompey made him, we read of a grant of land for the purpose of pleasure-grounds. But Balbus was too prudent to confine himself to a grant of land, and a great part of the Gallic booty passed through his hands. But his increasing wealth and influence and the pecuniary affaire of his friend, the consul Cornelius Lentulus, who was one of Pompey's partisans; but his neutrality was scarcely disguised. It is true that he did not appear against Pompey in the field, but all his exertions were employed to promote Caesar's interests. He was especially anxious to gain over Cicero, with whom he had corresponded before the breaking out of the civil war. Knowing the weak side of Cicero, he had first requested him to act the mediator between Caesar and Pompey, and afterwards pressed him to come to Rome, which would have been tantamount to a declaration in Caesar's favour. Cicero, after a good deal of hesitation, eventually left Italy, but returned after the battle of Pharsalia (b.c. 48), when he re-opened his correspondence with Balbus, and requested him to use his good offices to obtain Caesar's pardon for him. During all this time, Balbus, in conjunction with Oppius, had the entire management of Caesar's affairs at Rome; and we see, from Cicero's letters, that Balbus was now regarded as one of the chief men in the state. He seems, however, to have used his good fortune with moderation, and never to have been deserted by the prudence which had always been one of his chief characteristics. We are therefore disposed to reject the tale, which is related only by Suetonius (Ces. 70) and Plutarch (Ces. 69), that Balbus prevented Caesar from rising to receive the senate on his return from the Spanish war, in b.c. 45.

On the murder of Caesar in March, 44, Balbus was placed in a somewhat critical position. He retired from the city, and spent two months in the country, and was one of the first who hastened to meet young Octavius at Neapolis. During this time, he frequently saw Cicero, who believed that his professions to Octavius were hollow, and that he was in reality the friend of Antony. In this, however, Cicero was mistaken; Balbus, whose good fortune it always was to attach himself to the winning party, accompanied Octavius to Rome, and was subsequently advanced by him to the highest offices in the state. It is uncertain in what year he was praetor; but his praetorship is commemorated in the annexed coin of Octavius (copied from the Thesaur. Morel.), which contains on the obverse G. CASSAR. IVIR. R. P. C. with the head of Octavius, and on the reverse BALBUS PRO PR. He obtained the consulate in b.c. 40, the first instance, according to Pliny (H. N. vii. 43. s. 44), in which this honour had been conferred upon one who was not born a Roman citizen. The year of his death is unknown. In his will he left every Roman citizen twenty decennaria spes (Dio Cass. xlviii. 32), which would seem to shew that he had no children, and that consequently the emperor Balbinus could not be, as he pretended, a lineal descendant from him.

Balbus was the author of a diary (Epitomaria) which has not come down to us, of the most remendous barons of the Gallic war should be continued; and we accordingly find the eighth book dedicated to Gades, and received the Roman franchise along afterwards, either in Gades or Rome.

25.) He must not be confounded, as he has been by Pighius, with L. Turius who is mentioned in Cicero's "Philippics," and for his services in these wars, Caesar made him pontiff; and it is therefore probably this Cornelius Lentulus, who was an old friend of his uncle's, to persuade him to return to Rome. Balbus undertook the same dangerous commission in the following year, and paid Lentulus a visit in the Pompeian camp at Dyrrhachium, but he was not successful either time. Balbus served under Caesar in the Alexandrian and Spanish wars, during which time he kept up a correspondence with Cicero, with whom he had become acquainted through his uncle. In return for his services in these wars, Caesar made him pontiff; and it is therefore probably this Cornelius Balbus who wrote a work on the Roman sacra, of which the eighteenth book is quoted by Macrobius. (Sat., iii. 6.) In n. c. 44 and 43, Balbus was one of the exponents of the Stoic philosophy, as it is called the new city, and built a docks, and the place received in consequence the name of Didyma or double-city. (Strab. iii. p. 169.) Balbus, like his uncle, had amassed a large fortune; and, as Augustus was anxious to adorn Rome with public buildings, Balbus erected at his own expense a theatre in the city, which was remarkable on account of its containing four pillars of onyx. It was dedicated in n. c. 13, with festive games, on the return of Augustus to Rome; and as a compliment to Balbus for having built it, his opinion was asked first in the senatus by Tiberius, who was consul in that year. (Dion Cass. liv. 25; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7, c. 12.) After this we hear nothing farther of Balbus. He may have been the Cornelius Balbus whom L. Valerius made his heir, although he had involved Valerius in many law-suits, and had at last bought a capital charge against him. (Val. Max. vii. 8, § 7.) (For further information respecting the Cornelli Balbi, see Orelli's "Onomasticon Tulliano" and Drummann's "Rom.," vol. ii. p. 594, &c.)

VI. Domitius Balbus, a wealthy man of praetorian rank, whose will was forged in a. d. 61. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40.)

VII. Lucillii Balbi.

1. D. Labe. D. P. D. N. Balbus, one of the quinquemarii who superintended the celebration of the sacred games in b. c. 17 (Fast. Capitol.), and consul in b. c. 6. (Dion Cass. l. 9.)

2. Labe. L. Balbus, accused Acutia, formerly the wife of P. Vitellius, of treason (magistratus), but was unable to obtain the usual reward after her condemnation, in consequence of the intercession of the tribune Junius Otho. He was condemned in a. d. 37 as one of the paramours of Albina, deprived of his senatorial rank, and banished to an island; his condemnation gave general satisfaction, as he had been ever ready to accuse the innocent. (Tac. Ann. vi. 47, 48.)

VIII. Lucillii Balbi.

1. L. Lucillius Balbus, the jurist. See below.

2. Q. Lucillius Balbus, probably the brother of the preceding, a Stoic philosopher, and a pupil of Panaetius, had made such progress in the Stoic philosophy, that he appeared to Cicero comparable to the best Greek philosophers. (De Nat. Deor. l. 6.) He is introduced by Cicero in his dialogue "On the Nature of the Gods" as the expositor of the opinions of the Stoics on that subject, and his arguments are represented as of considerable weight. (De Nat. Deor. vii. 40, de Divin. l. 6.) He was also the exponent of the Stoic opinions in Cicero's "Hortensius." (Fragm. p. 484, ed. Orelli.)

IX. L. Naevius Balbus, plebeian, one of the quinquemarii appointed in b. c. 171 to settle the dispute between the Piamini and Lunenses respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Liv. xlv. 13.) The annexed coin of the Naevius gens belongs to this family. The obverse represents a head of Venus, the reverse is C. Naev. Balba, with Victory in a chariot.

X. Nonius Balbus, plebeian, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 32, put his veto upon the decree which the senate would have passed against Octavius at the instigation of the consul C. So- sius, a partisan of Antony. (Dion Cass. l. 2.)

XI. Octavius Balbus. See below.

XII. Thorii Balbi, plebeians.

1. C. Thorius Balbus, of Lanuvium, is said by Cicero to have lived in such a manner, that there was not a single pleasure, however refined and rare, which he did not enjoy. (De Fin. ii. 20.) He must not be confounded, as he has been by Pighius, with L. Turius who is mentioned in Cicero's Brutus (c. 67). The annexed coin of L. Thorius Balbus contains on the obverse the head of Juno Sospita, whose worship was of great anti-
BALBUS.

2. SP. THORIUS BALBUS, tribune of the plebs about b.c. 111, was a popular speaker, and introduced in his tribuneship an agrarian law, of which considerable fragments have been discovered on bronze tablets, and of which an account is given in the Dict. of Ant. s. v. Thoria Lex. (Cic. Brut. iii. 70; Appian, B. C. i. 27.)

BALBUS, JUNIUS, a consular, husband of Metia Faustina, the daughter of the elder Gordian. (Capitolin. c. 4.) According to some historians, the third Gordian, who succeeded Balbinus and Pupienus Maximus, was the issue of this marriage, while others maintain that he was the son of Gordian the second. [GORDIANUS.] [W. R.]

BALBUS, L. LUCILIUS, a Roman jurist, one of the pupils of Q. Mucius Scaevola, and one of the legal instructors of the eminent lawyer and distinguished friend of Cicero, Servius Sulpicius Rufus. He was probably the father of Lucilius, the companion of Appius Pulcher in Cilicia (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4), and the brother of Q. Lucilius Balbus, the Stoic philosopher. [BALBUS, No. VIII.] Cicero (de OraL iii. 21) speaks of the duo Ballus as Stoics. By Heinecciut (Hist. Jur. Rom. § 149) and others the jurist Lucilius has been confounded with Quintus the Stoic philosopher. The jurist was occasionally quoted in the works of Sulpicius; and, in the time of Pompomius, his writings did not exist in a separate form, or, at least, were in the hands of few. (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 42.) He was a man of much learning. In giving advice and pleading causes his manner was slow and deliberate. (Cic. Brut. 42, pro Quint. 16. 17.)

BALBUS, L. (pr. p.) OCTAVIUS, a Roman, contemporary with Cicero. He was remarkable for his skill in law, and for his attention to the duties of justice, morality, and religion. (Cic. pro Client. 36.) For these reasons he bore a high character as a judex in public as well as private trials. There is a passage in Cicero (in Ver. ii. 12) in relation to L. Octavius Balbus, which has been misinterpreted and corrupted by commentators and critics ignorant of the Roman forms of pleading. Cicero accuses Verres of having directed an issue of fact in such an improper form, that even L. Octavius, if he had been appointed to try it, would have been obliged to adjudge the defendant in the cause either to give up an estate of his own to the plaintiff, or to pay pecuniary damages. The perfect acquaintances with Roman law, and the knowledge of his duty which Balbus possessed, would have compelled him to pass an unjust sentence. To understand the compliment, it is necessary toremark, that in the time of Cicero a judex in a private cause was appointed for the occasion merely, and that his functions rather resembled those of a modern English juryman than those of a judge. It was his duty to try a given question, and according to his finding, sentence was to be pronounced; the sentence of condemnation or acquittal contained in the formula directed to him by the praetor. It was not his duty but the praetor's to determine whether the question was material, and whether the sentence was made to depend upon it in a manner consistent with justice. In the ordinary form of Roman action for the recovery of a thing, as in the English action of detinue, the judgment for the plaintiff was not directly that the thing should be restored, but the defendant was condemned, unless it were restored, to pay damages. The remainder of the chapter has been equally misinterpreted and corrupted. It accuses Verres of so shaping the formula of trial, that the judex was obliged to treat a Roman as a Sicilian, or a Sicilian as a Roman.

The death of Octavius Balbus is related by Valerius Maximus (v. 7. § 3) as a memorable example of paternal affection. Prescribed by the trunvirs Augustus, Antony, and Lepidus, b. c. 42, he had already made his escape from his house, when a false report reached his ears that the soldiers were massacring his son. Thereupon he returned to his house, and was consoled, by witnessing his son's safety, for the violent death to which he thus offered himself.

The phenomenon of Balbus is doubtful. In Cic. pro Cluent. 33 most of the MSS. have P.; in Cic. in Ver. ii. 12 the common reading is L. [J. T. G.]

BALDUINUS I. (BALDOUINUS), BALDWIN, the first Latin emperor of Constantinople, was the son of Baldwin, count of Hainaut, and Marguerite, countess of Flanders. He was born at Valenciennes in 1171, and after the death of his parents inherited both the counties of Hainaut and Flanders. He was one of the most powerful among those warlike barons who took the cross in 1200, and arrived at Venice in 1202, whence they intended to sail to the Holy Land. They changed their plan at the supplication of prince Alexis Angelus, the son of the emperor Isaac II. Angelus, who was gone to Venice for the purpose of persuading the crusaders to attack Constantinople and release Isaac, who had been deposed, blinded, and imprisoned by his brother Alexis Angelus, who reigned as Alexis III. from the year 1165. The crusaders listened to the promises of young Alexis, who was chiefly supported by Baldwin of Flanders, as he is generally called; and they left Venice with a powerful fleet, commanded by the doge of Venice, Dandolo, who was also commander-in-chief of the whole expedition. The various incidents and the final result of this bold undertaking are given under ALEXIS III., IV., and V. The usurper Alexis III. was driven out by the crusaders; prince Alexis and his father Isaac succeeded him on the throne; both perished by the usurper Alexis V. Duas Murzuphiliis; and Murzuphilius in his turn was driven out and put to death by the crusaders in 1204. During this remarkable war Baldwin distinguished himself by his military skill as well as by his personal character, the heat of the contest having resolved to choose one of their own body emperor of the East, their choice fell upon Baldwin.

Baldwin was accordingly crowned emperor at

BALDUNUS.
Constantinople, on the 9th of May, 1204. But he received only a very small part of the empire, namely Constantinople and the greater part of Thrace; the Venetians obtained a much greater part, consisting chiefly of the islands and some parts of Epirus; Boniface, marquis of Monteferrat, received Thessalonica, that is Macedonia, as a kingdom; and the rest of the empire, in Asia as well as in Europe, was divided among the French, Flemish, and Venetian chiefs of the expedition. The speedy ruin of the new Latin empire in the East was not doubtful under such divisions; it was hastened by the successful enterprises of Alexis Comnenus at Trebizond, of Theodore Lascaris at Nicea, and by the partial revolts of the Greek subjects of the conquerors. Simeon of Bulgaria supported the revolters, who succeeded in making themselves masters of Adrianople. Baldwin laid siege to this town; but he was attacked by Cdlomax, entirely defeated on the 14th of April, 1205, and taken prisoner. He died in captivity about a year afterwards. Many fables have been invented with regard to the nature of his death: Nicetas (Urb. Cap. 16) says, that Cdlomax ordered the limbs of his imperial prisoner to be cut off, and the mutilated body to be thrown into a field, where it remained three days before life left it. But from the accounts of the Latin writers, these statements have been carefully examined by Gibbon, and other eminent modern historians; we must conclude, that although Baldwin died in captivity, he was neither tortured nor put to death by his victor. The successor of Baldwin I. was his brother Henry I. (Nicetas, Alex. Isaaciucis Ang. Fr. iii. 9, Alex. Ducis Muranopodis, i. 1, Urb. Cap. 1-17; Acropolita, 8, 12; Nicephorus Gregor. ii. 3, &c.; Villehardouin, De la Conqueste de Constantinoble, ed. Paulin Paris, 1838.)

BALDUINUS II. (Balduin), the last Latin emperor of the east, was descended from the noble family of Courtenay, and was the son of Peter I. of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople, and the empress Yolanda, countess of Flanders. He was born in 1217, and succeeded his brother, Robert, in 1228, but, on account of his youth, was put under the guardianship of John of Brienne, count de la Marche and king of Jerusalem. The empire was in a dangerous position, being attacked in the south by Vatatzes, the Greek emperor of Nicea, and in the north by Assan, king of Bulgaria, who in 1234 concluded an alliance with Vatatzes and laid siege to Constantinople by sea and land. Until then the regent had done very little for his ward and the realm, but when the enemy appeared under the walls of the capital the danger roused him to energy, and he compelled the besiegers to withdraw after having sustained severe losses. John of Brienne died soon afterwards. In 1237 Vatatzes and Assan once more laid siege to Constantinople, which was defended by Gusbiry de Villehardouin, prince of Achaia, while the emperor made a mendicant visit to Europe. Begging for assistance, he appeared successively at the courts of France, England, and Italy, and was exposed to humiliations of every description; he left his son Philip at Venice as a security for a debt. At last he succeeded in gaining the friendship of Louis IX., king of France, of the emperor Frederic II., and of Pope Gregory IX., among whom Louis IX. was the most useful to him. The French king gave the unhappy emperor a large sum of money and other assistance, in return for which Baldwin permitted the king to keep several most holy relics. With the assistance of the Latins, Baldwin obtained some advantages over Vatatzes, and in 1243 concluded an alliance with the Turks Seljukus; but notwithstanding this, he was again compelled to seek assistance among the western princes. He was present at the council of Lyon in 1245, and returned to Greece after obtaining some feeble assistance, which was of no avail against the forces of Michael Palaeologus, who had made himself master of the Nicaean empire. On the night of the 15th of July, 1261, Constantinople was taken by surprise by Michael Palaeologus. Simeon of Bulgaria permitted the revolters, who succeeded in making themselves masters of Adrianople. Baldwin fled to Italy. In 1270 he nearly persuaded Charles, king of Naples, to fit out a new expedition against Michael Palaeologus, and Louis IX. of France promised to second him in the undertaking; but the death of Louis in Tunis deterred the Latin princes from any new expedition against the East. Baldwin II. died in 1275, leaving a son, Philip of Courtenay, by his wife Maria, the daughter of John of Brienne. The Latin empire in the East had lasted fifty-seven years. (Acropolita, 14, 27, 37, 78, 85, &c.; Pachymarches, Michael Palaeologus, iii. 31, &c., iv. 29; Nicephorus Gregor. iv. 4, &c., viii. 2, &c.)

BALE'RICUS, an agnomen of Q. Caccilius Metellus, consul c. 128. [METELLUS.]

BALISTA, one of the thirty tyrants of Trebellius Pollio. [AUDRÖLUS.] He was prefect of the praetorians under Valerian, whom he accompanied to the East. After the defeat and capture of that emperor, when the Persians had penetrated into Cilicia, a body of Roman troops rallied and placed themselves under the command of Balista. Led by him, they raised the siege of Pompeipolis, cut off numbers of the enemy who were straggling in disorderly confidence over the face of the country, and retook a vast quantity of plunder. His career after the destruction of Macrianus, whom he had urged to rebel against Gallicus, is very obscure. According to one account, he retired to an estate near Daphne; according to another, he assumed the purple, and maintained a precarious dominion over a portion of Syria and the adjacent provinces for three years. This assertion is however based on no good foundation, resting as it does on the authority of certain medals now universally recognised as spurious, and on the hesitating testimony of Trebellius Pollio, who acknowledges that, even at the time when he wrote, the statements regarding this matter were doubtful and contradictory. Neither the time nor manner of Balista's death can be ascertained with certainty, but it is believed to have happened about 264, and to have been contrived by Odenathus. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyrann. xvii., Gallien. 2, &c.; see MACRIANUS, ODERNATHUS, QUIETUS.)

BALLO'NYMUS. [ARDOLONIUS.]

BAL'SAMO, THEODO'RUS, a celebrated Greek canonist, born at Constantinople, where, under Manuel Comnenus, he filled the offices of Magnae Ecclesiae Nomo- phylos, and Chartophylax. Under Isaac Angelus he was elevated to the dignity of patriarch of Antioch, about 1185; but, on account of the invasion of the Latins, he was never able to ascend the patriarchal throne, and all the business of the patri-archate was conducted at Constantinople. He died about 1204. Of the works of this author there is no complete edition; they are scattered among various collections. Under the auspices of the emperor Manuel Comnenus and of Michael Archiaulus, the patriarch of Constantinople, he composed commentaries or scholia upon the Syntagma and the Nomocanon of Photius. These scholia seem, from external evidence, (though there is some difference of opinion among critics as to the exact date of their composition,) to have been begun as early as 1168, and not to have been completed before 1192. They are of much use in illustrating the bearing of the imperial law of Rome upon the canon law of the Eastern Church. The authenticity of the scholia of Balsamo has been questioned. In the preface of his commentary upon Photius, he refers the last revision of the Basilica to Constantinus Porphyrogenitus; whereas Attaliata, Blasites, Harmenopulus, and other authorities, concur in ascribing that honour to Leo the Wise. The Syntagma of Photius (which is a collection of canons at large), and the Nomocanon (which is a systematic abstract), are parts of a single plan; but, with the scholia of Balsamo, they have been usually edited separately. The scholia on the Nomocanon are best given in Justell et Voelli Bibliotheca Juris Canonici. (Paris, 1681, vol. ii. p. 788, &c.) The Syntagma, without the Nomocanon, is printed with the scholia of Balsamo and Zonaras subjoined to the text in the Synodicon of Bishop Beveridge. In this edition much use is made of an ancient Bodleian MS., which supplies the lacunae of the former printed edition of Paris, 1620. A further collation of Beveridge's text with three MSS. is given in Wolffi Anecdota Graeca Sacra et Profisa, vol. iv. p. 113. The schola of Balsamo, unlike those of Zonaras, treat not so much of the sense of words as of practical questions, and the mode of reconciling apparent contradictions. The text of Justinian's collections is carefully compared by Balsamo with the Basilica, and the portions of the former which are not incorporated in the latter are regarded by him as having no validity in ecclesiastical matters.

Other genuine works of Balsamo are extant. His book Μελετήσεως και διακρίσεως, and his answers to the questions of Marcus, patriarch of Alexandria, are given by Leunclavius. (Jus. Gr. Rom. vol. i.) The former work is also to be found in Cotelerius, Eccl. Gr. Monum.

Several works have been erroneously attributed to Balsamo. Of these the most important is a Greek collection of Ecclesiastical Constitutions, in three books, compiled chiefly from the Digest, Code, and Novellae of Justinian. It is inserted, with the Latin translation of Leunclavius, in Justell et Voelli Bibliotheca Juris Canonici. vol. ii. F. A. Biener, however, in his history of the Authentica (Diss. i. p. 10), proved that this collection was older than Balsamo; and in his history of the Novellae (p. 179), he referred it to the time of the emperor Heraclius. (A. n. 610—641.) Heimbach (Anecdota, vol. i. pp. xlv.—xlviii.) maintains, in opposition to Biener, that the collection was made after the time of Justin II. (565-8), and that four Novellae of Heraclius, appended to the work, are the addition of a later compiler. There is extant an arrangement of Justinian's Novellae according to their contents, which was composed, as Biener has shown, by Athanasius Scholasticius, though a small portion of it had been previously printed under the name of Balsamo. (Hugo, Rom. R. R. 14.)

The Glossa ordinaria of the Basilica, which was formed in the 12th century from more ancient scholia, is, without sufficient reason, attributed to Balsamo by Assemani. (Bibl. Jur. Oriental, iii. p. 386.)

Tigerström, in his Aeussera Geschichte des Röm. Rechts (Berlin, 1841, p. 331), speaks of a Πρόπολες, or legal manual, of Antiochus Balsamo, as extant in MS.; but he does not say where, nor does he cite any authority for the fact. As Tigerström is often inaccurate, we suspect that Antiochus is put by mistake for Theodorus, and that the Prochiron Auctum is referred to, of which an account is given by C. E. Zacharia, Historiarus Juris Graeco-Romani Dolus, § 48. The commencement of this Prochiron was published, by way of specimen, by Zacharia in the Prolegomena to his edition of the Prochiron of the emperor Basilus. (Heidelberg, 1837.) The Prochiron Auctum is supposed by Biener (in Savigny's Journal, vol. viii. p. 276) to have been rather later than Balsamo, from whose works it borrows, as also from the works of Joannes Cittius, who outlived Balsamo. (Beveridge, Preface to the Synodicon, §§ 14—21; Bach, Hist. Jur. Rom. ed. Stockmann, p. 684 ; Heinb. de Basil. Orig. pp. 290, 192; Biener, vol. iv. pp. 216, 218; Wittb. in Stockmann, A. Bibl. Jur. Orient., t. ii. p. 37; Walter, Kirchenrecht, Bonn, 1842, § 77.)

T. BALVENTIUS, a century of the first century (primi pidi), who was severely wounded in the attack made by Ambiorix upon Q. Titarius Sabinus, a. c. 54. (Caes. B. G. v. 35.)

M. BAMBATLIO, a man of no account, the father-in-law of M. Antonius, the trimvir, who received the nickname of Bambalio on account of a hesitancy in his speech. His full name was M. Fulvius Bambalio, and his daughter was Fulvia; he must not be confounded with Q. Fadius, whose daughter Fadia was Antony's first wife. (Cic. Phil. ii. 36, iii. 8.)

L. BA'NTIUS, of Nola, served in the Roman army at the battle of Cannae, a. c. 216, in which he was dangerously wounded and fell into the hands of Hannibal. Having been kindly treated by Hannibal, and sent home laden with gifts, he was anxious to surrender Nola to the Carthaginians, but was gained over to the Romans by the prudent conduct of Marcellus, who had the command of Nola. (Liv. xxiii. 15 ; Plut. Marcell. 10, &c.)

BA'PHIUS, a Greek commentator on the Basilica (cited Basilica, vol. vii. p. 787, ed. Fabrot). His date and history are uncertain, but he probably lived in the 10th or 11th century. Suarez (Notitia Basilicorum, § 39) thinks, that Baphius is not strictly a proper name, but an appellative epithet given to an annotator on the Rubrics of the Basilica. This opinion is rejected by Bach. (Hist. Jur. Rom. 776, n. i.) Tigerström (Annot. Rom., Rechtsprech. p. 350) erroneously calls him Solomon Baphius. The names should be separated by a comma, for Salomon is a distinct scholar (cited Basilica, vol. iii. p. 361).

BARBA, CAS'SIUS, a friend of J. Caesar, who gave Cicero guards for his vill, when Caesar paid him a visit in a. c. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 52 ; comp. Phil. xiii. 2.)

BARBATUS. 461

ii. 383.] Macerius (Sat. iii. 8) also mentions a statue of Venus in Cyprus, representing the goddess with a beard, in female attire, but resembling in her whole figure that of a man. (Comp. Suidas, s. e. 'Αφοδίτη; Hesych. s. e. 'Αφοδίτης.) The idea of Venus thus being a mixture of the male and female nature, seems to belong to a very late period of antiquity. (Voss, Mythol. Briefe, ii. p. 282, &c.)

BARBATIO, commander of the household troops under the Caesar Gallus, arrested his master, by command of Constantius, at Potium in Noricum, and thence, after stripping him of the emblems of his dignity, conducted him to Pola in Istria, a. d. 354. In return for his services, he was promoted, upon the death of Silvanus, to the rank of general of the infantry (principia), and was sent with an army of 25,000 or 30,000 men to cooperate with Julian in the campaign against the Alamanni in 356; but he treacherously deserted him, either through envy of Julian, or in accordance with the secret instructions of the emperor. In 358, he defeated the Juthungi, who had invaded Rhaetia; and, in the following year, he was, by command of Constantius, in consequence of an imputable letter which his wife had written him, and which the emperor thought indicated treasonable designs on his part. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, xvi. 11, xvii. 6, xviii. 3; Liban. Ort. x. 275.)

M. BARBATUS, a friend of J. Caesar, and afterwards quaestor of Antony in b. c. 40. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 2; Appian, B. C. v. 31.) His name occurs on a coin of Antony: the obverse of which is M. ANI. IMP. AVG. IIIIVIR. R. P. C. M. BAR¬BAY. Q. P., where there can be little doubt that M. Barbatus signifies M. Barbatus, and not Barbatus, as Ursinus and others have conjectured, who make it a surname of the Valeria gens. The letters Q. P. probably signify Quaestor P. Iperstitii. (Comp. Eckel, p. v. 334.)

This M. Barbatus appears to be the same as the Barbarius Philippus mentioned by Ulpian (Dig. I. tit. 14. s. 3), where Barbarius is only a false reading for Barbatus, and also the same as the Barbarius Philippus, spoken of by Suidas. (s. v.) We learn from Ulpian and Suidas that M. Barbatus was a runaway slave, who ingratiated himself into the favour of Antony, and through his influence obtained the pretorship under the triumvirs. While discharging the duties of his office in the forum he was recognized, we are told, by his old master, but privately purchased his freedom by a large sum of money. (Comp. Garanton, ad Cic. Phil. xiii. 2.)

BARBATUS, the name of a family of the Horatia gens. Barbatus was also a surname of P. Cornelius Scipio, consul in b. c. 329 [Scipio], of the Quintii Capitolini [Capitolinus], and of M. Valerius Messalla, consul in b. c. 12. [Messalla.]

1. M. HORATIUS M. F. M. N. BARBATUS, was one of the most violent opponents of the second decennvirs, when they resolved to continue their power beyond their year of office. In the tumult which followed the death of Virginia, Valerius Poplicola and Horatius Barbatus put themselves at the head of the popular movement; and when the plebeians seceded to the Sacred Hill, Valerius and Horatius were sent to them by the senate, as the only acceptable deputies, to negotiate the terms of peace. The right of appeal and the tribunes were restored to the plebs, and a full indemnity granted to all engaged in the secession. The decennvirs was also abolished, and the two friends of the plebcs, Valerius and Horatius, were elected consuls, b. c. 449. The liberties of the plebs were still further confirmed in their consulship by the passing of the celebrated Valerius Horatius Lepes. [Poplicola.] Horatius gained a great victory over the Sabines, which inspired them with such dread of Rome, that they did not take up arms again for the next hundred and fifty years. The senate out of spite refused Horatius a triumph, but he celebrated one without their consent, by command of the populace. (Liv. iii. 39, &c. 49, 50, 53, 55, 61—63; Dionys. xi. 5, 22, 30, 45, 48; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31; Dion. xii. 26; Zonar. viii. 12.)

2. L. HORATIUS BARBATUS, consul, b. c. 425. (Liv. iv. 35.)

BARBULLUS (Barbūlus), an astrologer at Rome in the reign of Vespasian. (Dion Cass. lxvi. 9.) He was retained and consulted by the emperor, though all of his profession were forbidden the city. He obtained the establishment of the games at Ephesus, which received their name from him, and are mentioned in the Arundelian Marbles, p. 71, and discussed in a note in Reimar's edition of Dion Cass. vol. ii. p. 1084. [A. G.]

BARBUCALLUS, JOANNES (Φανούριας Βαρβοκάλλος), the author of eleven epigrams in the Greek Anthology. From internal evidence his date is fixed by Jacobs about a. d. 551. The Scholastus derives his name from Barbacola, a city of Spain within the Ebro mentioned by Polybius and Stephanus. The name of the city as actually given by Polybius (iii. 14), Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v.), and Livy (xxvi. 5), is Arbusale (Ἀρμβοσάλα), or Arboca, probably the modern Albufera. [P. S.]

BARBULBA, the name of a family of the patriotic Aemilia gens.

1. Q. ARMILIUS Q. F. L. N. BARBULA, consul in b. c. 317, in which year a treaty was made with the Apulian Teates, Nerdum taken by Barbula, and Apulia entirely subdued. (Liv. iv. 20, 21; Dion. xix. 17.) Barbula was consul again in 311, and had the conduct of the war against the Etruscans, with whom he fought an indecisive battle according to Livy. (iv. 30—32; Dion. xx. 3.) The fact, however, as is maintained by the Etruscans, but this Nildhar (Rom. Hist. iii. p. 279) thanks to have been an invention of the family, more especially as the next campaign against the Etruscans was not opened as if the Romans had been previously conquerors.

2. L. ARMILIUS Q. F. Q. N. BARBULA, son of No. 1, was consul in b. c. 281. The Tarentines had rejected with the vilest insults the terms of peace which had been offered by Postumius, the Roman ambassador; but as the republic had both the Etruscans and Samnites to contend with, it was unwilling to come to a rupture with the Tar¬entines, and accordingly sent the consul Barbula towards Tarentum with instructions to offer the same terms of peace as Postumius had, but if they were again rejected to make war against the city. The Tarentines, however, adhered to their former resolution; but as they were unable to defend themselves against the Romans, they invited Pyrrhus to their assistance. As soon as Barbula became acquainted with their determination, he prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour, best the Tarentines in the open field, and took several of their towns. Alarmed at his progress, and trusting to his clemency, as he had treated the prisoners kindly and dismissed some without ransom, the Tarentines appointed Agis, a friend of the Romans, general with unlimited powers. But the arrival of Cines, the chief minister of Pyrrhus, almost immediately afterwards, caused this appointment to be annulled; and as soon as Milo landed with part of the king's forces, he marched against Barbula and attacked the army as it was passing along a narrow road by the sea-coast. By the side of the road were precipitous mountains, and the Tarentine fleet lay at anchor ready to discharge missiles at the Roman army as it marched by. The army would probably have been destroyed, had not Barbula covered his troops by placing the Tarentine prisoners in such a manner that they would have become the first object of the enemy's artillery. Barbula thus led his army in safety, as the Tarentines would not injure their own countrymen.

Barbula continued in southern Italy after the expiration of his consulship as proconsul. He gained victories over the Samnites and Sallentines, as we learn from the Fasti, which record his triumph over these people, as well as over the Bruscenes, in Quinctilis of 260. (Zonar. viii. 2; Oros. iv. 1; Appian, Samn. p. 58, &c., ed. Schrö.; Dionys. Eco. p. 2342, &c., ed. Reiske; Frontin. Strat. i. 4, § 1, where Aemilius Paulus is a mistake.)

3. M. AEMILIUS L. F. Q. N. BARBULA, son of No. 2, was consul in n. c. 230, and had in conjunction with his colleague the conduct of the war against the Ligurians. (Zonar. viii. 19.) Zonaras says (l. c.), that when the Carthaginians heard of the Ligurian war, they resolved to march against Rome, but that they relinquished their design when the consuls came into their country, and received the Romans as friends. This is evidently a blunder, and must in all probability be referred to the Gauls, who, as we learn from Polybius (ii. 21), were in a state of great ferment about this time owing to the lex Flaminia, which had been passed about two years previously, n. c. 232, for the division of the Picentian land.

Barbula purchased Marcus, the legate of Brutus, who had been proscribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, and who pretended that he was a slave in order to escape death. Barbula took Marcus with him to Rome, where he was recognized at the city-gates by one of Barbula's friends. Barbula, by means of Agrippa, obtained the pardon of Marcus from Octavianus. Marcus afterwards became one of the friends of Octavianus, and commanded part of his forces at the battle of Actium, n. c. 31. Here he had an opportunity of returning the kindness of his former master. Barbula had served under Antony, and after the defeat of the latter fell into the hands of the conquerors. He, too, pretended to be a slave, and was purchased by Marcus, who procured his pardon from Augustus, and both of them subsequently obtained the consulship at the same time. Such is the statement of Appian (B. C. iv. 19), who does not give us either the gentle or family name of Marcus, nor does he tell us whether Barbula belonged to the Aemilia gens. The Fasti do not contain any consul of the name of Barbula, but he and his friends may have been consuls successively, the names of all of whom are not preserved.
the persecution under Marcus Antoninus. We learn from Epherem the Syrian that Bardesanes composed, in his native tongue, no fewer than one hundred and fifty Psalms elegantly verified. On this subject see Hahn, Bardesanes Gnosticus Syrorum princeps Hymnologus, Lips. 1819. Bardesanes had a son, Harmonius (incorrectly called Hamiuonius by Lumper), whom Sozomen styles a man of learning, and specially skilled in music. (Hist. Eccles. iii. 16; comp. Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv. 29.) He was devoted to his father's opinions, and, by adapting popular melodies to the words in which they were conveyed, he did harm to the cause of orthodoxy. To counteract this mischief, Epherem set new and evangelical words to the tunes of Harmonius, which, in this improved adaptation, long continued in vogue.

In the writings of Porphyry (de Abstinentia, iv. 17, and also in his fragment de Syge), a Bardeanes Babylonius is mentioned, whom Vossius (de Hist. Graec. iv. 17), Struma (Hist. Bardesanae. Edessens Chronicle), Hahn (Journals Eclog. P. i.), and Harles (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 247) represent as altogether a different person from Bardesanes of Edessa. Dodwell (Diss. ad Iren.) identifies the Babylonian Bardesanes with the Syrian Gnostics, and maintains that he flourished, not under Marcus Antoninus, but Elagabalus; and in this last position Grabe concurs. (Specif. i. 317.) Lardner conceives that the historical and chronological difficulties may be satisfactorily adjusted by the hypothesis that the same individual who had acquired an early reputation in the reign of Marcus Aurelius was still living, in the full blaze of his celebrity, under Elagabalus. His reasoning on the question is very sound; yet an attentive consideration of the ancient authorities disposes us to agree with Vossius and Hecren. The Bardesanes mentioned by Porphyry wrote concerning the Indian gymnosophists. (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 30; Jerome, de Viris Illust. c. 33; Sozomen, Theodoret, and the Edessene Chronicle. BARDYLIS or BARDYLLIS (Bapyuta) is one of the early inspired teachers of Christianity, was originally named Bopyra, the son of Omphale. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bapyros.) The Bardylis of Illyria, Bardylis, who was now 90 years old, having proposed terms of peace which Philip rejected, led forth his troops to meet the enemy, and was defeated and probably slain in the battle which ensued. Plutarch mentions a daughter of his, called Bircenna, who was married to Pyrrhus of Epirus. (Diod. xvi. 4; Just. vii. 6; Lucian, Macrobr. 10; Plut. Pyrrh. 9.)

BA'REA SORANUS, must not be confounded with Q. Marcus Barea, who was consul successively in A. D. 26. The gentle name of Barea Soranus seems to have been Servilius, as Servilia was the name of his daughter. Soranus was consul successively in A. D. 52 under Claudius, and afterwards proconsul of Asia. By his justice and zeal in the administration of the province he incurred the hatred of Nero, and was accordingly accused by Ostorius Sabinus, a Roman knight, in A. D. 66. The charges brought against him were his intimacy with Rubellius Plautus (Plautus), and the design of gaining over the province of Asia for the purpose of a revolution. His daughter Servilia was also accused for having given money to the Magi, whom she had consulted respecting her father's danger; she was under twenty years of age, and was the wife of Ammius Pollio, who had been banished by Nero. Both Soranus and his daughter were condemned to death, and were allowed to choose the mode of their execution. The chief witness against father and daughter was P. Egnatius Celer, a Stoic philosopher, formerly a client and also the teacher of Soranus; to whose act of villany Juvenal alludes (iii. 116),

"Stoicus occidit Baream, delator ac scum, Discipulorumque senex."

Egnatius received great rewards from Nero, but was afterwards accused by Musonius Rufus under Vespasian, and condemned to death. (Tas. Ann. xii. 53, xvi. 21, 23, 30—33, Hist. iv. 10, 40; Dion Cass. ixi. 26; Schol. ad Juv. i. 33, vi. 531.)

BA'RNABAS (Barybas), one of the early inspired teachers of Christianity, was originally named Joseph, and received the appellation Barnabas from the apostles. To the few details in his life supplied by the New Testament various additions have been made; none of which are certainly true, while many of them are evidently false. Clemens Alexander, Eusebius, and others, affirm, that Barnabas was one of the seventy disciples sent forth by our Lord himself to preach the gospel. Baronius and certain other historians maintain, that Barnabas not only preached the gospel in Italy, but founded the church in Milan, of which they say he was the first bishop. That this opinion rests on no sufficiant evidence is ably shewn by the candid Tille-contemporaries, is destitute of all probability.

In the first and second prefaces to the code the names of the commissioners are mentioned in the following order:—Joannes Leontius, Phæus, Praeconius, Thomas, Tribonianus, Constantinus, Theophilius, Dioscurus, Praeconius. From the same sources it appears that before 528, Basiliscus had been praefectus praetorio of the East, and invested with the dignity of patricius, and that in 520 he was PP. of Illyricum.

BASILINA, the mother of Julian the apostate, being the second wife of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. She is believed to have been the daughter of Anicius Julianus, consul in A.D. 322, and afterwards prefect of the city. Her marriage took place at Constantinople, and she died in 331, a few months after the birth of her only son. From this princess the city of Basiliopolis in Bithynia received its name. (Ammian. Marcellin. xxv. 3; Liban. Ov. xii. p. 262; Not. exc. Hieroc. p. 692.) See the genealogical table prefixed to the article CONSTANTINUS MAGNUS. (W. R.)

BASILIUS (Βασιλεύς), a Greek writer of uncertain date, the author of a work on India (Ἰνδικ), of which the second book is quoted by Athenaeus. (I. p. 390. b.) He also seems to have written on Aethiopia, as he gave an account of the size of the country. (Plin. H. N. vi. 29. s. 35.) He is mentioned by Agatharchides among the writers on the east. (Ap. Phot. p. 454. b. 34, ed. Bekker, who calls him Basileus.)

BASILISCUS (Βασιλισσα), usurper of the throne of Constantinople, was the brother of the empress Verina, the wife of Leo I., who conferred upon his brother-in-law the dignities of patrician and "dux" Constantine. In 466, when Basiliscus was ordered to sail direct to Carthage, and the fleet that attacked Carthage consisted of eleven hundred and thirteen ships, having each one hundred thousand men on board. Sardinia and Libya were already conquered by Marcellinus and Heraclius, who had landed at anchor off the Promontorium Mercurii, now Cape Bon, opposite Sicily. Genseric, now cape Bon, opposite Sicily. Genseric, king of the Vandals—one of the greatest military leaders of his time, when overpowered by the Vandals, refused the pardon that was promised him, and with his heavy armour leaped overboard, and drowned himself in the sea. One half of the Roman ships was burnt, sunk, or taken, the other half followed the fugitive Basiliscus. The whole expedition had failed. After his arrival at Constantinople, Basiliscus hid himself in the church of St. Sophia, in order to escape the wrath of the people and the revenge of the emperor, but he obtained his pardon by the mediation of Verina, and he was punished merely with banishment to Heraclea in Thrace.

Basiliscus is generally represented as a good general, though easily deceived by stratagems; and it may therefore be possible that he had suffered himself to be surprised by Genseric. The historians generally speak ambiguously, saying that he was either a dupe or a traitor; and there is much ground to believe that he had concerted a plan with Aspar to ruin Leo by causing the failure of the expedition. This opinion gains further strength by the fact, that Basiliscus ascended to the imperial dignity, which, however, he was unable to obtain during the vigorous government of Leo. No sooner had Leo died (474), than Basiliscus and Verina, Leo's widow, conspired against his feeble successor, Zeno, who was driven out and deposed in the following year. It seems that Verina intended to put her lover, Priscus, on the throne, but Zeno's forces joined the army, and succeeded in being proclaimed emperor. (October or November, 475.) His reign was short. He conferred the title of Augusta upon his wife, Zenomila; he created his son, Marcus, Caesar, and afterwards Augustus; and he patronized the Eutychians in spite of the decisions of the council of Chalcedon. During his reign a dreadful conflagration destroyed a considerable part of Constantinople, and amongst other buildings the great library with 120,000 volumes. His rapacity and the want of union among his adherents caused his ruin, which was accelerated by the activity of Zeno, his wife, the empress Ariadne, and generally all their adherents. Ilus, the general despatched by Basiliscus against Zeno, who had assembled some forces in Cappadocia, on Zeno's invitation, had no sooner heard that the Greeks were dissatisfied with the usurper, than he and his army joined the party of Zeno; and his successor, Armatus or Harmatus, the nephew of Basiliscus, either followed the example of Ilus, or at least allowed Zeno to march unmolested upon Constantinople. Basiliscus was surprised in his palace, and Zeno sent him and his family to Cappadocia, where they were imprisoned in a stronghold, the name of which was probably Cœcitus. Food having been refused to them, Basiliscus, his wife, and children perished by hunger and cold in the winter of 471-478, several months after his fall, which took place in June or July, 477. (Zonaras, xiv. 1, 2; Procop. Hist. Mon. Bello Vandal. l. 6; Theophanes, pp. 87-107; ed. Paris; Cedren. pp. 349-50, ed. Paris. Jornandes, de Regim. Sucec. pp. 58, 59, ed. Lindenbrog, says, that Carthage was in an untenable position, and that Basiliscus was bribed by Genseric.) (W. P.)

BASILUS (Basilios and Basilius), commonly called BASIL. 1. Bishop of Ancyra (A. D. 336-360), originally a physician, was one of the chief leaders of the Semi-Arian party, and the founder of a sect of Arians which was named after him. He was held in high esteem by the emperor Constantius, and is praised for his piety and learning by Socrates and Sozomen. He was engaged in perpetual controversies both with the orthodox and with the ultra Arians. His chief opponent was Aemilian, through whose influence Basil was deposed by the synod of Constantinople (A. D. 360), and banished to Illyricum. He wrote against his adversaries for the monastic life. His name was Emmelia. He was brought up in the principles of the Christian faith partly by his parents, but chiefly by his grandmother, Macrina, who resided at Neocaesarea in Pontus, and had been a sister of Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of that city. His education was continued at Caesarea in Cappadocia, and then at Constantinople. Here, according to some accounts, or, according to others, at Antioch, he studied under Libanius. The statements of ancient writers on this matter are confused; but we learn from a correspondence between Libanius and Basil, that they were acquainted when Basil was a young man. The genuineness of these letters has been doubted by Gamier, but on insufficient grounds. From Constantine he proceeded to Athens, where he studied for four years (351-355 A. D.), chiefly under the sophists Himerius and Pronerius. Among his fellow-students were the emperor Julian and Gregory Nazianzen. The latter, who was the future bishop of Cappadocia, and had been Basil's school-fellow, now became, and remained throughout life, his most intimate friend. It is said, that he persuaded Basil to remain at Athens when the latter was about to leave the place in disgust, and that the attachment and piety of the two friends became the talk of all the city. Basil's success in study was so great, that even before he reached Athens his fame had preceded him; and in the schools of that city he was surpassed by no one, if we may believe his friend Gregory, in rhetoric, philosophy, and science. At the end of 355, he returned to Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he began to plead causes with great success. He soon however, abandoned his profession, in order to devote himself to a religious life, having been urged to this course by the persuasions and example of his sister Macrina. The more he studied the Bible the more did he become convinced of the excellence of a life of poverty and seclusion from the world. About the year 357, he made a journey through Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, in order to become acquainted with the monastic life as practised in those countries. On his return from this journey (358), he retired to a mountain on the banks of the river Iris, near Neocaesarea, and there lived as a recluse for thirteen years. On the opposite bank of the river was a small estate belonging to his family, where his mother and sister, with some chosen companions, lived in religious seclusion from the world. Basil assembled round him a company of monks, and was soon joined by his friend Gregory. Their time was spent in manual labour, in the religious exercises of singing, prayer, and watching, and more especially in the study of the Scriptures, with the comments of Christian writers. Their favourite writer appears to have been Origen, from whose works they collected a body of extracts under the title of Philoletics (περὶ Ἀρνίμου). Basil also composed a list of regulations for the monastic life. He wrote many letters of advice and consolation, and made journeys through Pontus for the purpose of extending monasticism, which owed its establishment in central Asia mainly to his exertions.

In the year 359, Basil was associated with his namesake of Ancyra and Eustathius of Sebaste in an embassy to Constantinople, in order to gain the emperor's confirmation of the decrees of the synod of Seleucia, by which the Homoeans had condemned the Anomoiotans; but he took only a silent part in the embassy. He had before this time, but how long we do not know, been appointed reader in the church at Caesarea by the bishop Dianius, and he had also received deacon's orders from Melitius, bishop of Antioch. In the following year (360) Basil withdrew from Caesarea and returned to his monastery, because Dianius had subordinated the Arian confession of the synod of Ariminum. Here (361) he received a letter from the emperor Julian, containing an invitation to court, which Basil refused on account of the emperor's apostacy. Other letters followed; and it is probable that Basil would have suffered martyrdom had it not been for Julian's sudden death. In the following year (362), Dianius, on his death bed, recalled Basil to Caesarea, and his successor Eusebius ordained him as a presbyter; but shortly afterwards (364), Eusebius deposed him, for some unknown reason. Basil retired once more to the wilder parts of Cappadocia, and was finally recalled by Gregory Nazianzen. Encouraged by this division, the Arians, who had acquired new strength from the accession of Valens, commenced an attack on the church at Caesarea. Basil had been their chief opponent there, having written a work against Eunomius; and now his loss was so severely felt, that Eusebius, availing himself of the mediation of Gregory Nazianzen, recalled Basil to Caesarea, and, being himself but little of a theologian, entrusted to him almost the entire management of ecclesiastical affairs. (363.) Basil's learning and eloquence, his zeal for the Catholic faith, and, above all, his conduct in a famine which happened in Cappadocia (357, 359), when he devoted his whole fortune to relieve the sufferers, gained him such general popularity, that upon the death of Eusebius, in the year 370, he was chosen in his place bishop of Caesarea. In virtue of this office, he became also metropolitan of Caesarea and archbishop of Pontus. He still retained his monastic habit and his ascetic mode of life. The chief features of his administration were his care for the poor, for whom he built houses at Caesarea and the other cities in his province; his restoration of church discipline; his strictness in examining candidates for orders; his efforts for church union both in the East and West; his defence of his authority against Anthimus of Tyana, whose see was raised to a second metropolis of Cappadocia by Valens; and against Modestus, the prefect of Cappadocia, and and Semi-Arian bishops in his neighbourhood, and he died on the 1st of January, 379 A. D., worn out by his aesthetic life, and was buried at Caesarea. His epitaph by Gregory Nazianzen is still extant. His monastic works are his chief works: 1. Eis tην εκκλησίαν, Nine Homilies on the Six Days' Work. 2. XVII. Homilies on the Psalms. 3. XXXI. Homilies on various subjects. 4. Two Books on Baptism.
5. On true Virginity. 6. Commentary (ἐρωτευµα tise on the Holy Spirit, addressed to Eunomius: its genuineness is doubted by Gamier. 9. Ἀστύτης, ascetic writings. Under this title are included his work on Christian Morals (φιλάδελφος), his monastic rules, and several other treatises and sermons.

10. The Homilies on the Six Days' Work. His minor works and those falsely ascribed to him are enumerated by Fabricius and Cave. The first complete edition of his works was published at Basel in 1551; the most complete is that by Gamier, 3 vols. fol. Paris,

3. Of CILICIA (δ Κιλία), was the author of a history of the Church, of which Photius gives a short account (Cod. 42), a work against John of Sicyon (Phot. Cod. 107), and one against Archelaus, Bishop of Colonia in Armenia. (Suidas, was presbyter at Antioch about 497 A. D., and afterwards bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia.

4. Bishop of SELINUCIA in Isauria from 448 till after 458, distinguished himself by taking alternately both sides in the Eutychian controversy. His works are published with those of Gregory Thaumaturgus, in the Paris edition of 1622. He must not be confounded with Basil, the friend of Chrysostom, as is done by Photius. (Cod. 168,
p. 116, ed. Bekker.)
[BASILIU5 l, MACEDO (Βασιλείου δ Μα-cedóv), emperor of the East, one of the most extraordinary characters recorded in history, ascended the throne after a series of almost incredible adventures. He was probably born in A. D. 826, and is said to have been the descendant of a prince of the house of the Arsacids, who fled to Greece, and was invested with large estates in Thrace by the emperor Leo I. Thrax. (451—474.) There were probably two Arsacidae who settled in Thrace, Chilenes and Artabanas. The father of Basil, however, was a small landowner, the family having gradually lost their riches; but his mother is said to have been a descendant of Constantine the Great.
At an early age, Basil was made prisoner by a party of Bulgarians, and carried into their country, where he was educated as a slave. He was rannoned several years afterwards, arrived at Constantinople a destitute lad, and was found asleep on the steps of the church of St. Demetrie. His naked body, as he lay, was seen by the empress Eudoxia, who was touched by the recommendation he was presented to Theophilus, surnamed the Little, a cousin of the emperor Theophilus (829—842), who, a diminutive man himself, liked to be surrounded by tall and handsome footmen. Such was Basil, who, having accompanied his master to Greece, was adopted by a rich widow at Patras. Her wealth enabled him to purchase large estates in Macedonia, whence he derived his surname Macedo, unless it be that his master was in account of his pretended descent, on his mother's side, either from the Great or his father, Philip of Macedonia, which however seems to be little better than a fable.
He continued to attend the little Theophilus, and after the accession of Michael I. in 842, attracted the attention of this emperor by vanquishing in single combat a giant Bulgarian, who was reputed to be the first pupilist of his time. In 854 Michael appointed him his chief chamberlain; and the ambition of Basil became so conspicuous, that the courtiers used to say that he was the lion who would devour them all. Basil was married to one Maria, by whom he had a son, Constantine; but, in order to make his fortune, he repudiated his wife, and married Theclina Ingerina, the concubine of the emperor, who took in exchange Thecla, the sister of Basil. The marriage was celebrated in December, 865; and in September, 866, Ingerina became the mother of Leo, afterwards emperor. The influence of Basil increased daily, and he was daring enough to form a conspiracy against the emperor's uncle, Bardus, upon whom the dignity of Caesar had been conferred, and who was assassinated in the presence of Michael.
A short time afterwards, Basil was created Augustus, and the administration of the empire developed upon him, Michael being unable to conduct it on account of his drunkenness and other vices.
The emperor became nevertheless jealous of his associate, and resolved upon his ruin; but he was prevented from carrying his plan into execution by the bold energy of Basil, by whose contrivance Michael was murdered after a debauch on the 24th of September, 867.
Basil, who succeeded him on the throne, was no general, but a bold, active man, whose intelligence was of a superior kind, though his character was stained with many a vice, which he had learned during the time of his slavery among the barbarians and of his courtiership at Constantinople. The famous patriarch Photius having caused these religious troubles for which his name is so conspicuous in ecclesiastical and political history, Basil instantly removed him from the see of Constantinople, and put Ignatius in his place. He likewise ordered a campaign to be undertaken against the warlike sect of the Paulicians, whom his generals brought to obedience. A still greater danger arose from the Arabs, who, during the reign of the incompetent Michael I., had made great progress in Asia and Europe. Basil, who knew how to choose good generals, forced the Arabs to renounce the siege of Ragusa. In 872, he accompanied his Asiatic army, which crossed the Bosphorus and defeated the Arabs in many engagements, especially in Cilicia in 875. In 877 the patriarch Ignatius died, and Photius succeeded in resuming his former dignity, under circumstances the narrative of which belongs to the life of Photius. The success which the Greek arms had obtained against the Arabs urged the emperor to drive them out of Italy, the southern part of the war, which lasted, with a few interruptions, till 1018, with a successful campaign in 987; and, during the following years, he made conquest after conquest in the south-western part of that kingdom, to which Epirus and a considerable part of Macedonia belonged. In 996, however, Samuel, the king of the Bulgarians, overran all Macedonia, laid siege to Thessalonica, conquered Thessaly, and penetrated into the Peloponnesus. Having marched back into Thessaly, in order to meet with the Greeks, who advanced in his rear, he was routed on the banks of the Sperchius, and hardly escaped death or captivity; his army was destroyed. In 999, the lieutenant of Basil, Nicephorus Xiphias, took the towns of Piscova and Parasthiva in Bulgarian Proper. But as early as 1002, Samuel again invaded Thrace and took Adrianople. He was, however, driven back; and during the twelve following years the war seems to have been carried on with but little energy by either party. It broke out again in 1014, and was signalized by an extraordinary success of the Greeks, who were commanded by their emperor and Nicephorus Xiphias. The Bulgarians were routed at Zetunium. Being incumbered on his march by a band of 15,000 prisoners, Basil gave the cruel order to put them out, sparing one in a hundred, who was to lead one hundred of his blind companions to their native country. When Samuel beheld his unhappy warriors, thus mutilated and filling his camp with their cries, he fell senseless on the ground, and died two days afterwards. Bulgaria was not entirely subdued till 1017 and 1018, when it was degraded into a Greek thema, and governed by dukes. This conquest continued a province of the Eastern empire till the reign of Isaac Angelus. (1185—1195.)

Among the other events which the reign of Basil was signalised, the most remarkable were, a new revolt of Scelera in 997, who were commanded by their emperor and Nicephorus Phocas; the Macedonians were routed at Zetunium. BASSUS.

I. A Roman of distinction selected by Constantine the Great as the husband of his sister Anastasia, and destined for the rank of Caesar and the government of Italy, although probably never actually invested with these dignities. For, while negotiations were pending with Licinius respecting the ratification of this arrangement, it was discovered that the last-named prince had been secretly tampering with Bassianus, and had persuaded him to form a treacherous plot against his brother-in-law and benefactor. Constantine promptly executed vengeance on the traitor, and declared the discovery of the ploty by his colleague to have led to a war, the result of which is recounted elsewhere. [Constantinus.] The whole history of this intrigue, so interesting and important on account of the momentous consequences to which it eventually led, is extremely obscure, and depends almost exclusively upon the anonymous fragment appended by Valesius to his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus.

2. A Phoenician of humble extraction, who nevertheless numbered among his lineal descendants, in the three generations which followed, none but emperors, — Caracalla, Geta, Elagabalus, Alexander Severus and Julia Soemias, and Julia Mamaca, besides having an emperor (Sept. Severus) for his son-in-law. From him Caracalla, Elagabalus, and Alexander Severus all bore the name of Bassianus; and we find his great-granddaughter Julia Soemias entitled Bassiana in a remarkable bilingual inscription discovered at Velitius and published with a dissertation at Rome in 1765. (Aurelius Victor, Epit. c. 21, has preserved his name; and from an expression used by Dion Cassius, lxxviii. 24, with regard to Julia Domna, we infer his station in life. See also the genealogical table prefixed to the article Caracalla.)

BASSUS. We find consulship of this name under Valerian for the years a. d. 258 and 259. One of these is probably the Pomponius Bassus who under Claudius came forward as a national sacrifice, because the Sibylline books had declared that the Goths could not be vanquished unless the chief senator of Rome should devote his life for his country; but the emperor would not allow him to execute this design, generously insisting, that the person pointed out by the Fates must be himself. The whole story, however, is very problematical. (Aurel. Vict. Epit. c. 34; comp. Julian, Caes. p. 11, and Tillemont on Claudius II.)

BASSUS. 1. Is named by Ovid as having formed one of the select circle of his poetical associates, and as celebrated for his iambic lays, "Ponticus heroo, Bassus quoque clarus inambo," but is not noticed by Quintilian nor by any other Roman writer, unless he be the Bassus familiarly addressed by Propertius. (Eleg. i. 4.) Hence is it probable that friendship may have exaggerated his fame and merits. Osann argues from a passage in Apuleius the grammaticus (De Orthograph. § 45), that Batus, and not Bassus, is the true reading in the above line from the Tristia, but his reasonings have been successfully combated by Weichert. (De L. Vario Poeta, Excur. ii. De Bassis quibusdaniae, &c.)

2. A dramatic poet, contemporary with Martial, and the subject of a witty epigram, in which he is recommended to abandon such themes as Medea, Thyestes, Niobe, and the fate of Troy, and to devote his compositions to Phaethon or Deucalion, i.e. to fire or water. (Martini. v. 55.) The name occurs frequently in other epigrams by the same author, but the persons spoken of are utterly unknown. [W. R.]

BASSUS, occurs several times in the ancient authors as the name of a medical writer, sometimes without any praenomen, sometimes called Julius and sometimes Tullius. It is not possible to say exactly whether all these passages refer to more than two individuals, as it is conjectured that Julius and Tullius are the same person; it is, however, certain that the Julius Bassus said by Pliny (Ind. to H. N. xx.) to have written a Greek work, must have lived before the person to whom Galen dedicates his work De Libris Propriis, and whom he calls Κόστος Βασίου. (Vol. xix. p. 8.) Bassus Tullius is said by Caecilius Aurelianus (De Mort. Auct. iii. 16. p. 233) to have been the friend of Niger, who may perhaps have been the Sextius Niger mentioned by Pliny. (Ind. to H. N. xx.) He is mentioned by Dioscorides (De Mat. Med. i. 195) and St. Epiphanius (Adv. Haer. i. 8 § 3) among the writers on botany; and several of his medical formulae are preserved by Aetius, Marcellus, Joannes Antimachus, and others. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 101. ed. vetr.; C. G. Kühn, Addit. ad Euseb. Med. a. Carol. f. XII. E. Kuhn, f. iv. p. 1, &c.)

BASSUS, ANNIUS, commander of a legion under Antonius Primus, a. d. 70. (Tac. Hist. iii. 50.)

BASSUS, AUFDFIUS, an orator and historian, who lived under Augustus and Tiberius. He drew up an account of the Roman wars in Germany, and also wrote a work upon Roman history of a more general character, which was continued, in thirty-one books, by the elder Pliny. No fragment of his compositions has been preserved. (Diog. de Orat. 23; Quintil. x. 1, 102, &c.; Senec. Susar. 6, Ep. xxx., which perhaps refers to a son of this individual; Phil. H. N. Præct. Ep. iii. 5, 9; ed. Titze.) It will be clearly perceived, upon comparing the two passages last referred to, that Pliny wrote a continuation of the general history of Bassus, and not of his history of the German wars, as Bähr and others have asserted. His praenomen is uncertain. Orelli (ad Diog. de Orat. c. 23) rejects Tiusus, and shews from Priscian (lib. viii. p. 371, ed. Kreil), that Tibus is more likely to be correct. [W. R.]

BASSUS, BETILINUS, occurs on a coin, from which we learn that he was a triumviral money-talis in the reign of Augustus. (Echhel, p. 150.) Seneca speaks (de Ira, iii. 18) of a Betilinus Bassus who was put to death in the reign of Caligula; and it is supposed that he may be the same as the Betilinus Cassius, who, Dion Cassius says (lxxix. 25), was executed by command of Caligula, a. d. 40.

BASSUS, Q. CARCILIVIUS, a Roman knight, and probably quæstor in b. c. 50 (Gell. ad Att. ii. 9), espoused Pompey's party in the civil war, and after the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48) fled to Tyre. Here he remained concealed for some time; but being joined by several of his party, he endeavoured to gain over some of the soldiers of Sex. Julius Caesar, who was at that time governor of Syria. In this attempt he was successful; but his designs were discovered by Sextus, who, however, forgave him on his alleging that he wanted to collect troops in order to assist Mithridates of Pergamus. Soon afterwards, however, Bassus spread a report that Caesar had been defeated and killed in Africa, and that he himself had been appointed governor of Syria. He forthwith seized upon Tyre, and marched against Sextus; but being defeated by the latter, he corrupted the soldiers of his opponent, who was accordingly put to death by his own troops.

On the death of Sextus, his whole army went over to Bassus, with the exception of some troops which were wintering in Apamæa and which fled to Cilicia. Bassus followed them, but was unable to overtake them, because he had not the means to pursue them. He then received three legions more, and marched against Sextus; but being defeated by the latter, he corrupted the soldiers of his opponent, who was accordingly put to death by his own troops.

It was one of the charges brought against Cicero’s client, Deitoraus, that he had intended to send forces to Bassus. After the retreat of Antistius, Statius Marcus was sent against Bassus with three legions, but he too received a repulse, and was obliged to call to his assistance Marcus Crispus, the governor of Bithynia. With these six legions Marcus and Crispus kept Bassus besieged in Apamæa till the arrival of Cassius in Syria in the year after Caesar’s death, b. c. 43.

The troops of Bassus, as well as those of Marcus and Crispus, immediately went over to Cassius, and Bassus, who was unwilling to join Cassius, was dismissed unharmed. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 26—28; Appian, B. C. iii. 77, 78, iv. 58, 59; Cic. pro Dei. 8, 9, ad Att. xiv. 9, xv. 13, ad Fam. xi. 1, Philipp. xi. 13, ad Fam. xii. 11, 12; Liv. Epit. 114, 121; Vell. Pat. ii. 69; Strab. xvi. p. 752; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 11, B. J. i. 10. § 10.)

Appian gives (l. c.) a different account of the origin of the revolt in Syria under Bassus. According to Appian’s statement, Bassus was appointed by Caesar commander of the legion under the governor Sex. Julius. But as Sextus gave himself up to pleasure and carried the legion about with him everywhere, Bassus represented to him the impropriety of his conduct, but his reproofs were received with contempt; and shortly afterwards Sextus ordered him to be dragged into his presence, because he did not immediately come when he was ordered. Hereupon the soldiers rose against Sextus, who was killed in the tumult.

Fearing the anger of Caesar, the soldiers resolved to rebel, and compelled Bassus to join them.

BASSUS, CAESIUS. 1. A Roman lyric poet, who flourished about the middle of the first century. Quintilian (x. i. § 95) observes, “At Lyricorum idem Horatius fecit solus legi dignum... Si quendam adiicere velit, est Caesar Bassus, quem impero vidimus: sedummy quae praeceperat ingenia viventium.” Two lines only of his compositions have been preserved, one of these, a dactyl hexameter from the second book of his Lyricæ, is to be found in Priscian (x. p. 897, ed. Putsch); the other is quoted by Dionysius (iii. p. 518, ed. Putsch.) as an example of Molossian verse. The sixth satire of Persius is evidently addressed to this Bassus; and the old scholar informs us, that he was destroyed along with his villa in a. n. 79 by the eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii. He must not be confounded with

2. Caesius Bassus, a Roman Grammarian of uncertain date, the author of a short tract entitled “Ars Caesii Bassi de Metris,” which is given in the “Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores Antiqui” of Putschius (Hanov. 1605), pp. 2662-2671. [W. R.]
direction, was unable to find them, and in despair put an end to his life, A. D. 66. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 1—3; Suet. Ner. 31.)

BASSUS, GA'VIUS or GA'BIIUS, a learned grammarian, whose Commentaria and treatise De Origine Verborum et Vocabilorum are cited by Cel- lius (ii. 4, iii. 9, 19, v. 7, xi. 17). He is probably the same with the writer of the work De Divis, spoken of by Macrobius (Sat. i. 18, iii. 9, comp. iii. 19), and perhaps to him belong the Satires also from which Fulgentius Planciades quotes a line. (Serv. Aen. i. 53.) We hear of a Gavius Bas- sus who was praefect of the Pontic coast under Trajan (Plin. Ep. x. 18, 32, 33), but those who would identify him with the person mentioned above have overlooked the circumstance that the author of the commentaries declares, that he beheld with his own eyes at Argos the famous equus Scianus, which was said to have belonged in suc- cession to Dolabella, Cassius, and M. Antonius; and hence it is clear that, unless in addition to its cession to Dolabella, Cassius, and M. Antonius; and hence it is clear that, unless in addition to its...

damus, and mother of Ilus and Erichthonius. The town of Bateia in Troas was believed to have de¬ tained the name from her. (Arrian, Anab., vi. 26. 5.) Tzetzes (ad Lyeogaph, 29) calls her a sister of Seamander, the father of Teucer by the nymph Idaca; and in another passage (ad Lyeogaph, 1296) he calls the daughter of Teucer, who mar¬

Brennus, Bathanatius led his people to the banks of the Danube, where they settled down. The way by which they returned received from their leader the name of Bathanatius; and his descendants were called

Bathanati. ( Athen. vi. p. 234, b.)

nevertheless advanced against Messallinus, and and gained a victory over him; but being shortly after defeated in his turn, he fled to his Breucian namesake. The two Batos now united their forces, and and took possession of the mountain Almus, near Sirti-mum, where they remained on the defensive, and and maintained themselves against the attacks of Cae-cina Severus. But after the latter had been recalled to Moesia by the ravages of the tribes bordering upon his province, the Batos, who had now no enemy to oppose them, since Tiberius and Messallinus were remaining at Siscia, left their position and induced many of the neighbouring tribes to join them. They undertook predatory incursions on every side, and carefully avoided an engagement with Tiberius. At the commencement of winter, they marched into Macedonia, but here they were defeated by the Thracian Rhymetalces and his broth Rascyporis, allies of the Romans.
The continuance of the war alarmed Augustus, who thought that it was purposely prolonged by Tiberius. Germanicus was accordingly sent into the disturbed districts in the following year (A. D.
7) with a fresh army, but Tiberius, it appears, not recalled, as he did not return to Rome till two years later. In the campaign of this year the Romans accomplished very little; the chief advantage which they gained was the conquest by Germanicus of the Mazaei, a Pannonian people. Next year (A. D. 8), the Pannonians and Batians were afflicted with famine and pestilence, in consequence of which, and of having suffered some reverses, they concluded a peace with the Romans.
When the Dalmatian Bato appeared before Tiberius to treat respecting the peace, and was asked why he had rebelled, he replied, "You are the cause.
Instead of sending dogs and shepherds to take care of your flocks, you send wolves."

This peace was of short duration. The Breucian Bato had betrayed to the Romans Pinnes or Pinetes, one of the principal Pannonian chiefs, and the Breucian and historian, who lived subsequently to Augustus, and of whom we have fragments of the following comedies by him: Haemonia. (Athen. vi.

Strab. xii. p. 546.) 2. On the tyrants of Ephesus.

BÁTON (Bátraw), a Greek rhetorician and historian, who lived subsequently to Augustus. His name is incorrectly written in some passages of the ancient authors, Batros, Batrow, Bátrow. (Plut. de Am. et Adul. p. 55; Suidas, s. v., Endoc. p. 93; Phot. Cod. 167; Stobaeus, Floril. xvii. 18; Athen. xiv. p. 662, c.; iv. p. 163, b.; vii. p. 279, c., xv. p. 678, f.)

BÁTARUS, a name which repeatedly occurs in the ancient poet "Diarie," or impreca-sions, ascribed to Virgil or the grammarian Valerius Cato, and respecting the meaning of which the commentators on this poem have entertained the most opposite opinions. Some have thought it to be the name of some locality, a tree, a river, a grove, or a hill, and the like; while others, and apparently with more reason, have considered it to be the name of a person. But those who entertain this latter opinion are again divided in regard to the person that may be meant. Some believe Batarus to be the name of the person who had taken possession by force of the estates, the loss of which was Am. el Adul. (Plut. Eudoc. p. 55; Suidas, s. v., Phot.
Thiersch, Epoch. Anm. p. 96.) That this tale is a mere fable founded on nothing but the appearance of the two figures on the columns, scarcely needs to be remarked.

Wernsdorff believes that it is only a fictitious name, and is meant to designate some satiric poet, perhaps Callimachus; others imagine that Batarus offered to surrender himself to Tiberius upon promise of pardon. This was promised, and Bato accompanied Tiberius to Rome, where he was the chief object of attraction in the triumph. Tiberius, however, kept his word. He sent Bato to Ravenna laden with presents, which were given him, according to Suetonius, because he had on one occasion allowed Tiberius to escape, when he was shut up with his army in disadvantageous ground.

BÁTARUS (Bátraw), a Lacedaemonian sculptor and architect of the time of Augustus.
Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 5, s. 14) relates, that Batra-chus and Sauras (Frog and Lizard), who were both very rich, built at their own expense two temples in Rome, one to Jupiter and the other to Juno, hoping they would be allowed to put their names in the inscription of the temples (inscriptionem operae). But being denied this, they made the figures of a frog and a lizard in the convolutions of the Ionic capitals (ta columnaum spiris, comp.
Thiersch, Epoch. Anm. p. 96.) That this tale is a mere fable founded on nothing but the appearance of the two figures on the columns, scarcely needs to be remarked.

[ W. I. ]

is merely a dialectic form for Bassaracs or Bassareans, a surname of Bacchus. Naece, lastly, conceives Battarus to be the name of a slave who was a skilful flute-player, or perhaps a shepherd, and who had formerly lived with the author of the "Diade" on his estate, and remained there after the poet had been driven from it. Each of these conflicting opinions is supported by something or other that occurs in the poem itself; but it is impossible to effect anything that would decide the question. (Wermadof, *Post. Lat. Min. iii. p. xviii. &c.; Naece, in the *Rhein. Mus. ii. 1. p. 118, &c.) [L.S.]

BATTUS (Barratus), count of the Cyrenaeans, Battus, having gone to Dionysus among the Satrae. (Herod, iv. 111.)

BATTUS (Barratus), son of Nucleus, who saw Hermes driving away the cattle he had stolen from Apollo. The god promised to reward him if he would not betray what he had seen. Battus promised on oath to keep the secret; but as Hermes mistrusted him nevertheless, he assumed a different appearance, returned to Battus, and promised him a handsome present, if he would tell him who had stolen the cattle of Apollo. The shepherd was tempted, and related all he knew, wherupon Hermes touched him with his staff, and changed him into a stone. (Ovid, *Met. ii. 600, &c.; Anton. Lib. 22.) [L.S.]

BATTUS and the BATTIADAEE (Barratos, Barratidæ), kings of Cyrene during eight generations. (Herod, iv. 163; comp. Thirge, *Res Cyren., § 42.)

BATTUS (Barroy), a shepherd of Neleus, who in the *Callim. Hymn, in *Apoll. Rhod. i. 1750; Thrige, *Res Cyren., §§ 8, 11.) He is said to have been first called "Aristoteles" (Pind. *Pyth. iv. 116; *Callim. Hymn. in *Apoll. 76); and we are left entirely to conjecture for the origin of the word "Battus," which he afterwards received. Herodotus (iv. 155) tells us, that it was the Libyan word for "king," and believes that the oracle which commanded the colonisation of Libya applied it to him with reference to his future dignity. Others again have supposed Battus to have been derived from Barratidæ, and to have been expressive of the alleged impudence in his speech. (Suid. and Hesych. s. v. Barratidæ; comp. Thirge, *Res Cyren., § 12; Stubb. xiv. p. 662;) while Thirge (L.c.) considers the name to be of kindred origin with Barsoi, the appellation of the oracular priests of Dionysus among the Satræ. (Herod. vii. 111.)

No less doubt is there as to the cause which led to the colonization of Cyrene. According to the account of the Cyrenaenians, Battus, having gone to consult the Delphic oracle about the removal of the physical defect above-mentioned, was enjoined to lead a colony into Libya; while the story of the Theraeans was, that this injunction was laid on them by Hermes, who was a son of No. 2, and the third king of Cyrene, with Libya in the act of crowning him. (Comp. Pind. *Pyth. iv. 120, &c.; Catull. vii. 6.) His subjects worshipped him as a hero, and we learn from Pausanias (x. 15), that they dedicated a statue of him at Delphi, representing him in a chariot driven by the nymph Cyrene, with Libya in the act of crowning him. (See Thirge, §§ 26, 28.)

2. ARCESILAUS I. (*Arcesilaus) was a son of the above (Herod. iv. 159); but nothing is recorded of him except that he reigned, and apparently in quiet, for 16 years, b.c. 529—513.

3. BATTUS II., assumed "the Happy," principally from his victory over Apries (Battos ο Εβαγια, was the son of No. 2, and the third king of the dynasty; for the opinion of those who consider that Herodotus has omitted two kings between Arcesilaus I. and the present Battus, is founded on an erroneous punctuation of iv. 158, and is otherwise encumbered with considerable chronological difficulties. (Thirge, §§ 29, 42, 43; comp. Pint. Cor. 11.) In this reign, Cyrene received a great accession of strength by the influx of a large number of colonists from various parts of Greece, principally perhaps from Peloponnesus and from Crete and the other islands, whom the state invited over under the promise of a new division of lands (probably to enable herself to make head against the neighbouring Libyans), and who were further urged to the migration by the Delphic oracle. (Herod. iv. 159, comp. c. 161.) This influx apparently giving rise to further en-for we read in Herodotus (iv. 159), that Archesilaus I. (Wesseling, ad Herod. l. c.) and, in other ways as well, cultivated friendly relations with the Cyrenaeans. By the same victory too the sovereignty of Cyrena over the Libyans was confirmed. (Comp. Herod. iv. 160, where their revolt from Archesilaus II. is spoken of.) It was in this reign also, according to a probable conjecture of Thrige’s (§ 30), that Cypreus began to occupy the neighbouring region with her colonies, which seem to have been numerous. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 20, 34, v. 20.) The period of the death of Battus II. is impossible to settle with exactness. We know only that his reign lasted beyond the year 570 B.C.; and it is pure conjecture which would assign the end of it, with Thrige, to 560, or, with Bouhier and Larcher, to 554. (Thrige, § 29; Larcher, ad Herod., iv. 163.)

4. ARCHESELAUS II., son of Battus II., was sur¬ named “the oppressive” (χαλαστός), from his at¬ tempting probably to substitute a tyranny for the Cyrenaean constitution, which had hitherto been similar to that of Sparta. It was perhaps from this cause that the dissensions arose between himself and his brothers, in consequence of which the latter withdrew from Cyrene, and founded Barca, at the same time exciting the Libyan tribes to re¬ volt from Archesilaus, who, in his attempt to quell this rebellion, suffered a signal defeat at Lencos or Lencos, a place in the region of Marmarica. He met his end at last by treachery, being strandied by his brother or friend, Learchus. His wife, Eryxos, however, soon after avenged his death by the mur¬ der of his assassin. His reign lasted, according to some, from 560 to 550 B.C.; according to others, from 554 to 544. (Herod. iv. 160; Diod. v. 222; Plut. de Virt. Mul. pp. 260, 261; Thrige, §§ 35, 37.)

5. BATTUS III., or “the lame” (χαλαστός), son of Archesilaus II., reigned from 550 to 530, or, as some state it, from 544 to 529. In his time, the Cyrenaeans, weakened by internal seditions, apprehensive of assaults from Libya and Egypt, and distracted too perhaps by the consciousness of the king’s inefficiency, invited Demonax, a Mantin¬ ean, by the advice of the Delphic oracle, to settle the constitution of the city. The conflicting claims of the original colonists with those of the later set¬ tlers, and the due distribution of power between the sovereign and the commonalty, were the main difficulties with which he had to deal. With re¬ spect to the former point, he substituted for the old division of tribes an entirely new one, in which he sought some privileges, in regard to their relation to the Hellenes, were reserved to those of Tharsian descent; while the royal power he reduced within very narrow limits, leaving to the king only cer¬ tain selected lands, and the enjoyment of some priestly functions (τερητικά κατ’ ησπευτρας), with the privilege probably (see Herod. iv. 165) of pre, sidency in the council. We hear nothing more recorded of Battus III. The diminution of the kingly power in his reign is not to be wondered at, when we remember that the two main causes assi¬ ded by Aristotle (Politi. v. 10, ad fin. ed. Bokk.) for the overthrow of monarchy had been, as we have seen, in full operation at Cyrene,—viz. qua¬ rels in the royal family, and the attempt to estab¬ lish a tyrannical government. (Herod. iv. 161; Diod. l. c.; Plut. l. c.; Thrige, §§ 58; Müller, Dor. iii. 4, § 5, iii. 9, § 13.)

6. ARCHESELAUS III., son of Battus III., by Pherecrite, reigned, according to Thrige (§ 39), from 530 to about 514 B.C. In the early part of his reign he was driven from Cyrene in an attempt to recover the ancient royal privileges, and, taking refuge in Samos, returned with a number of auxi¬ liaries, whom he had attached to his cause by the promise of a new division of lands. With their aid he regained the throne; on which, besides taking the most cruel vengeance on his enemies, he endeavoured further to strengthen himself by making submission to Cambyses, and stipulating to pay him tribute, n. c. 525. (Herod. iv. 162—165, comp. iii. 13, 91, ii. 181.) Terrified, how¬ ever, according to Herodotus (iv. 164), at the dis¬ covery that he had subjected himself to the woe denounced against him, under certain conditions, by an obscure oracle (comp. iv. 163), or, more proba¬ ably, being driven out by his subjects, who were exasperated at his submission to the Persians (see iv. 163, ad fin.), he fled to Almaz, king of Barca, whose daughter he had married, and was there slain, together with his father-in-law, by the Bar¬ ceanes and some Cyrenaeans exiles. (Herod. iv. 164, 167; see Thrige, §§ 39—41.)

7. BATTUS IV. is called “the Handsome” (μαλιστός) by Hellenides Ponticus. (See Thrige, § 38, n. 3. § 42.) It has been doubted by some whether there were any kings of the family after Archesilaus III., but this point seems to be settled by Her¬ odotus (iv. 163) and by Pindar. (Pyth. iv. 115.) The opinion of those, who suppose the names of two kings to have been omitted by Herodotus be¬	ween Archesilaus I. and Battus “the lame,” has been noticed above. Of Battus IV. we know no¬ ting. It is not improbable, however, that he was the son of Archesilaus III., and was in possess¬ ion of the throne at the period of the invasion of Barca by the Persians, about 512 B.C. (Herod. iv. 203.) At least the peaceable admission of the latter into Cyrene (Herod. l. c.) may seem to point to the prevalence there of a Medizing policy, such as we might expect from a son or near relative of Archesilaus III. The chronology of this reign is involved in as much obscurity as the events of it, and it is impossible therefore to assign any exact date either to its beginning or its end. (See Thrige, §§ 42—44.)

8. ARCHESELAUS IV., son probably of Battus IV., is the prince whose victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games, n. c. 466, is celebrated by Pindar in his 4th and 5th Pythian odes; and these, in fact, together with the Scholia upon them, are our only historical authority for the life and reign of this king of the Battides. From them, even in the midst of all the praises of him which they contain, it appears, that he endeavoured to make himself despotic, and had recourse, among other means, to the expedient (a favourite one with tyrants, see Aristot. Polit. iii. 13, v. 10, 11, ed. Bokk.) of ridding himself of the nobles of the state. Indeed one main object of Pindar in the 4th Pythian ode seems to have been to induce Aesclais to adopt a more prudent and moderate course, and in particular to recall Demophilus, a banished Cyrenaean nobleman, then living at Thebes. (See specially *Psych. iv. 463, &c., ιν δια τας βους, κ. θ. λ.; Böckh and Dissen, ad loc.) It is further probable (Thurgr, § 45), that the city "Hesperides" in the Cyrenaic Pentapolis (afterwards called "Berenice" from the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes) was founded by Aesclais IV., with the view of securing a retreat for himself in the event of the successful rebellion of his subjects. It is not known whether he died by violence or not; but after his death royalty was abolished, and his son Battus, who had fled to Hesperides, was there murdered, and his head was thrown into the sea. Various dates have been assigned for the conclusion of the dynasty of the Battidae; but nothing is certain, except that it could not have ended before b.c. 460, in which year Aesclais IV. won the chariot-race at Olympia,—nor after 401, when we hear of violent seditions between the Cyrenaean nobles and populace. (Diod. xiv. 34; Arist. *Politii. vi. 4, ed. Bekk.) Thrige is disposed to place the commencement of popular government about 450. (Res Cyrenaicas, §§ 24, 45, 46, 48; comp. Müller, *Dor. iii. 9, § 13.) The father of Callimachus was a Cyrenaean of the name of Battus (Suidas, s. v. *Kalliasxos); and the poet, who is often called "Battidae," seems to have claimed descent from the royal blood. (Callim. *Hymn in Apoll. 65, &c., Εν Ιο. 37; Ovid. *Trist. ii. 357; Catull. 66.) [E. B.]

BAUCIS (Baoxai or Baœxai), a mythical woman of Eleusis, whom Hesychius calls the nurse of Demeter; but the common story runs thus:—on her wanderings in search of her daughter, Demeter came to Baubo, who received her hospitably, and offered her something to drink; but when the goddess, being too much under the influence of grief, refused to drink, Baubo made such a strange gesture, that the goddess smiled and accepted the draught. (Clem. *Alex. Cohort, p. 17.) In the fragment of the Orphic hymn, which Clemens Alex. adds to this account, it is further related, that a boy of the name of Iacchus made an indecent gesture at the grief of Demeter. Arnobius (*Aevo. Gent. v. p. 175) repeats the story of Baubo from Clemens, but without mentioning the boy Iacchus, who is otherwise unknown, and, if meant for Dionysus, is out of place here. The different stories concerning the reception of Demeter at Eleusis seem all to be inventions of later times, coined for the purpose of giving a mythical origin to the jokes in which the women used to indulge at the festival of this goddess. [ASCALABUS AND ASCALAPHUS, No. 2.] [LS.]

BAUCIS, a Phrygian woman, in whose humble dwelling Jupiter and Mercury were hospitably received, after having been refused admission by every one else in the country. Baucis and her husband Philonem were therefore saved by the gods when they visited the country with an inundation; and Jupiter made Baucis and Philonem priests in his temple; and when the two mortals exclaiming 'We die together. Jupiter granted their request by changing them simultaneously into trees. (Or. Met. viii. 620—724.) [LS.]

BAUCIS (Bawxis), a Greek poetess, who is called a disciple of Sappho. She was a native of Tenos, and a friend of Erinna. She died at a youthful age, just before her marriage, and Erinna is said to have written the epitaph upon her which is still extant, and which, together with another fragment of Erinna, contains all we know about Baucis. (Anthol. Gr. vii. 710, 712; Bergk, *Pod. Lyr. Gr. p. 633.) [LS.]

BA'VIUS and MAE'VIUS, whose names have become a by-word of scorn for all jealous and malvolent poetasters, owe their unenviable immortality solely to the enmity which they displayed towards the rising genius of the most distinguished of their contemporaries, and would probably never have been heard of but for the well-known line of Virgil (Ecl. iii. 90): "Qui Baviun non obit amitt curmina, Maevi," the Epode of Horace where evil fortune is heartily anticipated to the ship which bore "rank Maevius" as its freight, and a rustic epigram by Domitian Marus, in which one and probably both are wittily assailed. Upon the first of these passages we have the remark of Servius, "Maevius et Bavius pessimi fuerunt poetae, inimici tam Horatio quam Virgilio, unde Horatius Epod. x. etc." and again, upon the "servte hordeae campis," in *Georgic. i. 210, the same commentator observes, "sane reprehensus Virgilius dicitur a Baviio et Maevio hoo versa hordea qui dixit, superest ut triticia dicat," from which it would appear, that their attack was in the form of a poetical satire, and was moreover a joint undertaking. Philargyrius, in his exposition of the third Eclogue, after giving the same account of these personages as Servius, adds, that M. Bavius was a "curator," a designation so indefinite, that it determines nothing except the fact that he enjoyed some public appointment. Finally, St. Jerome, in the Eusebian chronicle, records that M. Bavius, the poet, stigmatised by Virgil in his Bucolics, died in Cappadocia, in the third year of the hundred and eighty-sixth Olympiad, that is, u.c. 35. Porphyryn (ad Hor. Sat. i. 5. 299) tells us, that Maevius was the author of a work upon the son of Aeacopus the tragedian, and his luxury; the old Scholiast published by Longinus (Epod. x.) observes, "Maevius poeta fuit inimicus Homitii, obtructor certe omnium virorum doctorum, ipsa sectator vocum antiquarum," and an early annotator upon the *Ibis (i. 525) asserts, that Maevius is the person there spoken of who lampooned the Athenians, was thrown into prison in consequence, and starved to death; but this story has not found credit among scholars, although many disputes have arisen as to the individual actually referred to.

To one or other of these worthies has been attributed the practical jokes played off upon Virgil, who, when rehearsing the first book of his *Georgics, having chanced to make a pause after the words

"Nudus ara, sere nudus—" some one of the audience completed the verse by exclaiming —habeatis frigore febrem.

And to them also has been ascribed the *Anti- hydraulic, Two Pastoral Written expressely as a parody upon the Eclogues written by a. upon their publication. (Donat. *Vit. Pery. vii. § 28. xvi. § 61; Weichert, *Post. Lat. Reliqu., sec. p. 308, &c.) [W. R.]

BE'BRIUS MASSA. [Massa.]

BEBRYCE (Beßphcrist), one of the Danaids, whom Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5) calls Bryce, and BELISARIUS.

from whom the Bebryces in Bithynia were believed to have derived their name. (Eustath. ad Diog. Perieg. 395.) Others however derived the Bebryces from a hero, Bebryx. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Bebryxov.)

BEDAS, a sculptor, the son and pupil of Lyssippus, sculptured a praying youth (Plin. v. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), probably the original of which the fine bronze statue in Berlin is a copy. [W. I.]

BEGOE, an Etruscan nymph, who was believed to have written the Ars fylgiritarorum, probably the art of purifying places which had been struck by lightning. This religious book was kept at Rome in the temple of Apollo together with the Sibylline books and the Carmina of the Marsei. (Serv. ad Aen. vi. 72.) [L. S.]

BELIUS. [ABELID.]

BELESIS or BELESYS (Blaesos, Blaeus), the noblest of the Chaldaean priests at Babylon, who, according to the account of Ctesias, is said, in conjunction with Arbaces, the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. [ARBACES.]

Belises afterwards received the satrapy of Babylon from Arbaces. (Diod. ii. 24, &c. 28.)

BELIUS or BOLIUS (Bályovs), the leader of that division of the Gaulish army which invaded Macedonia and Ilyrnia in a. d. 180. He defeated the Macedonians in a great battle, in which Ptolemy Cennan, who had then the supreme power in Macedonia, was killed; but the Gauls did not follow up their victory, and the rest of Greece was spared for a time. (Paus. x. 19. § 4; Justin. xxiv. 5.)

BELISARIUS (the name is Belis-tar, Selavonic for "White Prince"), remarkable as being the greatest, if not the only great general, the Byzantine empire ever produced. He was born about a. d. 505 (comp. Procop. Goth, i. 5, Pers. i. 12) at Germania, a town of Ilyrnia. (Procop. Vand. i. 11, de Aedif. iv. 1.) His public life is so much mixed up with the history of the times, that it need not here be given except in outline, and his private life is known to us only through the narrative of the licentiousness and intrigues of his unworthy wife Antonina in the Secret History of Procopias. He first appears as a young man in the service of Justinian under the emperor Justin I. a. d. 520—527 (Procop. Pers. i. 12), and on the accession of the former, was made general of the Eastern armies, to check the inroads of the Persians, a. d. 529—532 (Procop. Pers. i. 13—21); shortly after which he married Antonina, a woman of wealth and rank, but of low birth and morals, and following the profession of an actress. (Procop. Hist. Arcan. 3, 4.)

The two great scenes of his history were the wars against the Vandals in Africa, and against the Ostrogoths in Italy.

1. The African expedition (a. d. 533, 534) was speedily ended by the taking of Carthage, the capture of the Vandal king, Gelimer, and the final overthrow of the Vandal kingdom established in Africa. (Procop. Vand. i. 11, ii. 8.) His triumph in 534 was remarkable as being the first ever seen at Constantinople, and the first ever enjoyed by a subject since the reign of Tiberius. Amongst his conquests were the Siculo-Sabaean and the spoils of the Vandal kingdom contained the vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, that had been carried from Rome to Carthage by Genseric. He also (alone of Roman citizens besides Bonifacius) had medals struck in his honour, with his head on the reverse (Cedrenus, i. 370), and on Jan. 1, a. d. 535, was inaugurated with great splendour as consul, and with a second triumph, conducted however not according to the new imperial, but the old republican forms. (Procop. Vandal. ii. 9.)

2. The Gothic war consists of two acts, the first (a. d. 535—540), the second (a. d. 544—548). The first began in the claims laid by Justinian to Sicily, and in his demand for the abdication of the feeble Gothic king, Theodatus. It was marked by Belisarius's conquest of Sicily (535) and Naples (537), by his successful defence of Rome against the newly elected and energetic king of the Goths, Vitiges (March, 537—March, 538), and by the capture of Ravenna with Vitiges himself, Dec. 539. (Procop. Goth. i. 5, ii. 30.) He was then recalled by the jealousy of Justinian and the intrigues of rival generals, without even the honours of a triumph. (Procop. Goth. iii. 1.)

The interval between the two Gothic wars was occupied by his defence of the eastern frontier against the inroads of the Persians under Nushiryan or Chosroe (541—543) (Procop. Pers. i. 23), from which he was again recalled by the intrigues of the emperor Theodora, and of his wife Antonina, and escaped the sentence of death only by a heavy fine, and by his complete submission to his wife. (Procop. Hist. Arcan. 3, 4.)

The second act of the Gothic war, which Belisarius undertook in the office of count of the stables, arose from the revolt of the Goths and reconquest of Italy under their new king, Totila, a. d. 541—544. (Procop. Goth. iii. 2—9.) Belisarius, on arriving in Italy, made a vigorous but vain endeavour to seize the siege of Rome (May, 546—Feb. 547), and then kept in check the hostilities of the conquerors, and when they left the city, recovered and successfully defended it against them. (Procop. Goth. iii. 13—24.) His career was again cut short by the intrigues of the Byzantine court, and after a brief campaign in Lucania, he returned from Italy, Sept. a. d. 548 (Procop. Goth. iii. 29—32), and left his victories to be completed by his rival Naraces in the complete overthrow of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna. (Procop. Goth. iv. 21—35.) (A. D. 549—554.)

The last victory of Belisarius was gained in repelling an inroad of the Bulgarians, a. d. 559. (Agath. Hist. v. 15—20; Theophanes, pp. 188, 189.) In a. d. 563 he was accused of a conspiracy against the life of Justinian, and his fortune was sequestered. All that is certain after this is, that he died on the 13th of March, a. d. 565. (Theophanes pp. 160, 162.)

It is remarkable that whilst his life is preserved to us with more than usual accuracy—by the fact of the historian Procopius having been his secretary (Procop. Pers. i. 12), and having published both a public and private history of the times—the circumstances of his disgrace and death are involved in great uncertainty, and historical truth has in popular fame been almost eclipsed by romance. This arises from the termination of the contemporary histories of Procopius and Agathias before the event in question; and in the void thus left, Gibbon (after Alemann) follows the story of John Malala (p. 242), and of Theophanes (pp. 159—162), that he was merely imprisoned for a year in his own palace (A. d. 565, 564) and restored to his honours eight months before his death; whilst Lord Mahon in his recent life of Belisarius, on the authority of an anonymous writer of the eleventh century, and of Tzetzes in the twelfth century, has endeavoured to revive the story which he conceives to have been handed down by tradition in Constantinople,—which was then transferred in the fifteenth century to Italy,—and which has since become so famous through the French romance of Marmontel, that his eyes were put out, and that he passed the remainder of his life sitting in the streets of Constantinople and begging in the words preserved in the metrical narrative of Tzetzes. The statue in the Villa Borghese, in a sitting posture with an open hand, formerly ascribed to Belisarius, has since the time of Winkelmann been generally conjectured to represent Augustus in the act of propitiating Nemesis.

In person, Belisarius was tall and handsome. (Procop. Goth. iii. 1.) As a general, he was distinguished as well by his personal prowess and his unconquerable presence of mind, as by the rapidity and comprehensiveness of his movements, and also as never having sustained defeat without good reason, and as having effected the greatest conquests with the smallest resources. His campaigns form an era in military history, as being the first conducted by a really great soldier under the influence of Christianity (for that he conformed to Christianity, even if he was not himself a Christian, is evident from his mention in connexion with the baptism of Theodosius, Procop. Hist. Arcan. 1.), and it is remarkable to trace the union of his rigorous discipline over his army (Procop. Goth. i. 28, Vand. i. 12, 16) with his considerate humanity towards the conquered, and (especially in contrast with the earlier spirit of Roman generals) his forbearance towards his enemies. (Procop. Vand. i. 16, 17, Goth. i. 10.)

In a private capacity, he was temperate, chaste, and brave; but his characteristic virtue, which appeared to Gibbon "either below or above the character of a man," was the patience with which he endured his rivals' insults, and the loyalty to Justinian,—in itself remarkable as one of the earliest instances in European history of loyalty to the person of the sovereign—which caused him at the height of his success and power to return, at the emperor's order, from Africa, Persia, and Italy. Sir W. Temple (Works, vol. ii. p. 236) places him among the seven generals in the history of the world who have deserved a crown without wearing it.

In his two vices—the avanice of his later life (Procop. Hist. Arcan. 5), and his uxoriousness—he has been well compared to Marlborough, except so far as the great Sarah was superior to the infamous Antonina. To her influence over him are to be ascribed the only great blots of his life—the execution of his officer, Constantine (Procop. Hist. 1.), A.D. 555, the persecution of his step-son, Photius (Hist. 1—3), p. 54, and the deposition of the pope Sylvesters and the corrupt election of Vigilius, A.D. 557. (Goth. i. 25.) He had by Antonina an only daughter, Joannina. (Procop. Hist. Arcan. 1. 5, Goth. iii. 30.)

The effects of his career are—1. The preservation of the Byzantine empire, and, with it, of the mass of ancient literature afterwards bequeathed by it to the West; both of which, but for his prepenance, must, humanly speaking, have perished in the inroad of the barbarians. 2. The timely support given to the cause of the orthodox faith in the Western empire at the crisis of its greatest oppression by the Arian kingdoms of the Goths and Vandals in all the western provinces. 3. The temporary infusion of Byzantine art and of the Greek language into Italy by the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna on the ruins of the Ostrogothic kingdom. 4. The substitution of the Byzantine for the Vandal dominion in Africa and Sicily, and the consequent preparation for their future submission to the Mohammedi conquerors, and their permanent desolation, from the fact of his having made them the provinces of a distant and declining empire, instead of leaving them to become the homes of a warlike and vigorous nation.

The authorities for the life of Belisarius are the works of Procopius; for the Bulgarian war, Agathias (v. 15, 20) and Theophanes (pp. 198, 199); and for his death, those mentioned above. In modern times, the chief authority is Gibbon (ec. 41 and 43); Lord Mahon's Life of Belisarius, in which several inaccuracies in Gibbon's account are pointed out; and a review of this last-mentioned work in the Wiener Jahrbücher, by Von Hammer. [A. P. S.]

BELLEROPHON or BELLEROPHONTES (Bellerophōn or Bellerophontes), properly called Hippocoon, was a son of the Corinthian king Glauceus and Eurymede, and a grandson of Sisyphus. (Apollod. i. 9, § 3; Hom. H. vii. 155.) According to Hyginus (Fab. 157; comp. Pind. Ol. xiii. 66), he was a son of Poseidon and Eurymede. He is said to have received the name Bellerophon or Bellerophontes from having slain the noble Corinthian, Bellerus. (Tzet. ad Lygoch. 17; Eustath. Hom. p. 632.) Others related, that he had slain his own brother, Deliades, Peiren, or Alcimenes. (Apollod. ii. 3, § 1, &c.) In order to be purified from the murder, whichever it may have been, he fled to Proetus, whose wife Antea fell in love with the young hero; but her offers being rejected by him, she accused him to her husband of having made improper proposals to her, and insisted upon his being put to death. Proetus, unwilling to kill him with his own hands, sent him to his father-in-law, Iobates, king in Lycia, with a sealed letter in which the latter was requested to put the young man to death. Iobates accordingly sent him to kill the monster Chimæra, thinking that he was sure to perish in the contest. Bellerophon mounted the winged horse, Pegasus, and rising up with him into the air, killed the Chimæra from on high with his arrows. Iobates, being thus disappointed, sent Bellerophon out again, first against the Solymi and next against the Amazons. In these contests too he was victorious; and when, on his return to Lycia, he was attacked by the bravest Lyceans, whom Iobates had placed in ambush for the purpose, Bellerophon slew them all. Iobates, now seeing that it was hopeless to attempt to kill the hero, showed him the letter he had received from Proetus, gave him his daughter (Philonoë, Antideia, or Casandrē) for his wife, and made him his successor on the throne. Bellerophon became the father of Isander, Hippolochus, and Latoæma. Here Apollodoros breaks off the story; and Homer, whose account (vi. 155—202) differs in some points from that of Apollodoros, describes the later period of Bellerphon's life only by saying, that he drew upon himself the hatred of the gods, and, consumed by grief, wandered lonely through the Alcian field, avoiding the paths of men. We must here remark with Baccelianthus, that Homer knows nothing of Bellophron killing the Chimaira with the help of Pegasus, which must therefore be regarded in all probability as a later embellishment of the story. The manner in which he destroyed the Chimaira is thus described by Tzetzes (L. 6.): he fixed lead to the point in the paths of men. We must here remark with Pindar (vii. 44; SchoL in consequence. (Pind. De Virt. Mid.)

some traditions stated, that he attempted to rise with Pegasus into heaven, but that Zeus sent a bloody scourge. (Virg. Aen. viii. 703; Lucan, Phars. viii. 566; Horat. Sat. ii. 3. 223.) The main object for which Bellona was worshipped and invoked, was to grant a warlike spirit and enthusiasm which no enemy could resist; and it was for this reason, for she had been worshipped at Rome from early times (Liv. viii. 9), that in n. c. 296, during the war against the Samnites, Appius Claudius the Blind vowed the first temple of Bellona, which was accordingly erected in the Campus Martius close by the Circus Flaminius. (Liv. Fast. vi. 201, &c.) This temple subsequently became of great political importance, for in it the senate assembled to give audience to foreign ambassadors, whom it was not thought proper to admit into the city, to generals who returned from a campaign for which they claimed the honour of a triumph, and on other occasions. (Liv. xxviii. 9, xxx. 21; Dict. of Ant. s. e. Legates.) In front of the entrance to the temple there stood a pillar, which served for making the symbolical declarations of war; for the area of the temple was regarded as a symbolical representation of the enemies' country, and the pillar as that of the frontier, and the declaration of war was made by launching a spear over the pillar. This ceremony, so long as the Roman dominion was of small extent, had been performed on the actual frontier of the enemy's country. (Ov. Post. vi. 265, &c.; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 53; Liv. i. 32; Dict. of Ant. s. t. Petiales.) The priests of Bellona were called Belloni, and when they offered sacrifices to her, they had to wound their own arms or legs, and either to offer up the blood or drink it themselves, in order to become inspired with a warlike enthusiasm. This sacrifice, which was afterwards softened down into a mere symbolic act, took place on the 24th of March, which day was called diei sanguinis for this reason. (Lucan, i. 566; Martial, xii. 57; Tertull. Apolog. 8; Lacant. i. 21; comp. Heindorf, ad Hor. Sat. i. e.; Hartung, Die Religi. der Römer, ii. p. 279, &c.; C. Tiesler, De Bellonae Cultu et Sacris, Berlin, 1866.)

BELLOVESUS. [AMBRIGIATUS.]

BELUS (Bjvdisp). 1. A son of Poseidon by Libya or Eurynome. He was a twin-brother of Agenor, and father of Aegyptus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several eastern nations, from whence the legends about him were transplanted to Greece and became mixed up with Greek myths. (Apoll. i. i. § 4; Diod. i. 29; Serv. ad Aen. i. 733.)

2. The father of Dido, who conquered Cyprus and then gave it to Teucer. (Virg. Aen. i. 621; Serv. ad Aen. i. 625, 640.)

C. BELLION, a distinguished Roman orator and jurist, who was prevented by the disorders which occurred in the time of Marius from attaining the consulship. (Cic. Brut. 47.) He is supposed by Trietannis (Comm. P. i. p. 90) to be the same person with C. Annius Bellius mentioned above [No. 3], but Ernesti (Clav. Cz.) repudiates this conjecture, as not easily reconcileable with dates. [J. T. G.]

BELLIUS, a Roman prator, who was taken prisoner by the pirates, about n. c. 68 (Plut. Pontop. 24; comp. Appian, Mithr. 93), may perhaps be a false reading for Bellius.

BELLONA, the goddess of war among the Romans. It is very probable that originally Bel-lona was a Sabine divinity whose worship was carried to Rome by the Sabine settlers. She is frequently mentioned by the later Roman poets in connexion of Mars, or even as his sister or his wife. Virgil describes her as armed with a scourge. (Virg. Aen. viii. 703; Lucan, Phars. viii. 566; Horat. Sat. ii. 3. 223.) The main object for which Bellona was worshipped and invoked, was to grant a war-like spirit and enthusiasm which no enemy could resist; and it was for this reason, for she had been wor-

BERENICE.

BERELIUS, C. SICINIUS, was the leader of the plebs in their accession to the Sacred Mountain, b. c. 494, and was afterwards one of the first tribunes of the plebs elected in that year. (Liv. ii. 32, 33; Dionys. vi. 45, 70, 72, 82, 89.) He was plebeian noble in 499 (Dionys. vii. 14), and tribune again in 491, when he distinguished himself by his attacks upon Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in that year. (Dionys. vii. 33-39, 61.) Asconius calls him (in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli) L. Sicinius L. f. Bellutus.

It is most probable that his descendants, one of whom was Electus V, who also was elected tribune in b. c. 449 (Liv. iii. 54), also bore the cognomen Bellutus; but as they are not mentioned by this name in ancient writers, they are given under Sicinius.

DEMARCHUS (Boubydraco), a Greek sophist and rhetorician of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who lived in or shortly after the time of the emperor Constantine, whose history he wrote in a work consisting of ten books. He also wrote declamations and various orations; but none of his works have come down to us. (Suidas, s. v. Boubydracos; Lib. Orient. p. 24, &c., ed. Reiske.) [L. S.]

BENDIS (Bédris), a Thracian divinity in whom the moon was worshipped. Hesychius (s. v. Δηλογχως) says, that the poet Callinus called this goddess Δηλογχως, either because she had to discharge two duties, one towards heaven and the other towards the earth, or because she bore two lances, or lastly, because she had two lights, the one her own and the other derived from the sun. In Greece she was sometimes identified with Persephone, but more commonly with Artemis. (Proclus, Theol. p. 353.) From an expression of Aristophanes, who in his comedy "The Lemnian Women" called her the μεγάλη Σελς (Phot. Lex. and Hesych. s. v.), it may be inferred, that she was worshipped in Lemnos; and it was either from this island or from Thrace that her worship was introduced into Attica; for we know, that as early as the time of Plato the Bendideion were celebrated in Peiraeus every year on the twentieth of Thargelion. (He- sach. s. v. Βεδίδις; Plut. Rep. l. i.; Proclus, ad Tym. p. 9; Xen. Hel. ii. 4. § 11; Strab. x. p. 471; Liv. xxxvii. 41.) [L. S.]

BERRYCHTHIA (Βερρυκθεία), a surname of Cybele, which she derived either from Mount Berycynthus, or from a fortified place of that name in Phrygia, where she was particularly worshipped. Mount Berycynthus again derived its name from Berycynthus, a priest of Cybele. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 246; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 82, vi. 785; Strab. x. p. 472; Plut. de Plunm. 10.) [L. S.]

BERENICE (Βερενίκη), a Macedonian form of Pherecina (Φερεχίνη). 1. Egyptian Berenices.

1. A daughter of Lagus by Antigone, niece of Antipater, was married first to Philip, an obscure Macedonian, and afterwards to Ptolemy Soter (the reputed son of Lagus by Arsinoe), who fell in love with her when she came to Egypt in attendance on his bride Eurydice, Antipater's daughter. (Schol. ad Thuc. I. xii. 61; Paus. i. 6, 7.) She had such influence over her husband that she procured the succession to the throne for her son Ptolemy Philadelphus, to the exclusion of Eurydice's children—and this, too, in spite of the remonstrances of Demetrius of Phalerus with the king. (Just. xvi. 2; Diog. Laërt. v. 78; comp. Ael. V. ii. iii. 17.) Plutarch speaks of her as the first in virtue and wisdom of the wives of Ptolemy, and relates that Pyrrhus of Epirus, when he was placed with Ptolemy as a hostage for Demetrius, courted her favour especially, and received in marriage Antigone, her daughter by her first husband Philip. Pyrrhus is also said to have given the name of "Berenice," in honour of her, to a city which he built in Epirus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4, 6.) After her death her son Philadelphus instituted divine honours to her, and Theocritus (Idyll. xvii. 34, &c., 123) celebrates her beauty, virtue, and deification. See also Athen. v. pp. 202, d., 203, a.; Theoc. Idyll. xv. 106; and the pretty Epigram (55) of Callimachus. It seems doubtful whether the Berenice, whose humane interference with her husband on behalf of criminals is referred to by Adianus (V. H. xiv. 63), is the subject of the present article, or the wife of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes.) See Perimu. ad Ael. l. c.

2. Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, became the wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, according to the terms of the treaty between him and Ptolemy, b. c. 249, which required him to divorce Laodice and marry the Egyptian princess, establishing also the issue of the latter as his successors. On the death, however, of Ptolemy, b. c. 247, Antiochus put Berenice away and recalled Laodice, who notwithstanding, having no faith in his constancy, caused him to be poisoned. Berenice fled in alarm to Daphne with her son, where being besiegled they fell into the hands of Laodice's partizans, and were murdered with all their Egyptian attendants, the forces of the Asiatic cities and of Ptolemy Euergetes (brother of Berenice) arriving only in time to avenge them. These events are prophetically referred to by Daniel in the clearest manner. (Polyp. Fragm. Hist. 54, v. 58, ad fin.; Athen. ii. p. 45, c.; Just. xxvii. 1; Polyba. xv. 50; Appian, Syr. 65, p. 130; Dan. xi. 6, and Hiero. ad loc.)

3. Grand-daughter of Berenice, No. i, and daughter of Magas, who was first governor and then king of Cyrene. Athenaeus (xv. p. 689, a.) calls her, if we follow the common reading, "Berenice the Great," but perhaps η Μαγας should be substituted for η μεγάλη. (Schweig. ad Athen. l. c.) She was betrothed by her father to Ptolemy Euergetes, as one of the terms of the peace between himself and his half-brother Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), the father of Euergetes.
BERENICE.

Magns died, however, before the treaty was executed, and his wife Arsinoe* (Just. xxi. 3), to prevent the marriage of Berenice with Ptolemy, offered her, together with the kingdom, to Demetrius, brother of Antigonus Gonatas. On his arrival, however, at Cyrene, Arsinoe fell in love with him herself, and Berenice accordingly, whom he had slighted, caused him to be murdered in the very arms of her mother; she then went to Egypt, and became the wife of Ptolemy. When her son, Ptolemy IV. (Philipotar), came to the throne, n. c. 221, he put her and his brother Magas to death, at the instigation of his prime minister Sostratus, and against the remonstrances of the Cionone III. of Syrinx. The marriage of Berenice, which is mentioned above, was celebrated by Callimachus in a poem, which, with the exception of a few lines, is lost. There is, however, a translation of it by Catullus, which has been retranslated into indifferent Greek verse by Salvini the Florentine. (Polyb. v. 36, xxv. 23; Just. xxi. 3, xxx. 1; Plut. Demetr. ad fin.; Clem. iii. 33; Catull. xvi. 20; Moret. ad loc.; Hygin. Poet. Astron. i. 24; Thirge, Rer. Cyren. §§ 58—61.) Hyginus (l.c.) speaks of Berenice as the daughter of Ptolemy II. and Arsinoe (No. 2, p. 366, b.) ; but the account above given rests on far better authority. And though Catullus, translating Callimachus, calls her the sister of her husband Euergetes, yet this may merely mean that she was his cousin, or may also be explained from the custom of the queens of the Ptolemies being called their sisters as a title of honour; and thus in either way may we reconcile Callimachus with Polybius and Justin. (See Thirge, Res Cyren. § 61; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexanders, Tabb. xiv. xv.)

4. Otherwise called Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy IX. (Lathyms), succeeded her father on the throne, n. c. 211, and married her first cousin, Alexander II., son of Alexander I., and grandson of Ptolemy VIII. (Physcon), whom Sutis, then dictator, had sent to Egypt to take possession of the kingdom. Nineteen days after her marriage she was murdered by her husband, and Appian tells us, that he was himself put to death by his subjects about the same time; but this is doubtful. (Paus. i. 9; Appian, Bell. Civ. i. p. 414; but see Cie. de Leg. Agr. ii. 16; Appian, Mithr. p. 251.)

5. Daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and eldest sister of the famous Cleopatra (Strab. xii. p. 558), was placed on the throne by the Alexandrines when they drove out her father, n. c. 38. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 12, &c.; Liv. Epit. 104; Plut. Cat. Min. 35; Strab. xvii. p. 780.) She married first Seleucus Cynocrates, brother of Antiochus XIII. (Amunius) of Syria, who had some claim to the throne of Egypt through his mother Seleene, the sister of Lathyrs. Berenice, however, was soon disgusted with the sordid character of Seleucus, and caused him to be put to death. (Strab. i. c.; Dion Cass. xxxix. 57; comp. Sueton. Vespas. 19.) She next married Archelaus, whom Pompy had made priest and king of Comana in Pontus, or, according to another account, in Cappadocia; but, six months after this, Auletes was restored to his kingdom by the Romans under Gabbinius, and Archelaus and Berenice were slain, n. c. 55. (Liv. Epit. 105; Dion Cass. xxxix. 55—58; Strab. xvii. p. 796, xii. p. 558; Hirt. de Bell. Alc. 66; Plut. Ant. 3; comp. Cie. ad Fam. i. 1—7, ad Q. Fr. ii. 2.)

II. Jewish Berenices.

1. Daughter of Costobarus and Salome, sister of Herod the Great, was married to Aristobulus, her first cousin. [ARISTOBULUS, No. 4.] This prince, proud of his descent through Mariamne from the line of the Maccabees, is said by Josephus to have taunted Berenice with her inferiority of birth, and her consequent complaints to Salome served to increase that hostility of the latter to Aristobulus which mainly caused his death. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, 94, xvi. 1. §§ 2, 4, 1, 7, 3; Bell. Jud. i. 29, § 1, 24, § 3.) After his execution, n. c. 6, Berenice became the wife of Thnodion, maternal uncle to Antipater the eldest son of Herod the Great—Antipater having brought about the marriage with the view of conciliating Salome and disarming her suspicions of himself. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1. § 1; Bell. Jud. i. 38. § 1.) Josephus does not mention the death of Thnodion, but it is probable that he suffered for his share in Antipater’s plot against the life of Herod. [See p. 203, a.] (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4. § 2; Bell. Jud. i. 30, § 5.)

Berenice certainly appears to have been again a widow when she accompanied her mother to Rome with Archelaus, who went thither at the commencement of his reign to obtain from Augustus the ratification of his father’s will. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9. §§ 3; Bell. Jud. ii. 2. § 1.) At Rome she seems to have continued for the rest of her life, enjoying the favour of Augustus and the friendship of Antonio, wife of the elder Drusus. [ANTONIA, No. 6.] Antonio’s affection, indeed, for Berenice exhibited itself even after the death of the latter, and during the reign of Tiberius, in offices of substantial kindness to her son Agrippa I., whom she furnished with the means of discharging his debt to the treasury of the empress. (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9. §§ 1—6.)

2. The eldest daughter of Agrippa I., by his wife Cyprus, was capussed at a very early age to Marcus, son of Alexander the Ababarch; but he died before the consummation of the marriage, and she then became the wife of her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons. (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 3. § 4; xix. 5. §§ 1, 5, 2, 7, 3; Bell. Jud. ii. 2. § 6.) After the death of Herod, a. d. 48, Berenice, then 30 years old, lived for a considerable time with her brother, and not without suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him, to avoid the scandal of which she induced Poleman, king of Cilicia, to marry her; but she soon deserted him and returned to Agrippa, with whom she was living in a. d. 62, when St. Paul defended himself before him at Caesarea. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7. § 3; Juvi. vi. 156; Acts. xxv. xxvi.) About a. d. 65, we hear of her being at Jerusalem (whether she had gone there for the performance of a vow), and interceding for the Jews with Gessius Florus, at the risk of her life, during his cruel massacre of them. (Joseph. Bell. Jud. i. 15. § 1.) Together with her brother, she endeavoured to divert her countrymen from their... purpose of rebellion (Bell. Jud. ii. 16. § 5); and having joined the Romans with him on the outbreak of the war, she gained the favour of Vespasian; but the fear of offending the Romans by such a step compelled him to dismiss her, and, though she afterwards returned to Rome, she still avoided a renewal of their intimacy. (Tac. Hist. ii. 2, 81; Suet. Tit. 7; Dion Cass. xvi. 15, 18.) Quintilian (Inst. Orat. iv. 18.) speaks of having pleased her cause on some occasion, not further alluded to, on which she herself sat as judge. [E.E.]

BERISADES (Bepiápñjv), a ruler in Thrace, who inherited, in conjunction with Amaduces and Cersobleptes, the dominions of Cotys on the death of the latter in B.C. 338. Berisades was probably a son of Cotys and a brother of the other two princes. His reign was short, as he was already dead in B.C. 352; and on his death Cersobleptes declared war against his children. (Dem. in Aristoc. pp. 623, 624.) The Birisades (Bepiápñjv) mentioned by Deinarchus (c. Dem. p. 95) is probably the same as Parisades, the king of Bosporus, who must not be confounded with the Berisades mentioned above. The Berisades, king of Pontus, whom Stratonice, the player on the lyre, visited (Athen. viii. p. 649, d.), must also be regarded as the same as Parisades. [PARISADES.]

BEROB (Bepoúv), a Trojan woman, married to Doryclus, one of the companions of Aeneas. Iris assumed the appearance of Berob when she persuaded the women to set fire to the ships of Aeneas on the coast of Sicily. (Virg. Aen. v. 620, &c.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name, concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Hyl. Fab. 167; Virg. Georg. iv. 341; Nonnus, Dionys. xii. 155.) [L.S.]

BEROB, the wife of Glaucias, an Illyrian king, took charge of Pyrrhus when his father, Aecidius, was expelled from Epirus in B.C. 316. (Justin, xvii. 3.)

BERONICIANUS (Bepomiaros), of Sardis, a philosopher of considerable reputation, mentioned only by Eunapius. (Plin. Soph. sub fin.)

BERO'SUS (Bepi<pt£$rjS), a priest of Belus at Babylon, and an historian. His name is usually considered to be the same as Bar or Her Sosos, that is, son of Osias. (Scalig. Anecd. ed. Excub. p. 245.) He was born in the reign of Alexander the Great, and lived till that of Antiochus II., surmamed Osias (b. c. 261-246), in whose reign he is said to have written his history of Babylonia. (Tatian, adv. Gent. 55; Euseb. Proc. Eclog. x. p. 289.) Respecting the personal history of Berosus scarcely anything is known; but he must have been a man of education and extensive learning, and was well acquainted with the Greek language, which the conquests of Alexander had diffused over a great part of Asia. Some writers have thought that they can discover in the extant fragments of his work traces of the author's ignorance of the Chaldee language, and thus have come to the conclusion, that the history of Berosus was a mere forgery of a Babylonian, who assumed the name of a celebrated Babylonian. But this opinion is without any foundation at all. The fact that a Babylonian wrote the history of his own country in Greek cannot be surprising; for, after the Greek language had commenced to be spoken in the East, a desire appears to have sprung up in some learned persons to make the history of their countries known to the Greeks; hence Memnon of Tyre wrote the history of Phoenicia, and Momchus that of Egypt. The historical work of Berosus consisted of three books, and is sometimes called Беросовская, and sometimes Χαλδαίικα or ιστορία χαλδαïικα. (Athen. xiv. p. 639; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 142, Proo. 10.) The work itself is lost, but we possess several fragments of it, which are preserved in Josephus, Eusebius, Syncellus, and the Christian fathers, who made great use of the work, for Berosus seems to have been acquainted with the sacred books of the Jews, whence his statements often agree with those of the Old Testament. We know that Berosus also treated of the history of the neighbouring countries, such as Chaldea and Media. (Agathias, ii. 24.) He himself states, that he derived the materials for his work from the archives in the temple of Belus, where chronicles were kept by the priests; but he appears to have used and interpreted the early or mythical history, according to the views current in his time. From the fragments extant we see that the work embraced the earliest traditions about the human race, a description of Babylonia and its population, and a chronological list of its kings down to the time of the great Cyrus. The history of Assyria, Media, and even Armenia, seems to have been constantly kept in view also. There is a marked difference, in many instances, between the statements of Ctesias and those of Berosus; but it is erroneous to infer from this, as some have done, that Berosus forged some of his statements. The difference appears sufficiently accounted for by the circumstance, that Ctesias had recourse to Assyrian and Persian sources, while Berosus followed the Babylonian, Chaldaean, and the Jewish, which necessarily placed the same events in a different light, and may frequently have differed in their substance altogether. The fragments of the Babylonian are collected at the end of Scaliger's work De Emendatione Temporum, and more complete in Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. xiv. p. 178, &c., of the old edition. The best collection is that by J. D. G. Richter. (Berosi Chald. Historiae quae supersunt; seu Comment. de Beroth Vita, &c. Lips. 1825, 8vo.)

Berosus is also mentioned as one of the earliest writers on astronomy, astrology, and similar subjects; but what Pliny, Vitruvius, and Seneca have preserved of him on these subjects does not give us a high idea of his astronomical or mathematical knowledge. Pliny (vii. 57) relates, that the Athenians erected a statue to him in a gymnasium, with a gilt tongue to honour his extraordinary predictions; Vitruvius (iv. 4, x. 7) attributes to him the invention of a semicircular sundial (horologium), and states, that in his later years, he settled in the island of Cos, where he founded a school of astrology. By the statement of Justin Martyr (Cohist. ad Graec. c. 39; comp. Paus. x. 12. § 5; and Suidas, s. v. Σεληνα), that the Babylonian Sibyl, who gave oracles at Cnæa in the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a daughter of the historian Berosus, some writers have been led to place the real Bero-sus at a much earlier date, and to consider the history which bore his name as the forgery of a Greek. But there is little or no reason for such an hypothesis, for Justin may have confounded the well-known historian with some earlier Babylonian of the name of Berosus; or, what is more probable, the Sibyl whom he mentions is a recent one, and may really have been the daughter of the historian.
(Faus. c.) [Sibylla.] Other writers again have been inclined to assume, that Berosus the historian was a different person from the astrologer; but this opinion too is not supported by satisfactory evidence.
The work entitled Berossi Antiqutatum Libri quinque cum Commentariis Jacobii Assevii, which appeared at Rome in 1498, 4to., and was afterwards often reprinted and even translated into Italian, is one of the many fabrications of Giovanni Nanni, a Dominican monk of Viterbo, better known under the name of Annius of Viterbo, who died in 1502.

ments.) [L. S.] BELLYLIUS (Beppaldis), bishop of Bysra in Arabia, a. d. 230, maintained that the Son of God had no distinct personal existence before the birth of Christ, and that Christ was only divine as having the divinity of the Father residing in him, communicated to him at his birth by a ray or emanation from the Father. At a council held at Bysra (a. d. 244) he was convinced by Origen of the error of his doctrine, and returned to the Catholic faith. He wrote Hymns, Poems, and Letters, several of the latter to Origen, thanking him for having reclaimed him. A work was extant in the time of Eusebius and of Jerome, in which was an account of the questions discussed between Bysra and Origen. None of his works are extant. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 20, 33; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 60; Socrates, H. E. iii. 7.) [P. S.] BELIYTUS, a surname given to several writers from their being natives of Berytus. See ANATO-LIUS, HARRIPPUS, LEPUSCUS, TAURUS.
BICYNTUS (Bepparion). The Vatican
MS. of the Greek Anthology attributes to an author of this name two epigrams, of which one is also ascribed to Pallas (Anmol. ii. p. 435, No. 124;
Jacobs, iii. p. 142), and the other (Jacobs, Paral. ex Cod. Pat. 42, xii. p. 651) is included among the epigrams of Theognis. (Vv. 557, 558, 592, Bepp.
5.) This latter epigram is quoted by Stobaeus as of "Theognis or Basantius." (Tit. cxxvi. 11.) The "Egg" of Simias (Anmol. i. p. 207, Jacobs, i. p. 140) bears the following title in the Vatican MS.: Ἰωνείου Θανάτου οὖν ἡ Δοκίδης ἡ Σελευκίδης, ἀνθρώπου γὰρ Θάνατος. Hence we may infer that Basantius was a Rhodian.
An author of this name is repeatedly quoted in the Etymologicum Magnum (pp. 608, 1. 57, 685, L. 56, Syh.), whom Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. x 772) rightly identifies with the Helladius Basantius of Ptohias. [HELLADIUS.] The name is also spelt Biancianus. (Bianianus, Eym. Mag. p. 212, 49; BESSUS (Baipatos), was satrap of Bactria in the time of Darius III. (Codomanus), who saw reason to suspect him of treachery soon after the battle of Issus, and summoned him accordingly from his satrapy to Babylon, where he was collecting forces for the continuance of the war.
(Curt. iv. 6. § 1.) At the battle of Arbela, a. c.
331, Bessus commanded the left wing of the Per-isan army, and was thus directly opposed to Alexander himself. (Curt. iv. 12. § 6; Arr. Arab.
iii. p. 59, e.) After this battle, when the fortunes of Darius seemed hopelessly ruined, Bessus formed a plot with Nabaunus and others to seize the king, and either to put him to death and make themselves masters of the empire, or to deliver him up to Alexander, according to circumstances.
Soon after the flight of Darius from Ecbatana (where, after the battle of Arbela, he had taken refuge), the conspirators, who had the Bactrian troops at their command, succeeded in possessing themselves of the king's person, and placed him in chains. But, being closely pressed in pursuit by Alexander, and having in vain urges Darius to mount a horse and continue his flight with them, they filled up by his murder the measure of their treason, n. c. 330. (Curt. v. 9—13; Arr. Arab.
iii. pp. 68, 69; Dios. xvi. 73; Plut. Alex. 42.)
After this deed Bessus fled into Bactria, where he collected a considerable force, and assumed the name and insignia of royalty, with the title of Araxeses. (Curt. vi. 6. § 13; Arr. Arab. iii.
p. 71, d.) On the approach of Alexander, he fled from him beyond the Oxus, but was at length betrayed by two of his followers, and fell into the hands of Phraemy, whom Alexander had sent forward to receive him. (Curt. vii. 5; Arr. Arab.
p. 75; comp. Strab. xi. p. 513.) He was brought naked before the conqueror, and, having been soured, was sent to Zaraespis, the capital of Bactria (Strab. xi. p. 514): here, a council being afterwards held upon him, he was sentenced to suffer mutilation of his nose and ears, and was de-divered for execution to Oxathridas, the brother of Darius, who put him to a cruel death. The mode of it is variously related, and Plutarch even makes Alexander himself the author of the shocking barbarity which he describes. (Curt. vii. 5, 10;

Arr. Arab. iv. p. 82, d.; Polen. and Aristobul.
ap. Arr. Arab. iii. ed. fin.; Dios. xvi. 73; Plut.
Alex. 431; Just. xii. 5.) [E. E.] BESTES (Beppes), perhaps Vesta or some Conoestulus, a Greek interpreter of the Novellae, filed the office of judex veli, and probably lived soon after the age of Justinian. He is cited by Harmenopolus (Promptuarium, p. 496, ed. 1557), and mentioned by Nic. Commena Papadopolis.
(Prorokat. Mystagog. p. 372.) [J. T. G.]
BESTIA, the name of a family of the plebeian Calpurnia gens.
I. L. CALPURNIA, tribune of the plebs, a. c.
121, obtained in his tribunship the recall of P.
Poppillius Laenas, who had been banished through the efforts of C. Graecus in 123. (Cic. Brut. 94; comp. Veil. Pat. ii. 7; Plut. C. Graec. 4.) This made him popular with the aristocratical party, who then had the chief power in the state; and it was through their influence doubtless that he obtained the consulship in 111.
The war against Jugurtha was assigned to him.
He prosecuted it at first with the greatest vigour;
but when Jugurtha offered him and his legate, M.
Scarrus, large sums of money, he concluded a peace with the Numidian without consulting the senate, and returned to Rome to hold the comitia.
His conduct excited the greatest indignation at Rome, and the aristocracy was obliged to yield to the wishes of the people, and allow an investigation into the whole matter. A bill was introduced for the purpose by C. Mamilius Lusturna, and three commissioners or judges (quaestores) appointed, one of whom Semus contrived to be chosen. Many men of high rank were condemned, and Bestia among the rest, c. 110. The nature of Bestia's punishment is not mentioned; but he was living at Rome in c. 90, in which year he went voluntarily into exile, after the passing of the Varia lex, by which all were to be brought to trial who had been engaged in exciting the Italians to revolt.

Bestia possessed many good qualities; he was prudent, active, and capable of enduring fatigue, not ignorant of warfare, and undismayed by danger; but his goodness of gain spoilt all. (Cic. L. c.; Sull. Jgu. 27–28, 40, 65; Appian, B. C. i. 57; Val. Max. viii. 6, § 4.)

2. L. CALPURNIUS BESTIA, probably a grandson of the preceding, was one of the Catilinarian conspirators, and is mentioned by Sullust as tribune of the plebs in the year in which the conspiracy was detected, c. 63. It appears, however, that he was then only tribune designatus; and that he held the office in the following year, c. 62, though he entered upon it, as usual, on the 10th of December, 63. It was agreed among the conspirators, that Bestia should make an attack upon Cicero in the popular assembly, and that this should be the signal for their rising in the following night. The vigilance of Cicero, however, as is well known, prevented this. (Sall. Cat. 17, 45; Appian, B. C. ii. 3; Plat. Cie. 23; Schol. ad Pind. pyg. 294, ad Sull. p. 366, ed Orelli.)

Bestia was sedile in c. 59, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the praetorship in 57; notwithstanding his bravery, for which he was brought to trial in the following year and condemned. He was defended by his former enemy, Cicero, who had now become reconciled to him, and speaks of him as his intimate friend in his oration for Cæcina. (c. 11.) After Caesar's death, Bestia attached himself to Antony, whom he accompanied to Mutina in c. 43, in hopes of obtaining the consulship in the place of M. Brutus, although he had not been praetor. (Cic. Phil. xiii. 12, ad Qn. Fr. ii. 3, Pid. xi. 5, xil. 8, xilf. 2.)

BETILIENUS or BETILLINUS. [Dassus, Bittiliens.] BIBACULUS. BETUCIUS BARRUS. [Barrus.] BIA (Bia), the personification of mighty force, is described as the daughter of the Titan Pallas, and Styx, and as a sister of Zelos, Cratos, and Nice. (Hesiod. Theog. 383; Aeschyl. Prom. 12.) [L.S.] BIA' DICE (Bia'dice), or, as some MSS. call her, Demodice, the wife of Cretes, who on account of her love for Phrixus meeting with no return, and there is a certain ungallant dilemma on the subject of marriage, which we find fathered upon him in Aulus Gellius. (Herod. i. 27, 170; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 13. § 4; Cic. de Am. 16, Parav. i.; Diod. Exc. p. 552, ed. Wess; Gell. v. 11; Diog. Laërt. i. 82–88; comp. Herod. i. 20–22; Plat. Sol. 4.) [E. B.]

BIA'NOR (Bia'nor), a Bithynian, the author of twenty-one epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under the emperors Augustus and Tiberius. His epigrams were included by Philip of Thessalonica in his collection. (Jacobs, xiii. p. 868; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iv. p. 467.)

BIAS (Bias), son of Amythaon, and brother of the seer Melampus. He married Pero, daughter of Nectes, whom her father had refused to give to any one unless he brought him the oxen of Iphieus. These Melampus obtained by his courage and skill, and so won the princess for his brother. (Schoel. ad Theor. Idyll. iii. 48; Schoel. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 118; Paus. iv. 36; comp. Hom. Odysse. xi. 286, &c., xx. 231.) Through his brother also Bias is said to have gained a third of the kingdom of Argos, Melampus having insisted upon it in his behalf, as part of the condition on which alone he would have the daughters of Proetus and the other Argive women of their madness. According to Pausanias, the Biantidae continued to rule in Argos for four generations. Apollonius Rhodius mentions three sons of Bias among the Argonauts,—Talas, Arcius, and Leodocus. (Herod. ix. 34; Pind. Nem. ix. 30; Schol. ad loc.; Diod. iv. 68; Paus. ii. 6, 18; Apoll. Rhod. i. 118.) According to the received reading in Diod. iv. 68, "Bias" was also the name of a son of Melampus by Iphieus, daughter of Megapenthes; but it has been proposed to read "Abas," in accordance with Paus. i. 43; Apoll. Rhod. i. 142; Apollod. l. 9. [E. E.]

BIAS (Bias), of Priene in Ionia, is always reckoned among the Seven Sages, and is mentioned by Diodorus (ap. Diog. Laërt. i. 41) as one of the Four to whom alone that title was universally given—the remaining three being Thales, Pittacus, and Solon. We do not know the exact period at which Bias lived, but it appears from the reference made to him by the poet Hippomachus, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century c. c., that he had by that time become distinguished for his skill as an advocate, and for his use of it in defence of the right. (Diog. Laërt. i. 84, 88; Strub. xiv. p. 638.) Diogenes Laërtius informs us, that he died at a very advanced age, immediately after pleading successfully the cause of a friend; by the time the votes of the judges had been taken, he was found to have expired. Like the rest of the Seven Sages, with the exception of Thales, the fame of Bias was derived, not from philosophy, as the word is usually understood, but from a certain practical wisdom, moral and political, which was of usefulness to the magistrates and doings are recorded by Diogenes Laërtius, in his rambling uncritical way, and by others. In particular, he suffers in character as the reputed author of the selfish maxim ἄνδρας υαμικῶς νομοθέτησαι; and there is a certain ungentlemanly dilemma on the subject of marriage, which we find fathered upon him in Aulus Gellius. (Herod. i. 27, 170; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 13. § 4; Cic. de Am. 16, Parav. i.; Diod. Exc. p. 552, ed. Wess; Gell. v. 11; Diog. Laërt. i. 82–88; comp. Herod. i. 20–22; Plat. Sol. 4.) [E. B.]

BIB'ACULUS, the name of a family of the Furia gens. 1. L. FURIO BIBACULUS, quaestor, fell in the battle of Cannae, b.c. 216. (Liv. xxii. 49.)

2. L. FURIO BIBACULUS, a pious and religious man, who, when he was praetor, carried, at the command of his father, the magister of the college of the Sulli, the anemia with his six lictors preceding him, although he was exempted from this duty by virtue of his praetorship. (Val. Max. i. 1, § 9; Lactant. i. 21.)

3. M. FURIO BIBACULUS. See below.
BIBACULUS, M. FURIUS, who is classed by Quintilian (x. 1. § 96) along with Catullus and Horace as one of the most distinguished of the Roman satiric pamphl enthusiastic authors, and who is in like manner ranked by Dionysius, in his chapter on lamic verse (p. 482, ed. Putsch.) with Archilochus and Hipponax, among the Greeks, and with Lucil. us, Catullus, and Horace, among the Romans, was born, according to Suetonius, in the Eusebian chronicle, at Cremona in the year B. c. 103. From the scanty and unimportant specimens of his works transmitted to modern times, we are scarcely in a condition to form any estimate of his powers. A single senarian is quoted by Suetonius (de Iust. Gr. c. 9), containing an allusion to the loss of me- Gr. single senarian is quoted by Suetonius BIBULUS. Tacitus (Ann. iv. 34), that the writings of Biba- culus were stuffed with insults against the first two Caesars—a consideration which will serve to explain also the hostility displayed by the favourite of the Augustan court towards Catullus, whose tal- ents and taste were as fully and deservedly appre- ciated by his countrymen and contemporaries as those of Bibulus. Unfortunately, however, the latter were little likely to sound pleasing in the ears of the adopted son and heir of the dictator Julius.

Lastly, by comparing some expressions of the elder Pliny (Praef. H. N.) with hints dropped by Suetonius (de Iust. Gr. c. 4) and Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 1), there is room for a conjecture, that Bibulus made a collection of celebrated jests and witticisms, and gave the compilation to the world under the title of Luculentiones.

We must carefully avoid confounding Furius Bibulus with the Furius who was imitated in several passages of the Aeneid, and from whose Annals, extending to eleven books at least, we find some extracts in the Saturnalia. (Macro. Sat. vii. 1; Compare Murnin, ed. Brut. Ann. p. xli.) The latter was named in full Furius Fortiatus, and to him L. Lucretius Catullus, colleague of M. Marius in the consulsip of B. c. 102, addressed an account of the campaign against the Girmi. (Cic. Brut. c. 35.) To this Furius Antius are ascribed certain lines found in Aulus Gellius (viii. 11), and brought under review on account of the affected neotermism with which they abound. Had we any fair pretext for calling in question the authority of the summaries prefixed to the chapters of the Noctes Atticae, we should feel strongly disposed to follow G. J. Voss, Lambinus, and Heindorf, in assigning these follies to the am- bitious Bibulus rather than to the chaste and simple Antius, whom even Virgil did not disdain to copy. (Weichert, Poet. Latit. Reliqu. [W. R.] BIBULUS, a cognomen of the plebeian Cal- purnii gens.

1. L. CALPURNIUS BIBULUS, obtained each of the public magistracies in the same year as C. Julius Caesar. He was curule aedile in B. c. 65, praetor in 59, and consul in 59. Caesar was anxious to obtain L. Lucceius for his colleague in the consulsip; but as Lucceius was a thorough partizan of Caesar's, while Bibulus was opposed to him, the aristocratical party used every effort to secure the election of the latter, and contributed large sums of money for this purpose. (Suet. Cæs. 19.) Bibulus, accordingly, gained his election, but was able to do but very little for his party. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Caesar's agrarian law, he withdrew from the popular assemblies al- together, and shut himself up in his own house for the remainder of the year; whence it was said in joke, that it was the consulsip of Julius and Cæs- sar. He confined his opposition to publishing edicts against Caesar's measures: these were widely circulated among his party, and greatly ex- tolled as pieces of composition. (Suet. Cæs. 9, 49; Cic. ad Att. ii. 19, 20; Plut. Popul. 48; comp. Cic. Brut. 77.) To vitiate Caesar's measures, he also pretended, that he was observing the skies, while his colleague was engaged in the comitia (Cic. pro Dumn. 15); but such kind of opposition was not likely to have any effect upon Caesar.

On the nomination of his colleague, Bibulus re- mained at Rome, as no province had been assigned him. Here he continued to oppose the measures of Caesar and Pompey, and prevented the latter in 56 from restoring in person Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt. When, however, a coolness began to arise between Caesar and Pompey, Bibulus supported the latter, and it was upon his proposal, that Pompey was elected sole consul in 52, when the republic was almost in a state of anarchy through the tumults following the death of Caius. In the following year, 51, Bibulus obtained a province in consequence of a law of Pompey's, which provided that no future consul or praetor should have a province till five years after the expiration of his magistracy. As the magistrates for the time being were thus excluded, it was peculiarly in the interest of all men of consular or equestrian rank who had not held provinces, should now draw lots for the vacant ones. In consequence of this measure Bibulus went to Syria as proconsul about the same time as Cicero went to Cilicia. The eastern provinces of the Roman empire were then in the greatest alarm, as the Parthians had crossed the Euphrates, but they were driven back shortly before the arrival of Bibulus by C. Cassius, the propraetor. Cicero was very jealous of this victory which had been gained in a neighbouring province, and took good care to let his friends know that Bibulus had no share in it. When Bibulus obtained a thanksgiving in consequence of the victory, Cicero complained bitterly, to his friends, that Bibulus had made false representations to the senate. Although great fears were entertained, that the invasion would be repeated, the Parthians did not appear for the next year. Bibulus left the province with the reputation of having administered its internal affairs with integrity and zeal.

- BIBACULUS. - BIBULUS.

On his return to the west in 49, Bibulus was appointed by Pompey commander of his fleet in the Ionian sea to prevent Caesar from crossing over into Greece. Caesar, however, contrived to elude his vigilance; and Bibulus fell in with only thirty ships returning to Italy after landing some troops. Enraged at his disappointment, he burnt these ships with their crews. This was in the winter; and his own men suffered much from cold and want of fuel and water, as Caesar was now in possession of the eastern coast and prevented his crews from landing. Sickness broke out among his men; Bibulus himself fell ill, and died in the beginning of the year 49, near Corycyra, before the battle of Dyrachium. (Caes. B. C. iii. 5–13; Dion Cass. xii. 48; Plut. Brut. 13; Oros. vi. 15; Cic. Brut. 77.)

Bibulus was not a man of much ability, and is chiefly indebted for his celebrity to the fact of his being one of Caesar's principal, though not most formidable, opponents. He married Porcia, the daughter of M. Porcius Cato Uticensis, by whom he had three sons mentioned below. (Orelli, Oeconomici. ii. p. 227; &c.)

2. CALPURNIUS BIBULL, two sons of the presiding, whose praenomens are unknown, were murdered in Egypt, b. c. 50, by the soldiers of Gabinius. Their father bore his loss with fortitude though he deeply felt it; and when the murderers of his children were subsequently delivered up to him by Cleopatra, he sent them back, saying that their punishment was not his duty but that of the senate. Bibulus had probably sent his sons into Egypt to solicit aid against the Parthians; and they may have been murdered by the soldiers of Gabi-

BIBULUS, because it was known that their father had been opposed to the expedition of Gabinius, which had been undertaken at the instigation of Pompey. (Caes. B. C. iii. 110; Val. Max. iv. 1. 15; comp. Cic. ad Att. vi. 5, ad Fam. ii. 17.)

4. L. CALPURNIUS BIBULUS, the youngest son of No. 1, was quite a youth at his father's death (Plut. Brut. 15), after which he lived at Rome with M. Brutus, who married his mother Porcia. He went to Athens in b. c. 45 to prosecute his studies (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32), and appears to have joined his step-father Brutus after the death of Caesar in 44, in consequence of which he was proscribed by Sulla. Bibulus was present at the battle of Philippi in 42, and shortly after surrendered himself to Antony, who pardoned him and promoted him to the command of his fleet, whence we find on some of the coins of Antony the inscription L. BIBULUS PRÆP. CLAS. (Eckhel, v. p. 161, vi. p. 57.) He was frequently employed by Antony in the negotiations between himself and Augustus, and was finally promoted by the former to the government of Syria, where he died shortly before the battle of Actium. (Appian, B. C. iv. 103, 136, v. 192.) Bibulus wrote the Memorabilia of his step-father, a small work which Plutarch made use of in writing the life of Brutus. (Plut. Brut. 19, 22.)

C. BIBULUS, an aedile mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 52) in the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 22, appears to be the same as the L. Publicius Bibulus, a plebeian edile, to whom the senate granted a burial-place both for himself and his posterity. (Orelli, Inscrip. n. 4698.)

BILLIENUS. [Bellienu.] BION (Blow). 1. Of Proconnesus, a contemporary of Pherecydes of Syros, who consequently lived about b. c. 560. He is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) as the author of two works which he does not specify; but we must infer from Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. vi. p. 267), that one of these was an abridgement of the work of the ancient historian, Cadmus of Miletus. A mathematician of Abdera, and a pupil of Democritus. He wrote both in the Ionic and Attic dialects, and was the first who said that there were some parts of the earth in which it was night for six months, while the remaining six months were one uninterrupted day. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 58.) He is probably the same as the one whom Strabo (i. p. 29) calls an astrologer.

3. Of Soli, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) as the author of a work on Aethiopia (Albæsard), of which a few fragments are preserved in Pliny (vi. 85), Athenæus (xiii. p. 560), and in Cæcilius of Anicula (n. 415). Whether he is the same as the one from whom Plutarch (Thes. 26) quotes a tradition respecting the Amazonis, and from whom Agathias (ii. 25; comp. Synecclaus, p. 576, ed. Diudor.) quotes a statement respecting the history of Assyria, is uncertain. Vario (De Rect. i. 1) mentions Bion of Soli among the writers on agriculture; and Pliny refers to the same or similar works, in the Enchiœ to several books. (Lib. 8, 10, 14, 15, 17, 18.) Some think that Bion of Soli is the same as Cæcilius Bion. [Bion, Cæcilius.]

4. Of Smyrna, or rather of the small place of Philossa on the river Mêles, near Smyrna. (Suid. s. v. Geîdrov.) All that we know about him is the little that can be inferred from the third Idyl of Moschus, who laments his untimely death. The time at which he lived can be pretty accurately determined by the fact, that he was older than Moschus, who calls himself the pupil of Bion. (Mosch. iii. 93, &c.) His flourishing period must therefore have very nearly coincided with that of Theocritus, and must be fixed at about B.C. 280. Moschus states, that Bion left his native country and spent the last years of his life in Sicily, cultivating bucolic poetry, the natural growth of that island. Whether he also visited Macedonia and Thrace, as Moschus (iii. 17, &c.) intimates, is uncertain, since it may be that Moschus mentions those countries only because he calls Bion the Doric Orpheus. He died of poison, which had been administered to him by several persons, who afterwards received their well-deserved punishment for the crime. With respect to the relation of master and pupil between Bion and Moschus, we cannot say anything with certainty, except that the resemblance between the productions of the two poets obliges us to suppose, at least, that Moschus imitated Bion; and this may, in fact, be all that is meant when Moschus calls himself a disciple of the latter. The subjects of Bion's poetry, viz. shepherds and love-songs, are beautifully described by Moschus (iii. 32, &c.); but we can now form only a partial judgment on the spirit and style of his poetry, on account of the fragmentary condition in which his works have come down to us. Some of his idyls, as his poems are usually called, are extant entire, but of others we have only fragments. Their style is very refined, the sentiments, he is much inferior to Theocritus. This results which were their natural fruit.

5. A tragic poet, whom Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 58) describes as ὁ τυφλὸς τριαδὰς τῶν Τάρσου Ἀγαθήνων. Casaubon (De Sat. Poes. i. 5) remarks, that Diogenes by these words meant to describe a poet whose works bore the character of extempore poetry, of which the inhabitants of Tarsus were particularly fond (Strab. xiv. p. 674), and that Bion lived shortly before or at the time of Strabo. Suidas (s.v. Αὔρυξ/ας) mentions a son of Αἴσχυλος of the name of Bion who was likewise a tragic poet; but nothing further is known about him.

6. A melos poet, about whom no particulars are known. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 58; Eudoc. p. 94.)

7. A Greek sophist, who is said to have censured Homer for not giving a true account of the events he describes. (Aecr. ad Horat. Epist. ii. 2.) He is perhaps the same as one of the two rhetoricians of this name.

8. The name of two Greek rhetoricians; the one, a native of Symeuses, was the author of theoretical works on rhetoric (ῥήτορας ψυχρασίας γεγραφομενος); the other, whose native country is unknown, was said to have written a work in nine books, which bore the names of the nine Muses. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 58.)

[B. S.]

BION (Biōs), a Scythian philosopher, surmamed BIONTHERIUS, from the town of Oecanthus, Olbia, or Byblessium, near the mouth of the Donuber, lived about B.C. 250, but the exact dates of his birth and death are uncertain. Suda (i. 15) mentions him as a contemporary of Eratosthenes, who was born B.C. 275. Laërtius (i. 46, &c.) has preserved an account which Bion himself gave of his parentage to Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. His father was a freedman, and his mother, Olympia, a Lacedaemonian harlot, and the whole family were sold as slaves, on account of some offence committed by the father. In consequence of this, Bion fell into the hands of a rhetorician, who made him his heir. Having burnt his master's library, he went to Athens, and applied himself to philosophy, in the course of which study he embraced the tenets of almost every sect in succession. First he was an Academic and a disciple of Crates, then a Cynic, afterwards attached to Theorus (ΘΕΟΔΟΡΟΣ), the philosopher who carried out the Cyrenaic doctrines into the atheistic results which were their natural fruit (ἈΚΡΙΣΤΟΠΟΥ), and finally he became a pupil of Theophamus, the Peripatetic. He seems to have been a man of considerable intellectual acuteness, but utterly profligate, and a notorious unbeliever in the existence of God. His habits of life were indeed avowedly infamous, so much so, that he spoke with contempt of Socrates for abstaining from crime. Many of Bion's dogmas and sharp sayings are preserved by Laërtius: they are generally trite pieces of moral philosophy, of which the inhabitants of Tarsus were particularly fond (Strab. xiv. p. 674), though hardly brilliant enough to justify Horace in holding him up "as an example of adverse fortune, as do others, when he speaks of persons delighting Bionis sermoneis et sole nigro. (Epist. ii. 2. 60.) Examples of this sort are his sayings, that "the miser did not possess wealth, but was possessed by it," that "impiety was the companion of credulity," "avarice is a tear our hair when we are in grief, since sorrow is a hard to bear our hair when we are in grief, since sorrow is not cured by baldness." He died at Claciis in Euboea. We learn his mother's name and country from Athenaeus (xiii. p. 591, f. 592, a.) [C. B. L. C.]

BION, CAECILIUS, a writer whose country is unknown, but who is mentioned by Pliny (Ind. to H. N. xxviii.) among the "Auctores Externi." Of his date it can only be said, that he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. He wrote a work Περὶ Δαυιδαρον, "On the Properties of Plants and other Medicines," which is not now extant, but which was used by... scipions, Bityus, a king of the Arverni in Gaul. When the consul Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus undertook the war in B.C. 151 against the Allobroges, who were joined by the Arverni under Bityus, these Gallic tribes were defeated near the town of Vindalia. After this first disaster the Allobroges and Arverni made immense preparations to renew the contest with the Romans, and Bityus again took the field with a very numerous army. At the point where the Isara empties itself into the Rhodanus, the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, the grandson of Paulus, met the Gauls in the autumn of B.C. 121. Although the Romans were far inferior in numbers, yet they gained such a complete victory, that, according to the lowest estimate, 129,000 men of the army of Bityus fell in the battle. After this irreparable loss, Bityus, who had been taken prisoner in an insidious manner by Cn. Domitius, was sent to Rome. The senate, though disapproving of the conduct of Domitius, exiled Bityus to Alba. His son, Congentianus, was likewise made prisoner and sent to Rome. Florus adds, that the triumph of Q. Fabius was adorned by Bityus riding in a silver war-chariot and with his magnificent armour, just as he had appeared on the field of battle. (Liv. Epit. 61; Florus, iii. 2; Vel. Pat. ii. 10; Suet. Nero, 2; Appian, Gallic, 12, where Bityus is erroneously called king of the Allobroges ; Oros. v. 14 ; Val. Max. ix. G. trop. iv. 22, where the year and the consuls are incorrectly given.)

Bityus (Bitys), an Egyptian seer, who is said by Tammiechus (de Acct. VIII. 5) to have interpreted to Ammon, king of Egypt, the books of Hermes written in hieroglyphics.

Blaesus (Blæus), an ancient Italian poet, born at Capreac, who wrote serio-comic plays by Iamblichus (de Myst. V. vcn incorrectly; Oros. v. 14; Val. Max. ix. G. trop. iv. 22, where the year and the consuls are incorrectly given). Two of these plays, the Meicræa and Σατυρόων, are quoted by Athenaeus (iii. p. 111, c., xi. p. 487, c.), and Hesychius refers to Blæus (s. wv. Μοοκράων, Μολάκης, Φαυλάς), but without mentioning the names of his plays. Caesarius supposed that Blæus lived under the Roman empire; but he must have lived as early as the 3rd century B.C., as Valeskenar (ad Theocr. p. 290, a.) has shown, that Athenaeus took his quotations of Blæus from the Παθρῶν of Pamphilus of Alexandria, who was a disciple of Aristarchus; and also that Pamphilus borrowed a part of his work explaining the words in Blæus and similar poets from the Παθρῶν of Diodorus, who was a pupil of Aristophanes of Alexandria. (Comp. Schwieg. ad Athen. iii. p. 111, c.)

Blaesus, "a stammerer," was the name of a plebeian family of the Sempronia gens under the republic. It also occurs as a cognomen of the Junii and of one Pedius under the empire. (It. S.)

Blaesus, a Roman jurist, not earlier than the 3rd century B.C., as Valckenar (ad Theocr. p. 487, c.), and Ilesychius refers to Blæus (s. wv. Μοοκράων, Μολάκης, Φαυλάς), but without mentioning the names of his plays. Caesarius supposed that Blæus lived under the Roman empire; but he must have lived as early as the 3rd century B.C., as Valeskenar (ad Theocr. p. 290, a.) has shown, that Athenaeus took his quotations of Blæus from the Παθρῶν of Pamphilus of Alexandria, who was a disciple of Aristarchus; and also that Pamphilus borrowed a part of his work explaining the words in Blæus and similar poets from the Παθρῶν of Diodorus, who was a pupil of Aristophanes of Alexandria. (Comp. Schwieg. ad Athen. iii. p. 111, c.)

1. C. Sempronius Ti. f. Ti. n. Blæus, consul in B.C. 253 in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, Cn. Servilius Caepio, with a fleet of 260 ships to the coast of Africa, which they laid waste in frequent descents, and from which they obtained great booty. They did not, however, accomplish anything of note; and in the lesser Syria, through the ignorance of the pilots, their ships ran aground, and only get off, upon the return of the tide, by throwing everything overboard. This disaster induced them to return to Sicily, and in their voyage from thence to Italy they were overtaken off cape Palatium by a tremendous storm, which more than 500 of them perished. Notwithstanding these misfortunes, each of them obtained a triumph for their successes in Africa, as we learn from the Fasti. (Polyb. ii. 39; Eutrop. ii. 23; Oros. iv. 9; Zonar. viii. 14.) Blæus was consul a second time, in 244 (Fasti Capit.), in which year a colony was founded at Brundusium. (Vell. Pat. i. 14.)

2. Sempronius Blæus, questor in B.C. 217 to the consul Cn. Servilius Geminus, was killed, together with a thousand men, in a descent upon the coast of Africa in this year. (Liv. xxvii. 31.)

3. C. Sempronius Blæus, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 211, brought Cn. Fulvius to trial on account of his losing his army in Apulia. (Liv. xxvi. 2; comp. Val. Max. ii. 8. § 3.)

4. Cn. Sempronius Blæus, legate in B.C. 210 to the dictator Q. Fulvius Flaccus, by whom he was sent into Etruria to command the army which had been under the praetor C. Calpurnius. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) It is not improbable that this Cn. Blæus may be the same as No. 3, as Cn. is very likely a false reading for C., since we find none of the Sempronii at this period with the former praenomen, while the latter is the most common one.

5. P. Sempronius Blæus, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 151, opposed the triumph of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, but withdrew his opposition through the remonstrances of the consul. (Liv. xxxvi. 39, 40.)

6. C. Sempronius Blæus, plebeian aedile in B.C. 187, and praetor in Sicily in 184. In 170, he was sent with Sex. Julius Caesar as ambassador to Abdera. (Liv. xxxix. 7, 32, 38, xliii. 6.)

Blæus, a Roman jurist, not earlier than Trebatius Testa, the friend of Cicero: for Blæus is cited by Labeo in the Digest (33. tit. 2. s. 31) as reporting the opinion of Trebatius. Various conjectures have been made without much plausibility for the purpose of identifying the jurist with other persons of the same name. Junius Blæus, proconsul of Africa in A.D. 22, was probably somewhat later than the jurist. (Majansius, vol. ii. p. 162; G. Grotli, Vita Ictomi, c. 9. § 18.) [J.T.G.]

Blæus, Junius. 1. The governor of Panamia in the year 8 B.C., A.D. 14, when the formidable insurrection of the Iberians broke out in that province, which was with difficulty quelled by Drusus himself. The conduct of Blæus in allowing the soldiers relaxation from their ordinary duties was the immediate cause of the insurrection, but the real causes lay deeper. Through the influence of Sejanus, who was his uncle, Blæus obtained the government of Africa in 21, where he gained a victory over Tacfarinas in 22, in consequence of which Tiberius granted him the insignia of a triumph, and allowed him the title of Imperator—the last instance of this honour being conferred upon a private person. We learn from Velleius Paterculus, who says that it was difficult to decide whether Blæus was more useful in the camp or distinguished in the forum, that he also commanded in Spain. (Dion Cass. liv. 4; Tac. Ann. i. 16, &c., iii. 35, 58, 72-74; Vell. Pat. ii. 125.) It appears from the Fasti, from which we learn that his praenomen was Quintus, that Blæus was consul suffectus in 26; but he shared in the fall of Sejanus in 31, and was deprived, as was also his son, of the priestly offices which he held. His life, however, was spared for the time; but when Tiberius, in 36, conferred these offices upon other persons, Blaesus and his son perceived that their fate was sealed, and accordingly put an end to their own lives. (Tac. Ann. v. 7, vi. 40.)

2. The son of the preceding, was with his father in Pannonia when the legions mutinied in a. d. 14, and was compelled by the soldiers to go to Tiberius with a statement of their grievances. He was sent second time to Tiberius after the arrival of Drusus in the camp. He also served under his father in 22 in the war against Taforanuia in Africa; and he put an end to his own life, as mentioned above, in 36. (Tac. Ann. i. 19, 29, iii. 74, vi. 40.)

3. Probably the son of No. 2, was the governor of Gallia Lugdunensis in a. d. 70, and espoused the party of the emperor Vitellius, whom he supplied when in Gaul with everything necessary to support his rank and state. This liberality on the part of Blaesus excited the jealousy of the emperor, who shortly after had him poisoned on the most trumpety accusation, brought against him by L. Vitellius. Blaesus was a man of large property and high integrity, and had steadily refused the solicitations of Caecina and others to desert the cause of Vitellius. (Tac. Hist. i. 69, ii. 29, iii. 36, 37.)

BLAESISUS, PEDVIUS, was expelled the senate in a. d. 60, on the complaint of the Cyrenians, for robbing the temple of Asclepius, and for corruption in the military levies; but he was re-admitted in 70. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 18, Hist. i. 77.)

BLANDUS, a Roman knight, who taught eloquence at Rome in the time of Augustus, and was the instructor of the philosopher and rhetorician, Fabianus. (Senec. Controv. ii. proem. p. 136, ed. Bip.) He is frequently introduced as a speaker in the Scauriae (2, 5) and Controversiae (1, 1, 2, 4 &c.) of the elder Seneca. He was probably the father or grandfather of the Rubellius Blandus mentioned below.

BLANDEUS, RUBELLIUS, whose grandfather was only a Roman knight of Tibur, married in a. d. 33 Julia, the daughter of Drusus, the son of the emperor Tiberius, whence Blandus is called the progener of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 27, 45.) Rubellius Plautus, who was put to death by Nero, was the offspring of this marriage. (Plautus.)

There was in the senate in a. d. 21 a Rubellius Blandus, a man of consular rank (Tac. Ann. iii. 23, 51), who is probably the same as the husband of Julia, though Lipsius supposes him to be the father of the latter. We do not, however, find in the Fasti any consul of this name.

There is a coin, struck under Augustus, bearing the inscription C. RUBELLIUS BLANDVS HUIR A. A. A. P. F. that is, Auro Argento Acri Flanno Forinando, which is probably to be referred to the father of the above-mentioned Blandus. (Eckhel. v. p. 225.)

BLASIO, a surname of the Cornelii and Holiana gentes.

I. Corneli Blasionem.

1. CN. CORNELIUS L. F. CN. N. BLASIO, who is mentioned nowhere but in the Fasti, was consul in b. c. 279, censor in 265, and consul a second time in 237. He gained a triumph in 270, but we do not know over what people.

2. CN. CORNELIUS BLASIO, was praetor in Sicily in b. c. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 42, 43.)

3. P. CORNELIUS BLASIO, was sent as an ambassador with two others to the Carni, Istri, and Iapyges, in b. c. 170. In 168 he was one of the five commissioners appointed to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lynamensis respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Liv. xiii. 7, xlv. 13.)

There are several coins belonging to this family. The obverse of the one annexed has the inscription BLASIO CN. F., with what appears to be the head of Mars: the reverse represents Dionysus, with Pallas on his left hand in the act of crowning him and another female figure on his right. (Eckhel. v. p. 190.)

II. Helvii Blasionem.

1. M. HELVIUS BLASIO, plebeian aedile in b. c. 198 and praetor in 197. He obtained the province of further Spain, which he found in a very disturbed state upon his arrival. After handling over the province to his successor, he was detained in the country a year longer by a severe and tedious illness. On his return home through nearer Spain with a guard of 6000 soldiers, which the praetor Ap. Claudius had given him, he was attacked by an army of 20,000 Celtiberi, near the town of Itiliurgi. These he entirely defeated, slew 12,000 of the enemy, and took Itiliurgi. This at least was the statement of Valerianus Antonius. For this victory he obtained an ovation (b. c. 195), but not a triumph, because he had fought under the auspices and in the province of another. In the following year (194) he was one of the three commissioners for founding a Roman colony at Sipontum in Apulia. (Liv. xxxii. 27, 28, xxxiii. 21, xxxiv. 10, 45.)

2. HELVIO BLASIO, put an end to his own life to encourage his friend D. Brutus to meet his death firmly, when the latter fell into the hands of his enemies, in b. c. 43. (Dion. Cass. xvi. 53.)

BLASSIUS, BLATIUS, or BLATTIUS, one of the chief men at Salapia in Apulia, betrayed the town to the Romans in b. c. 210, together with a strong Carthaginian garrison that was stationed there. The way in which he outwitted his rival Dasius, who supported the Carthaginians, is related somewhat differently by the ancient writers. (Appian, Ann. 45—47; Liv. xxxvi. 38; Val. Max. iii. 6, extern. l.)

BLASTARES, MATTHAEUS, a hieromelchus, or monk in holy orders, eminent as a Greek canonist, who composed, about the year 1582 (as Bishop Beveridge satisfactorily makes out from the author's own enigmatical statement) an alphabetical compendium of the contents of the genuine canons. It was intended to supply a more convenient repertory for ordinary use than was furnished by the collections of Photius and his commentators. The letters refer to the leading word in the rubrics of the titles, and under each letter the chapters begin anew in numerical order. In each chapter there is commonly an abstract, first of the ecclesiastical, then of the secular laws which relate to the subject; but the sources whence the secular laws are cited are not ordinarily referred to, and cannot always be determined. The ecclesiastical constitutions are derived from the common canonical collections. This compilation, as the numerous extant manuscripts prove, became very popular among ecclesiastics. The preface to the Syntagma Alphabeticum of Blastares contains some historical particulars, mingled with many errors, concerning the ecclesiastical laws. As an example of the errors, it may be stated that the formation of Justinian's Digest and Code is attributed to Hadrian. In most MSS., a small collection of major works, probably due to Blastares, is appended to the Syntagma. As to unpublished works of Blastares in MS., see Fabric. *Bild. Graec." xii. p. 205. A portion of the Syntagma (part of Books I and II), which was probably found copied in a detached form, is printed in Leuclav. *Jal. Graeco-Rom., vol. i. lib. viii.; but the only complete edition of the work is that which is given by Beveridge in his Synodicon, vol. ii. part. 2. The "maritatorial questions" of Blastares, printed in Leuclav. *Jal.
Graeco-Rom., are often enumerated as a distinct work, but in reality they come under the head *Paus.
At the end of the Peri Geo's edition of Codinus is a treatise, written in popular verses (πολυτῇστι τίχον), concerning the offices of the Palace of Constantinople, by Matthaeus, monk, Sōtis, and physician. The author may possibly be no other than Blastares.
(Bienner, *Gesch. der Nov., pp. 218—222; Walter, Kirchenrecht, § 79.) [J. T. G.]

BLEMMIDAS. [NECHTHUS BLEMMDIAS.

BLEPAEUS (Bēraios), a rich banker at Athens in the time of Demosthenes, who was also mentioned in one of the comedies of Alexis. (Dem.
Ath. vi. p. 241, b.)

BLEIASMIUS, a Galatian, a friend and minister of Deotaros, by whom he was sent as ambassador to Rome, where he was when Cicero defended his master, n.c. 45. (Cic. pro Deiot. 12, 14. 15.) Bleiasmius was also in Rome in the following year, 44. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 3.)

BLITOR (Baitrap), satrap of Mesopotamia, was deprived of his satrapy by Antigonus in n. c. 316, because he had allowed Seleucus to escape from Babylon to Egypt in that year. (Appian, Syr.
53.)

BLO'SIUS or BLO'SSIUS, the name of a noble family in Campana.

1. F. MARIUS Blosius, was Campanian prator when Capua revolted from the Romans and joined Hannibal in n. c. 216. (Liv. xxvii. 3.)

2. Blosius, two brothers in Capua, were the ring leaders in an attempted revolt of Capua from the Romans in n. c. 210; but the design was discovered, and the Blosii and their associates put to death. (Liv. xxvii. 3.)

3. C. Blosius, of Cumae, a kasper of Staevolon's family, was an intimate friend of Ti. Gracchus, whom he is said to have urged on to bring forward his agrarian law. After the death of Ti. Gracchus he was accused before the consuls in n. c. 132, on account of his participation in the schemes of Gracchus, and fearing the issue he fled to Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, who was then at war with the Romans. When Aristonicus was con-cquered shortly afterwards, Blosius put an end to his own life for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans. Blosius had paid considerable attention to the study of philosophy, and was a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus. (Cic. de Amic. 11, de Leg.
Agr. ii. 34; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 1; Plut. Ti.
Gracch. 8, 17. 20.)

BOADICEA. (some MSS. of Tacitus have Bodicea, Bodicia or Voodicea, and Dion Cassius calls she Bodicce.) was the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, a tribe inhabiting the eastern coast of Britain. Her husband, who died about a. d.
60 or 61, made his two daughters and the emperor Nero the heirs of his private property, hoping thereby to protect his kingdom and his family from the oppression and the rapacity of the Romans stationed in Britain. But these expectations were not realized; for Bodicea, who succeeded him, saw her kingdom and her house robbed and plundered by the Roman soldiers, as if they had been in a country conquered by force of arms.
The queen herself was maltreated even with blows, and Romans ravished her two daughters. The most distinguished among the Iceni were deprived of their property, and the relatives of the late king were cruelly treated by Roman soldiers and veterans under the connivance of their officers, who not only took no measures to stop their proceedings, but Catus Decianus was the most notorious of all by his extornution and avarice. At last, in a. d. 62, Bodicea, a woman of manly spirit and undaunted courage, roused to revenge. She induced the Iceni to take up arms against their oppressors, and also prevailed upon the Trinobantes and other neighbouring tribes to join them. While the legate Paulinus Suetonius was absent on an expedition to the island of Mona, Camulodunum, a recently established colony of veterans, was attacked by the Britons. The colony solicited the aid of Catus Decianus, who however was unable to send them more than 200 men, and these had not even regular arms. Camulodunum was taken and destroyed by fire, and the soldiers, who took refuge in a temple which formed the arx of the place, were besieged for two days, and then made prisoners. Petullius Cerealis, the legate of the ninth legion, who was advancing to relieve Camulodunum, was met by the Britons, and, after the loss of his infantry, escaped with the cavalry to his fortified camp.
Catus Decianus, who in reality bore all the guilt, made his escape to Gaul; but Suetonius Paulinus, who had been informed of what was going on, had returned by this time, and forced his way through the midst of the enemies as far as the colony of Londinium. As soon as he had left it, it was taken by the Britons, and the municipality of Vetralumium soon after experienced the same fate; in these places nearly 70,000 Romans and Roman allies were slain with cruel tortures. Suetonius saw that a battle could no longer be deferred. His forces consisted of only about 10,000 men, while those of the Britons under Boudicca are said to have amounted to 230,000. On the day of the battle, the queen rode in a chariot with her two daughters before her, and commanded her army in person. She harangued her soldiers, reminded them of the wrongs inflicted upon Britain by the Romans, and roused their courage against the common enemy. But the Britons were conquered by the greater military skill and the favourable position of the Romans. About 80,000 Britons are said to have fallen on this day, and those who were too bold to have lost no more than 400.
Boudicca would not survive this irreparable loss, and put an end to

her life by poison. Her body was interred with the greatest solemnity by the Britons, who then dispersed. This victory, which Tacitus declares equal to the great victory of a former time, finally established the Roman dominion in Britain. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 31-37, Agric. 15, 16; Dion Cass. xlii. 1-12.)

BOCCCHAR. 1. A king of the Mauri in the time of Masinissa, b.c. 204. (Liv. xxix. 30.)

2. A general of Syphax, who sent him against Masinissa, b.c. 204. (Liv. xxxii. 32.) [P.S.]

BOCCCHORIS (B<ci>χωρις), an Egyptian king and legislator, who was distinguished for his wisdom, courage, and bodily weakness. His laws related chiefly to the prerogatives of the king and to pecuniary obligations. (Diod. i. 94.) From his not being mentioned by Herodotus, it has been conjectured that he was identical with Asychis. (Herod. ii. 136.) Eusebius places him alone in the twenty-fourth dynasty, calls him a Saitic, and says that, after reigning forty-four years, he was taken prisoner and burnt by Sabacon. (Chron. Arm. pp. 104, 316, Mai and Zohm.; compare Syncellus, pp. 74, b., 184, c.) According to Wilkinson, he began to reign c. 812; he was the son and successor of Turphactus; and his name on the monuments is Pehor, Bakhor, or Anmun-SEhor. (Ancient Egyptians, i. pp. 130, 130.) In the Armenian copy of Eusebius his name is spelt Boccharis, in Syncellus B<ci>κ<ci>χωρις. (See also Aelian, Hist. An. xiii. 3; Tac. Hist. v. 3; Athen. x. p. 418, e, where his father is called Neochabos.) [F.S.]

BOCCHUS (B<ci>χος). 1. A king of Mauretania, who acted a prominent part in the war of the Romans against Jugurtha. He was a barbarian without any principles, assuming alternately the appearance of a friend of Jugurtha and of the Romans, as his momentary inclination or avarice dictated; but he ended his prevarication by betraying Jugurtha to the Romans. In b.c. 108, Jugurtha, who was then hard pressed by the proconsul Q. Metellus, applied for assistance to Bocchus, whose daughter was his wife. Bocchus complied the more readily with this request, since at the beginning of the war he had made offers of alliance and friendship to the Romans, which had been rejected. But when Q. Metellus also sent an embassy to him at the same time, Bocchus entered into negotiations with him likewise, and in consequence of this the war against Jugurtha was almost suspended so long as Q. Metellus had the command. When in c. 107, C. Marius came to Africa as the successor of Metellus, Bocchus sent several embassies to him, expressing his desire to enter into friendly relations with Rome; but when at the same time Jugurtha promised Bocchus the third part of Numidia, and C. Marius ravaged the portion of Bocchus's dominion which he had formerly taken from Jugurtha, Bocchus accepted the proposal of Jugurtha, and joined him with a large force. The two kings thus united made an attack upon the Romans, but were defeated in two successive engagements. Hereupon, Bocchus again sent an embassy to Marius, requesting him to despatch two of his most trustworthy officers to him, that he might negotiate with them. Marius accordingly sent two embassadors to Sulla, and A. Manlius, who succeeded in effecting a decided change in the king's mind. Soon after, Bocchus despatched embassadors to Rome, but they fell into the hands of the Gaeduli, and having made their escape into the camp of Sulla, who received them very hospitably, they proceeded to Rome, where hopes of an alliance and the friendship of the Roman people were held out to them. When Bocchus was informed of this, he requested an interview with Sulla. This being granted, Sulla tried to persuade Bocchus to deliver up Jugurtha into the hands of the Romans. At the same time, however, Jugurtha also endeavoured to induce him to betray Sulla, and these clashing proposals made Bocchus hesitate for a while; but he at last determined to comply with the wish of Sulla. Jugurtha was accordingly invited to negotiate for peace, and when he arrived, was treacherously taken prisoner, and delivered up to Sulla, b.c. 106. According to some accounts, Jugurtha had come as a fugitive to Bocchus, and was then handed over to the Romans. Bocchus was rewarded for his treachery by an alliance with Rome, and he was even allowed to dedicate in the Capitol statues of Victory and golden images of Jugurtha representing him in the act of being delivered up to Sulla. (Sall. Jug. 19, 80-120; Appian, Numid. 3, 4; Liv. Epit. 66; Dion Cass. Fragn. Reimaur. n. 168, 169; Eutrop. iv. 27; Florus, iii. 1; Oros. v. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Plut. Marin. 10, 32, Sall. 3.)

2. Probably a son of the preceding, and a brother of Bogud, who is expressly called a son of Bocchus I. (Oros. v. 21.) These two brothers for a time possessed the kingdom of Mauretania in common, and, being hostile to the Pompeian party, J. Caesar confirmed them in b.c. 49, as kings of Mauretania, which some writers describe as if Caesar had then raised them to this dignity. In Caesar's African war, Bocchus was of great service, by taking Cirta, the capital of Juba, king of Numidia, and thus compelling him to abandon the cause of Scipio. Caesar rewarded him with a portion of the dominions of Masinissa, the ally of Juba, which however was taken from him, after the death of Caesar, by Arabion, the son of Masinissa. There is a statement in Dion Cassius (xliii. 36), that, in b.c. 45, Bocchus sent his sons to Spain to join Cn. Pompey. If this is true, it can only be accounted for by the suspicion, that Bocchus was induced by jealousy of his brother Bogud to desert the cause of Caesar and join the enemy; for all we know of the two brothers shews that the good understanding between them had ceased. During the civil war between Antony and Octavianus, Bocchus sided with the latter; but when Bogud was in alliance with Antony. When Bogud was in Spain, b.c. 38, Bocchus united the sole government of Mauretania, in which he was afterwards confirmed by Octavianus. He died about b.c. 33, whereupon his kingdom became a Roman province. (Dion Cass. xlii. 42, xliii. 3, 36, xlviii. 45, xlix. 43; Appian, b. c. ii. 96, iv. 54, v. 26; Hirt. B. Afr. 25; Strab. xvii. p. 828.) [L.S.]

BODON (B<ci>δων), an ancient hero, from whom the Thessalian town of Bodone derived its name. (Steph. Byz. a. v. B<ci>δων.) [L.S.]

BODUOGNATUS, a leader of the Nervii in their war against Caesar, b.c. 57. (Caes. B. G. ii. 23.)

BOEBUS (Bo<ci>βος), a son of Glaephyrus, from whom the Thessalian town of Boebi derived its name. (Steph. Byz. a. v. B<ci>βων.) [L.S.]

BOEDROMIUS (Bo<ci>δρωμιος), the helper in distress, a surname of Apollo at Athens, the origin of which is explained in different ways. According to some, the god was thus called because he had assisted the Athenians in the war with the Amazons, who were defeated on the seventh of Boedromion, the day on which the Boeotians were afterwards celebrated. (Plut. Theog., 12.) According to others, the name arose from the circumstance, that in the war of Erechtheus and Ion against Eumolpus, Apollo had promised to be present in case the Athenians were assailed by the Boeotians with a war-shout (Boeot.), if they would conquer. (Harpocr., Suid., Etym. M. a. e. Böendeus; Callim. Hymn. in Apollo, 69.) [L.S.]

BOEO (Bóes), an ancient poetess of Delphi, composed a hymn of which Pausanias (x. 5. § 4) has preserved four lines. Athenaeus (i. p. 393, é.) cites a work, apparently a poem, entitled Όρφειον, which seems to have contained an account of the myths of men who had been turned into birds, but he was doubtful whether it was written by a poetess Boeo or a poet Bocus (Bóes): Antoninus Liberalis, however, quotes it (cc. 3, 7, and 11, &c.) as the work of Boeoa. The name of Boeo occurs in a list of seers given by Clemens Alexandrinus. (Strorn. i. p. 333, ed. Phil.

BOETUSUS (Bóetra), a son of Poseidon and Itonus and Arne (Antiope or Melanippe), and brother of Aeolus. (Aeolus, No. 3.) He was the ancestral hero of the Boeotians, who derived their name from him. (Paul. i. 1. § 1.) [L.S.]

BOETHIUS, whose full name was Anicius MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOETHIUS (to which a few MSS. of his works add the name of Torquatus, and commentators prefix by conjecture the praenomen Flavius from his father's consulship in A. D. 487), a Roman statesman and author, and remarkable as standing at the close of the classical and the commencement of scholastic philosophy. He was born between A. D. 470 and 475 (as is inferred from Consol. Phil. i. 1). The Anician family had for the two preceding centuries been the most illustrious in Rome (see Gibbon, c. 31), and several of its members have been reckoned amongst the direct ancestors of Boethius. But the only conjecture worth notice is that which makes his grandfather to have been the Flavius Boethius murdered by Valentinian III. A. D. 455. His father was probably the consul of A. D. 457, and died in the childhood of his son, who was then brought up by some of the chief men at Rome, amongst whom were probably Festus and Symmachus. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3.)

He was famous for his general learning (Eunomius, Ep. viii. 1) and his laborious translations of Greek philosophy (Cassiodor. Ep. i. 48) as well as for his extensive charities to the poor at Rome, both natives and strangers. (Procop. Goth. i. 1.) In his domestic life, he was singularly happy, as the husband of Rusticiana, daughter of Symmachus (Consol. Phil. ii. 3, 4; Procop. Goth. iii. 20), and the father of two sons, Aurelius Anicius Symmachus, and Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius, who were consuls, A. D. 522. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3, 4.)

He naturally rose into public notice, became patron, before the usual age (Consol. Phil. ii. 3), consul in A. D. 510, as appears from the diptychon of his consulship still preserved in Brescia (See Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), and princesse sumptibus. (Procop. Goth. i. 1.) He also attracted the attention of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, was appointed (Anonym. Vales. p. 36, supra, “magister officiorum” in his court, and was applied to him by a mathematical regulation of the coinage to prevent forgery (Cassiod. Ep. i. 10), for a sun-dial and waterclock for Gundobald, king of the Burgundians (ib. i. 45), and for the recommendation of a good musician to Clevis, king of the Franks. (Bib. i. 40.) And he reached the height of his prosperity when, on the inaugural day of his two sons in the consulate, A. D. 522, after pronouncing a panegyric on Theodoric, he distributed a largess to the Roman populace in the games of the circus. (Consol. Phil. ii. 3.)

This happiness was suddenly overcast. He had resolved, on his entrance into public life, to carry out the saying of Plato, "that the world would only be happy when kings became philosophers, or philosophers became kings." He protected and relieved the provincials from the public and private rapine to which they were exposed, defended the Campanians against the praefect of the praetorium, saved Paulinus from "the dogs of the palace," and restrained the oppressions of the barbarian officers, Trigiulia and Conigastus. (Consol. Phil. i. 4.) This had naturally roused intensely the jealousy of his enemies in the court of Theodoric; and the boldness with which he pleaded the cause of Albinus, when accused of treason by the informer Cyprianus, seems to have been the plea on which Gaudentius, Opilio, and Basilius charged him and Symmachus with the intention of delivering Rome from the barbarian yoke,—to which was added the charge of sacrilege or magic. A sentence of confiscation and death was passed against him unheard (Consol. Phil. i. 4), and he was imprisoned at Ticinum in the baptistry of the church, which was to be seen at Pavia till 1848 (Tiraboschi, vol. iii. lib. i. c. 4), during which time he wrote his book "De Consolatione Philosophiae." He was executed at Calvanzano (in agro Calvintano) (Anonym. Vales. p. 36), or according to the general belief, at Ticinum, by beheading (Anast. Vit. Pontif. in Joanne I); Almin. Hist. Franc. ii. 1), or (according to Anonym. Vales. p. 36) by the torture of a cord drawn round his head till the eyes were forced from their sockets, and then by beating with clubs till he expired. Symmachus was also beheaded, and Rusticiana reduced to poverty, till Alamanus, widow of Theodoric and regent during her son's minority, restored the statues and restored to her his confiscated property. (Procop. Goth. i. 2; Anec. 10; Jordan. Reb. Got. 89.)

Rusticiana was, however, on the sack of Rome, in A. D. 541, chiefly by her liberality to the besieged, again reduced to beggary, and was only saved by the kindness of Totila from the fury which this liberality, as well as her destruction of Theodoric's statues in revenge for her husband and father, had excited in the Gothic army. (Procop. Goth. iii. 30.) In A. D. 722, a tomb was erected to Boethius' memory by Luitprand, king of the Lombards, in the church of S. Pietro Cielo d'Or, and in A. D. 990, a more magnificent one by Otho III., with an epitaph by pope Sylvester II. (Tiraboschi, vol. iii. lib. i. c. 4.)

With the facts stated above have been mixed up various stories, more or less disputed, which seem to have grown with the growth of his posthumous reputation.

The story of his eighteen years' stay at Athens, and attendance on the lectures of Proclus, his constant activity on the authority of the spurious treatise "De Divisione Scollarum," proved by Thomasius to have been written by Thomas Brabantinus, or Cantipratinus. Being the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece, and living on the boundary of the ancient and modern world, he is one of the most important links between them. Although he was the great object of his public life to protect the declining fortunes of Rome against the oppression of the barbarian invaders, so it was the great object of his literary life to keep alive the expiring light of Greek literature amidst the growing ignorance of the age. The complete ruin of the ancient world, which followed almost immediately on his death, imparted to this object an importance and to himself a celebrity far beyond what he could ever have anticipated. In the total ignorance of Greek writers which prevailed from the 6th to the 14th century, he was looked upon as the head and type of all philosophers, as Augustin was of all theology and Virgil of all literature, and hence the tendency throughout the middle ages to invest him with a distinctly Christian and almost miraculous character. In Dante, g. he is thus described (Parad. x. 124)—

"Per veder ogni ben dentro vi gode
L' anima santa, che 'l mondo fallace
Pa manifesto a chi di lei ben ode;
Lo corpo, ovd' ella fu cadace, gent
Giuso in Cielardo, ed essa du martiro
E da esiglo venne a questa pace."

After the introduction of the works of Aristotle into Europe in the 13th century, Boethius's fame gradually died away, and he affords a remarkable instance of an author, who having served a great purpose for nearly 1000 years, now that that purpose has been accomplished, will sink into obscurity as general as was once his celebrity. The first author who quotes his works is Hincmar (i. 211, 460, 474, 521), a. d. 850, and in the subsequent literature of the middle ages the Consolation gave birth to imitations, translations, and commentaries, innumerable. (Warton's Eng. Poet. iii. 342, 343.) Of four classics in the Paris library in a. d. 1300 this was one. (Ib. i. p. cxii.) Of translations the most famous were one into Greek, of the poetical portions of the work, by Maximus Planudes (first published by Weber, Darmstadt, 1833), into Hebrew by Ben Benschet (Wolf. Bibl. Hebr. i. 229, 1092, 243, 534, 369; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), into old High German at the beginning of the 11th century, by St. Gallen; into French by J. Meun, in 1306, at the order of Philip the Fair; but above all, that into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great, which is doubtfully interesting. (1) as one of the first attempts at the translation of a Latin secular work; (2) as the chief literary relic of Alfred himself, whose own mind appears not only in the freedom of the translation, but also in large original insertions relative to the king's office, or to Christian history, which last fact strikingly illustrates the total absence of any such in Boethius's own work. (Of this the best edition is by J. S. Cardale, with notes and translation, 1828.)

Of imitations may be mentioned (1), Chaucer's Testament of Love. (Warton's Eng. Poet. ii. 295.)

The chief ancient authorities for his life are the Epitases of Eunomius and Cassiodorus, and the History of Procopius. The chief modern authorities are Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15; Timbschol, vol. iii. lib. i. cap. 4; Hand, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopaedia; Barbarini, Crit. storica Exposizione della Vite di Doc. Divina, Pavia, 1753; Heyne, Consequentia Logicae, Gottingen, 1796. [A.P.S.J.

BOETHUS (Boethius). 1. A Stoic philosopher who perhaps lived even before the time of Chrysippus, and was the author of several works. One of them was entitled Περὶ σώματος, from which Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 146) quotes his opinion about the essence of God; another was called Περὶ εἰμικοῦ, of which the same writer (vii. 149) mentions the eleventh book. This latter work is, in all probability, the one to which Cicero refers in his treatise on Divination (i. 8, ii. 21). Philo (de Mund. incognit. ii. p. 497, ed. Mangely) mentions him together with Posidonius, and it is not improbable that this Boethius is the one mentioned by Plutarch. (De Placit. Philos. iii. 2.)

2. An Epicurean philologist and geometrician, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Phil. Orac. p. 396, d.), and is introduced by the same writer in the Sympoios (v. 1, p. 673, c.), but nothing further is known about him.

3. A Platonic philosopher and grammarian, who wrote a Lexicon to Plato's works (ουργεῖς Λέξεων Πλατωνικῶν), dedicated to Melanthus, which Photius (Cod. 154) preferred to the similar work of Timaeus still extant. Another work on the ambiguous words of Plato (περὶ τῶν παπά Πλατωνίκων Λέξεων) was dedicated to Athenagoras. (Phot. Cod. 155.) Whether he is the same as the Boethius who wrote an exegesis to the Phaenomena of Aratus (Geminus, introd. ad Phaen. 14) is uncertain, and also whether he is the one referred to by Boethius. He wrote 14 platonic and philosophic works. (Euseb. Praep. Evang. xiv. 10, xx. 11, 16; comp. Heasch. x. v. βικάδων ερώτ.; Aeneas, Gaz. Theophr. p. 16.)

Among the celebrated persons of Sidon, speaks of that the student should begin with the Physics his commentary on the same work of Aristotle. At the same time as his own teacher in the Nicus is known to have taught. Strabo (xvi. p. 1546), he must have travelled at an early age to Rome and Athens, in which cities Andronicus is known to have taught. Strabo (xvi. p. xcv.); (Fabric. Buhle, Aristot. Opera, i. p. 297; Stahr, Aristotelis, ii. p. 129, &c.)

BOETHUS (B<o<04s), the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology in praise of Pylades, a pantomime in the time of Augustus, was a native of Tarsus. Strabo (xiv. p. 674) describes him as a bad citizen and a bad poet, who gained the favour of Antony by some verses on the battle of Philippi, and was set by him over the gymnasion and public games in Tarsus. In this office he was guilty of peculation, but escaped punishment by the favour of Antony by some verses on the battle of Philippi, and was set by him over the gymnasion and public games in Tarsus. In this office he was guilty of peculation, but escaped punishment by the favour of Antony. He was afterwards expelled from Tarsus by Athenodorus, with the approbation of Augustus.

BOETHUS (Bo<044s), a sculptor and embosser or chaser of Carthage (Paus. v. 17, § 1) of uncertain age. Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 12. 55) praises his excellence in embossing and (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) in sculpture. Müller (Haedub. Arch. § 159. 1) suspects, and not without good reason, that the reading Καρυχθώνας is corrupted out of Καρχιθώνας. The artist would then not be an inhabitant or even a native of the barbarian Carthage, but of the Greek town of Chalecodon in Asia Minor. (Agra-

BOEUS (B<o4s), a son of Heraclæs, and founder of the Laconian town of Boeae, to which he led colonists from Etis, Aphrodisias, and Side. (Paus. iii. 22, § 9.) (L. S.)

BOEUS. [Bo<044s], BOIUS.

BOGES (B<o4s), the Persian governor of Eion in Thrace, when Xerxes invaded Greece in B.C. 480. Bokes continued to hold the place till B.C. 476, when it was besieged by the Athenians under Cimon. Bokes, finding that he was unable to defend the town, and refusing to surrender it, killed his wife, children, and family, and set fire to the place, in which he himself perished. (Herod. vii. 113, 107; Plut. Cim. 7, who calls him Boëtus; Paus. viii. 8, § 5, who calls him Bokes; Polyæn. vii. 24, who calls him Boëtus; comp. Diod. xi. 68.)

BOGUS (Bo<044s) was king of Mauretania Tingitana, in B.C. 49, as a reward for his adherence to him in opposition to the party of Pompey. (Dion Cass. xiii. 42; comp. Cic. ad Fam. x. 32; Sueton. Jul. 52.) Accordingly, while Caesar was engaged with his rival in Greece, B.C. 48, we find Bogus zealously lending his aid to Cassius Longinus, Caesar's pro-prætor in further Spain, to quell the sedition in that province. (Hirt. Bell. Alex. 62.) Again, during Caesar's campaign in Africa, B.C. 46, Mauretania was invaded unsuccessfully by the young Cn. Pompey; and when Juba, the Numidian, was hastening to join his forces to those of Q. Metellus Scipio, Bogus attacked his dominions at the instigation of the Roman exile P. Attius, and obliged him to return for their defence. (Hirt. Bell. Afric. 23, 25, comp. c. 55; Dion Cass. xiii. 3.) In Caesar's war in Spain against Pompey's sons, B.C. 45, Bogus joined the former in person; and it was indeed by his attack on the camp of Cn. Pompey at the battle of Mutina that Labienus was drawn from his post in the field to cover it, and the scale was thus turned in Caesar's favour. (Dion Cass. xiii. 38.) After the murder of Caesar, Bogus espoused the side of Antony, and it was perhaps for the furtherance of these interests that he crossed over to Spain in B.C. 38, and so lost his kingdom through a revolt of his subjects, fomented in his absence by Boecchus. This prince's usurpation was confirmed by Octavius, and seems to have been accompanied with the gift of a freer constitution to the Tingitaniens. (Dion Cass. xvi. 43.) Upon this, Bogus betook himself into Greece to Antony, for whom we afterwards find him holding the town of甲状, at the capture of which by Agrippa he lost his life about the end of B.C. 32 or the beginning of 31. (Dion Cass. i. 11.) [E. E.]

BOJOCALUS, the leader of the Anabarii, a German people, was a man of great renown, and had long been faithful to the Romans, but made war against them in 30 B.C. (Tac. Ann. iii. 55.)

BOLEINUS, a chieftain of the Boii, who in B.C. 194, together with his two brothers, excited his countrymen to revolt from the Romans, and fought an indecisive battle with Tib. Sempronius, the consul, who had advanced into his territory. The Boii continued to give the Romans trouble for several successive years, till their reduction by Scipio in B.C. 191; but of Bolox he himself we find no further mention in Livy. (Liv. xxxiv. 46, 47, 56, xxxvi. 4, 5, 40, xxxvi. 38, 39.) (E. E.)

BOLUS (B<o<044s), a sculptor and embosser or chaser of Carthage (Paus. v. 17, § 1) of uncertain age. Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 12. 55) praises his excellence in embossing and (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) in sculpture. Müller (Haedub. Arch. § 159. 1) suspects, and not without good reason, that the reading Καρυχθώνας is corrupted out of Καρχιθώνας. The artist would then not be an inhabitant or even a native of the barbarian Carthage, but of the Greek town of Chalecodon in Asia Minor. (Agra-

BOULUS. (B<h<044s), was king of Mauretania Tingitana, in B.C. 49, as a reward for his adherence to him in opposition to the party of Pompey. (Dion Cass. xiii. 42; comp. Cic. ad Fam. x. 32; Sueton. Jul. 52.) Accordingly, while Caesar was engaged with his rival in Greece, B.C. 48, we find Bogus zealously lending his aid to Cassius Longinus, Caesar's pro-prætor in further Spain, to quell the sedition in that province. (Hirt. Bell. Alex. 62.) Again, during Caesar's campaign in Africa, B.C. 46, Mauretania was invaded unsuccessfully by the young Cn. Pompey; and when Juba, the Numidian, was hastening to join his forces to those of Q. Metellus Scipio, Bogus attacked his dominions at the instigation of the Roman exile P. Attius, and obliged him to return for their defence. (Hirt. Bell. Afric. 23, 25, comp. c. 55; Dion Cass. xiii. 3.) In Caesar's war in Spain against Pompey's sons, B.C. 45, Bogus joined the former in person; and it was indeed by his attack on the camp of Cn. Pompey at the battle of Mutina that Labienus was drawn from his post in the field to cover it, and the scale was thus turned in Caesar's favour. (Dion Cass. xiii. 38.) After the murder of Caesar, Bogus espoused the side of Antony, and it was perhaps for the furtherance of these interests that he crossed over to Spain in B.C. 38, and so lost his kingdom through a revolt of his subjects, fomented in his absence by Boecchus. This prince's usurpation was confirmed by Octavius, and seems to have been accompanied with the gift of a freer constitution to the Tingitaniens. (Dion Cass. xvi. 43.) Upon this, Bogus betook himself into Greece to Antony, for whom we afterwards find him holding the town of甲状, at the capture of which by Agrippa he lost his life about the end of B.C. 32 or the beginning of 31. (Dion Cass. i. 11.) [E. E.]

BOIOCALUS, the leader of the Anabarii, a German people, was a man of great renown, and had long been faithful to the Romans, but made war against them in 30 B.C. (Tac. Ann. iii. 55, 56.)

BOIORIX, a chieflain of the boii, who in B.C. 194, together with his two brothers, excited his countrymen to revolt from the Romans, and fought an indecisive battle with Tib. Sempronius, the consul, who had advanced into his territory. The Boii continued to give the Romans trouble for several successive years, till their reduction by Scipio in B.C. 191; but of Bolox he himself we find no further mention in Livy. (Liv. xxxiv. 46, 47, 56, xxxvi. 4, 5, 40, xxxvi. 38, 39.) (E. E.)

BOLANUS, a friend of Cicero's, recommended by him to P. Sulpicius in B.C. 54. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 77.)

Bolus also occurs in Horace (Sat. i. 9, 11) as the name of a well-known furious fellow, who would not submit to any insult or impertinence.

BOLANUS, VETTIUUS, commanded a legion under Corbulo in the war against Tigranes in Armenia, A.D. 63, and was appointed governor of Britain in 69, in the place of Trebellius Maximus. In the civil war between Vespasian and Vitellius, Bolanus did not declare in favour of either; and, during his government of the province, he attempted nothing against the Britons, and allowed his troops great licence. But, as his administration was marked by integrity, he was popular in the province. The praises which Statius bestows upon Bolanus in the poem (Silv. v. 2, 34, &c.) addressed to his son Crispinus, must be set down to flattery. (Tac. Ann. xxv. 3, Hist. ii. 65, 97, Agric. 3, 16.)

BOLGIUS. [Belgius.]

BOLIS. [Achaerus, p. 8, a.]

BOLUS (B<h<044s). Under this name Suidas, and Eudocius after him, mention a Pythagorean philosopher of Mende, to whom they ascribe several works, which are otherwise entirely unknown. From this Pythagorean, Suidas distinguishes a Bolus who was a philosopher of the school of Democritus, who wrote on medicine and also an historical work. But, from a passage of Columella (vii. 5; comp. Stobaeus, Serm. 51), it appears that Bolus of Mende and the follower of Democritus were one and the same person; and he seems to have lived subsequently to the time of Theophrastus, whose work on plants he appears to have known. (Steph. Byz. s. a. "Ἀρσενως; Schol. ad Nicand. Thess. 8.4.)

BOMILCAR (Βομιλκάρ, Bomilcar). A commander of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, n. c. 310. In the first battle with the invaders, Bomilcar, his colleague Hanno having fallen, betrayed the fortune of Hannibal's army at the passage of the Rhone, n. c. 216; and returned with 130 ships, but was prevented from further operations by the Roman fleet under Hippocrates and Himilco, Bomilcar again sailed to Carthage with the news, and was himself called Fauna, Fatun, or Omn. She was worshipped at Rome from the earliest times as a chaste and prophetic divinity; and her worship was so exclusively confined to women, that men were not even allowed to know her name. Faunus himself had not been able to overcome her aversion to men, except by changing her sex. She was made an object of suspicion to her master, which became an object of suspicion to his master, which was revealed by Rutilius, lieutenant of Metellus. (Suid. ad Milon. p. 32.)

she was worshipped at Rome from the earliest times as a chaste and prophetic divinity; and her worship was so exclusively confined to women, that men were not even allowed to know her name. Faunus himself had not been able to overcome her aversion to men, except by changing her sex. She was made an object of suspicion to her master, which became an object of suspicion to his master, which was revealed by Rutilius, lieutenant of Metellus. (Suid. ad Milon. p. 32.)

3. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies which were voted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, n. c. 216, and with which he arrived in Italy in the ensuing year. (Liv. xxi. 13, 41.) In n. c. 214, he was sent with fifty-five ships to Numidia. The murder was discovered and traced to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or Nabdalsa, a Numidian nobleman, for the seizure or assassination of the king; but the design was discovered to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or secretary, and Bomilcar was put to death. (Stil. Jug. 70, 71.)

4. A Numidian, deep in the confidence of Jugurtha, by whom he was employed on many secret services. In particular, when Jugurtha was at Rome, in n. c. 108, Bomilcar undertook and effected for him the assassination of Massiva, who happened to be at Rome at the same time, and who, as well as Jugurtha himself, was a grandson of Masinissa, and a rival claimant to the throne of Numidia. The murder was discovered and traced to Bomilcar, who was obliged to enter into large recognizances to appear and stand his trial; but, before the trial came on, his master privately sent him back to Africa. (Sall. Jug. 35; comp. Liv. Epit. 64.) In the ensuing year, we find him commanding a portion of Jugurtha's army, with which he was defeated in a skirmish at the river Mutul by Rutillus, Lieutenant of Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 49, 62, 53.) In the winter of the same year Metellus, after his unsuccessful attempt on Zama, engaged Bomilcar by promises of Roman favour to deliver Jugurtha to him, or toubi, and he seems to have presided in that assembly of the senate accordingly at his instigation that the king sent ambassadors to make offers of unconditional submission to Metellus. (Sall. Jug. 61, 62.) In consequence of this advice Bomilcar seems to have become an object of suspicion to his master, which urged him the more towards the execution of his treachery. Accordingly he formed a plot with Nabdalsa, a Numidian nobleman, for the seizure or assassination of the king; but the design was discovered to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or secretary, and Bomilcar was put to death. (Stil. Jug. 70, 71.)

5. E. B.

BONA DEA, a Roman divinity, who is described as the sister, with or daughter of Faunus, and was herself called Fauna, Fatun, or Omn. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 814; Macrobr. Sat. i. 12.) She was worshipped at Rome from the earliest times as a chaste and prophetic divinity; and her worship was so exclusively confined to women, that men were not even allowed to know her name. Faunus himself had not been able to overcome her aversion to men, except by changing her sex. She was made an object of suspicion to her master, which became an object of suspicion to his master, which was revealed by Rutilius, lieutenant of Metellus. (Suid. ad Milon. p. 32.)

6. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies which were voted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, n. c. 216, and with which he arrived in Italy in the ensuing year. (Liv. xxi. 13, 41.) In n. c. 214, he was sent with fifty-five ships to Numidia. The murder was discovered and traced to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or Nabdalsa, a Numidian nobleman, for the seizure or assassination of the king; but the design was discovered to Jugurtha by Nabdalsa's agent or secretary, and Bomilcar was put to death. (Stil. Jug. 70, 71.)

7. Bomilcar, who was a philosopher of the school of Democritus, who wrote on medicine and also an historical work. But, from a passage of Columella (vii. 5; comp. Stobaeus, Serm. 51), it appears that Bolus of Mende and the follower of Democritus were one and the same person; and he seems to have lived subsequently to the time of Theophrastus, whose work on plants he appears to have known. (Steph. Byz. s. a. "Ἀρσενως; Schol. ad Nicand. Thess. 8.4.)

8. Bomilcar (Βομιλκάρ, Bomilcar). A commander of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, n. c. 310. In the first battle with the invaders, Bomilcar, his colleague Hanno having fallen, betrayed the fortune of Hannibal's army at the passage of the Rhone, n. c. 216; and returned with 130 ships, but was prevented from further operations by the Roman fleet under Hippocrates and Himilco, Bomilcar again sailed to Carthage with the news, and was himself called Fauna, Fatun, or Omn. She was made an object of suspicion to her master, which became an object of suspicion to his master, which was revealed by Rutilius, lieutenant of Metellus. (Suid. ad Milon. p. 32.)

9. Bomilcar (Βομιλκάρ, Bomilcar). A commander of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, n. c. 310. In the first battle with the invaders, Bomilcar, his colleague Hanno having fallen, betrayed the fortune of Hannibal's army at the passage of the Rhone, n. c. 216; and returned with 130 ships, but was prevented from further operations by the Roman fleet under Hippocrates and Himilco, Bomilcar again sailed to Carthage with the news, and was himself called Fauna, Fatun, or Omn. allowed to bring wine with her, a vessel filled with wine, stood in the room, and from it the women made their libations and drank. This wine, however, was called milk, and the vessel containing it mellarium, so that the name of wine was avoided altogether. The solemnity commenced with a sacrifice called dianum (the priestess who performed the name dianatrix, and the goddess damia; Fest. s. n. Dianum, who however gives an absurd account of these names). One might suppose that the sacrifice consisted of a chamois (dama) or some kind of substitute for a chamois; but Pliny (H.N. x. 77) seems to suggest, that the sacrifice consisted of hens of various colours, except black ones. After this sacrifice, the women began to perform Bacchic dances, and to drink of the wine prepared for them. (Juvi. vi. 314.) The goddess herself was believed to have set the example for this; for, while yet on earth, she was said to have intoxicated herself by emptying a large vessel of wine, whereupon Fauna killed her with a myrtle staff, but afterwards raised her to the rank of a goddess. (Varr. op. Lat. temp. l. c.; Arnob. adv. Gent. v. 18; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 20.) This whole ceremony took place at night, when it is usually called sacrificium opertum, or sacra opertane. (Cic. de Legg. ii. 9, ad Att. i. 13.) Fauna was also regarded as a goddess possessed of healing powers, as might be inferred from the serpent being part of her worship; but we know that various kinds of medicinal herbs were used in her temple, and bought largely by the poorer classes. (Macro, Plut., Arnob. l. c.) Greek writers, in their usual way, identify the Bona Dea with some Greek divinity, such as Semele, Medea, Hecate, or Persephone. The Angitia of the Marrians seems to have been the same goddess with them as the Bona Dea with the Romans. (Augustin. ii. 9, do Legg. ad Alt. l. c. p. 195, &c.)

BONIFACIUS, a Roman general, tribune, and comes in the province of Africa under Valentinian III. In the early part of his career he was distinguished for his prompt administration of justice, and also for his activity against the barbarians, as at Massilia in a. d. 413 against the Gothic king Ataulphus (Olymp. op. Post. p. 50, Bekck.), and in 422 against the Vandals in Spain (Procop. B. Vand. i. 3, 4, 9; Olymp. op. Post. pp. 59, 69; Augustin. Ep. 185 (or 50), 189 (or 95), 220 (or 79); and, of modern writers, Gibbon, c. 33; at greater length, Tillelmon, Mon. Ecol. xii. pp. 712—886, in which last (note 77) is a discussion on a correspondence of sixteen smaller letters, falsely ascribed to him and Augustin. [A. P. S.]

BONOSUS, was born in Spain; his ancestors were from Britain and Gaul. The son of a humble schoolmaster, he displayed a marked aptitude for literary pursuits; but, having entered the army, gradually rose to high military rank, and was indited for much of his success in life to the singular faculty which he possessed of being able to drink to excess (bibil quantum hominum nemo) without becoming intoxicated, or losing his self-command. Aurelian, resolving to take advantage of this natural gift, kept him near his person, in order that when ambassadors arrived from barbarian tribes, they might be tempted to deep potations by Bonosus, and so led to betray the secrets of their mission. In pursuance of this plan, the emperor caused him to wed Hunilia, a damsel of the noblest blood among the Goths, in hopes of gaining early information of the schemes in agitation among her kinsmen, which they were apt to divulge when under the influence of wine. How the husband spying discharged his task we are not told; but we find him at a subsequent period in the command of troops upon the Rhetian frontier, and afterwards stationed on the Rhine. The Germans having succeeded in destroying certain Roman vessels in consequence of some carelessness or breach of duty on his part, in order to avoid immediate punishment, he prevailed upon his soldiers to proclaim him emperor. After a long and severe struggle, he was vanquished by Probus, and hanged himself. The conqueror magnanimously spared his two sons and pensioned his widow. No medals are extant except those published by Goltzius, which are spurious. (Vopiscus, Vit. Bonos.) [W. R.] BOORAS (Bọrras), an epithet commonly given to Her in the Homeric poems. It has been said, that the goddess was thus designated in allusion to her having metamorphosed Io into a cow; but this opinion is contradicted by the fact, that other divinities too, such as Euryphaessa (Horn. Hymn. in Del. 2) and Pluto (Hesiod. Theog. 335.), are mentioned with the same epithet; and from this circumstance it is thought, that the poets meant to express by it nothing but the sublime and majestic character of those divinities. [L. S.]

2. The Carthaginian commander of the mercenary troops in Sarthina, was, together with all the Carthaginians with him, killed by these soldiers when they revolted in B. C. 240. (Polyb. i. 79.)

3. A Carthaginian general, who was sent by Hasdrubal, the commander-in-chief of the Carthaginian forces in Spain, to prevent the Romans under Scipio from crossing the Iberus in B. C. 217. But not daring to do this, Bostar fell upon Saguntum, where all the hostages were kept which had been given to the Carthaginians by the different states in Spain. Here he was persuaded by Alexob, who had secretly gone over to the Romans to set these hostages at liberty, because such an act would secure the affections of the Spanish people. But the hostages had no sooner left the city, than they were betrayed by Alexob into the hands of the Romans. For his simplicity on this occasion, Bostar was involved in great danger. (Polyb. iii. 98, 99; Liv. xxii. 22.)

4. One of the ambassadors sent by Hamilcar to Philip of Macedonia in B. C. 215. The ship in which they sailed was taken by the Romans, and the ambassadors themselves sent as prisoners to Rome. (Liv. xxii. 34.) We are not told whether they obtained their freedom; and consequently it is uncertain whether the Bostar who was governor of Capua with Hanno, in 211, is the same as the preceding. (Liv. xxvi. 5, 12; Appian, Annib. 43.)

continued to attach himself to the interests of Macedonia under Philip V., whom he attended in his conference with Flaminius at Nicaea in Locris, n. c. 198. (Polyb. xvii. 1; Liv. xxxii. 32.) At the battle of Cynoscephalae, n. c. 197, he commanded the Boeotian troops in Philip's army; but, together with the rest of his countrymen who had on that occasion fallen into the Roman power, he was sent home in captivity by Flaminius, who wished to conciliate Bocotia. On his return he was elected Ecdactus, through the influence of the Macedonian party at Thebes; in consequence of which Zeuxippus, Peisistratus, and the other leaders of the Roman party, caused him to be assassinated as he was returning home one night from an entertainment, n. c. 196. Polybius tells us, what Livy omits to state, that Flaminius himself was privy to the crime. (Polyb. xviii. 26; Liv. xxxii. 27, 28; comp. xxxv. 47, xxxvi. 6.) [L. E.]

BRANCHUS (Brachus), a son of Apollo or Smerus of Delphi. His mother, a Milesian woman, dreamt at the time she gave birth to him, that the sun was passing through her body, and the seers interpreted this as a favourable sign. Apollo loved the boy Branchus for his great beauty, and endowed him with prophetic power, which he exercised at Didyma, near Miletus. Here he founded an oracle, of which his descendants, the Branchidæ, were the priests, and which was held in great esteem, especially by the Ionians and Aeolians. (Herod. i. 157; Strab. xiv. p. 634, xvii. p. 814; Latut. ad Stat. Theb. viii. 198; Conon, Narrat. 53; Luc. Dial. Deor. 2; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oraculam.)

BRANCUS, king of the Allobroges, had been deprived of his kingdom by his younger brother, but was restored to it by Hamilcar in n. c. 219. (Liv. xxi. 31.)

BRANGAS (Brangas), a son of the Thracian king Strymon, and brother of Rhessus and Olynthus. When the last of these three brothers had been killed during the chase by a lion, Brangas buried him on the spot where he had fallen, and called the town which he subsequently built there Olynthus. (Conon, Narrat. 4; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ολύνθος; Athen. viii. p. 334, who calls Olynthus a son of Heracles.) [L. S.]

BRASIDAS (Brasidas), son of Tellis, the most distinguished Spartan in the first part of the Peloponnesian war, signalized himself in its first year (n. c. 431) by throwing a hundred men into Methone, while besieged by the Athenians in their first ravage of the Peloponnesian coast. For this exploit, which saved the place, he received, the first in the war, public commendation at Sparta; and perhaps in consequence of this it is we find him in September appointed Ephor Eponymus. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 10.) His next employment (n. c. 429) is as one of the three councillors sent to assist Chemus, after his first defeat by Phormion; and his name is also mentioned after the second defeat in the attempt to surprise the Peiraeus, and we may not improbably ascribe to him the attempt, and its failure to his colleagues. In 427 he was united in the same, but a subordinate, capacity, with Alcidas, the new admiral, on his return from his Ionian voyage; and accompanying him to Corcyra he was reported, Thucydides tells us, to have been received by the people as a saviour immediately after their victory in the first engagement. Next, as triarch in the attempt to dislodge De-retreat, perhaps the greatest of his exploits, from Lyncestis; and a third before the battle of Amphiopolis. His own opinion of him seems to have been very high, and indeed we cannot well overestimate the services he rendered his country. Without his activity, even the utmost temerity in their opponents would hardly have brought Sparta out of the contest without the utmost disgrace. He is in fact the one redeeming point of the first ten years; and had his life and career been prolonged, the war would perhaps have come to an earlier conclusion, and one more happy for all parties. As a commander, even our short view of him leads us to ascribe to him such qualities as would have placed his above all other names in the war, though it is true that we see him rather as the captain than the general. To his reputation for "justice, liberality, and wisdom," Thucydides ascribes not only much of his own success, but also the eagerness shown for the Spartan alliance after the Athenian disasters at Syracuse. This character was no doubt mainly assumed from motives of policy, nor can we believe him to have had any thought except for the ensuing of Sparta and his own glory. Of unscrupulous Spartan duplicity he had a full share, adding to it a most unusual dexterity and tact in negotiation; his powers, too, of eloquence were, in the judgment of Thucydides, very considerable for a Spartan. Strangely united with these qualities we find the highest personal bravery; apparently too (in Plato's Symposium he is compared to Achilles) heroic strength and beauty. He, too, like Archidamus, was a successful adaptation to circumstances of the unwildly Spartan character: to make himself fit to cope with them he sacrificed, far less, indeed, than was afterwards sacrificed in the age of Lysander, yet too much perhaps to have permitted a return to perfect acquiescence in the ancient discipline. Such rapidity and versatility, such enterprise and daring, were probably felt at Sparta (comp. Thuc. i. 79) as something new and incongruous. His successes, it is known, were regarded there with such jealousy as even to hinder his obtaining reinforcements. (Thuc. iv. 108.) [A. H. C.]

BRAUON (Bραύων), an ancient hero, from whom the Attic deities of Brauron derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)*

BRAURO'NIA (Bραυρωνία), a surname of Artemis, derived from the deities of Brauron in Attica. Under this name the goddess had a sanctuary on the Acropolis of Athens, which contained a statue of her made by Praxiteles. Her image at Brauron, however, was believed to be the most ancient, and the one which Orestes and Tiphaineia had brought with them from Tauris. (Paus. i. 28 § 8; Diod. of Ant. s. c. Bnapwpoa.)

BRENNUS. 1. The leader of the Gauls, who in B.C. 390 crossed the Apennines (Diod. xiv. 113; Liv. v. 36), Brennus attacked Clusium, and unsuccessfully. The valley of the Clanis was then open before him, leading down to the Tiber, where the river was fordable; and after crossing it he passed through the country of the Sabinians, and advanced along the Salarian road towards Rome. His army now amounted to 70,000 men. (Diod. xiv. 114.) At the Alia, which ran through a deep ravine into the Tiber, about 12 miles from the city, he found the Roman army, consisting of about 40,000 men, strongly posted. Their right wing, composed of the proletarians and irregular troops, was drawn up on high ground, covered by the ravine in front and some woody country on the flank; the left and centre, composed of the regular legions, filled the ground between the hills and the Tiber (Diod. xiv. 114), while the left wing rested on the river itself. Brennus attacked and carried this position, much in the same way as Frederick of Prussia defeated the Austrians at Leuthen. He fell with the whole strength of his army on the right wing of the Romans, and quickly cleared the ground. He then charged the exposed flank of the legions on the left, and routed the whole army with great slaughter. Had he marched at once upon the city, it would have fallen, together with the Capitol, into his hands, and the name and nation of Rome might have been swept from the earth. But he spent the night on the field. His warriors were busy in cutting off the heads of the slain (Diod. l. c.), and then abandoned themselves to plunder, drunkenness, and sleep. He delayed the whole of the next day, and thus gave the Romans time to secure the Capitol. On the third morning he burst open the gates of the city. Then followed the massacre of the eighty priests and old patricians (Zonar. ii. 23), as they sat, each in the portico of his house, in their robes and chairs of state; the plunder and burning of all the city, except the houses on the Palatine, where Brennus established his quarters (Diod. xiv. 115); the famous night attack on the Capitol, and the gallant exploit of Manlius in saving it. For six months Brennus besieged the Capitol, and at last reduced the garrison to offer 1000 pounds of gold for their ransom. The Gaul brought unfair weights to the scales, and the Roman tribune remonstrated. But Brennus then flung his broadsword into the scale, and told the tribune, who asked what it meant, that it meant "vae victis" that the weakest goes to the wall.

Polybius says (i. 18), that Brennus and his Gauls then gave up the city, and returned home safe with their booty. But the vanity of the Romans and their popular legends would not let him so escape. According to some, a large detachment was cut off in an ambush near Caere (Diod. xiv. 117); according to others, these were none others than Brennus and those who had besieged the Capitol. (Strab. v. p. 220.) Last of all, Camillus and a Roman army are made to appear suddenly just at the moment that the gold is being weighed for the Capitol, Brennus is defeated in two battles, he himself is killed, and his whole army slain to a man. (Liv. v. 40.)
BRENNUS.

2. The leader of a body of Gauls, who had settled in Pannonia, and who moved southwards and broke into Greece A.C. 279, one hundred and eleven years after the taking of Rome.

Pyrhus of Epeirus was then absent in Italy. The infamous Ptolemy Ceraunus had just established himself on the throne of Macedon. Athens was again free under Olympiodorus (Paus. i. 26.), and the old Achaean league had been renewed, with the promise of brighter days in the Peloponnese, when the inroads of the barbarians threatened all Greece with desolation.

Brennus entered Thessaly at the same time that two other divisions of the Gauls invaded Thrace and Macedonia. On returning home, the easy victory which his countrymen had gained over Ptolemy in Macedon, the richness of the country, and the treasures of the temples, furnished him with arguments for another enterprise, and he again advanced southward with the enormous force of 150,000 foot and 61,000 horse. (Paus. x. 19.)

After ravaging Macedonia (Justin. xxiv. 6.) he marched through Thessaly towards Thermopylae. Here an army of about 20,000 Greeks was assembled to dispute the pass, while a fleet of Athenian triremes lay close in shore, commanding the narrow road between the foot of the cliffs and the beach.

On arriving at the Spercheus, Brennus found the bridges broken, and a strong advanced post of the Greeks on the opposite bank. He waited therefore till night, and then sent a body of men down the river, to cross it where it spreads itself wide. But the ill-supplied and undisciplined Gauls rushed in vain upon the Greek phalanx, and after repeated attacks of incredible fury they were forced to retire with great loss. Brennus then despatched 40,000 of his men across the mountains of Thessaly into Aetolia, which they ravaged with horrible barbarity. This had the intended effect of detaching the Aetolians from the allied army at Thermopylae; and about the same time some Heracleots betrayed the pass over the mountains by which, two hundred years before, the Persians had descended on the rear of the devoted Spartans. The Gaul followed the same path. But the Greeks this time, though again surrounded, escaped; for the Athenian fleet carried them safely away before the Gauls attacked them. (Paus. x. 22.)

Brennus, without waiting for those whom he had left on the other side of the pass, pushed on for the plunder of Delphi. Justin says the barbarians laughed at the notion of dedication to the gods (xxiv. 6.): "The gods were so rich themselves that they could afford to be givers instead of receivers; and as he approached the sacred hill, he pointed out the statues, and chariots, and other offerings, which were conspicuous around the temple, and which he promised as the golden prizes of victory. (Justin. xxiv. 8.)

The Delphins had collected about 4000 men on the rock—a small number to oppose the host of Brennus. But they were strongly posted, and the advantage of the ground, and their own steady conduct, manifestly saved the temple without the supernatural help of Apollo, which is given to them by the Greek and Roman historians. As the Gauls rushed on from below, the Greeks plied their darts, and rolled down broken rocks from the cliff upon them. A violent storm and intense cold (for it was winter) increased the confusion of the assailants. They nevertheless pressed on, till Brennus fainted from his wounds, and was carried out of the fight. They then fled. The Greeks, exasperated by their barbarities, hung on their retreat, through a difficult and mountainous country, and but few of them escaped to their comrades, whom they had left behind at Thermopylae. (Paus. x. 23.)

Brennus was still alive, and might have recovered from his wounds, but according to Pausanias he would not survive his defeat, and put an end to his life with large draughts of strong wine—a more probable account than that of Justin (xxiv. 8), who says that being unable to bear the pain of his wounds, he stabbed himself. [A. O.]

BRENTUS (βρέντος), a son of Heracles, who was regarded as the founder of the town of Brentesium or Brundusium, on the Adriatic. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βρέντος.)

BRARIUS. [Αραίος.]

BRETTUS (βρεττός), a son of Heracles, from whom the Tyrrhenian town of Brettus and the country of Brettia derived their names. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βρεττός.)

BRENNIUSSI, JOANNES, a Greek scholiast on the Basileus, of uncertain date and history. (Basilica s. v. Βρεννίος.)

BRIEIUS, a painter, the father of Pausias of Cydon. (Plin. H. N. x. xii. 40.)

BRIEIUS, a painter, the father of Pausias of Cydon. (Plin. H. N. x. xii. 40.)

BRIGANTICUS, JULIUS, was born among the Batavi, and was the son of the sister of Civilis, who hated and was in turn hated by his nephew. Brigantius commanded a squadron of cavalry, with which he first revolted to Caecina, the general of Vitellius, and afterwards to Vespasian, in A. D. 70. He served under Cerialis in Germany against his uncle Civilis, and fell in battle in this war, A. D. 71. (Tac. Hist. ii. 25, iv. 70, v. 21.)

BRIMO (Bromus), the angry or the terrifying, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Hecate or Peramphe (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 861, 1211; Tzetza ad Lyoph. 1171), Demeter (Arnob. v. p. 170), and Cybele. (Theodoret. Thor. i. 699.) The Scholiast on Apollonius (l. c.) gives a second derivation of Brimo from Bpoyos, so that it would refer to the cracking of the fire, as Hecate was conceived bearing a torch. [L. S.]

BRINNO, a German of noble birth, was chosen leader of his people, the Cimnienteles, in their attack upon the Romans in A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 15.)

BRISAEUS (Brosios), a surname of Dionysus, derived from mount Brosa in Lesbos (Steph. Byz. s. v. Βροσά), or from a nymph Brosa, who was said to have brought up the god. (Schol. ad Pers. Sot. i. 76.)

BRISIEUS (Βρισιός), a patronymic from Iriaeus, and the name of Hippodamus, the son of Iriaeus of Lynessus, who fell into the hands of Achilles, and about whom the quarrel arose between Achilles and Agamemmnon. (Hom. II. i. 194, &c.; Achilles) [L. S.]

BRISIEUS (Βρισέας), the father of Iriaeus, was a son of Ardis and king of the Leleges at Pedasus, or a priest at Lynessus. (Hom. II. i. 393, ii. 689.) Iriaeus is said to have hanged himself when he lost his daughter. (Dict. Cret. li. 17.) [L. S.]
BRITANNICUS.

BRISO, M. ANTIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 137, opposed the tabellaria lex of his colleague L. Cassius Longinus, but was induced by Scipio Africanus the Younger to withdraw his opposition. (Cic. Brut. 29.)

BRITANNICUS, son of Claudius and Messalina, appears to have been born in the early part of the year A.D. 42, during the second consulsiphip of his father, and was originally named Claudius Tiberius Germanicus. In consequence of victories, or pretended victories, in Britain, the senate bestowed the title of Britannicus, which was shared by the infant prince and retained by him during the remainder of his life as his proper and distinguishing appellation. He was cherished as the heir apparent to the throne until the disgraceful termination of his mother's scandalous career (A.D. 48); but Claudius, soon after his marriage with the ambitious and unscrupulous Agrippina, was prevailed upon by her wiles and the intrigues of the freedman Pallus, her paramour, to adopt L. Domitius, her son by a former husband, to grant him Octavia, sister of Britannicus, in marriage, and to give him precedence over his own offspring. This preference was publicly manifested the year following (51), for young Nero was prematurely invested with the manly gown, and received various marks of favour, while Britannicus still wore the simple dress of a boy. Indications of jealousy were upon this occasion openly displayed by Britannicus towards his adopted brother, and Agrippina seized upon his conduct as a pretext for removing by banishment or death the most worthy of his preceptors, and substituting creatures of her own in their place. Claudius is said before his death to have given tokens of remorse for his conduct, and to have hastened his own fate by inconveniently dropping some expressions which seemed to denote a change of purpose. After the accession of Nero, Britannicus might perhaps have been permitted to live on in harmless insignificance, had he not been employed as an instrument by Agrippina for working upon the fears of her rebellious son. For, when she found her wishes and commands alike disregarded, she threatened to bring the claims of the lawful heir before the soldiery and publicly to assert his rights. Nero, alarmed by these menaces, resolved at once to remove a rival who might prove so dangerous: poison was procured from Locusta—the same apparently whose infamy has been immortalized by Juvenal—and administered, but without success. A second dose of more potent efficacix was mixed with a draught of wine, and presented at a banquet, where, in accordance with the usage of those times, the children of the imperial family, together with other noble youths, were seated at a more frugal board apart from the other guests. Scarcely had the cup touched the lips of the ill-fated prince, when he fell back speechless and breathless. While some fled, and others remained gazing in dismay at the horrid spectacle, Nero calmly ordered him to be removed, remarking that he had from infancy been subject to fits, and would soon revive. The obscurities were hurried over the same night; historians concur in reporting, that a terrible storm burst forth as the funeral procession defiled through the streets of Rome. (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 15; Suet. Claud. 27.)

Britomartis, whose death he reserved for his triumph, Britomartis, a leader of the Senonian Gauls, who induced his countrymen to murder the Roman ambassadors who had been sent to complain of the assistance which the Senones had rendered to the Etruscans, then in war with Rome. The corpse of the Roman ambassadors were mangled with every possible indignity; and as soon as the Roman consul, P. Cornelius Dolabella, heard of this outrage, he marched straight into the country of the Senones, which he reduced to a desert, and murdered all the males, with the exception of Britomartis, whose death he reserved for his triumph. (Appian, Senn. v. 1, 2, p. 55, ed. Schv., Gall. xi. p. 83; comp. Polyb. ii. 19; Liv. Epit. 12.)

BRITOMARTIS (Bri'tomartis), appears to have originally been a Cretan divinity of hunters and fishermen. Her name is usually derived from Bri'tos, sweet or blessing, and mare,'i<, a maiden, so that the name would mean, the sweet or blessing maiden. (Paus. iii. 14, § 2; Solin. 11.) After the introduction of the worship of Artemis into Crete, Britomartis, between whom and Artemis there were several points of resemblance, was... placed in some relation to her: Artemis, who loved her, assumed her name and was worshipped under it, and in the end the two divinities became completely identified, as we see from the story which makes Britomartia a daughter of Leto. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 189, with the Schol.; Paus. ii. 30. § 3; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 1402; Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 126; Aristoph. Ran. 1388; Virg. Georg. 306.) The mythus of Britomartia is given by some of the authorities just referred to. She was a daughter of Zeus and Carme, the daughter of Eubulus. She was a nymph, took great delight in wandering about hunting, and was beloved by Artemis. Minos, who likewise loved her, pursued her for nine months, but she fled from him and at last threw herself into the nets which had been set by fishermen, or leaped from mount Dictynnaeum into the sea, where she became entangled in the nets, but was saved by Artemis, who now made her a goddess. She was worshipped not only in Crete, but appeared to the inhabitants of Aegina, and was there called Aphaea, whereas in Crete she received the surname Dictyna or Dictynna (from ἰἀκτυννος, a net; comp. Diod. v. 76). According to another tradition, Britomartia was foud of solitude, and had vowed to live in perpetual maidenhood. Therefore, she received divine honours from the inhabitants under the name of Laphria. From Cephalenna she came to Crete, where she was pursued by Minos; but she fled to the sea-coast, where fishermen concealed her under their nets, whence she derived the surname Dictyna. A sailor, Andromedes, carried her from Crete to Aegina, and when, on landing there, he made an attempt upon her chastity, she fled from his vessel into a grove, and disappeared in the sanctuary of Artemis. The Aeginctans now built a sanctuary to her, and worshipped her as a goddess. (Anton. Lib. 40.) These wanderings of Britomartia unquestionably indicate the gradual diffusion of her worship in the various maritime places of Greece mentioned in the legend. Her connexion and ultimate identification with Artemis had naturally resulted from the analogous worship in the various maritime places of Greece. As Britomartia had to do with rivers or on the sea-coast, she appears with the crescent. Lastly, Britomartia was like Artemis drawn into the mystic worship of Hecate, and even identified with her. (Eurip. Hylas. 141, with the Schol.; comp. Müller, Aeginit. p. 163, &c.; Höck, Kret. ii. p. 158, &c.; Diet. of Ant. s. v. Δικτυννα.)

BRIZO (Βρίζω), a prophetic goddess of the island of Delos, who sent dreams and revealed their meaning to man. Her name is connected with βρίζω, to fall asleep. The women of Delos offered sacrifices to her in vessels of the shape of boats, and the sacrifices consisted of various things; but fishes were never offered to her. Prayers were addressed to her that she might grant everything that was good, but especially, that she might protect ships. (Athen. viii. p. 335; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1726; Hesych. s. v. Βρίζως.) [L. S.]

BROCCHUS, a Roman cognomen, was originally applied to a person who had teeth standing out. It was the name of a family of the Puria gens, and occurs on coins. In the one annexed, the obverse is H. V. B. ROCCHI the head of Ceres, and the reverse L. FIVI CN. F. with a sella curulis and fasces on each side of it. This Brocchus is not mentioned by ancient writers: he may have been a trimvir of the mint or for the purchase of corn. Pighius assigns the surname of Brocchus to several persons of the Puria gens: but the only Brocchus of this gens mentioned by ancient writers, as far as we are aware, are:

1. T. (Furius) Brocchus, the uncle of Q. Ligures. (Cic. pro Lig. 4.)
2. CN. Furius Brocchus, detected in adultery, and grievously punished. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)
3. BROCCHUS, C. ANNAEUS, or ANNEIUS, a Roman senator, who was plundered by Symmachus, one of the Venerii, a new class of publicani instituted by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 40.)
4. BROCCHUS, ARMENTIUS, a proconsul in the time of Domitian. (Plin. Ep. x. 71.)
5. BROGITARUS, a Gallo-Grecian, a son-in-law of king Deiotarus. He was an unworthy and nefarious person, who has become known only through the fact, that P. Clodius, in his tribunicianship, c. 50, sold him, by a lex tribunicia, for a large sum of money, the office of high priest of the Magna Mater at Pessinus, and the title of king. (Cic. pro Sext. 26, de Hasarp. Resp. 13, comp. ad Q. Fratr. ii. 9.) [L. S.]

BRÖME or BRO'MIE, one of the nymphs who brought up Dionysus on mount Nysa. (Hygin. Fab. 182; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 15.) [L. S.]

BROMIUS (Bρομίος), a surname of Dionysus, which some explain by saying, that he was born during a storm of thunder and lightning (Diod. iv. 5; Dion Chrys. Or. 27); others derive it from the nymph Brome, or from the noise of the Bacchantic processions, whence the verb βρομίζω, to rage like a Bacchant (Orv. Met. iv. 11; Orph. Lyc. xviii. 77.) There is also a mythical personage of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

BRONTES, [Cyclopes.]

BRONTINUS (Βροντινός), of Metapontum, a Pythagorean philosopher, to whom, as well as to Leon and Bathylus, Alcmaeon dedicated his works. According to some accounts, Brontinus married Theano, the daughter of Pythagoras. (Diog. Laert. viii. 83; Suidas, s. v. Θεανα; Iamb. Vit. Pyth. § 267.) Inambichus (Villaeon, Anec. Gr. vol. ii. p. 198) quotes a work of Brontinus.

BROTEAS (Βροτέας). 1. A son of Vulcan and Minerva, who burnt himself that he might not be taunted with his ugliness. (Ov. I. 66, 517.)

2. One of the fighters at the marriage of Phineus. (Ov. Med. v. 106.)

3. A Lapith, who was slain at the marriage of Pithous. (Ov. Med. xii. 260.)

4. The father of Tantalus, who had been married to Cytherea before Agamemnon. The common account, however, is, that Thyestes was the father of this Tantalus. (Paus. ii. 22. § 4.)

5. A son of Tantalus, who, according to a tradition of the Magnetes, had made the most ancient statue of the mother of the gods on the rock of Coddinos. (Paus. iii. 22. § 4.)

BRUNI CHIUS (Brouniotos), a chronographer of uncertain date, referred to by Joannes Malala (vol. i. p. 239), the title of whose work was έκδες Βρονυχον Ραμφα χρονογράφος.

BRUSUS (Brusus), a son of Emathius, from whom Brusus, a portion of Macedonian, was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. e. n. 4. 8.)

BRUTIUS NIGER. [Neck.]

BRUTIUS (Brusios), an historian and chronicler, is called by the writer of the Alexandrian chronicle (p. 90), who quotes some things from him respecting Danae and Perses, ας σεροτοις λεοντος καὶ χρονογράφους. He is also mentioned by Joannes Malala (vol. i. pp. 329, 336, 340) and by Hieronymus in the Chronicle of Eusebius; and Scaliger, in his notes upon this passage (p. 209), has conjectured, that he may be the same as the Brutus Praxescus whose daughter, Brutia Crispina, married L. Aurelius Commodus, the son of M. Aurelius; but this is quite uncertain. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 409, ed. Westermann.)

BRUTIA'NUS LUSTRICUS. [Lustriicus.]

BRUTIUS. 1. A Roman knight, for whom Cicero wrote a letter of introduction to M. Aelia Gabria, proconsul in Sicily in n. c. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 33.)

2. A philologist, with whom M. Cicero, the son of the orator, studied at Athens, in n. c. 44. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 21.)

BRUTIUS SURA. [Sura.]

BRUTULUS PAPIUS, a man of noble rank and great power among the Sammites, who persuaded his countrymen to undertake a second war against the Romans; but the Sammites, after their disaster in n. c. 322, became anxious for a peace, and resolved to deliver up Brutulus to the Romans. His corpse, however, was all that they could give their enemies; for Brutulus put an end to his own life, to avoid pilfering by the hands of the Romans. (Liv. viii. 39.)

BRUTUS, the name of a plebeian family of the Junia gens, which traced its descent from the first consul, L. Junius Brutus. (Comp. Cic. Phil. i. 6, Brut. 4.) It was denied by many of the ancients that this family could be descended from the first consul, first, because the latter was a patrician, and secondly, because his race became extinct at his death, as he had only two sons, who were executed by his own orders. (Dionys. v. 18, comp. vi. 70; Dion. Cass. xiv. 12; Plut. Brut. 1.) Posidonius, indeed, asserted that there was a third son, who was a child when Brutus was put to death, and that the plebeian family was descended from him; and he even pretended to discover a likeness in many of the Brutii to the statue of the first consul. (Plut. l. c.) But this tale about a third son is such an evident invention, to answer an objection that had been started by those who espoused the other side of the question, that it deserves no credence; and nothing was more natural than that the family should claim descent from such an illustrious ancestor, especially after the murder of Caesar, when M. Brutus was represented as the liberator of his country from tyranny, like his name-sake of old.

It is, however, by no means impossible, that the family may have been descended from the first consul, even if we take for granted that he was a patrician, as we know that patricians sometimes passed over to the plebeians; while this descent becomes still more probable, if we accept Niebuhr's conjecture (Rom. Hist. i. p. 522, x.), that the first consul was a plebeian, and that the consulship was, at its first institution, shared between the two orders.

The surname of Brutus is said to have been given to L. Junius, because he pretended idiocy in order to save himself from the last Tarquin, and the word is accordingly supposed to signify an "idiot." (Liv. i. 56; Dionys. iv. 67, who translates it ἄνθος; Nonius, p. 77.) Festus, however, in a passage (s. v. Brutum) which is pointed out by Arnold (Rom. Hist. i. p. 104), tells us, that Brutus, in old Latin, was synonymous with Gratus; which, as Arnold remarks, would show a connexion with βατος. The word may, therefore, as a surname, have been originally much the same as Severus. This conjecture we think more probable than that of Niebuhr's, who supposes it to mean a "runaway slave," and connects it with the Brettii, "revolted slaves," whence the Brutii are supposed to have derived their name (Strab. vi. p. 222; Diod. xvi. 18; Gell. x. 9); he further observes, that this name might easily have been applied by the Tarquins to Brutus as a term of reproach. (Rom. Hist. i. pp. 63, 98, 515.)

I. L. JUNIUS BRUTUS, was elected consul in n. c. 509, according to the chronology of the Fasti, upon the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome. His story, the greater part of which belongs to poetry, ran as follows: The sister of king Tarquin the Proud, married M. Brutus, a man of great wealth, who died leaving two sons under age. Of these the elder was killed by Tarquin, who coveted their possessions; the younger escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy, whence he received the surname of Brutus. After a while, Tarquin became alarmed by the prodigy of a serpent crawling from the altar in the royal palace, and accordingly sent his two sons, Titus and Aruns, to consult the oracle at Delphi. They took with them their cousin Brutus, who propitiated the priestess with the gift of a golden stick enclosed in a hollow staff. After executing the king's commission, the youths asked the priestess who was to reign at Rome after Tarquin, and the reply was, "He who first kisses his mother." Thereupon the sons of Tarquin agreed to draw lots, which of them should first kiss their mother upon arriving at Rome; but Brutus, who better understood the meaning of the oracle, stumbled upon the ground as they quitted the temple, and kissed the earth, mother of them all. Soon after followed the reign of Tarquin's eldest son, and Brutus succeeded to the unfortunate father to Rome, when his daughter sent for him to the camp at Ardea. Brutus was present at her death, and the moment had now come.
for avenging his own and his country's wrongs. In the capacity of Tribunus Celerum, which office he then held, and which bore the same relation to the royal power as that of the Magister Equitum did to the dictatorship, he summoned the people, obtained the banishment of the Tarquins, and was elected consul with L. Tarquinius Collatinius in the comitia centuriata. Resolved to maintain the freedom of the infant republic, he loved his country better than his children, and accordingly put to death his two sons, when they were detected in a conspiracy with several other of the young Roman nobles, for the purpose of restoring the Tarquins. He moreover compelled his colleague, L. Tarquinius Collatinius, to resign his consulship and leave the city, that none of the hated family might remain in Rome. And when the people of Veii and Tarquinii attempted to bring Tarquin back by force, Brutus marched against them, and, fighting with Aruns, the son of Taiquin, he and Aruns both fell, pierced by each other's spears. The massacre lasted three days. Of the men, 9,000 were slain, and 7,000 were taken prisoners, and Brutus was buried in Rome in the Forum Boarium, at his father's funeral in B. C. 264. (Liv, Epit. 16; Val. Max. ii. 4, § 7.)

6. D. Junius Brutus, legate in the army of the consuls Sp. Curtius Maximus, and consul in 292. (Livy. x. 43, 47.) In his consulship he conquered the Faliscans, with superior numbers, over the Oppia lex, which restrained the expenses of women. He was praetor in 191, and had the jurisdiction in the city, while his colleagues obtained the provinces. During his praetorship he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, on which occasion the Megalensian games were performed for the first time. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Megalestis.) He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 189, to settle the terms of peace with Antiocus the Great. (Liv. xxxiv. 1; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 3; Liv. xxxv. 24, xxxvi. 2, 36, xxxvii. 55.) This M. Junius Brutus may be the same as No. 12, who was consul in 178.

9. M. Junius Brutus, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 195, endeavoured with his colleague P. Junius Brutus to prevent the repeal of the Oppia lex, which restrained the expenses of women. He was praetor in 191, and had the jurisdiction in the city, while his colleagues obtained the provinces. During his praetorship he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, on which occasion the Megalensian games were performed for the first time. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Megalestis.) He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 189, to settle the terms of peace with Antiocus the Great. (Liv. xxxiv. 1; Val. Max. ix. 1. § 3; Liv. xxxv. 24, xxxvi. 2, 36, xxxvii. 55.) This M. Junius Brutus may be the same as No. 12, who was consul in 178.

11. D. Junius Brutus, one of the triumvirs for founding a colony in the territory of Sipontum, B. C. 194. (Liv. xxxiv. 35.)

The annexed stemma exhibits the probable family connexion of the following persons, Nos. 12 to 17 inclusive.

14. M. Junius Brutus, the accuser, cos. n. c. 77.

17. D. Junius Brutus Albinius, one of Caesar's assassins.

12. M. Junius M. F. L. N. Brutus, the son of No. 9, unless he is the same person, was consul B. C. 178, and had the conduct of the war against the Isti, whom he subdued in the following year, and compelled them to submit to the Romans. (Liv. xl. 59, xli. 9, 14, 15; Obsequ. 62.) He was one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 171, to extort the allies to assist the Romans in their war against Persia. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship in 169. (Liv. xlii. 35, xliii. 16.)
BRUTUS.

13. M. Junius Brutus, an eminent Roman jurist, who, judging from his panegyric and the time in which he is said to have lived, was probably addressed by Cicero. He is renowned by Pompomius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 59), along with P. Mucius and Manlius, as one of the three founders of civil law; and it may be inferred from Pompomius, that though he was praetor, he never attained the rank of consul. The passage of Pompomius, according to the reading which has been suggested, is as follows:

The transformation of the names Brutus and Manlius makes the clause Illi duo consules fuerunt, Brutus praetorius, consistent with the former part of the sentence. It also makes the testimony of Pompomius consistent with that of Cicero, who reports, on the authority of Scacvola, the testimony of Pomponius consistent with that of Cicero's statement. Brutus is frequently referred to as a high authority on points of law in ancient classical and legal authors (e. g. compare Cic. de Fin. i. 4, and Dig. 7. tit. 1. s. 68, pr.; again, compare Cic. de Fin. vii. 22, and Geoff. xlv. 7).

In the books of Brutus are contained some of the responsa which he gave to clients, and he and Cato are censured by Cicero for publishing the actual names of the persons, male and female, who consulted them, as if, in law, there were anything in a name. (De Orat. ii. 33.) From the fragments we possess (de Orat. ii. 55), Brutus certainly appears to enter into unlawyer-like details, giving us the very names of the villains where he happened to be. Whether Servius Sulpicius commented upon Brutus is a much disputed question. Ulpian (Dig. 14. tit. 3. s. 5. § 1) cites Servium libros primos ad Brutum, and Pompomius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44) asserts that Servium libros ad Brutum per quamque breviessimis ad Edilium subscriptus veligit. It is commonly supposed that Servius, instead of commenting on the work of the juristconsult, dedicated his short notes on the Edict to M. Junius Brutus, the assassin of Julius Caesar, or else to the father of the so-called tyrannicide. (Zimmern, R. G. G. § 75; Magnanensi, vol. i. pp. 127—140.)

14. M. Junius Brutus, s. o. of the preceding, studied law like his father, but, instead of seeking magisteries of distinction, became so notorious for the vehemence and harshness of his prosecutions, that he was named Accuser. (Cic. de Off. ii. 14.) He did not spare the highest rank, for among the objects of his attack was M. Aemilius Scarrus. (Cic. pro Font. 13.) He was a warm and impassioned orator, though his oratory was not in good taste. It should be remarked that all we know of the son is derived from the unfavourable representations of Cicero, who belonged to the opposite political party. Brutus, the father, was a man of considerable wealth, possessing baths and three country seats, which were all sold to support the extravagance of the son. Brutus, the son, in the accusation of Cl. Plancus, made some charges of inconsistency against L.Licinius Crassus, the orator; and Cicero twice (de Orat. ii. 55, pro Arch.) mentions the case. Brutus relates the bone mots (bone dicta) of Crassus, recontexting upon the extravagance of the accuser.

15. D. Junius M. F. M. N. Brutus Gallacius (Gallacius) or Gallaeus, s. o. of No. 12 and brother of No. 13, was a contemporary of the Gracchi, and one of the most celebrated generals of his age. He belonged to the aristocratical party, and in his consulship with P. Cornelius Seipio Nasicon, in b. c. 138, distinguished himself by his opposition to the tribunes. He refused to bring before the senate a proposition for the purchase of corn for the people; and when the tribunes wished to have the power of exempting ten persons apiece from the military levies, he and his colleague refused to allow them this privilege. In consequence of this they were committed to prison by the tribune C. Curiatius. (Val. Max. iii. 7. § 3; Liv. Epit. 55; Cic. de Leg. iii. 9.) The province of Further Spain was assigned to Brutus, whither he proceeded in the same year. In order to pacify the province, he assigned lands to those who had served under Viriathus, and founded the town of Valenteria. But as Lusitanlia continued to be over-run with parties of marauders, he laid waste the country in every direction, took numerous towns, and advanced as far as the river Lethe or Oblivio, as the Romans translated the name of the river, which was also called Limnea, Limia or Belion, now Lima. (Strab. iii. p. 153; Mela, iii. 1; Plin. H. N. iv. 22. s. 53.) Here the soldiers at first refused to march further; but when Brutus seized the standard from the standard-bearer, and began to cross the river alone, they immediately followed him. From thence he advanced to the Minius (Minho), which he crossed and continued his march till he arrived at the ocean, where the Romans saw with astonishment the sun set in its waters. In this country he subdued various tribes, among whom the Bremi are mentioned as the most warlike. He also conquered the Gaetuli, who had come to the assistance of their neighbours with an army of 60,000 men, and it was from his victory over them that he obtained the surname of Gallacius. The work of subjuga-tion, however, proceeded but slowly, as many towns after submission again revolted, among which Tablaria is particularly mentioned. In the midst of his successes, he was recalled into Neuter Spain by his relation, Aemilius Lepidus (Appian, Hisp. 80), and from thence he proceeded to Rome, where he celebrated a splendid triumph, b. c. 136, for his victories over the Lusitanians and Gallaeus. Drumann (Gesch. Roms, vol. i. p. 9), misled apparently by a passage in Eutropius (iv. 10), places his triumph in the same year as that of Seipio's over Numantia, namely, in b. c. 132. (Liv. Epit. 55, 56; Appian, Hisp. 71—73; Flor. ii. 17. § 12; Oros. v. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 3; Cic. pro Balb. 17; Plut. Qued. Rom. 34, T. Gracch. 21; Val. Max. vi. 4, extern. 1.)

With the booty obtained in Spain, Brutus erected temples and other public buildings, for which he poist L. Accius wrote inscriptions in verse. (Cic. de Leg. iv. 18; Plin. h. N. 34. i. 5. § 7; Val. Max. vili. 14. § 2.) The last time we hear of Brutus is in b. c. 129, when he served under C. Sempronius Tuditanus against the Japydles, and by his military skill gained a victory for the const and thereby repaired the losses which the latter had sustained at the commencement of the campaign. (Liv. Epit. 59.)

Brutus was a patron of the poet L. Accius, and for the times was well versed in Greek and Roman literature; he was also not deficient in oratorical talent. (Cic. Brut. 28.) We hear, from Cicero (de Am. 2), that he was angry. The Clodii mentioned by Cicero in a letter to Atticus (xii. 22), whom Orelli supposes to be the mother of this Brutus, was in all probability his wife, and the mother of the consul of n. c. 77. [No. 16.] (Drum- man, l. c.)

16. D. JUNIUS D. P. M. N. BRUTUS, son of the preceding, distinguished himself by his opposition to Saturninus in n. c. 100. (Cic. pro Rubir. perd. 7.) He belonged to the aristocratical party, and is alluded to as one of the aristocrates in the oration which Sallust puts into the mouth of Lepidus against Sulla. (Sall. Hist. i. p. 937, ed. Coriplus.) He was consul in n. c. 77, with Mnenus Lepidus (Cic. Brut. 47), and in 74 became praetor, and in the latter year praetor urbans. (Cic. Ver. i. 55, 57.) He was well acquainted with Greek and Roman literature; he was also not deficient in oratorical power. (Cic. Brut. 11.) His wife Sempronia was a well-educated, but licentious woman, who carried on an intrigue with Catiline; she received the ambassadors of the Allobroges in her husband's house in 63, when he was absent from Rome. (Sall. Cot. 40.) We have no doubt that the preceding D. Brutus is the person meant in this passage of Sallust, and not D. Brutus Albinus, one of Caesar's assassins [No. 17], as some modern writers suppose, since the latter is called an adolescent by Caesar (B. G. iii. 11) in 56, and therefore not likely to have had Sempronia as his wife in 63; and because we know that Paula Valeria was to marry Brutus Albinus in 60. (Caelli, ad Fam. viii. 7.)

17. D. JUNIUS BRUTUS ALBINUS, one of Caesar's assassins, who must not be confounded with the more celebrated M. Junius Brutus, was in all probability the son of No. 16 and of Sempronia, as we know that they had children (Sall. Cot. 25), and the praenomen is the same. This D. Brutus was adopted by A. Postumius Albinus, who was consul n. c. 99 [Albinus, No. 22], whence he is called Brutus Albinus; and this adoption is commemorated on a coin of D. Brutus figured on p. 93. (Plut. Caes. 64, &c., Aut. 11; Dion Cass. xiv. 14.) We first read of him as serving under Caesar in B. C. 49, he was praetor in B. C. 18. M. Brutus, praetor in B. C. 49, was sent with his colleague Servilius by the senate, at the request of Marius, to command Sulla, who was then at Nola, not to advance nearer to Rome. (Plut. Cat. 3; Sall. Cat. 3; Appian, B. C. iii. 140, iii. 98; Suet. Cat. 81, 83; Vell. Pat. ii. 56.)

After Caesar's death (44), D. Brutus went into his province of Cisalpine Gaul, and when Antony obtained from the people a grant of this province, Brutus refused to surrender it to him. His conduct was warmly praised by Cicero and the senatorial party; but so little was he prepared to resist Antony, that when the latter crossed the Rubicon towards the close of the year, D. Brutus dared not meet him in the field, but threw himself into Mutina, which was forthwith besieged by Antony. In this town he continued till April in the following year (43), when the siege was raised by the consul Hirtius and Pansa, who were accompanied by Octavianus. Antony was defeated, and fled across the Alps; and as Hirtius and Pansa had fallen in the battle, the command devolved upon D. Brutus, since the senate was unwilling to entrust Octavianus with any further power. He was not, however, in a condition to follow up his victory against Antony, who meantime had collected a large army north of the Alps, and was preparing to march again into Italy. Octavianus also had obtained the consulship, notwithstanding the ill-will of the senate, and had procured the enactment of the lex Pedia, by which the murderers of Caesar were outlawed, and the execution of the sentence entrusted to himself. D. Brutus was now in a dangerous position. Antony was marching against him from the north, Octavianus from the south; his own troops could not be depended upon, and L. Plancus had already deserted him and gone over to Antony with three legions. He therefore determined to cross over to M. Brutus in Macedonia; but his soldiers deserted him on the march, and he was betrayed by Camillus, a Gaulish chief, upon whom he had formerly conferred some favours, and put to death, by order of Antony, by one Capenus, a Sequanum, n. c. 43. (Cicero's Letters and Philippides; Liv. Epit. 117-120; Dion Cass. xiv. 9, 14, xvi. 35, &c., &c.; Appian, B. C. iii. 74, 81, 97, 98; Vell. Pat. ii. 64.)

18. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS, praetor in n. c. 88, was sent with his colleague Servilius by the senate, at the request of Marius, to command Sulla, who was then at Nola, not to advance nearer to Rome. (Plut. Cat. 3; Sall. Cat. 3; On. Sat. 9.) Octavianus then invaded Rome; Brutus was proscribed with ten other senators. (Appian, B. C. i. 60.) He subsequently served under Ca. Papirius Carbo, the consul, a. c. 82, and was sent by him in a fishing-boat to Litybaenum;
but finding himself surrounded by Pompey's fleet, he put an end to his own life, that he might not fall into the hands of his enemies. (Liv. Epit. 89.)
Cicero, in a letter to Atticus (ix. 14), mentions a report, that Caesar intended to revenge the death of M. Brutus and Carbo, and of all those who had been put to death by Sulla with the assistance of Pompey. This M. Junius Brutus is not to be confounded, as he often is, with L. Junius Brutus Damasippus, praetor in 82 [No. 19], whose surname we know from Livy (Epit. 86) to have been Lucius; nor with M. Junius Brutus [No. 20], the father of the so-called tyrannicide.

19. L. JUNIUS BRUTUS DAMASIPPUS, an active and unprincipled partizan of Marius. The younger Marius, reduced to despair by the blockade of Prænesta (n. c. 82), came to the resolution that his greatest enemies should not survive him.
Accordingly he managed to despatch a letter to L.
Brutus, who was then praetor urbanus at Rome, designing to summon the senate upon some false pretext, and to procure the assassination of P. Antistius, of C. Papirius Carbo, L. Domitius, and Scævolus, the pontiﬁx maximus. The cruel and treacherous order was too well obeyed, and the dead bodies of the murdered senators were thrown unburied into the Tiber. (Appian, B. C.
i. 88; Vell. Pat. ii. 26.)

In the same year L. Brutus made an ineffectual attempt to relieve Prænesta: the consul of Cn. Pa-risius, praetor in 82 [No. 19], whose surname we know from Livy (Epit. 86) to have been Lucius; nor with M. Junius Brutus [No. 20], the father of the so-called tyrannicide.

20. M. JUNIUS BRUTUS, the father of the so-called tyrannicide [No. 21] is described by Cicero as well skilled in public and private law; but he will not allow him to be numbered in the rank of consuls (Cc. Brut. 36.) He is celebrated by Plut.
ca. 83 (Cc. pro Quinct. 20); and the M. Brutus who is spoken of with some asperity by Cicero for havingen made an impious attempt to colonize Capua (de Leg. Agr. ii. 33, 34, 36), in opposition to omens and auspices, and who is said, like all who shared in that enterprise, to have perished miserably, is supposed by Ernesti (Clav. Cic.) after Massochis 217) to have been the pater intersecoris. He no doubt made this attempt in his tribunate.

M. Brutus married Servilia, who was the daughter of Q. Servilius and of Livia, the sister of Drusus, and thus was half-sister of Cato of Utica by the mother's side. Another Servilia, her sister, was the wife of Lucullus. The Q. Servilius Carpio, who afterwards adopted her son, was her brother.
She traced her descent from Servilius Ahala, the assassin of Sp. Maelius. (Plut. Brut. 1.) This asserted descents explains the pronun ceter in the masculin gender in a passage of Cicero's Orator
(c. 45), which was addressed to the younger Brutus:
"Quomodo enim est, axilla ala facta est, nisi fuga Ierenee vastioris." It is in reference to this descent that we find the head of Servilius Ahala on the coins of the so-called tyrannicide: one is figured on p. 83. Servilia was a woman of great ability, and had much influence with Cato, who became the father-in-law of her son.

Brutus, besides his well-known son, had two daughters by Servilia, one of whom was married to M. Lepidus, the triumvir (Vell. Pat. ii. 88; compare Cic. ad Fam. xii. 2), and the other to C.
Cassius. The name, other than Junia, of the former, is not known. Asconius, in his commentary on the speech pro Milone, mentions Cornelia, cæsas castra pro exemplo habita est, as the wife of Lepi-dus; but perhaps Lepidus was married twice, as a characteristic of his father-in-law, and the name may have become a part of the family-name Cornelia. The wife of Cassius was named Tertila, or, by way of endurance, Tertulla.
Some have supposed, without reason, that Brutus had but one daughter, Tertia Junia, who was mar-rried successively to Lepidus and Cassius; and Lipsius (cited Orelli, Onomast. Cæs. s. v. Tertia) erroneously (see ad Att. xiv. 20) makes Tertia the daughter of Servilia by her second husband.

There is much reason to suspect that Servilia intrigued with Caesar (Plut. Brut. 3), who is said to have believed his assassin to have been his own son; but this cannot have been, for Caesar was only fifteen years older than the younger Brutus.
Scandal went so far as to assert, that Tertila, like hers mother, was one of Caesar's mistresses; and Suetonius (Cæs. 30) has preserved a double entendre of Cicero in allusion to Servilia's supposed connivance at her daughter's shame. This anecdote refers to a time subsequent to the death of the elder Brutus. The death of Tertila, a. d. 22, when she must have been very old, is recorded by Tacitus (Ann. iii. 76), who states that the images of twenty of the noblest families graced her funeral; "sed praefugebant Cassius atque Brutus, eo ipso, quod quidem eorum non visibuntur."

The knowledge of these family connexions gives great interest to the history of the times.
Though the reputed dishonour of his wife did not prevent the father from actively espousing the political party to which Caesar belonged, yet it is possible, but not very probable, that the rumour of Caesar's amours with a mother and a sister may afterwards have deepened the hostility of the son.

When Lepidus, a. c. 77, endeavoured to succeed to the leadership which had become vacant by the death of Sulla, Brutus was placed in command of the forces in Cisalpine Gaul; and, at Mutina, he figured on p. 83. Servilia was a woman of great ability, and had much influence with Cato, who became the father-in-law of her son.
days to the senate to announce first the surrender and then the death of Brutus) was much and justly blamed for this cruel and perfidious act. (Plut. Pomp. 16; Appian, B. C. ii. 111; Liv. Epit. 90.)

21. M. Junius Brutus, the son of No. 20, by Servilla, was born in the autumn of B.C. 85. He was subsequently adopted by his uncle Q. Servilius Caepio, which must have happened before B.C. 59, and hence he is sometimes called Caepio or Q. Caepio Brutus, especially in public documents, on coins, and inscriptions. (On the coin annexed the inscription on the reverse is CAEPIO BRUTUS PROCONS.) He lost his father at the early age of eight years, but his mother, Servilla, assisted by her two brothers, continued to conduct his education with the utmost care, and he acquired an extraordinary love for learning, which he never lost in after-life. M. Porcius Cato became his great political model, though in his moral conduct he did not follow his example. In 59, when J. Caesar was consul and had to silence some young and vehement republicans, L. Vettius on the instigation of the tribune, P. Vatinius, denounced Brutus as an accomplice in a conspiracy against Pompey's life; but as it was well known that Brutus was perfectly innocent, Caesar put a stop to the prosecution. When it was thought necessary in 58 to remove from Rome some of the leading republicans, Cato was sent to Cyprus, and Brutus accompanied him. After his return to Rome, Brutus seems for some years to have taken no part in public proceedings, and not to have attached himself to any party. In 53 he followed Appius Claudius, whose daughter Claudia he had married, to Cilicia, where he did not indeed, like his father-in-law, plunder the provincials, but could not resist the temptation to lend out money at an exorbitant rate of interest. (De Finibus.) When he had to silence some young and vehement republicans, a sort of conspiracy was formed against Cato, Cato was sent from Rome to meet him, and, in the beginning of August, returned to the city with him. After his return, he published his oration on Cato, in which Cicero found sentiments that hurt his vanity, as his suppression of the eulogy on Cato, in which Cicero found sentiments that hurt his vanity, Cicero was subsequently adopted by his uncle Q. Servilius Caepio, who implored Caesar to spare him. (Plut. Brut.)

In the year following Brutus was made governor of Cilicia, probably to arrange matters with his former friends, he withdrew from the war, and spent his time either in Greece or at Rome in his favourite literary pursuits. He did not join Caesar again till the autumn of 47 at Nicæa in Bithynia, on which occasion he endeavoured to interfere with the conqueror on behalf of a friend of king Diodorus; but Caesar refused to comply with the request. In the year following Brutus was made governor of Cilicia, Gaul, though he had been neither praetor nor consul; and he continued to serve the dictator Caesar, although the latter was making war against Brutus's own relatives in Africa. The provincials in Cilicia were delighted with the mild treatment and justice of Brutus, whom they honoured with public monuments: Caesar too afterwards testified his satisfaction with his administration. As his province was far from the scene of war, Brutus as usual devoted his time to study. At this time, Cicero made him one of the speakers in the treatise which bears the name of Brutus, and in 46 he dedicated to him his Orator. In 45, Brutus was succeeded in his province by C. Vibius Pansa, but did not go to Rome immediately. Before his return, he published his orations on Cato, in which Cicero found sentiments that hurt his vanity, as his suppression of the conspiracy of Catiline was not spoken of in the terms he would have liked. Accordingly, upon the arrival of Brutus at one of his country-seats near Rome, a certain degree of coldness and want of confidence existed between the two, although they wrote letters to each other, and Cicero, on the advice of Atticus, even dedicated to him his work De Finaibus. About this time, Brutus divorced Claudia, apparently for no other reason than that he wished to marry Portia, the daughter of Cato. After the close of Caesar's war in Spain, Brutus went from Rome to meet him, and, in the beginning of August, returned to the city with him.

In 44 Brutus was praetor urbanus, and C. Ciusius, who had been disappointed in his hope of obtaining the praetorship, was as much enraged against Brutus as against the dictator. Caesar promised Brutus the province of Macedonia, and also held out to him hopes of the consulship. Up to this time Brutus had borne Caesar's dictatorship without expressing the least displeasure; he had served the dictator and paid homage to him, nor had he thought it contrary to his republican principles not to accept favours and offices from him. His change of mind which took place at this time was not the result of his reflections or principles, but of the
The battle of Philippi was fought. In the first engagement, leaving Asia, Brutus had a dream which foreboded that Caesar had destined for them. All parties were apparently reconciled. But the arrangements which Antony made for the funeral of Caesar, and in consequence of which the people made an assault upon the houses of the conspirators, shewed them clearly the intentions of Antony. Brutus withdrew into the country, and during his stay there he gave, in the month of July, most splendid Ludi Apollinares, hoping thereby to turn the disposition of the people in his favour. But in this he was disappointed, and as Antony assumed a threatening position, he sailed in September to Athens with the intention of taking possession of the province of Macedonia, which Caesar had assigned him, and of repelling force by force. After staying at Athens a short time in the company of philosophers and several young Romans who attached themselves to his cause, and after receiving a very large sum of money from the quaestor M. Appuleius, who brought it from Asia, Brutus intended to proceed to Macedonia. But the senate had now assigned this province to Antony, who, however, towards the end of the year, transferred it to his brother, the praetor C. Antonius. Before, however, the latter arrived, Brutus, who had been joined by the scattered troops of Pompey, marched into Macedonia, where he was received by Q. Hortensius, the son of the orator, as his legitimate successor. Brutus found an abundance of arms, and the troops stationed in Illyricum, as well as several other legions, joined him. C. Antonius, who also arrived in the meantime, was unable to advance beyond the coast of Illyricum, and at the beginning of 43 was besieged in Apollonia and compelled to surrender. Brutus disregarded all the decrees of the senate, and resolved to act for himself. While Octavianus in the month of August 43 obtained the condemnation of Caesar’s murderers, Brutus was engaged in a war against some Thracian tribes to procure money for himself and booty for his soldiers. About this time he assumed the title imperator, which, together with his portrait, appear on many of his coins. The things which were going on meantime in Italy seemed to affect neither Brutus nor Cassius, but the time was not sufficiently near to the transaction of the business which was wished. Brutus began to prepare for war. Instead, however, of endeavouring to prevent the enemy from landing on the coast of the Ionian sea, Brutus and Cassius separated their forces and ravaged Rhodes and Lycia. Loaded with booty, Brutus and Cassius met again at Sardis in the beginning of 42, but it was only the fear of the triumvirs that prevented them from falling out with each other. Their carelessness was indeed so great, that only a small fleet was sent to the Ionian sea under the command of Statius Murcus. Before leaving Asia, Brutus had a dream which foreboded his ruin at Philippi, and in the autumn of 42 the battle of Philippi was fought. In the first engagement Brutus conquered the army of Octavius, while Cassius was defeated by Antony. But in a second battle, about twenty days later, Brutus was defeated and fell upon his own sword.

From his first visit to Asia, Brutus appears as a man of considerable wealth, and he afterwards increased it by lending money upon interest. He possessed an extraordinary memory and a still more extraordinary imagination, which led him into superstitions differing only from those of the multitude by a strange admixture of philosophy. He was deficient in knowledge of mankind and the world, whence he was never able to foresee the course of things, and was ever surprised at the results. Hence also his want of independent judgment. The quantity of his varied knowledge, which he had acquired by extensive reading and his intercourse with philosophers, was beyond his control, and was rather an encumbrance to him than anything else. Nothing had such charms for him as study, which he prosecuted by day and night, at home and abroad. He made abridgments of the historical works of C. Fannius and Caelius Antipater, and on the eve of the battle of Pharsalus he is said to have been engaged in making an abridgment of Polybius. He also wrote several philosophical treatises, among which we have mention of those On Duties, On Patience, and On Virtue. The best of his literary productions, however, appear to have been his orations, though they are censured as having been too dry and serious, and deficient in animation. Nothing would enable us so much to form a clear notion of his character as his letters, but we unfortunately possess only a few (among those of Cicero), the authenticity of which is acknowledged, and a few passages of others quoted by Pintarch. (Brut. 2, 22, Cic. 43.) Even in the time of Plutarch (Brut. 55) there seem to have existed forged letters of Brutus; and the two books of “Epistolae ad Brutum,” usually printed among the works of Cicero, are unquestionably the fabrications of a later time. The name of Brutus, his fatal deed, his fortunes and personal character, offered great temptations for the forgery of such documents; but these letters contain gross blunders in history and chronology, to which attention was first drawn by Erasmus of Rotterdam. (Epist. 1. 1.) Brutus is also said to have attempted to write poetry, which does not seem to have possessed much merit. (Cicero, in the passages collected in Orelli’s Onomast. Tullii. ii. pp. 319—324; Plut. Life of Brutus; Appian, H. C. ii. 1—iv. 132; Dion Cass. lib. xii.—xiviii. Respecting his oratory and the extant fragments of it, see Meyer, Orat. Rom. Progym. p. 443, &c., 2nd edit.; comp. Weichert, Poet. Lat. Relig. p. 125; Drumm. Brutus, l.c. 111. C.搠eal.)

BRYAXIS. (Braixis), an Athenian statue in stone and metal, cast a bronze statue of Seleucus, king of Syria (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), and, together with Scopas, Timothus, and Leochares, adorned the Mausoleum with bas-reliefs. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) He was also said to have executed five colossal statues at Rhodes (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), and, together with Scopas, Timothus, and Leochares, adorned the Mausoleum with bas-reliefs. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 5. s. 4.) He must have lived accordingly n. c. 372—312. (Sillig. Catal. Art. s. v.) Besides the two works above mentioned, Bryaxis executed five colossal statues at Rhodes (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7. s. 18), an Asclepius (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19), a Liber, father of Cnidius (H. N. xxxvi. 5), and a statue of Pasiphae. (Tatian, ad Graec. 54.) If we believe Clemens Alexandrinus (Protr. p. 90, c.), Bryaxis attained so high a degree of perfection, that two statues of his were ascribed by some to Phidias.
BRYENNIUS, JOSEPHUS (Ἰωσήφ Βρυεν-νιος), a Greek priest and eloquent preacher, died between a.d. 1431 and 1438. He is the author of a great number of treatises on religious subjects, as well as of several letters to distinguished persons of his time respecting theological and ecclesiastical matters. His works were first published under the title "Ἰωσήφ μανογια του Βρυενιου τα εξεθεντα Δι Επισκεπς Ευγενος, Δικαιον της Βουλαγης, ην το τραγον τους εκθεσε,ας," three volumes, &c. Leipzig, 1763—1764. This edition contains only the Greek text. Eugenius, diaconus in Bulgaria, was in possession of a fine manuscript of the works of Bryennius, and he is the author of a life of Bryennius contained in the preface to the Leipzig edition. The works of Bryennius were known and published in extracts long before the complete edition of them appeared. Leo Allatius refers to, and gives extracts from, several of his treatises, such as "Ομνιατες II de Futuro Judicio et Semperita Beatitudine," in which the author maintained peculiar views respecting purgatory; "Ορα-τοι de Sancta Trinitate;" "Ορατο de Transfigurazioni Domini;" "Οντο de Domini Crucifixione;" &c. The style of Bryennius is remarkably pure for his time. (Leo Allat. De Libris et Rebus Eccles. Graec. pars i. pp. 136, 141, 153, &c, 311, 320, 343, De Commen Nuns Utimnay Etc. Etc. pp. 292, 387, 363, &c; Cave, Hist. Liber. Appendix, p. 121; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 659, &c.) [W. P.]

BRYENNIUS, MANUEL (Μαυραλ Βρυενι-νος), a Greek writer on music, is probably identical with one Manuel Bryennius, the contemporary of the emperor Andronicus I., who reigned from 1282 till 1328. Bryennius wrote "Ἀρμονιακα, or a commentary on the theory of music, which is divided into three books, in the first of which he frequently dwells upon the theory of Euclid, while in the second and third books he has chiefly in view that of Ptolemy the musician. The learned Melchiorus intended to publish this work, and to add it to his "Antique Musicae Autores Septem," Amsterdam, 1652; but he was prevented from accomplishing his purpose. The "Harmonica" has attracted the attention of John Wallis, who perused the Oxford MSS., he published it in 1680 together with the "Harmonica" of Ptolemy and some other ancient musicians; he also added a Latin translation. The "Harmonica" of both Bryen-nius and Ptolemy are contained in the third volume of Wallis's works, Oxford, 1699. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. pp. 648, 649; Labbe, Biblioth. Nov. MSS. p. 118.) [W. P.]

BRYENNIUS, NICEPHORUS (Νικηφόρος Βρυε-νιος), the accomplished husband of Anna Comnena, was born at Orestias in Macedonia in the middle of the eleventh century of the Christian aera. He was the son, or more probably the nephew, of another Nicephorus Bryennius, who is renowned in Byzantine history as one of the first generals of his time, and who, having revolted against the emperor Michael VII. Ducas Parapini-ae, assumed the imperial title at Dyrrhachium in 1071. Popular opinion was in favour of the usurper, but he had to contend with a third rival, Nicephorus Botanites, who was supported by the aristocracy and clergy, and who succeeded in deposing Michael and in becoming recognized as emperor under the name of Nicephorus III. The contest then lay between Nicephorus Botanites and Nicephorus Bryennius, against whom the former sent an army commanded by Alexis Comnenus, who afterwards became emperor. Bryennius was defeated and made prisoner by Alexis near Calbryna in Thrace: he was treated by the viceroy with kindness; but Basil, the emperor's minister, ordered his eyes to be put out. His son, or nephew, the subject of this article, escaped the fate of his relative; and no sooner had Alexis Comnenus ascended the throne (1081), than the name of Bryennius became conspicuous as the emperor's most faithful friend.

Bryennius was not only distinguished by bodily beauty and military talents, but also by his learning, the affability of his manners, and the wisdom he showed in the privy council of the emperor. During the first differences with the crusaders, he was one of the chief supports of the throne; and, in order to reward him for his eminent services, Alexis created for him the dignity of panhyperse-bastos—a title until then unknown in the code of Byzantine ceremonies, and which gave the bearer the rank of Caesar. But Bryennius is also called Caesar, and we must therefore suppose that this title was formally conferred upon him. The greatest mark of confidence, however, which Alexis bestow-ed upon him was the hand of his daughter, Anna Comnena, with whom Bryennius lived in happiness during forty years. Bryennius distinguished himself in the war between Alexis and Bohemond, prince of Antioch, and negotiated the peace of 1108 to the entire satisfaction of his sovereign.

Anna Comnena and the empress Irene tried to persuade the emperor to name Bryennius his successor; but Alexis would not deprive his son John of his natural rights. After the death of Alexis in 1118, and the accession of John, Anna and Bryennius conspired against the young em-peror, but the conspiracy failed. [Anna Comnena.] The cause of its failure was the refusal of Bryen-nius to act in the decisive moment, for which he was severely blamed by his haughty wife. They were punished with confiscation of their estates and banishment to Oenoe, now Unieh, on the Black Sea, where they led a retired life during several years. Bryennius afterwards recovered the favour of the emperor. In 1137 he went to Cilicia and Syria with the intention of relieving the siege of Antioch by the crusaders; but ill health compelled him to return to Constantinople, where he died soon afterwards.

Bryennius is the author of a work entitled "Ταν ιστοριας, which is a history of the reign of the em-perors Isaac I. Comnenus, Constantine XI. Ducas, Romanus III. Diogenes, and Michael VII. Ducas Parapinaees; his intention was to write also the history of the following emperors, but death pre-vented him from carrying his design into execution. This work, which is divided into four books, is one of the most valuable of the Byzantine histories, and is distinguished by the clearness of the narrative. Its principal value arises from its author's not only a witness but also one of the chief Laders in the events which he relates, and from his being acustomed to, and having the power of forming a judgment upon, important affairs. The editio prin-cipis forms part of the Paris collection of the Byz-anines, and was published by Pierre Poussines at the end of Procopius, Paris, 1661, fol., with notes and a Latin translation. The editor, who dedicated the work to Christina, queen of Sweden, perused two MSS., one of Cujas, and the other of Vavre de St.
Joire. Du Cange has written excellent notes upon it, which form an appendix to his edition of Cinnamus, Paris, 1670, fol. Cousin (le président) translated it into French in his usual extravagant and inaccurate way, which induced Gibbon to say, "did he ever think?" A new and careful edition has been published by Meineke, together with Cinnamus ("Nicephori Bryennii Commentarii," Bonn, 1836, 8vo), which forms part of the Bonn collection of the Byzantines. It contains the notes of Pierre Poussines and Du Cange, and the Latin translation of the former revised by the editor. (Anna Commens, Alexios; Cinnamus, i. 1-10; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vii. 22; Lankhus, de Byzant. Rer. Sacrae, Coloniae, pp. 492—507.)

BRYSON (Bρυσων), mentioned by Lambichus (Vit. Pyth., c. 23) as one of those youths whom Pythagoras instructed in his old age. He was perhaps the same writer that is mentioned in the extract from Theopompos found in Athenaeus (xi. p. 508), where Plato is charged with having borrowed from Bryson, the Heraclæt, and others, a great deal that he introduced into his dialogues as his own. A saying of Bryson's is refuted by Aristotle in his Rhet. iii. 23. (A. G.)

BUBARES (Βούβαρης), the son of Megabæus, a Persian, was sent into Macedonia to make inquiries after the missing Persian envoys, whom Alexander, the son of Amyntas I, had caused to be murdered at his father's court, about B.C. 507. Alexander induced Bubares to pass the matter over in silence, by giving him great presents and also his sister Gymnæ in marriage. By this Gymnæ Bubares had a son, who was called Amyntas after his grandfather. (Herod. v. 21, viii. 136.)

In conjunction with Artachees, Bubares superintended the construction of the canal which Xerxes made across the isthmus of Athos. (Herod. vii. 22.)

BUBASTIS (Βούβαστης), an Egyptian divinity whom the Greeks used to identify with their own Artemis, and whose genealogy they explain accordingly. (Herod. ii. 137, 156; Steph. Byz. s. v. Βούβαστης.) She was a daughter of Osiris and Isis, and sister of Horus (Apollo). Her mother, Isis, entrusted Bubastis and Horus to Bute, to protect them from Typhon. In the town of Buto there was a temple of Bubastis and Horus, but the principal seat of the worship of Bubastis was in the town of Bubastus or Bubastis. Here her sanctuary was surrounded by two canals of the Nile, and it was distinguished for its beautiful situation as well as for the style of the building. (Herod. ii. 137, 138.) An annual festival was celebrated to the goddess here, which was attended by immense crowds of people (Herodotus, ii. 60, estimates their number at 700,000, and was spent in great merriment. But the particulars, as well as the object of the solemnity, are not known, though the worship of Bubastis continued to a very late time. (Or. Met. i. 289 ; Gratius, De Venat. 42.) The animal sacred to Bubastis was the cat; and according to Stephanus of Byzantium, the name Bubastis itself signified a cat. When cats died they were carefully embalmed and conveyed to Bubastis. (Herod. ii. 67.) The goddess herself was represented in the form of a cat, or of a female with the head of a cat, and some specimens of such representations, though not many, are still extant. This is explained in the legend of Bubastis by the story, that when the gods fled from Typhon, Bubastis (Artemis, Diana) concealed herself by assuming the appearance of a cat. (Or. Met. v. 329 ; Anto. Lib. 28.) But it seems more natural to suppose here, as in other instances of Egyptian religion, that the worship of Bubastis was originally the worship of the cat itself, which was subsequently refined into a mere symbol of the goddess. The fact that the ancients identify Bubastis with Artemis or Diana is to us a point of great difficulty, since the information which we possess respecting the Egyptian goddess presents little or no resemblance between the two divinities.

The only point that might seem to account for the identification, is, that Bubastis, like Artemis, was regarded as the sister of Horus, the Egyptian Osiris (the sun) and Isis (the moon), was considered as the symbol of the new moon. But the interpretation given by Plutarch cannot be regarded as decisive, for in another passage (De Is. et Os. 74) he gives a different account of the symbolic meaning of the cat. Another point in which some think that Bubastis and Artemis coincide, is the identity of the two with Eileithyia. But although Artemis and Eileithyia may have been the same, it does not follow that Bubastis and Eileithyia were likewise identical, and originally they must have been different, as the mode of worship of the latter was incompatible with the religion of the Egyptians. (Manetho, ap. Plat. De Is. et Os. 75 ; Herod. ii. 45 ; Macrobi. i. 7.) We must, therefore, be contented with knowing the simple fact, that the Greeks identified the Egyptian Bubastis with their own Artemis, and that in later times, when the attributes of different divinities were exchanged in various ways, the features peculiar to Eileithyia were transferred to Bubastis (Anthol. Græc. xi. 81) and Isis. (Or. Amar. ii. 13.)

The number of the phases of the moon. (Comp. Phot. Bvil. p. 343, c. 1, ed. Becker ; Demeter Phil. Epist. Epigr. § 158, ed. Oxford.) It might, therefore, seem that Bubastis, being the daughter of Osiris (the sun) and Isis (the moon), was considered as the symbol of the new moon. But the interpretation given by Plutarch cannot be regarded as decisive, for in another passage (De Is. et Os. 74) he gives a different account of the symbolic meaning of the cat.

BUBULCUS (Βούβουλκος), the name of a family of the Junia gens. (Phin. H. N. xviii. 37 ; comp. Plut. Poplic. 11.) There are only two persons of this family mentioned, both of whom bear the name of Brutus also; of these, one is called in the Fasti Capitolini Bubulus Brutus, and the other Brutus Bubulcus: they may therefore have belonged to the Brutii, and not to a distinct family of the Junia gens.
1. C. Junius C. f. C. n. Bubulus Brutus, was consul b. c. 317 and again in 313, in the latter of which years Satiacula was founded. (Liv. ix. 20, 21, 28; Diod. xix. 17, 77; Festus, s. v. Sati¬ acula.) He was magister equitum in 312 to the dictator C. Sulpicius Longus (Fast. Capitol.) and not dictator, as he is erroneously called by Livy (ix. 29). He was consul a third time in 311, and carried on the war against the Samnites with great success. He retook Clunia, which the Samnites had wrested from the Romans, and thence marched to Boianium, which also fell into his hands. In his return from Boianium, he was surprised in a narrow pass by the Samnites; but, after a hard-fought battle, he gained a great victory over them, and slew 20,000 of the enemy. It must have been on this occasion that he vowed a temple to Safety, which he afterwards dedicated in his dictator¬ship. In consequence of this victory, he obtained a honour of a triumph. (Liv. ix. 30, 31; Diod. xx. 3; Fast. Capitol.) In 309 he was again magister equitum to the dictator L. Papirius Cursor (Liv. ix. 38), and in 307 obtained the censorship with L. Valerius Maximus. During his censorship he contracted for the building of the temple of Safety which he had vowed in his consulship, and he and his colleague had roads made at the public expense. They also expelled L. Antonius from the senate. (Liv. ix. 43; Val. Max. ii. 9, § 2.) Finally, in 302, he was appointed dictator when the Aequians renewed the war, as a general rising of the surrounding nations was feared. Bulbucus defeated the Aequians at the first encounter, and returned to Rome at the end of seven days; but he did not lay down his dictatorship till he had dedicated the temple of Safety which he had vowed in his consulship. The walls of this temple were adorned with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor, which probably represented the battle he had gained over the Samnites. (Liv. x. 1; Val. Max. viii. 14, § 6; Plin. xxxv. 4, s. 7.) The festival to com¬memorate the dedication of this temple was cele¬brated, in Cicero's time, on the Nones of Sextilis. (Cic. ad Att. liv. 1.)

2. C. Junius C. f. C. n. Bubulus Bubulus, consul b. c. 291 (Liv. xvii. 6), and again in 277. In the latter year, he and his colleague P. Cornelius Rufinus were sent into Samnium, and sus¬tained a repulse in an attack upon the Samnites in the mountains. Their loss upon this occasion led to a quarrel between the consuls, who sepa¬rated in consequence. Zonaras says, that Bulbucus remained in Samnium, while Rufinus marched into Luania and Bruttium: but, according to the Capitoline Fasti, which ascribe a triumph over the Lucanians and Bruttians to Bulbucus, the contrary must have been the case. (Zonar. viii. 6.)

BUCA, the name of a family of the Aemilii gens, known to us chiefly from coins.

1. L. Aemilius Buca, the father (Ascon. in Scourr. p. 29, ed. Orelli), is supposed to have been quaestor under Sulla, and to have struck the ann¬nexed coin to commemorate the dream which Sulla had on his approach to Rome from Nola, in b. c. 83. (Plut. Sull. 9.) On the obverse is the head of Venus, with L. Buca; on the reverse a man sleeping, to whom Diana appears with Victory. (Eckhel, v. p. 121.)

2. L. Aemilius Buca, the son, supplicated the judges on behalf of M. Scaurus at his trial in b. c. 54. (Ascon. l. c.) The following coin is supposed to refer to him, on the obverse of which is the head of Caesar, with perpetuo Caesar, and on the reverse Venus seated, holding a small statue of Victory, with the inscription L. Buca. There are several other coins belonging to this Buca, on some of which we find the inscription, L. Aemilius Buca invis, from which it would appear that he was a triumvir of the mint. (Eckhel, vi. pp. 8, 9.)

M. Bucculeius, a Roman, not universal in legal studies, although, in the treatise De Oratore (i. 89), Cicero puts into the mouth of L. Crassus a rather sarcastic sketch of his character. Bucculeius is there described by Crassus as familiaris uoster, neque meo judicio stultus, et suo valde sapiens. An anecdote is then given of his want of legal caution. Upon the conveyance of a house to L. Fufius, he covenanted that the lights should remain in the state in which they then were. Accordingly Fufius, whenever any building however distant was raised which could be seen from the house, commenced an action against Bucculeius for a breach of agreement.

BUCILLANUS, one of Caesar's assassins, b. c. 44 (Cic. ad Att. xxv. 17, xvi. 4), is called Bucilius by Appian (B. C. ii. 113, 117), from whom we learn that he had been one of Caesar's friends.

BUCOLION (Boukolion), a son of Laomedon and the nymph Calybe, who had several sons by Abarbarea. (Hom. ii. vi. 21, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12, § 3; Abarbarea.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. iii. 8, § 1; Paus. vii. 5, § 5.)

BUCOLUS (Boukos), two mythical per¬ sonages, one a son of Hercules, and the other of Hippocoon. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 8, iii. 10, § 5.)

Budelia (Boedia). 1. [Atenea.]

2. A Boeotian woman, the wife of Clymenus and mother of Erginus, from whom the town of Budeon derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1076.) From the Scholast on Appollion Rho¬dius (i. 185), it appears that she was the same as Buzzyge. Others derived the name of the town of Budeon from an Argive hero, Budeos. (Eustath. l. c.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Boedoe.)

BULARCHUS, a very old painter of Asia Minor, whose picture representing the defeat of the Magnesians (Magnetum proelium, Plin. H. N. xxxv. 34; Magnetum eelitiundum, 1b. vii. 39) is said to have been paid by Candaules, king of Lydia, with so much gold as was required to cover the whole of its large surface. This is either a mistake of Pliny, since Candaules died in n. c. 716, and the only destruction of Magnesia that is known of took place after n. c. 676 (see Heyne, Art. Tempor. Opusc. v. p. 349); or, what is more probable,
The whole story is fictitious, as Welcker has shown. (Archiv für Philol. 1830, Nos. 9 and 10.) [W. I.]

BULUS, a Roman senator and an unprincipled man, was one of the judges at the trial of Oppianus, Sisanius, another of the judges at the trial, had received a sum of money to secure the acquittal of Oppianus; but, although Bulbus had obtained a share of it, he and Sisanius condemned Oppianus. Bulbus was afterwards condemned on a charge of treason (megeta) for attempting to corrupt a legion in Illyricum. (Cic. pro Cluent. 26, 35, a. Ferr. ii. 32.)

BULUS, C. ATILIUS, was consul in B.C. 245, a second time in 235, and censor in 234. In his second consularship, in which he had to T. Manlius Torquatus for a colleague, the temple of Janus was closed for the first time after the reign of Numa. (Fast. Capit.; Eutrop. ii. 3; Oros. iv. 12; Plato. Nax. 20; comp. Liv. i. 33.)

BULUS (Boisna) and SERTHIAS (Serthéias), two Spartans of noble rank, voluntarily offered to go to Xeres and offer themselves to punishment, when the hero Talythibius was enraged against the Spartans on account of their having murdered the herds which Dareius had sent to Sparta; but, upon their arrival at Susa, they were dismissed uninjured by the king. Their names are written somewhat differently by different authors. (Herod. vii. 184, &c.; Plut. Aphi. Luc. 60, p. 235, l.; Praxe. Reipubl. Ger. 19, p. 813, e.; Lucian, Don. Boc. 52; Suidas, s. v.; Stobaeus, Serm. vii. p. 93.) There was a mournful song upon this Sparthias or Siphtias, which seems to have been composed when he and his companion left Sparta. (Theocr. xv. 98.)

BULON (Boisau), the founder of the town of Bulis in Phocis. (Paus. x. 37, § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Boisē.)

BUNAE (Bouaios), a surname of Hera, derived from Bunas, the son of Hermes and Alcidaeia, who is said to have built a sanctuary to Hera on the road which led up to Acrocorinthus. (Paus. ii. 4, § 7, 3, § 8.)

BUPAPALUS, an architect and sculptor of the island of Chios, whose family is said to have exercised the art of statuary from the beginning of the Olympiads. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; comp. Thiersch, Epoch. Ann. p. 56.) Bupalus and his brother Athenis are said by Piny (i. e.) and Suidas (s. v. ἁπολογεῖσθαι) to have made caricatures of the famous fabulographical poet Hipponax, which the poet rejected by the bitterest satires. (Welcker, Hipp. frag. p. 12.) This story, which we have no grounds for doubting, gives us at once a pretty certain date for the age of the two artists, for Hipponax was a contemporary of Dareius (s. c. 524—485); and it also accounts for their abilities, which for their time must have been uncommon. This is proved moreover by the fact, that Augustus adorned their time must have been uncommon. This is proved moreover by the fact, that Augustus adorned their statues, which before that time had been wrought as isolated figures. The father of Bupalus and Athenias, likewise a celebrated artist, is generally called Anthermus, which being very differently spelt in the different MSS. has been rejected by Sibyll. 1st. Ant. s. v., but he proposes to read Archeneus. The reading, Anthermus for the son's name instead of Athenia has long been generally given up. [W. I.]

BUPIAGUS (Bōphiagos). 1. A son of Lapeetus and Thornax, an Arcadian hero and husband of Promne. He received the wounded Iphicles, the brother of Hercules, into his house, and took care of him until he died. Bupagus was afterwards killed by Artemis for having pursued her. (Paus. viii. 14, § 6, 27. § 11.)

2. A surname of Hercules, Leprens, and others, who were believed to have eaten a whole bull at ones. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 7, § 11; Aslan, V. H. i. 24; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1823.)

BURA (Boisra), a daughter of Ion, the ancestral hero of the Ionians, and Helice, from whom the Achaean town of Bura derived its name. (Paus. vii. 25, § 5; Steph. Byz. s. e.) [L. S.]

BURA'IUS (Bouraisèiro), a surname of Heracles, derived from the Achaean town of Bura, near which he had a statue on the river Buraicus, and an oracle in a cave. Persons who consulted this oracle first said prayers before the statue, and then took four dice from a heap which was always kept ready, and threw them upon a table. These dice were marked with certain characters, the meaning of which was explained with the help of a painting which hung in the cave. (Paus. vii. 25, § 6.)

BURDO, J'ULIUS, commander of the fleet in Germany, A. D. 70, was sodomized by the soldiers, because it was thought that he had had a hand in the death of Pontius Capito; but he was protected by Vittellius from the vengeance of the soldiers. (Tac. Hist. i. 53.)

B'URRICHUS (Boisrîkos), one of the command¬
ners of Demetrius Poliorcetes in the sea-fight off Cyprus, n. c. 306, was one of the flatterers of the king, to whom the Athenians erected an altar and a heroum. (Diod. xx. 52; Athen. vi. p. 253, a.)

C. BURREN'US, praetor urbanus about n. c. 82. (Cic. pro Quint. 6, 21.)

BURRUS or BURRUS, AFRANIUS, a distinguished Roman general under Claudius and Nero, who was appointed by Claudius sole praetor praetorius, A. D. 52, upon the recommendation of Agrippina, the wife of the emperor, as she hoped to obtain more influence over the praetorian cohorts by one man being their prefect instead of two, especially as Burrus was made to feel that he owed his elevation to her. Burrus and Seneca conducted the education of Nero, and although they were men of very different pursuits, yet they agreed in their endeavours to bring up the young prince in virtuous habits. When Claudius died in A. D. 55, Burrus accompanied Nero from the palace to the praetorians, who, at the command of their prefect, received Nero with loud acclamations. It appears, indeed, that Nero owed his elevation to the throne chiefly to the influence of Burrus. The executions which Agrippina ordered in the beginning of Nero's reign were strenuously opposed by Burrus and Seneca. When Nero had given orders in A. D. 60 to put his mother Agrippina to death, and was informed that she had escaped with a slight wound, he consulted Burrus and Seneca, hoping that they would assist him in carrying his plan into effect; but Burrus refused to take any part in it, and declared that the praetorians were bound to afford their protection to the whole house of the Caesars. In the same manner Burrus opposed Nero's design of murdering his wife Octavia. At length, however, Nero, who had already threatened to deprive Burrus of his post, resolved to get rid of his stern and virtuous officer, and accordingly had him killed by poison, A.D. 63. Tacitus, indeed, states, that it was uncertain whether he died of illness or in consequence of poison, but the authority of other writers leaves no doubt that he was poisoned by the emperor. The death of Burrus was lamented by all who had felt the beneficial influence he had exercised, and the power which Seneca had hitherto possessed lost in Burrus its last supporter. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 42, 69, xiii. 2, 20, &c.; xiv. 7, 51, 52; Dion Cass. lii. 15; Suet. Nerv. 35.)

BUSA, a surname of T. Munatius Plancus. [Flancus.]

Bursio, a cognomen of the Julia gens, which is known only from coins. There is a large number of which the following is a specimen, bearing on the reverse the inscription L. IVLI. BURSIO, with Victory in a four-horse chariot. The head on the obverse has occasioned great dispute among writers on coins: on account of its wings and the trident, it may perhaps be intended to represent Ocean. (Eckhel, v. p. 237, &c.)

BUSA, an Apulian woman of noble birth and great wealth, who supplied with food, clothing, and provisions for their journey, the Roman soldiers who fled to Canusium after the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216. For this act of liberality thanks were afterwards returned her by the senate. (Liv. xxii. 52, 54; Val. Max. iv. 8. § 2.)

Bursias (Bodoro), according to Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5), a son of Aegyptus, who was killed by the Danaid Automate; but according to Diodorus (i. 17), he was the governor whom Osiris, on setting out on his expedition through the world, appointed over the north eastern portion of Egypt, which bordered on the sea and Phoenicia. In another place (i. 45) he speaks of Bursis as an Egyptian king, who followed after the 52 successors of Memnon, and states that Bursis was succeeded by eight kings, who descended from him, and the last of whom likewise bore the name of Bursis. This last Bursis is described as the founder of the city of Zeus, which the Greeks called Thbes. Apollodorus, too (ii. 5. § 11), mentions an Egyptian king Bursis, and calls him a son of Poseidon and Lyasannassa, the daughter of Epaphus. Concerning this Bursis the following remarkable story is told — Egypt had been visited for nine years by uninterrupted scarcity, and at last there came a soothsayer from Cyprus of the name of Phrasius, who declared, that the scarcity would cease if the Egyptians would sacrifice a foreigner to Zeus every year. Bursis made the beginning with the prophet himself, and afterwards sacrificed all the foreigners that entered Egypt. Heracles on his arrival in Egypt was likewise seized and led to the altar, but he broke his chains and slew Bursis, together with his son Amphidamas or Iphidamas, and his herald Chalbes. (Apollod. l.c.; Schol. ad Apollon. iv. 1396; comp. Herod. ii. 45; Gell. ii. 6; Macrobr. Sat. vi. 7; Hygin. Fab. 31.) This story gave rise to various disputes in later times, when a friendly intercourse between Greece and Egypt was established, both nations being anxious to do away with the stigma it attached to the Egyptians. Herodotus (l.c.) expressly denies that the Egyptians ever offered human sacrifices, and Isocrates (Bus. 13) endeavours to upset the story by shewing, that Heracles must have lived at a much later time than Bursis. Others again said, that it was a tale invented to shew up the incorrigible character of the inhabitants of the town of Bursis, and that there never was a king of that name. (Strab. xvii. p. 802.) Diodorus (i. 88) relates on the authority of the Egyptians themselves that Bursis was not the name of a king, but signified the tomb of Osiris, and that in ancient times the kings used to sacrifice at this grave men of red colour (the colour of Typhon), who were for the most part foreigners. Another story gives a Greek origin to the name Bursis, by saying that when Isis had collected the limbs of Osiris, who had been killed by Typhon, she put them together in a wooden box (ebos), whence the name of the town of Bursis was derived (Diod. i. 89), which contained the principal sanctuary of Isis. (Herod. ii. 39.) If we may judge from the analogy of other cases, the name of the town of Bursis was not derived from a king of that name; and indeed the dynasties of Manethon do not mention a king Bursis, so that the whole story may be a mere invention of the Greeks, from which we can scarcely infer anything else than that, in ancient times, the Egyptians were hostile towards all foreigners, and in some cases sacrificed them. Modern scholars, such as Creuzer and G. Hermann, find a deeper meaning in the myths of Bursis than it can possibly suggest. [L. S.]

Butias (Bostra), a Greek poet of uncertain age, wrote in elegiac verse an account of early Roman history, from which Plutarch quotes the fabulous origin of the Lupercalia. It seems to have been called Afris, like a number of Cypriote towns, because it gave the causes or origin of various fables, rites, and customs. (Plut. Rom. 21; Arnob. x. 18.)

Butiote, the name of a family of the patrician Fabia gens. This name, which signifies a kind of hawk, was originally given to a member of this gens, because the bird had on one occasion settled upon his ship with a favourable omen. (Plin. H.N. x. 8, s. 10.) We are not told which of the Fabii first obtained this surname, but it was probably one of the Fabii Ambusti. [Ambustus.]

1. N. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butiote, consul B.C. 247, in the first Punic war, was employed in the siege of Drepanum. In 224 he was magistrate equitum to the dictator L. Caecilius Metellus. (Zonar. viii. 19; Fast. Capit.)

2. M. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butiote, brother apparently of the preceding, was consul B.C. 245. Florus says (ii. 2. §§ 30, 31), that he gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians and afterwards suffered shipwreck; but this is a mistake, as we know from Polybius, that the Romans had no fleet at that time. In 216 he was elected dictator Butades or Etcobutadac derived their origin from Ercchtheian Poseidon. The Attic family of the Argonaut. (Apollod. i. 9. §§ 16, 25, iii. 14.)

He accordingly went with a band of colonists to Massilia on his way to the province. (Liv. xli. 4.)

Butes himself into a well. (Diod. v. 50.)

He accordingly conjectured that he was the colleague of C. Aurelius Cotta in the censorship, b. c. 241. In the Fasti Capitoline the name of Cotta's colleague has disappeared.

4. M. Fabius Butex, curule aedile b. c. 203, and praetor 201, when he obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxx. 26, 40.)

5. Q. Fabius Butex, praetor b. c. 196, obtained the province of Further Spain. (Liv. xxxiii. 24, 26.)

6. Q. Fabius Butex, praetor b. c. 181, obtained the province of Cisalpine Gaul, and had his command prolonged the following year. In 179 he was appointed one of the triunvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of the Pisani, and in 168 one of the quingueviri to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lumeses respecting the boundaries of their lands. (Liv. xli. 16, 26, 43, xiv. 18.)

Butes. 1. A son of Boreas, a Thracian, was hostile towards his step-brother Lycurgus, and therefore compelled by his father to emigrate. He accordingly went with a band of colonists to the island of Strongyle, afterwards called Naxos. But as he and his companions had no women, they made predatory excursions, and also came to Thessaly, where they carried off the women who were just celebrating a festival of Dionysus. Butes himself took Coronis; but she invoked Dionysus, who struck Butes with madness, so that he threw himself into a well. (Diod. v. 50.)

2. A son of Telcon and Zantepe. Others call his father Pandion or Amycus. He is renowned as an Athenian shepherd, ploughman, warrior, and an Argonaut. (Apollod. i. 9. §§ 16, 25, iii. 14. §§ 8, 15, § 1.)

After the death of Pandion, he obtained the office of priest of Athena and the Erechtheum Poseidon. The Attic family of the Butades or Eteobutades derived their origin from him, and in the Erechtheum on the Acropolis there was an altar dedicated to Butes, and the walls were decorated with paintings representing scenes from the history of the family of the Butades. (Paus. i. 26. § 6; Harpocr. Etym. M. Hesych. s. v.; Orph. Arg. 138; Val. Flacc. i. 394; Hygin. Fab. 14.)

The Argonaut Butes is also called a son of Poseidon (Eustath. ad Hom. xiii. 43); and it is said, that when the Argonauts passed by the Sirens, Orpheus commenced a song to counteract the influence of the Sirens, but that Butes alone leaped into the sea. Aphrodite, however, saved him, and carried him to Lilybaenum, where she by him became the mother of Eryx. (Apollod. i. 9. § 23; Serv. ad Aen. i. 574, v. 24.) Diodorus (iv. 88), on the other hand, regards this Butes as one of the native kings of Sicily.

There are at least four more mythical persons of this name, respecting whom nothing of interest can be said. (Ov. Met. vii. 590; Diod. v. 59; Virg. Aen. xi. 690, &c., ix. 646, &c.)

Buto (Boutra), an Egyptian divinity, whom the Greeks identified with their Leto, and who was worshipped principally in the town of Buto, which derived its name from her. Festivals were celebrated there in her honour, and there she had also an oracle which was in high esteem among the Egyptians. (Herod. ii. 59, 83, 111, 138, 152, 155; Aelian, V. H. ii. 41; Strab. xviii. p. 602.) According to Herodotus, she belonged to the eight great divinities; and in the mythology of Osiris and Isis she acts the part of a nurse to their children, Horus and Bubastis. Isis entrusted the two children to her, and she saved them from the persecutions of Typhon by concealing them in the floating island of Chemnis, in a lake near the sanctuary at Buto, where afterwards Bubastis and Horus were worshipped, together with Buto. (Herod. ii. 156; Plut. de Is. et Os. 18, 38.)

Stephanus of Byzantium appears (s. v. Αυροίς πόλας) to speak of an earlier worship of Buto (Leto) at Letopolis near Memphis; but Letopolis was in later times known only by its name, and was destroyed long before the time of Cambyses. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. ii. 15. § 1.) As regards the nature and character of Buto, the ancients, in identifying her with Leto, transferred their notions of the latter to the former, and Buto was accordingly considered by the Greeks as the mother of Apollo (Plut. de Nat. Deor. 5, 13; Plut. op. Eusel. Prosp. Ev. iii. 1.) This opinion seemed to be confirmed by the peculiar animal which was sacred to Buto, viz. the shrew-mouse (μυράλα) and the hawk. Herodotus (ii. 67) states, that both these animals were, after their death, carried to Buto; and, according to Antoninus Liberalis (28), Leto (Buto) changed herself into a shrew-mouse in order to escape the persecution of Typhon. About this mouse Plutarch (Sympos. iv. 5) relates, that it was believed to have received divine honours in Egypt because it was blind, and because darkness preceded light. This opinion of the ancients respecting the nature of Buto has been worked out with some modifications by modern writers in Egyptian mythology. (Jalabinsky, Panh. Aug. iii. 4. § 7; Champollion, Panh. Egypt., text to plate 23.)

Butorides. One of the authors who wrote upon the pyramids of Egypt. From the order in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12. s. 17), it would appear that he must have lived after Alexander Polyhistor and before Apion, that is, either in the first century before or the first century after Christ. [ARIStoGoranAS.]

BUZYGE. [BUDEIA.]

BYBLIS (BYBAIS), a daughter of Miletus and Eidothea (others call her mother Tragasia or Areia), and sister of Caunus. The story about her is related in different ways. One tradition is, that Caunus loved his sister with more than brotherly affection, and as he could not get over this feeling, he quitted his father's home and Miletus, and settled in Lycea. Byblis, deeply grieved at the flight of her brother, went out to seek him, and having wandered about for a long time, hung herself by means of her girdle. Out of her tears arose the well Byblis. (Parthen. Evrot. 11; Conon, Norm. 2.) According to another tradition, Byblis herself was seized with a hopeless passion for her brother, and as in her despair she was on the point of leaping from a rock into the sea, she was kept back by nymphs, who sent her into a profound sleep. In this sleep she was made an immortal by the gods. In the sleep she beheld a grove of Apollo, called the Iseumium. The god appeared to her, and that it was impossible to rescue the soul of Caunus, who was in love with her brother, made her reveal to him her passion, whereupon Caunus fled to the country of the Lycaeans, and Byblis hung herself. (Parthen. l.c.) Ovid (Met. iv. 446-665) in his description combines several features of the different legends; Byblis is in love with Caunus, and as her love grows from day to day, she escapes; but she follows him through Caris, Lycea, &c., until at last she sinks down worn out; and as she is crying perpetually, she is changed into a well. The town of Byblus in Phoenicia is said to have derived its name from her. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

BYZAS (BYZAS), a son of Poseidon and Caroelis, the daughter of Zeus and Io. He was believed to be the founder of Byzantium. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Diod. iv. 40.) This transplantation of the legend of Io to Byzantium suggests the idea, that colonists from Argos settled there. The leader of the Megarians, who founded Byzantium in B.C. 656, was likewise called Byzus. (Muller, Dor. l. 6. § 9.)

C.

CAANTHUS (KAIiYos), a son of Oceanus and brother of Melia. He was sent out by his father in search of his sister who had been carried off, and when he found that she was in the possession of Apollo, and that it was impossible to rescue her from his hands, he threw fire into the sacred grove of Apollo, called the Iseumium. The god then killed Caanthus with an arrow. His tomb was shown by the Thesmophorion on the spot where he had been killed, near the river Iseumium. (Paus. ix. 10. § 5.)

CABADIES. [SASSANIDAE.]

CABARNUS (KABAPoF2), a mythical personage of the island of Paros, who revealed to Demeter the fact of her daughter having been carried off, and from whom the island of Paros was said to have been called Cabarnis. (Steph. Byz. s. v. IAPos.) From Hesychius (s. v. KABAPoF2) it would seem that, in Paros, Cabarnus was the name for any priest of Demeter. [L. S.]

CABASILAS, NEILUS (NEILos KAlSAlais), archbishop of Thessalonica, living according to some about A.D. 1314, and according to others somewhat later, about 1340, in the reign of the emperor Ioannes Cantacuzenus. He was a bitter opponent of the doctrines of the Latin Church, whence he is severely censured by modern writers of that church, whereas Greek and even Protestant writers speak of him in terms of high praise. Cabasilas is the author of several works, of which, however, two only have yet appeared in print. 1. An oration on the cause of the schism between the Latin and Greek churches (προ των άντων των ενεκρατον έκκλησιων έκκλησιων), and 2. A small work on the scriptures (προ των ήγεμων της ένεκρατον). The first edition of the latter treatise, with a Latin translation by Mathias Flacius, appeared at Frankfort in 1555, in small 8vo. This was followed by the editions of B. Vulcinus, Lugd. Bat. 1595, 8vo. and of Salmasius, Hanover, 1608, 8vo. This last edition contains also a work of Barlaam, on the same subject, with notes by the editor, and also the first edition of the oration of Cabasilas on the schism between the two churches, which Salmasius has printed as the second book of the work on the primacy of the pope. Of this latter work there is an English translation by Thomas Gresop, London, 1560, 8vo. A list of the works of Neilus Cabasilas which have appeared are: 1. A Latin translation of the Eclogues of Horace, with a Greek translation. (Bibl. Grec. x. p. 50, &c.; comp. Wharton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Lit. i. p. 34, &c., vol. ii. p. 521, &c. ed. London.)

sAlais), archbishop of Thessalonica, was the nephew and successor of Neilus Cabasilas, with whom he has often been confounded. He lived about A.D. 1350. He first held a high office at the imperial court of Constantinople, and in that capacity he was sent in 1346 by Ioannes, patriarch of Constantinople, to the emperor Cantacuzenus to induce him to resign the imperial dignity. In the year following he was sent by the emperor Cantacuzenus himself, who had then conquered and entered the city, to the palace of the empress Anna, to lay before her the terms of peace proposed by the conqueror. (Cantacuz. Hist. Byz. iv. 38, &c., xiv. 10.) Nicolaus Cabasilas, who was a man of great learning, wrote several works, of which however only a few have been published, perhaps because he was, like his uncle, a vehement antagonist of the Latin church. The following works have appeared in print: 1. Ενημερωμένος διάγωνος, &c., that is, a compendious explanation of the holy mass or liturgy. It first appeared in a Latin translation by Gentianus Hereditianus, Venice, 1548, 8vo., from whence it was reprinted in the "Liturgia SS. Patrum," edited by J. S. Andreas and F. C. de Saintes, Paris, 1569, fol., and Antwerp, 1562, 8vo., and also in the Biblioth. Patr. xxvi. p. 173, ed. Lugd. The Greek original was first edited by Fronto Duceius in the Auctarium to the Bibl. Patr. of 1624, vol. ii. p. 200, &c. 2. A work on the life of Christ, in six books, in which, however, the author treats principally of baptism, the last unction, and the eucharist. This work is as yet published only in a Latin version by J. Pontanus, together with some other works, and also an oration of Nicol. Cabasilas against usury, Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to. From this edition it was reprinted in the Bibl. Patr. xxvi. p. 136, ed. Lugd. In some MSS. this work consists of seven books, but the seventh has never appeared in print. 3. An oration on Usury and against Usurers, of which a Latin translation was published by J. Pontanus together with Cabasius' life of Christ. The Greek original of this oration appeared at August Vindel. 1595 by D. Hoeschel, and was afterwards published in a more correct form, together with the oration of Epiphanius on the burial of Christ, by S. Simnides, Samoscii, 1604, 4to. The many other orations and theological works of Nicolaus Cabasius, which have not yet been printed, are enumerated in Fabric. Bibl. Graec x. p. 28, &c. &c; comp. Whatton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Lit. 1. p. 44, ed. Lond. 1830.

CABEIRI. (Καβείρι). Mystic divinities who occur in various parts of the ancient world. The obscurity that hangs over them, and the contradictions respecting them in the accounts of the ancients themselves, have opened a wide field for speculation to modern writers on mythology, each of whom has been tempted to propound a theory of his own. The meaning of the name Caberiri is quite uncertain, and has been traced to nearly all the languages of the East, and even to those of the North; but one etymology seems as plausible as another, and etymology in this instance is a real ignis fatuus to the inquirer. The character and nature of the Cabeiri are as obscure as the meaning of their name. All that we can attempt to do here is to trace and explain the various opinions of the ancients themselves, as they are presented to us in chronological succession. We chiefly follow Lobecch, who has collected all the passages of the ancients upon this subject, and who appears to us the most sober among those who have written upon it. (Ajaqgam. pp. 1202—1281.)

The earliest mention of the Cabeiri, so far as we know, was in a drama of Aeschylus, entitled Aylaopkam. The opinion of Weicker (Die Aeschy. Trilog. p. 236), who infers from Dionysius (i. 66, &c.) that the Cabeiri had been spoken of by Arisillus, has been satisfactorily refuted by Lobecch and others. From the passage of Aeschylus here in question, it appears that he regarded the Cabeiri as the grandchildren of Proteus and as the sons of Hephaestus, and consequently as inferior in dignity to the great gods on account of their origin. Their inferiority is also implied in their jocose conversation with the Argonauts, and their being repeatedly mentioned along with the Curetes, Dactyls, Corybantes, and other beings of inferior rank. Herodotus (iii. 57) says, that the Cabeiri were worshipped at Memphis as the sons of Hephaestus, and that they resembled the Phoenician dwarf-gods (Hiraciri) whom the Phoenicians fixed on the prows of their ships. As the Dioscuri were then yet unknown to the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 51), the Cabeiri cannot have been identified with them at that time. Herodotus proceeds to say, "the Athenians received their phallic Hercules from the Pelasgians, and those who are initiated in the mysteries of the Cabeiri will understand what I am saying; for the Pelasgians formerly inhabited Samothrace, and it is from them that the Samothracians received their orgies. But the Samothracians had a sacred legend about Hermes, which is explained in their mysteries." This sacred legend is perhaps no other than the one spoken of by Cicero (De Nat. Deor. ii. 22), that Hermes was the son of Coeus and Dies, and that Proserpine desired to embrace him. The same is perhaps alluded to by Herodotus (i. 6) when he says, that Mercury (Hermes) had connexions with Brimos, who is probably the goddess of Phœbes worshipped at Athens, Sicyon, and Argos, whom some identified with Proserpine (Persephone), and others with Hecate or Artemis. (Spanh. ad Callim. hymn. in Dion. 259)

We generally find this goddess worshipped in places which had the worship of the Cabeiri, and a Lemnian Artemis is mentioned by Galen. (De Medic. Simpl. ix. 2, p. 246, ed. Chart.) The Tyrrhenians, too, are said to have taken away the statue of Artemis at Brauron, and to have carried it to Lemnos. Aristophanes, in his "Lemnian Women," had mentioned Bendis along with the Brauronian Artemis and the great goddess, and Nomus (Dionys. xxi. 48) states that the Cabeiri Alcon brandished Evedra Svareiska resperda, so that we may draw the conclusion, that the Samothracians and Lemnians worshipped a goddess akin to Hecate, Artemis, Bendis, or Persephone, who had some sexual connexion with Hermes, which revelation was made in the mysteries of Samothrace.

The writer next to Herodotus, who speaks about the Cabeiri, and whose statements we possess in Strabo (p. 472), though brief and obscure, is Stesimbrotus. The meaning of the passage in Strabo is, according to Lobecch, as follows: Some persons think that the Corybantes are the sons of Crones, others that they are the sons of Zeus and Caliophe, that they the Cabeiri. But as the doings of the Cabeiri are generally known, whereas no one knows of the Samothracian Corybantes, those persons are obliged to have recourse to saying, that the doings of the latter Corybantes are kept secret or are mystic. This opinion, however, is contested by Demetrius, who states, that nothing was revealed in the mysteries either of the deeds of the Cabeiri or of their having accompanied Rhea or of their having brought up Zeus and Dionysus.

Demetrius also mentions the opinion of Stesimbrotus, that the lep were performed in Samothrace to the Cabeiri, who derived their name from mount Cabeiri in Bercyntia. But here again opinions differed very much, for while some believed that the ἱερός Καβείρων were thus called from their having been instituted and conducted by the Cabeiri, others thought that they were celebrated in honour of the Cabeiri, and that the Cabeiri belonged to the great gods.

The Attic writers of this period offer nothing of importance concerning the Cabeiri, but they intimated that their mysteries were particularly calculated to protect the lives of the initiated. (Aristoph. Par, 298; comp. Etymol. Gud. p. 289.) Later writers in making the same remark do not mention the name Cabeiri, but speak of the Samothracian gods generally. (Diod. iv. 43, 49; Aelian, Fragm. p. 320; Callim. Ep. 36; Lucian. Ep. 15; Plut. Marcell. 30.) There are several instances mentioned of oaths swearing by the Cabeiri in promising fidelity to one another (Juuv. iii. 144; Himerius, Ort. i. 12; and Suidas (s. e. Δαμνάυματα) mentions a case of a girl invoking the Cabeiri as her avenger, her lover who had broken her oath.

But from these oaths we can no more draw any inference as to the real character of the Cabeiri, than from the fact of their protecting the lives of the initiated; for these are features which they have in common with various other divinities. From the account which the scholiast of Apollonius Rhodius (i. 913) has borrowed from Atheneion, who had written a comedy called Τὰ Σαμοθρακικά (Athen. xiv. p. 661), we learn only that he spoke of two Cabeiri, Dardanus, and Jason, whom he called sons of Zeus and Electra. They derived their name from mount Cabeirus in Phrygia, from whence they had been introduced into Samothrace.

A more ample source of information respecting the Cabeiri is opened to us by those writers of the Alexandrine period. The two scholiasts on Apollonius Rhodius (s. e. Cabeiri) contain in substance the following statements: Mnaseas mentions the names of three Cabeiri in Samothrace, viz. Axieros, Axioeris, and Axioeris; the first is Demeter, the second Persephone, and the third Hadès. Others add a fourth, Cadmus, who according to Dionysodorus is identical with Hermes. It thus appears that these accounts agreed with that of Steinsibrotus, who reckoned the Cabeiri among the great gods, and that Mnaseas only added their names. Herodotus, as we have seen, had already connected Hermes with Persephone; the worship of the latter as connected with that of Demeter in Samothrace is attested by Artemidorus (op. Strab. iv. p. 198); and there was also a port in Samothrace which derived its name, Demetrios, from Demeter. (I. c. xiv. 6.) According to the authors used by Dionysius (i. 88), the worship of Samothrace was introduced there from Arcadia; for according to them Dardanus, together with his brother Jason or Jesus and his sister Harmonia, left Arcadia and went to Samothrace, taking with them the Palladium from the temple of Pallas. Cadmus, however, who appears in this tradition, is king of Samothrace: he made Dardanus his friend, and sent him to Tenedos in Troas. Dardanus himself, again, is sometimes described as a Cretan (Serv. ad Aen. iii. 167), sometimes as an Asiatic (Steph. l. s. v. Δαμάναυρος; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 391), while Arrian (op. Eustath. p. 351) makes him come originally from Samothrace. Respecting his brother Jason or Jesus, the accounts likewise differ very much; for while some writers describe him as going to Samothrace either from Parrhasia in Arcadia or from Crete, a third account (Dionys. i. 61) stated, that he was killed by lightning for having entertained improper desires for Demeter; and Apollonius Rhodius (s. e. Δαμναύματα) says that Jason, being inspired by Demeter and Ceres, went to Sicily and many other places, and there established the mysteries of these goddesses, for which Demeter rewarded him by yielding to his embraces, and became the mother of Parus, the founder of Paros.

All writers of this class appear to consider Dardanus as the founder of the Samothracian mysteries, and the mysteries themselves as solemnized in honour of Demeter. Another set of authorities, on the other hand, regard them as belonging to Rhea (Diob. v. 51; Schol. ad Aristid. p. 106; Strab. Perieg. ib. vii. p. 511, ed. Almodov.; Lucian, De Dea Sgr. 97), and suggests the identity of the Samothracian and Phrygian mysteries. Pherecydes too, who placed the Corybantes, the companions of the great mother of the gods, in Samothrace, and Steinsibrotus who derived the Cabeiri from mount Cabeirus in Phrygia, and all those writers who describe Dardanus as the founder of the Samothracian mysteries, naturally ascribed the Samothracian mysteries to Rhea. To Demeter, on the other hand, they were ascribed by Mnaseas, Artemidorus, and even by Herodotus, since he mentions Hermes and Persephone in connexion with these mysteries, and Persephone has nothing to do with Rhea. Now, as Demeter and Rhea have many attributes in common—both are συνάδελφοι Σκόλοι, and the festivals of each were celebrated with the same kind of enthusiasm; and as peculiar features of the one are occasionally transferred to the other (e. g. Eurip. Helen. 1304), it is not difficult to see how it might happen, that the Thracian goddess was sometimes called Demeter and sometimes Rhea. The difficulty is, however, increased by the fact of Venus (Aphrodite) too being worshipped in Samothrace. (Plin. H. N. v. 6.) This Venus may be either the Thracian Bendi or Cybele, or may have been one of the Cabeiri themselves, for we know that Thebes possessed three ancient statues of Aphrodite, which Harmonia had taken from the ships of Cadmus, and which may have been the Ερημίς who resembled the Cabeiri. (Paus. ix. 16. § 3; Herod. iii. 57.) In connexion with this Aphrodite we may mention that, according to some accounts, the Phoenician Aphrodite (Astarte) had commonly the epithet οἰκεῖρ or οἰκείρ, an Arabic word which signifies "the great," and that Lobock considers Astarte as identical with the Σεξακηρία Κατιελία, which name P. Ligurios saw on a gem.

There are also writers who transfer all that is said about the Samothracian gods to the Dioscuri, who were indeed different from the Cabeiri of Acusilaus, Pherecydes, and Aeschylus, but yet might easily be confounded with them; first, because the Dioscuri are also called great gods, and secondly, because they were also regarded as the protectors of persons in danger either by land or water. Hence we find that in some places where the ἱερακεῖα were worshipped, it was uncertain whether they were the Dioscuri or the Cabeiri. (Paus. x. 38. § 3.) Nay, even the Roman Penates were sometimes considered as identical with the Dioscuri in Samothrace (Dionys. i. 67, 8, &c.); and it was thought that the Penates were carried by Dardanus from the Arcadian town Pheneos to Samothrace, and that Aeneas brought them from thence to Italy. (Macro. Sat. iii. 4; Serv. ad Aen. l. 378, iii. 148.) But the authorities for this opinion are all of a late period. According to one set of accounts, the Samothracian gods were two male divinites of the same age, which alludes to Zeus and Dionysus, or Dardanus and Jason, but not to Demeter, Rhea, or Persephone. When people, in the course of time, had become accustomed to regard the Penates and Cabeiri as identical, and yet did not know exactly the name of each separate divinity comprised under those common names, some divinities are mentioned among the Penates who belonged to the Cabeiri, and vice versa. Thus Servius (ad Aen. viii. 619) represents Zeus, Pallas, and Hermes as introduced from Samothrace; and, in another passage (ad Aen. iii. 264), he says that, according to the Samothracians, these three were the great gods, of whom Hermes, and perhaps Zeus also, might be reckoned among the Penates. Varro (de Ling. Lat. v. 86, ed. Muller) says, that Heaven and Earth were the great Samothracian gods; while in another place (ap. August. De Civ. Dei, vii. 18) he stated, that there were three Samothracian gods, Jupiter or Heaven, Juno or Earth, and Minerva or the prototype of things,—the ideas of Plato. This is, of course, only the view Varro himself took, and not a tradition.

If we now look back upon the various statements we have gathered, for the purpose of arriving at some definite conclusion, it is manifest, that the earliest writers regard the Cabeiri as descended from inferior divinities, Proteus and Phoebas: they have their seats on earth, in Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. Those early writers cannot possibly have conceived them to be Demeter, Persephone or Rhea. It is true those early authorities are not numerous in comparison with the later ones; but Demetrius, who wrote on the subject, may have had more and very good ones, since it is with reference to him that Strabo repeats the assertion, that the Cabeiri, like the Corybantes and Curetes, were only ministers of the great gods. We may therefore suppose, that the Samothracian Cabeiri were originally such inferior beings; and as the notion of the Cabeiri was from the first not fixed and distinct, it became less so in later times; and as the ideas of mystery and Demeter came to be looked upon as inseparable, it cannot occasion surprise that the mysteries, which were next in importance, were thus discovered. Another tradition stated, that Caca, the sister of Cacus, betrayed the place where he had been concealed; but the remaining oxen passed by the cave, the traces of which were thus discovered. Another tradition stated, that Caca, the sister of Cacus, betrayed the place where he lived, while in another place (ap. August. De Civ. Dei, vii. 18) he stated, that there were three Samothracian gods, Jupiter or Heaven, Juno or Earth, and Minerva or the prototype of things,—the ideas of Plato. This is, of course, only the view Varro himself took, and not a tradition.

The places where the worship of the Cabeiri occurs, are chiefly Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. Some writers have maintained, that the Samothracian and Lemnian Cabeiri were distinct; but the contrary is asserted by Strabo (x. p. 466). Besides the Cabeiri of these three islands, we read of Boeotian Cabeiri. Near the Neitian gate of Thebes there was a grove of Demeter Cabeiria and Cora, which none but the initiated were allowed to enter; and at a distance of seven stadia was cultivated a field of the Cabeiri. (Paus. ix. 25, § 5.) Here mysteries were celebrated, and the sanctity of the temple was great as late as the time of Pausanias. (Comp. iv. 1, § 5.)

The account of Pausanias about the origin of the Boeotian Cabeiri savours of rationalism, and is, as Lobeck justly remarks, a mere fiction. It must further not be supposed that there existed any connexion between the Samothracian Cabeiris of Cadmus and the Theban Cadmus; for tradition clearly describes them as beings of different origin, race, and dignity. Pausanias (ix. 22, § 5) further mentions another sanctuary of the Cabeiri, with a grove, in the Boeotian town of Anthedon; and a Boeotian Cabeirus, who possessed the power of averting dangers and increasing man's prosperity, is mentioned in an epigram of Diodorus. (Brunck, Anal. ii. p. 185.) A Macedonian Cabeirus occurs in Lactantius, (i. 15, 3; comp. Firmicus, de Evang. Prof. p. 33; Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 16.) The reverence paid by the Macedonians to the Cabeiri may be inferred from the fact of Philip and Olympus being initiated in the Samothracian mysteries, and of Alexander erecting altars to the Cabeiri at the close of his Eastern expedition. (Plut. Alex. 2; Philostr. de Vit. Apostol. ii. 43.) The Pergamenean Cabeiri are mentioned by Pausanias (i. 4, § 6), and those of Bergus by Sanchonianthus (ap. Euseb. Prap. Evang. p. 31) and Damascius. (Vit. Isidor. ccli. 573.)

CACUS. A wild, savage, Italian shepherd, who was believed to have lived in a cave, and to have committed various kinds of robberies. Among others, he stole a part of the cattle of Hercules or Recaranus; and, as he dragged the animals into his cave by their tails, it was impossible to discover their traces. But when the remaining oxen passed by the cave, those within began to bellow, and were thus discovered. Another tradition stated, that Caca, the sister of Cacus, betrayed the place of his concealment. Cacus was slain by Hercules. (Liv. i. 7.) He is usually called a son of Vulcan, and Ovid, who gives his story with considerable embellishments, describes Cacus as a fearful giant, who was the terror of the whole land. (Ov. Fast. i. 554; comp. Virg. Aen. viii. 190, &c.; Propert. iv. 9; Dionys. i. 32, 43; Aur. Vic. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 6.) Evander, who then ruled over the country in which Cacus had resided, showed his gratitude to the conqueror of Cacus by dedicating to him a sanctuary, and appointing the Potitii and Pinarii as his priests. The common opinion respecting the original character of Cacus is, that he was the personification of some evil daemon, and this opinion is chiefly founded upon the descriptions of him given by the Roman poets. Hartung (Die Caciden) remarks, that Cacus, whom he identifies with Cacus (Diod. iv. 21; Solin. i. 1), and his sister Caca were Roman penates, whose names he connects with salus, CADMUS.

celo, and coopo. There were at Rome various things connected with the legends about Cacus. On the side of the Palatine hill, not far from the foot of Faustulus, there was a foot-path leading up the hill, with a wooden ladder called "the ladder of Cacus," and the ancient cave of Cacus, which is still shown at Rome, was in the Salina, near the Porta Trigemina. (Diod. Solin. ii. 26; Klauser, Abhandl. der Stadt Rom, i. p. 134, iii. p. 492.) [L. S.]

CADMUS RUFUS. [Rufus.]

CADMILUS, CASMILUS, or CADMUS (Kαδμιλος, Κασμιλος, or Καδμος), according to Acusaus (ap. Strab. x. p. 472) a son of Hephæstus and Cabeiro, and father of the Samothracian Cabei and the Cabeironian nymphs. Others consider Cadmilin himself as the fourth of the Samothracian Cabei. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 917; comp. Cabeiro.) [L. S.]

CADMUS (Καδμος), a son of Agenor and Telephassa, and brother of Europa, Phoenix, and Cílix. When Europa was carried off by Zeus to Crete, Agenor sent out his sons in search of their sister, enjoining them not to return without her. Telephassa accompanied her sons. All researches being fruitless, Cadmus and Telephassa settled in Thrace. (Herod. ii. 23; Paus. ix. 12 § 2), and his parentage is modified accordingly; for he is also called a son of Antiope, the daughter of Belus, or of Argiope, the daughter of Neleus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 5, with Vaelck. note; Hygin. Fab. 6, 178, 179.) He is said to have introduced into Greece from Phoenicia or Egypt an alphabet of sixteen letters (Herod. v. 58, &c.; Diod. iii. 47, v. 57; Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Hygin. Fab. 277), and to have been the first who worked the mines of Mount Pangaeon in Thrace. The teeth of the dragon whom Cadmus slew were sown, according to some accounts, by Athena herself, and the spot where this was done was shown, in aftertimes, in the neighbourhood of Thebes. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 670; Paus. ix. 10 § 1.) Half of the teeth were given by Athena to Aëtes, king of Colchis. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1183; Apollon. i. 9. § 23; Serv. ad Verg. Georg. ii. 141.) The account of his quitting Thebes also was not the same in all traditions; for some related, that he was expelled by Amphion and Zethus, or by Dionysus, (Sycell. p. 296, ed. Dindorf.) A tradition of Brasias stated, that Cadmus, after discovering the birth of Dionysus by his daughter Semele, shut up the mother and her child in a chest, and threw them into the sea. (Paus. iii. 24 § 3.) According to the opinion of Herodotus (ii. 49), however, Melampus learned and received the worship of Dionysus from Cadmus, and other traditions too represent Cadmus as worshipping Dionysus. (e. g. Eurip. Bacch. 181.) According to Euripides, Cadmus resigned the government of Thebes to his grandson, Pentheus; and after the death of the latter, Cadmus went to Illyria, where he built Butheoi (Bacch. 43, 1331, &c.), in the government of which he was succeeded by his son Ilyrus or Polydorus.

The whole story of Cadmus, with its manifold poetical embellishments, seems to suggest the immigration of a Phoenician or Egyptian colony into Greece, by means of which civilisation (the alphabet, art of mining, and the worship of Dionysus) came into the country. But the opinion formed on this point must depend upon the view we take of the early influence of Phoenicia and Egypt in general upon the early civilisation of Greece. While Buttman and Creuzer, permit such an influence, C. O. Müller denies it altogether, and regards Cadmus as a Pelasgian divinity. Cadmus was worshipped in various parts of Greece, and at Sparta he had a heroum. (Paus. iii. 15 § 6; comp. Buttman, Mytholog. ii. p. 171; Müller, Orchom. p. 113, &c.) [L. S.]

CADMUS (Καδμος), the son of Scythes, a man renowned for his integrity, was sent by Gelon to Delphi, in n. c. 480, with great treasures, to await the issue of the battle between the Greeks and Persians, and with orders to give them to the Persians if the latter conquered, but to bring them back to Sicily if the Greeks prevailed. After the defeat of Xerxes, Cadmus returned to Sicily with the treasures, though he might easily have appropriated them to his own use. (Heron. vi. 163, 164.) Herodotus calls Cadmus a Canaanite, and states further, that he received the tyranny of Cos from his father, but gave the state its liberty of his own accord, merely from a sense of justice; and that after the defeat of Xerxes, Cadmus returned to Sicily with the Samians at Zanclae, afterwards called Messana. Müller (Der. i. 8. § 4, note g.) thinks that this Cadmus was the son of the Scythes, tyrant of Zanclae, who was driven out by the Samians (c. 497), and who fled to the court of Persia, where he died. (Herod. vi. 23.) In reply to the objection, that Herodotus speaks of Cadmus having inherited the tyranny from his father, but of Scythes having died in Persia, Müller remarks that the government of Cos was probably given to his father by the Persians, but that he notwithstanding continued to reside in Persia, as we know was the case with Histiaeus. If this conjecture is correct, Cadmus probably resigned the tyranny of Cos through desire of returning to his native town, Zanclae. He was accompanied to Sicily by the prophet Epiceramus. (Suidas, s. v. 'Enxy epoùs.)

CADMUS (Καδμος). 1. Of Miletus, a son of Pandion, and in all probability the earliest Greek historian or logographer. He lived, according to the vague statement of Josephus (s. Apion. i. 2; comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 267), very shortly before the Persian invasion of Greece; and Suidas makes the singular statement, that Cadmus was only a little younger than the mythical poet Orpheus, which arises from the thorough confusion of the mythical Cadmus of Phoenicia and the historian of Cos. But there is every probability that Cadmus lived about B.C. 640. Strabo (i. p. 18) places him only a little younger than the mythical poet Orpheus; and not Cadmus; but that the latter was the earliest Greek historian, and Cadmus of Miletus simply the earliest historian, we have probably to regard this as one of those numerous inconsistencies into which Pliny fell by following different authorities at different times, and forgetting what he had said on former occasions. All, therefore, we can infer from his contradicting himself in this case is, that there were some ancient authorities who connected with the worship of the god of the hearth. That she was, at the same time, looked upon as a model of domestic life, may be inferred from the fact, that a newly married woman, before entering the house of her husband, on being asked what her name was, answered, "My name is Caia." (Val. Max. l. e.; Plat. Quaest. Rom. p. 271, e.) [L. S.]

CAECILIA, CAIA, is said to have been the genuine Roman name for Tanagis, the wife of Tarquinus Priscus. (Plin. H. N. viii. 74; Val. Max. Epit. de Poen. in fin.; Festus, s. v. Gaia; Plut. Quaest. Rom. p. 271, e.) Both her names, Cnae and Caecilia, are of the same root as Caeculus, and the Roman Caeculia are supposed to have derived their origin from the Praenestine Caecula. (Fest. s. v. Caeculus.) The story of Caia Caecilia is related under TANAQUIL; and it is sufficient to say here, that she appears in the early legends of Rome as a woman endowed with prophetic powers, and closely connected with the early history of the city in the Crimean war. She was, at the same time, looked upon as a model of domestic life, may be inferred from the fact, that a newly married woman, before entering the house of her husband, on being asked what her name was, answered, "My name is Caia." (Val. Max. l. e.; Plat. Quaest. Rom. p. 271, e.) [L. S.]

CAECILLIA, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, who is called Caecilia, because her father took the name of his uncle, Q. Caecilius, by whom he was adopted. She was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. (Atticus, p. 418, a.)

CAECILIA or MISTELLA, 1. and 2. Daughters of Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, consul c. 143, one of whom married C. Servilius Vatia, and was by him the mother of P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus, consul in 79, and the other P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul in 111, and was the grandmother of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio, consul in 52. (Cic. pro Dom. 47, post red. ad Qur. 3, Brut. 58.)

3. The daughter of L. Caecilius Metellus Calvis, consul in c. 142, and the brother of Metellus Numidicus, consul in 109, was married to L. Licinius Lucullus, praetor in 103, and was by him the mother of the celebrated Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates. Her moral character was in bad repute. (Plut. Lic. 1; Cic. in Ver. iv. 66; Aurel. Vict. de VIR. ill. 62.)

4. Daughter of Q. Caecilius Metellus Balbinus, consul in c. 129, was the wife of Ap. Claudius Pulcher, consul in 79, and the mother of Ap. Claudius Pulcher, consul in 54, and of P. Claudius Pulcher, tribune of the plebs in 58. (Cic. de Div. i. 2, 44, pro Rose, Am. 10, 50; in the former of the two latter passages she is erroneously called Nepote fiji instead of Nepote soror.) Her brother was Q. Metellus Nepos, consul in 98, and we accordingly find his two sons, Metellus Celer and Metellus Nepos, called the fraives (cousins) of her sons Ap. Claudius and P. Claudius. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3, ad Fam. v. 3, pro Ciel. 24.)

Cicerro relates (de Div. ii. cc.), that in consequence of a dream of Caecilius in the Maratc war, the temple of Juno Sospita was restored.

5. Daughter of L. Metellus Dalmaticus, consul in c. 116, and of Q. Caecilius Metellus Maximus, consul in 80, as has been inferred from Plutarch. (Sull. 6.)

Her father's praenomen is Lucius, and he is said to have rebuilt the temple of... the Dioecuri (Cic. pro Scaur. 2. §§ 45, 46, with the commentary of Asconius), which point to L. Dalmaticus as her father. She was first married to M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul in 115, by whom she had three children, the eldest of whom was the M. Scaurus defended by Cicero (Cic. l. c. pro Sect. 47; Plut. Sull. 33, Fomp. 9; Plin. H. N. xxii. 19, s. 24. § 4), and afterwards to the dictator Sulla, who always treated her with the greatest respect. When she fled from Cinna and Carbo in Italy to her husband's camp before Athens, she was insulted from the walls of the city by Aristion and the Athenians, for which they paid dearly at the capture of the city. She fell ill in 61, during the celebration of Sulla's triumphal feast; and as her recovery was hopeless, Sulla for religious reasons sent her a bill of divorce, and had her removed from his house, but honoured her memory by a splendid funeral. (Plut. Sull. 6, 15, 22, 55.) She purchased a great deal of the property confiscated in the proscriptions. (Plin. l. c.)

6. The wife of P. Lentulus Spinther, the younger, whose father was consul in 45. She was a woman of loose character, and intrigued with Dolabella, Cicero's son-in-law (Cic. ad Att. xi. 23), and also, as it appears, with Assopus, the son of the actor. (Hor. Sermon. ii. 3. 239.) She was divorced by her husband in 45. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 52, xiii. 7.) Her father is not known.

CAECLILIA GENES, plebeian; for the name of T. Caecilius in Livy (iv. 7, comp. 5), the patrician consular tribune in B. C. 444, is a false reading for T. Clodius. A member of this gens is mentioned in history as early as the fifth century B. C.; but the first of the Cecilius who obtained the consulship was L. Caecilius Metellus Denter, in 234. The family of the Metelli became from this time one of the most distinguished in the state. Like other Roman families in the later times of the republic, they traced their origin to a mythical personage, and pretended that they were descended from Caeculus, the founder of Praeneeae [Cacicilus], or Caecas, the companion of Aeneas. (Festus, s. v. Caeculus.) The cognomina of this gens under the republic are Bassus, Dentor, Metellus, Niger, Pinna, Rufus, of which the Metelli are the best known: for those whose cognomen is not mentioned, see CAECILIUS.

CAECLILIANUS, a senator, punished in A. D. 32 for falsely accusing Cotta. (Tac. Ann. vii. 7.)

CAECLILIANUS, a deacon of the church at Carthage, was chosen bishop of the see in A. D. 311, upon the death of the African primate, Mononian. The validity of this appointment was impugned by Donatus, stimulated, it is said, by the malicious intrigues of a woman named Lucilia, upon three grounds: 1. That the election had been irregular. 2. That the ordinance was null and void, having been performed by Felix, bishop of Apthunga, a traditor, that is, one of those who, in obedience to the edicts of Diocletian, had yielded to the civil power, and delivered up the sacred vessels used in places of worship, and even the Holy Scriptures. 3. That Caecilian had displayed markred hostility towards the victims of the late persecutions. These charges were brought under the consideration of a council of twenty bishops, who declared the see vacant, and accordingly the rival prelates repaired to Rome, each attended by ten leading ecclesiastics of his own faction. The cause was judged by a council composed of three Gallic and fifteen Italian bishops, who met on the 2nd of October, 313, and gave their decree in favour of Caecilian and Felix. An appeal was lodged with Constantine, who agreed to summon a second and more numerous council, which was held at Arles on the 1st of August, 314, when the decision of the council of Rome was confirmed. The struggle was, however, obstinately prolonged by fresh complaints on the part of the Donatists, who, after having been defeated before various tribunals and commissions to which the determination of the dispute was delegated by the supreme government, at length openly refused to submit, or to acknowledge any authority whatever, if hostile to their claims. The formidable schism which was the result of these proceedings is spoken of more fully under DONATUS. (Optatus, 1. 19, &c.)

CAECLILIANUS, DOMITIUS, an intimate friend of Thrasea, who informed him of his condemnation by the senate in A. D. 67. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 34.)

CAECLILIANUS, MA'GIUS, praetor, falsely accused of treason in A. D. 21, was acquitted, and his accusers punished. (Tac. Ann. iii. 37.)

CAECLILIIUS. 1. Q. CAECILIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 439. (Liv. iv. 16.)

2. Q. CAECILIUS, a Roman knight, the husband of Catulline's sister, who had taken no part in public affairs, was killed by Catiline himself in the time of Sulla. (Q. C. de Pett. Cons. 2; Ascon. in Top. Cons. p. 84, ed. Orelli.) This is perhaps the same Q. Caecilius who is mentioned in connexion with the trial of P. Gabinius, who was praetor in 69. (Cic. Divert. 20.) Zumpt remarks, that he can hardly have belonged to the noble family of the Metelli, as Cicero says that he was overborne by the influence and rank of Piso.

3. Q. CAECILIUS, a Roman knight, a friend of L. Lucullus, and the uncle of Atticus, acquired a large fortune by lending money on interest. The old usurer was of such a crabbed temper, that no one could put up with him except his nephew Atticus, who was in consequence adopted by him in his will, and obtained from him a fortune of ten millions of sesterces. He died in B. C. 87. (Nepos, Att. 5; Cic. ad Att. i. 12, ii. 19, 20, iii. 20.)

4. T. CAECILIUS, a centurion of the first rank (primi pilii) in the army of Aaron, was killed at the battle of Ilerda, B. C. 49. (Cass. B. C. i. 46.)

L. CAECILIUS. We generally find included among the writings of Lucanuntus a book divided into fifty-two chapters, entitled De Mortibus Persecutorum, containing an outline of the career of those emperors who displayed active hostility towards the church, an account of the death of each, together with a sketch of the different persecutions from Nero to Diocletian. The object of the narrative is to point out that the signal vengeance of God in every case overtook the enemies of the faith, and to deduce from this circumstance, from the preservation of the new religion amidst all the dangers by which it was surrounded, and all the attacks by which it was assailed, and from its final triumph, an assurance in favour of its heavenly origin. The work appears from internal evidence to have been composed after the victory of Constantine over Maxentius, and before his quarter with Licinius, that is to say, between a.d. 312 and 315. The text is corrupt and mutilated, and the statements which it contains must be received with a certain degree of caution, in consequence of the inflammatory tone in which they are delivered, and the high colouring and trimming employed throughout to suit the particular design proposed. But notwithstanding these drawbacks, the treatise is extremely valuable and is peculiarly famous as containing a contemporary record of the alleged vision of Constantine before the battle of the Milvian bridge, in consequence of which he ordered the soldiers to engrave upon their shields the well-known monogram representing the cross together with the initial letters of the name of Christ (c. 44).

This piece is altogether wanting in the earlier editions of Lactantius, and was first brought to light by Stephen Baluze, who printed it at Paris in his Miscellanea (vol. ii., 1679) from a very ancient MS. in the Bibliotheca Colbertina, bearing simply the inscription LUCII CECILI I INSCRIPT LIBER AD DONATUM CONCEF SORVM DE MORBIUS PERSECUTORVM. Baluze entertained no doubt that he had discovered the tract of Lactantius quoted by Hieronymus as De Persecutione Librum Unum, an opinion corroborated by the name prefixed [LACTANTIUS], by the date, by the dedication to Donatus, apparently the same person with the Donatus addressed in the discourse De Ira Dei, and by the general resemblance in style and expression, a series of considerations no one of which would be in itself conclusive, but which when combined form a strong chain of circumstantial evidence. Le Nourry, however, sought to prove that the production in question must be assigned to some unknown L. Caecilius altogether different from Lactantius, and published it at Paris in 1710 as "Ludii Cecilii Liber ad Donatum Consessimorum de Morbius Persecutorum hactenus Lucio Caecilio Firmiano Lactantio adscriptus, ad Colbertinum codicem denuo emendatus," to which is prefixed an elaborate dissertation. His ideas have been adopted to a certain extent by Pfaff, Walch, Le Clerc, and Gibbon, and controverted by modern critics seem upon the whole disposed to acquiesce in the original hypothesis of Baluze.

The most complete edition of the De Mortibus Persecutorum in a separate form, is that published at Utrecht in 1693, under the inspection of Bauldri, with a very copious collection of notes, forming one of the series of Variorum Classics in 8vo. Other editions are enumerated in the account given of the works of LACTANTIUS. [W.R.]

SEX. CAECILIUS. A Roman jurist of this name is occasionally cited in the Corpus Juris, and is suspected by some authors to be distinct from and earlier than Africanius. [AFRICANIUS, SEX. CAECILIUS.] In support of this opinion, not to mention the corrupt passage of Lampridius (Ann. Sex. 138), where it is stated that there is no proof, that the Sex. Caecilius Africanius to whom Julianus returned an answer upon a legal question (Dig. 35. tit. 3. § 4) was identical with Africanius. He may have been a private person, and distinct from the jurists Sex. Caecilius and Africanius. This inconclusive passage is the only connecting link between Africanius and Sex. Caecilius, for elsewhere in the Digest the name Africanius always appears alone. Africanius was probably rather later (say they) than Julianus, and could occasionally cite a. d. 315. (Dig. 12. tit. 6. s. 38; Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 45, pr.). On the other hand, Caecilius (they proceed) appears to be anterior to Africanius, for he is cited by Javolenus (Dig. 34. tit. 1. s. 64), who was the master of Julianus. (Dig. 40. tit. 2. s. 5.) Again, Sex. Caecilius is represented by Gallus as conversing with Favorinus, and is spoken of in the Noctes Atticae as a person deceased. "Sexus Caecilius, in disciplina juris atque legibus populi Romani noscendis interpretandique scientia, usu, nuctoritatique illustri fuit." (Gell. xx. 1, pr.) Now Favorinus is known to have flourished in the reign of Hadrian, and Gallus to have completed the Noctes Atticae before the death of Antoninus Pius. (A. d. 161.) The passage in Gallus which would make the conversation take place nearly 700 years after the laws of the Twelve Tables were enacted, must be, if not a false reading, an error or exaggeration; for at most little more than 600 years could have elapsed from a. u. c. 300 in the lifetime of Gallus. If 600 be read for 700, the scene would be brought at furthest to a period not far from the commencement (A. d. 138) of the reign of Antoninus Pius.

These arguments are not sufficient to destroy the probability arising from Dig. 35. tit. 3. s. 3. § 4, that Sex. Caecilius and Africanius are one person. In Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 64, some have proposed to read Caecilius instead of Caecilius, and thus get rid of the passage which is the principal ground for assigning an earlier date to Sex. Caecilius; but this mode of cutting the knot, though it is assisted by fair critical analogies, is unnecessary, for Javolenus, as we learn from Capitolinus (Auton. Pius, 12), was living in the reign of Antoninus Pius, and a contemporary of Javolenus and Julianus might easily cite the younger, and be cited by the elder of the two. The pupil in the master's lifetime may have acquired greater authority than the master.

To assist the inquirer in investigating this question—one of the most difficult and celebrated in the biography of Roman jurists—we subjoin a list of the passages in the Corpus Juris where Caecilius or Caecilius Sex. is cited:—Caecilius: Dig. 16. tit. 2. a. 1. § 7; 21. tit. 1. a. 14. § 3 (ad Caecilius); 21. tit. 1. a. 14. § 10; 24. tit. 1. a. 64; 35. tit. 2. s. 36. § 4; 48. tit. 5. s. 2. § 5; Cod. 7. tit. 7. s. 1. pr. Sex. Caecilius: Dig. 54. tit. 1. a. 9. § 33; 35. tit. 2. a. 9. § 3 (qu. Sex. Aelius; compare Gall. iv. 14); 35. tit. 1. a. 71. pr.; 40. tit. 9. a. 12. § 2; 40. tit. 9. a. 12. § 6; 48. tit. 5. a. 13. § 1.

A jurist of the name Sex. Thrus is thirly quoted by Ulpian in the Digest (29. tit. 5. a. 1. § 27; 30. tit. 5. a. 32. pr.; 42. tit. 4. a. 7. § 17). Whether this Sex. Thrus be identical with Sex. Caecilius must be a matter of doubt. There may have been a Sex. Thrus, known, like Gaius, by a single name. There are, moreover, several jurists with the praenomen Sex. named in the Digest, e.g. Sex. Aelius Sex. Pedius, Sex. Pomponius. That these were two jurists named Pomponius has been inferred from Dig. 28. tit. 5. a. 41, where Pomponius appears to quote Sex. Pomponius. From this and from the other passages where Sex. Pomponius is named in full (Dig. 24. tit. 3. a. 44; 29. tit. 2.
CAECILIUS.

s. 30, § 6), the prænomen Sextus has been supposed to be distinctive of the elder Pompónius. But that Sextus, alone, did not designate any one named Pompónius is clear from the phrase "tam Sextus quam Pompónius" in Dig. 30. tit. s. 92, pr., and from the similar phrase "Sextum quoque et Pompónium" occurring in Vit. Frgm. § 98, though the prænomen only is taken by the last editor (in the Bonn Corp. Rom. Anteject. i. p. 255), has thought proper to omit the et. From Dig. 42. tit. 4. a. 7, § 19, Vit. Frgm. § 88, and Galus, ii. 218, we infer, that Sextus was contemporary with Juventius Cæsarius, the son, and that some of his works were digested by Julianus. If, then, Sextus is identified with Cæcilius Cæcilius and Africanus, Africanus must have lived rather earlier than is usually supposed, and can scarcely have been a pupil of Julianus. That, however, a pupil should have been annotated by his preceptor is not without example, if we understand in its ordinary sense the expression "Servius apul Alfenum notat," in Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 35, § 8. (See contra, Otto, in Theol. Phil. Rom. v. 35, p. 6.)

A jurist named Publicus Cæcilius is spoken of by Rutlius (Vita J. Curti, c. 45) as one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius; but the name Publicus Cæcilius is a mere conjectural emendation for Publicius Cæcilius, who figures in the text of Pompónius, Dig. 1. tit. 2. l. sm. § 44. The conjecture was invited by the unusual blending of two family names in Publicius Cæcilius. (Menagius, Amoen. Jur. cc. 22, 23; Heineccius, de Sexto Pompónio, Open, ed. Genev. i. 77.) [J. T. G.] CÆCILIUS (Kauláinos or Kaulánaos) of Argos, is mentioned by Athenaeus (l. p. 13) among the writers on the art of fishing; but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CÆCILIUS BION. [Bion.]

CÆCILIUS CALACTIUS (Kaulános Kalaκτινος), or, as he was formerly, though erroneously, surnamed CALANTIUS, a Greek rhetorician, who lived at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a native of Cale Acte in Sicily (whence his name Calactinus). His parents are said by Suidas to have been slaves of the Jewish religion; and Cæcilius himself, before he had obtained the Roman franchise, is said to have borne the name Archagathus. He is mentioned by Quintilian (ii. 1. § 16, comp. iii. 6, § 47, v. 10, § 7, ix. 12, § 3, §§ 38, 46, 89, 91, 97) along with Dionysius of Halicarnassus as a distinguished Greek rhetorician and grammarian. Respecting the sphere of his activity at Rome, and his success as a teacher of rhetoric, nothing is known; but, from the title of one of his works, we see that he studied Roman oratory along with that of the Greeks. He wrote a great number of works on rhetoric, grammar, and also on historical subjects. All these works are now lost; but they were in high repute with the rhetoricians and critics of the imperial period. (Plut. Dem. 3, Vit. X Orat. pp. 632, 633, 636, 636, 849; Phot. Bibl. pp. 20, 485, 486, 489, ed. Bekker.) Some of his works were of a theoretical character, others were commentaries on the Greek orators, and others again were of a grammatical or historical kind. The following list is made up from that given by Suidas, and from some other of the fragments of Holler's list of Cæcilius's works. (Suid; Quintil. l. c.) 2. Peri σχημάτων. (Alex. de Figur. ii. 2; Tiber. de Figur. passim.) 3. Peri χαρακτήρων τῶν δικὰ δητορῶν. 4. Peri Αντωνίου

CAECILIUS CORNFUTUS. [Cornutus.]

CAECILIUS CYPRIANUS. [Cyprianus.]

Q. CAECILIUS EPIRIO'TA, a grammarian, born at Tarsus, was a freedman of T. Pompónius Atticus, and taught the daughter of his patron, who was afterwards married to M. Agrippa. But, suspected by Atticus of entertaining designs upon his daughter, he was dismissed. He then lived on the most intimate terms with Cornélius Gallus; and, after the death of the latter, he opened a school at Rome for young men, and is said to have been the first to dispute in Latin extempor, and to give lectures upon Virgil and other modern poets. (Suet. Ill. Gram. 16.)

CAECILIUS BUTYCHIDES. [Butychides.]

CAECILIUS NATA'LIS. [Natalis.]

CAECILIUS RUFUS'NUS. [Rufinus.]

CAECILIUS SIMPLEX. [Simplex.]

CAECILIUS STATIUS, a Roman comic poet, the immediate predecessor of Terence, was, according to the accounts preserved by Aulus Gellius (iv. 20) and Hieronymus (in Euseb. Chron. Olym. c. 2), by birth an Insubrian Gaul, and a native of Milan. Being a slave he bore the servile appellation of Statius, which was afterwards, probably when he received his freedom, converted into a sort of cognomen, and he became known as Cæcilius Statius. His death happened c. 163, one year after that of Ennius and two years before the representation of the Andria, which had been previously submitted to his inspection and had excited his warm admiration. (Sueton. Vit. Terent. 14.)

The names of at least forty dramas by Cæcilius have been preserved, together with a considerable number of fragments, but all of them are extremely brief, the two longest extending one (ap. Aul. Gell. 14. 14) to nineteen lines, and the other (Gesch. der Griech. Beredtnik. Westermann, § 88, note 12) to twelve only. Hence we must rest satisfied with collecting and recording the opinions of those who had the means of forming an estimate of his powers, without attempting to judge independently. The Romans themselves, then, seem to agree in placing Cæcilius in the first rank of his own department, classing him for the most part with Plautus and Terence. "Cæcilius excels in the arrangement of his plots, Terentius in the development of character, Plautus in dialogue;" and again, "None rival Titinius and Terentius in depicting character, but Trabea and Atilius part with Plautus and Terence. "Cæcilius excels of his own department, classing him for the most..." A jurist named Publicus Cæcilius is spoken of by Rutlius (Vita J. Curti, c. 45) as one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius; but the name... (See contra, Otto, in Theol. Phil. Rom. v. 35, p. 6.) says Cicero (De Optin. Gen. Div. i.), although in other passages he censures his latinity as impure, (Ad Att. viii. 3, Brut. c. 74. ) The dictum of the fashionable critics of the Augustan age is embodied by Horace in the line (Ep. ii. 1. 59). "Vineere Caecilius gravitate, Terentius arte." Velleius declares (ii. 17), that the "chams of Latin wit were brilliantly displayed by Caecilius, Terentius, and Afranius." "We are most lame in comedy, although the ancients extol Caecilius," is the testimony of Quintilian (x. 1. § 99), while Vulc- tius Sedigitus in an epigram preserved in the Noctes Atticene (xv. 24) pronounces Caecilius first among the nine comic poets there enumerated, the second place being assigned to Plautus, and the sixth to Terence.

This popularity, however, was not acquired at once, for the speaker of the prologue to the Hecym, while he apologises for reproducing a piece which had already twice failed, reminds the audience that although the works of Caecilius were now listened to by pleasure, several had at first been driven off the stage, while others had with difficulty kept their ground. The whole of the forty plays alluded to above, as far as we can gather from their titles, belong to the class of Palliatae, that is, were free translations or adaptations of the works of Greek writers of the new comedy. There is a curious chapter in Aulus Gellius (ii. 23), where a compari- son is instituted between certain passages in the Plciun of Caecilius and the corresponding por- tions of the drama by Menander, from which it was derived. We here gain some knowledge of the manner in which these transla- tions were performed, and we feel strongly impressed with the pride possessed by the Latin imitator when placed in juxtaposition with the sparkling brilliancy of the rich and racy original. To adopt the quaint simile of the grammarian, they resemble each other in the same degree as the sparkling brilliancy of the rich and racy original.

The argument of this oration, which is of a purely legal nature, cannot be understood without a knowledge of the Roman interdict. It is discussed at length by Keller in the second book of his *Semestria ad M. Tullium Cicernem Libri VI." Turici, 1843. He was probably the father of the following, and not the same person, as is usually supposed. (Comp. Cic. ad Fam. vi. 9; Orelli, Oenon. Tell. s. n.)

2. A. CAECINA, son of the preceding, published a libellous work against Caesar, and was in conse- quence compelled to go into exile after the battle of Pharsalia, b. c. 48. In order to obtain Caesar's pardon, he wrote another work entitled Querelae, which he sent to Cicero for revision. In the collection of Cicero's letters there is rather a long one from Caecina to Cicero, and three of Cicero's to Caecina. (Suet. Caes. 75; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 5-8.) In 47 Caecina was in Asia, and was recommended by Cicero to the proconsul P. Servilius, the go- vernor of the province (ad Fam. xii. 66): from thence he crossed over to Sicily, as was recom- mended by Cicero to Furuvianus, the governor of Sicily. (Ad Fam. vi. 9.) From Sicily he went into Africa, and, upon the defeat of the Pompeians there in the same year, b. c. 46, surrendered to Caesar, who spared his life. (Hist. Bell. Afr. 89.)

Caecina was the author of a work on the "Etruscan Disciplina," which is referred to by Pliny as one of his authorities for his second book; and it is prob- ably from this work that Seneca quotes (Quaest. Nat. ii. 29) some remarks of Caecina upon the different kinds of lightning. Cicero tells us (ad Fam. vi. 6. § 3), that Caecina was trained by his father in the knowledge of the Humanities, and spoke to him other things, a matter of ten thousand lines of oratorical powers. Seneca (Quaest. Nat. ii. 56) says, that he would have had some reputation in eloquence if he had not been thrown into the shade by Cicero. This must be the same Caecina whose work on the Etruscan Discipline is quoted in the Veronese scholia on the Aeneid (x. 198, ed. Mat.)

3. CAECINA of Volaterrae, one of the ancient cities of Etruria. It seems either to have derived its name from, or given it to, the river Caccina, which flows by the town. Persons of this name are first mentioned in the Museum of Paris. The family was di- vided into several branches, and we accordingly find on the funeral urns the cognomens Caesio and Tlapuni: in Latin inscriptions we also meet with the surnames Quadratus and Placidus; and various others occur below. (Müller, Etrusk. vol. i. p. 416, &c.) The most important persons of this name are:

1. A. CAECINA, of Volaterrae, whom Cicero de-CAECINA.

Caecina was a great favourite with the soldiers. His personal presence was commanding; he was tall in stature, comely in person, and upright in gait; he possessed an admirable ability in speaking; and, as he was ambitious, he used every means to win the favour of his troops. After persuading them to espouse the side of Vitellius, he set out at the beginning of the year (A.D. 69), on his march towards Italy at the head of an army of 30,000 men, the main strength of which consisted in one legion, the twenty first. In his march through Switzerland, he ravaged the country of the Helvetians in a frightful manner, because they had refused to own the authority of Vitellius. He crossed the Great St. Bernard and marched through northern Italy without meeting with any opposition. Upon entering Italy, he observed greater discipline than he had done previously, and prevented his troops from plundering the country; but his dress gave great offence to the citizens, because he wore in receiving them a military cloak of various colours, and also trousers, which were reckoned as characteristic of barbarians. People were also scandalized at his wife Salonina riding as it were in state upon a beautiful horse, and dressed in purple.

As Placentia was garrisoned by the troops of Otho, who had now succeeded Galba, Caecina crossed the Po, and proceeded to attack that city. He was, however, repulsed in his attack with considerable loss, and therefore recrossed the Po and retired towards Verona, where a conference was called by Suetonius Paulinus and Celsius, the former a general of great skill and military experience, who frustrated all the plans of Caecina. Anxious to retrieve his honour before he was joined by Fabius Valens, who was advancing with the other division of the German army, Caecina determined to make a vigorous effort to gain some decisive advantage. He accordingly laid an ambush at a place called Castorium, twelve miles from Cremona; but his plans were betrayed to the enemy, and he suffered a signal defeat. Shortly afterwards, he was joined by Fabius Valens, and their united forces then gained a victory over Otho's troops at Bedriacum, which established the power of Vitellius in Italy. The unhappy country, however, was now exposed to pillage in every direction, as neither Caecina nor Valens attempted to restrain his soldiers, the former through desire of preserving his popularity with them, the latter because he himself took part in the plunder.

After obtaining possession of Rome, Caecina and Valens were advanced to the consulship, and entered upon the office on the 1st of September, A.D. 69. Meantime, Antonius Primus, who had declared in favour of Vespasian, was preparing to invade Italy, and Caecina was accordingly sent against him. Caecina met with Antonius in the neighbourhood of Verona, and might with his numerous army easily crushed him; but he resolved to desert the cause of Vitellius, and concerted measures for that purpose with Lucullus Bassus, who mediated the same treachery and had the command of Vitellius's fleet. But when he attempted to persuade his soldiers to take the oath of allegiance to Vespasian, they rose against him and put him in irons. In this state of things, they were attacked by Antonius, who conquered them near Bedriacum, and forthwith proceeded to assault Cremona, where most of the conquered had taken refuge. Alarmed at the success of Antonius, Caecina was released by his soldiers, and sent to Antonius to intercede on their behalf. Antonius despatched Caecina to Vespasian, who treated him with great honour.

When the news of his treachery reached Rome, he was deprived of his censorship, and Roscius Regulus elected in his stead. (Tac. Hist. i. 52, 53, 61, 67—70, i. 20—25, 30, 41, 44, 71, 99, 100, ii. 13, 14, 31; Dion Cass. lvi. 10, 14; Joseph. B. J. iv. 11. § 3.)

Nothing more is heard of Caecina till the latter end of the reign of Vespasian (A. D. 70), when he entered into a plot against the emperor, and was deprived of his consulship, and Roscius Regulus elected in his stead. (Tac. Hist. ii. 63.) According to Aurelius Victor (Epit. 10), Caecina was put to death by Titus because he suspected him of intriguing with his mistress Berenice.

10. Lucius CAECINA, a senator attached to Otho's party, A. D. 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 63), may perhaps be the Lecina Caecina, a man of proconsular rank, mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xx. 18. § 76.)

CAECINA, DECIVIUS ALBINUS, a Roman satirist who flourished under Augustus and Honorius. Rutilius Namatianus in his Itinerarii (i. 599) addresses a certain Decius, a man of high station, whom he styles "Lucilli nobile pignum," and whose father he pronounces to be not inferior as a poet to Turnus and Juvenal. But this Decius, the son, is supposed to be the same person with the Decius, son of Albinius, introduced by Macrobius as conversing with Postumianus (Saturn. i. 2, init.), and Decius the father is identified with Caecinian Albinius, represented in the same chapter of the Saturnalia as the friend and companion of Aurelius Victor. Moreover, it is maintained that the elder Decius, the satirist, is the individual to whom several of the epistles of Symmachus are addressed (Ep. vii. 35—65, comp. viii. 21), that he was praefectus urbi in a. d. 67. (Ep. iv. 13, 14, 31; Dion Cass. lvi. 10, 14; Joseph. B. J. iv. 11. § 3.)

The web of conjecture by which all these facts are connected has been very ingeniously woven by Fabricius, who have included a corrupting under Arcadius and Honorius. Rutilius Namatianus in his Itinerarii (i. 599) addresses a certain Decius, a man of high station, whom he styles "Lucilli nobile pignum," and whose father he pronounces to be not inferior as a poet to Turnus and Juvenal. But this Decius, the son, is supposed to be the same person with the Decius, son of Albinius, introduced by Macrobius as conversing with Postumianus (Saturn. i. 2, init.), and Decius the father is identified with Caecinian Albinius, represented in the same chapter of the Saturnalia as the friend and companion of Aurelius Victor. Moreover, it is maintained that the elder Decius, the satirist, is the individual to whom several of the epistles of Symmachus are addressed (Ep. vii. 35—65, comp. viii. 21), that he was praefectus urbi in a. d. 67. (Ep. iv. 13, 14, 31; Dion Cass. lvi. 10, 14; Joseph. B. J. iv. 11. § 3.)

CAECUS, a surname of Ap. Claudius, censor B. C. 312 and consul in 297. His life is related under Claudius, as he is better known under the latter name.
be invited to become their general, and according to another account he himself carried to Camillus the decree of the senate appointing him to the command. (Liv. v. 45, 46; Appian, Civ. 5.)

3. C. Caecilius, one of the legates of the consul L. Papirius Cursor, commanded the cavalry in the great battle with the Samnites in B. c. 293. (Liv. x. 40.)

4. Q. Caecilius Q. f. Q. n., consul B. c. 266, died in his consulship, and was succeeded in the office by M. Atilius Regulus. (Fast. Capit.)

CAELIDIVS, two mythical personages in Virgil's Aeneid (ix. 360, x. 747). [L. S.]

CAELIUS or CAELIUS VIBENNA, the leader of an Etruscan army, who is said to have come to Rome at the invitation of one of the early Roman kings, and to have settled with his troops on the hill called after him the Caelian. In whose reign however he came, was differently stated, as Tacitus observes. (Ann. iv. 65.) Tacitus himself places his arrival at Rome in the reign of Tarquinus Priscus, and this is in accordance with a manuscript passage of Festus (De lingua Romana), in which, moreover, Caeled and Vibenna are spoken of as brothers. Festus, however, in another passage (e. n. Caelius Mono), Dionysius (ii. 36), and Varro (L. L. v. 46, ed. Müller), state that Caelus came to Rome in the age of Romulus to assist him against the Sabines. The Etruscan story, which is preserved in the speech of the emperor Claudius, of which considerable fragments were discovered at Lyons, differs considerably from the preceding ones. According to the Etruscan account, Servius Tullius, afterwards king of Rome, was originally a follower of Caeles Vivena, whose fortunes he shared, and that afterwards overcame by a multitude of disasters he migrated to Rome with the remains of the army of Caeled, and occupied the Caelian hill, which he called after the name of his former commander. It is probable that these different accounts refer to two distinct Etruscan migrations to Rome, and that Caeles Vibenna is thus represented as the leader of each. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 381, &c; Müller, Etrusker, vol. i. p. 116, &c.)

CAELESTIUS, an historian of the Empire referred to by Trebellius Pollio in the biography of the younger Valerian. We know nothing more about him. [W. R.]

CAELIA or COELIA, the third wife of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced on account of barrenness. (Plut. Sull. 6.)

CAELIA or COELIA GENES, plebeian. In manuscripts the name is usually written Caelius, while on coins it generally occurs in the form of Coelius or Ceilius, though we find on one coin L. Caels Tux. (Fechel, v. pp. 156, 175.) From the similarity of the names, Caelius is frequently confounded with Caelius. The gens traced its origin to the Etruscan leader, Caeles Vibenna, in the time of the Roman kings, but no members of it obtained the higher offices of the state till the beginning of the first century B. C.; the first who obtained the consulship was C. Caels Calidus in B. C. 94. There were only two family-names in this gens, Caelsius and Rubius; the other cognomina are personal surnames, chiefly of freedmen. For those without a surname see CAELIUS.

CAELIOMONTA'NUS (not Coeliomontanus), the name of a family of the Virgin gens. Almost all the members of this gens had the surname Tricostus, and the name of Caeliomontanus was undoubtedly given to the family dwelling on the Caelian hill, to distinguish it from others of the same gens.

1. T. Virginius T'riestcus Caeliomontanus, consul B. C. 496 with A. Postumius Albus Regilena, in which year, according to some annalists, the battle at the lake Regillus was fought. According to the same accounts, Postumius resigned the consulsship because he suspected his colleague, and was afterwards made dictator. The battle, however, is usually placed two years earlier. [Ablinus, No. 1.] (Liv. ii. 21; Dionys. vi. 2.)

2. A. Virginius A. F. P. Triestcus Caeliomontanus, called by Dionysius A. Virgininus Montanus, consul B. C. 494, the year in which the plebs seceded to the Sacred Mountain. Previous to the secession he had marched against the Volsci, whom he had defeated in battle, and had taken one of their chief towns, Velitana. He is mentioned by Dionysius as one of the ten envoys sent by the senate to treat with the plebs. (Liv. ii. 20–23; Dionys. vii. 34, 42, 69; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orell.)

3. A. Virginius A. F. A. N. Triestcus Caeliomontanus, son of No. 2, consul in 469, marched against the Aequi, whom he eventually defeated through the valour of his soldiers, though his army was nearly destroyed in consequence of his own negligence. (Liv. vi. 63; Dionys. ix. 56; Dion. xli. 70.)

4. Sp. Virginus A. P. A. N. Triestcus Caeliomontanus, son of No. 2, consul B. C. 456, in whose consulship the ludi saculares are said to have been celebrated the second time. (Liv. iii. 31; Dionys. x. 31; Dion. xii. 4; Censor, de Die Nat. 17.)

5. T. Virginus T. F. Triestcus Caeliomontanus, consul B. C. 448. (Liv. iii. 65; Dionys. xi. 51; Dion. xii. 27.)

CAELIUS or COELIUS. 1. M. Caelsi, tribune of the plebs in the time of M. Cato, the censor, whom Cato attacked in a speech, in which among other hard things he said, that Caelsi would speak or hold his tongue for a piece of bread. (Gell. i. 15.)

2. L. Caelsius, commanded as legate in Illyricum in the war against Perseus, B. C. 169, and was defeated in an attempt which he made to obtain possession of Scasina in the country of the Penestae, a town which was garrisoned by the Macedonians. (Liv. xili. 21.)

3. P. Caelsius, was placed in the command of Piacentia by the consul Q. Octavius, B. C. 87, and when the town was taken by Cnatus's army, he caused himself to be put to death by L. Petronius, that he might not fall into the hands of the Marian party. (Val. Max. iv. 7. § 5.)

4. P. Caelsius, perhaps a son of the preceding, praetor with Verres, B. C. 74. (Cic. C. Fferr. i. 50.)

5. M. Caelsius, a Roman knight, from whom Verres took away, at Liumbueum, several silver vases. (Cic. Fferr. iv. 47.) As Cnus says that this Caesius was still young at this time, B. C. 71, he may be the same M. Caelsius who is mentioned in the epitaph of Plazaus, B. C. 59. (Cic. pro Place. 4.)

6. C. Caelsius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 51, put his veto with several of his colleagues upon the decrees of the senate directed against Caesar (Cael. ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8.)
CAESAR.

7. Q. Caelius, a friend and follower of M. Antonius, attacked by Cicero. (Phil. xiii. 2, 12)
8. Caelius, an usurer, with whom Cicero had some dealings. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 5, 6, vii. 3, xiii. 3)

CAELIUS VINCIANUS. [Vincianus]

CAENIUS, the concubine of Vespasian, was originally a freedwoman of Antonia, the mother of the emperor Claudius. After the death of his wife Flavia Domitilla, Vespasian took her to live with him and treated her almost as his legal wife. She had very great influence with Vespasian, and acquired immense wealth from the presents presented to her by those who wished to gain the favour of the emperor. Domitian, however, treated her with some contempt. After her death, Vespasian kept to his by those who wished to gain the favour of the emperor. Domitian, however, treated her with some contempt. After her death, Vespasian kept many concubines in her place. (Dion Cass. lxvL)

C. and L. CAEPA'SII, two brothers, contemporaries of the orator Hortensius, obtained the quaestorship, though they were unknown men, by means of their oratory. They were very industrious and laborious, but their oratory was of rather a rude and unpolished kind. (Cic. Brut. 69, pro Cluent. 20, 21; Julius Victor, p. 248, ed. Orcli; Quintil. iv. 2. § 19, vi. 1. § 41, 3. § 39.)

CAEPIAS was, according to Dion Cassius (xiv. 1), the surname of C. Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus. This cognomen, however, is not mentioned by any other writer, nor even by Dion Cassius himself in any other passage.

CAEPIO, the name of a patrician family of the Servilia gens.

STEMMA CAEPIONUM.

2. Cn. Servilius Caepio, Cos. b. c. 203.

4. Q. Fabius Maximus Servillianus, Cos. b. c. 142.
6. Q. Servilius Caepio, Cos. b. c. 140.
7. Q. Servilius Caepio, Cos. b. c. 106.

8. Q. Servilius Caepio, Quest. b. c. 100, married Livia, the sister of M. Livius Drusus.

9. Q. Servilius Caepio, Tribunus Militum, b. c. 72.
10. Servilia, married M. Junius Brutus. [Brutus, No. 20.]
11. Servilia, married L. Licinius Lucullus, Cos. b. c. 74.

12. Q. Servilius Caepio Brutus, the murderer of C. Julius Caesar. The son of No. 10, but adopted by No. 9. [Brutus, No. 21.]

1. CN. SERVILIUS CN. P. CN. N. CAEPIO, consul b. c. 253, in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, C. Sempronius Blaesus, to the coast of Africa. For an account of this expedition, see Blaesus, No. 1.
2. CN. SERVILIUS CN. P. CN. N. CAEPIO, was probably a grandson, and not a son, of No. 1. He was elected pontiff in the place of C. Papirius Maso, b. c. 213; circule adjule in 207, when he celebrated the Roman games three times; praetor in 205, when he obtained the city jurisdiction; and consul in 203. In his consulship he had Brutus assigned to him as his province, and he was the last Roman general who fought with Hannibal in Italy. The engagement took place in the neighbourhood of Crotona, but no particulars of it are preserved. When Hannibal quitted Italy, Caepio passed over into Sicily, with the intention of crossing from thence to Africa. In order to prevent this, the senate, who feared that the consul would not obey their commands, created a dictator, P. Sulpicius Galba, who recalled Caepio to Italy. In b. c. 192, Caepio was sent with other legates into Greece, to encourage the Roman allies in the prospect of the war with Antiochus. He died in the pestilence in 174. (Liv. xxv. 2, xxviii. 10, 38, 46, xxxix. 39, xxx. 1, 19, 24, xxxix. 23, xli. 26.)

3. CN. SERVILIUS CN. P. CN. N. CAEPIO, son of
No. 2 (Liv. xli. 26) curule aedile. In c. 179, when he celebrated the Roman games over again, on account of prodigies which had occurred; and praetor in c. 174, when he obtained the province of Further Spain. On his return to Italy, he was one of the ambassadors sent into Macedonia to reconcile the Roman alliance with Perseus; and he was consul in 169 with Q. Marcus Philippus. Caepio remained in Italy; his colleague had Macedonia as his province. (Liv. xl. 59, xli. 26, xlii. 25, xliii. 13, 14, 17.; Cic. Brut. 20, de Statu, 5.)

4. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, son of No. 3, consul in c. 142, was adopted by Q. Fabius Maximus. [Maximus.]

5. CN. Servilius Cn. F. Cn. N. Caepio, son of No. 3, was consul c. 141 (Cic. ad Att. xii. 5, de Fin. ii. 10), and censor in 125. In his censorship one of the aqueducts, the Aqua Topalis, for supplying Rome with water, was constructed. (Front. de Aquaeq. 8.; Cic. Verr. i. 55.; Vell. Pat. ii. 10.)

6. CN. Servilius Cn. F. Cn. N. Caepio, son of No. 3, consul c. 140 with Q. Laelius (Cic. Brut. 43.; Obsequ. 82), succeeded his brother, Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, in the conduct of the war against Viriathus in Lusitania. His brother had made a treaty of peace with Viriathus, which had been confirmed by the senate; but Caepio, by representing that the treaty was unfavourable to the interests of Rome, induced the senate to allow him at first to injure Viriathus, as far as he could, secretly, and finally to declare open war against him. Hereupon, Viriathus sent two of his most faithful friends to Caepio to offer terms of peace; but the consul persuaded them, by promises and great rewards, to assassinate their master. Accordingly, on their return to their own party, they murdered Viriathus while he was asleep in his tent, and afterwards fled to Caepio. But this murder did not put an immediate stop to the war. After burying the corpse of Viriathus with great magnificence, his soldiers elected Tantalus as their general, who undertook an expedition against Seguntum. Repulsed from thence, he crossed the Baetis, closely pursued by Caepio, and, despairing of success, at length surrendered with all his forces, to the Roman general. Caepio deprived them of their arms, and assigned them a certain portion of land, that they might not turn robbers from want of the necessities of life. (Appian. Hisp. 70, 75, 76.; Liv. Epit. 54.; Flor. ii. 17.; Eutrop. iv. 16.; Oros. v. 4.; Vell. Pat. ii. 1.; Val. Max. ix. 6. § 4.; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 71.; Diod. xxxii. Ecl. 4.) Caepio treated his soldiers with great cruelty and severity, which rendered him so unpopular, that he was nearly killed by his cavalry on one occasion. (Dion Cass. Frag. xiii. p. 33, ed. Reimaz.)

The two last-mentioned brothers, Nos. 5 and 6, are classed by Cicero (Brut. 23) among the Roman orators. He says, that they assisted their clients much by their advice and oratory, but still more by their authority and influence. They appeared as witnesses against Q. Pompeius. (Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1.; Cic. pro Font. 7.)

7. Q. Servilius Q. F. Cn. N. Caepio, son of No. 6, was praetor about c. 110, and obtained the province of Further Spain, as we learn from the triumphal Fasti, that he triumphed over the Lusitaniuns, as praetor, in c. 108. His triumph is mentioned by Valerius Maximus (vi. 9. § 15); but Eutropius (iv. 27) is the only writer, as far as we are aware, who refers to his victories in Lusitania. He was consul, c. 106, with C. Attilius Sciarus, and proposed a law for restoring the judicium to the senators, of which they had been deprived by the Sempronius lex of C. Grnechus. That this was the object of Caepio's law, appears tolerably certain from a passage of Tacitus (Ann. xii. 60); though many modern writers have inferred, from Julius Obsequens (c. 101), that his law opened the judicium to the senate and the equestrians in common. It seems, however, that this law was repealed shortly afterwards.

As the Cumbr and Tunitmes were threatening Italy, Caepio received the province of Galla Narbonensis. The inhabitants of Tolosa, the capital of the Tectosagae, had revolted to the Cimbri; and it was one of the most wealthy cities in those districts, and possessed a temple which was celebrated for its immense treasures, Caepio eagerly availed himself of the pretext which the inhabitants had given him to enrich himself by the plunder both of the city and the temple. The wealth which he thus acquired was enormous; but he was thought to have paid for it dearly, as the subsequent destruction of his army and his own unhappy fate were regarded as a divine punishment for his sacrilegious act. Hence too arose the proverb, "Aurum Tolosannum habet." (Strab. iv. p. 108.; Dion Cass. Frag. xviii. p. 41.; Gall. iii. 9.; Justin. xxviii. 3.; Flor. ii. 17.; Eutrop. iv. 16.; Oros. v. 15.) He was continued in his command in Gaul in the following year (c. 105), in which some writers place the sack of Tolosa; and, that there might be a still stronger force to oppose the Cimbri, the consul Cn. Mallius, or Manlius, was sent with another consular army into Galla Narbonensis. As however Caepio and Mallius could not agree, they divided the province between them, one having the country west, and the other the country east, of the Rhone. Soon afterwards, M. Aurelius Scarrus was defeated by the Cumbr, and Mallius sent for Caepio, that they might unite their forces to oppose the common enemy. Caepio at first refused to come, but afterwards, fearing lest Mallius should reap all the glory by defeating the Cimbri, he crossed the Rhone and marched towards Gaul. Still, however, he would hold no communication with him; he encamped separately; and that he might have an opportunity of finishing the war himself, he pitched his camp between the consul and the enemy. At this juncture, with such a formidable enemy in their front, the utmost prudence and unanimity were needed by the Roman generals: their discord was fatal. The Roman soldiers saw this, and compelled Caepio, against his will, to unite his forces with those of Mallius. But this did not mend matters. The discord of Mallius and Caepio increased more and more, and they appear to have separated again before they were attacked by the Cimbri, as Florus speaks of the defeat of Mallius and Caepio as two separate events. But whether they were attacked together or separately, the result was the same. Both armies were utterly defeated; 80,000 soldiers and 40,000 camp-followers perished; only ten men are said to have escaped the slaughter. It was one of the most complete defeats which the Romans had ever sustained; and the day on which it happened, the 6th of October, became one of the black days in the Roman calendar. (Dion Cass. Frag. xcviii. xcv. pp. 41, 42.; Liv. Epit. 67.; Oros. v. 16.; Sall. Jug. 114.; Flor. iii. 3.; Tac.
CÆPIO.

Cæpio. Germ. 37; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Val. Max. iv. 7. § 3; Plut. Mor. 19, Sect. 3, Locull. 37.

Cæpio survived the battle, but was deprived of the imperium by the people. Ten years afterwards (C. 95) he was brought to trial by the tribune C. Norbanus on account of his misconduct in this war, and although he was defended by the orator L. Licinius Crassus, who was consul in that year (Cic. Brut. 44), and by many others of the Roman aristocracy, he was condemned and his property confiscated. He himself was cast into prison, where according to one account he died, and his body, mangled by the common executioner, was afterwards exposed to view on the Gemonian steps.

But according to the more generally received account, he escaped from prison through the assistance of the tribune L. Antistius Regimius, and lived in exile at Smyrna. (Val. Max. iv. 7. § 3; Cic. Brut. 44.) But according to the more generally received account, he escaped from prison through the assistance of the tribune L. Antistius Regimius, and lived in exile at Smyrna. (Val. Max. iv. 7. § 3; Cic. Brut. 44.)

9. Q. Servilius Cæpio, son of No. 7, was a tribune of the soldiers in the war with Sertorius, B. c. 72. He died shortly afterwards at Aenus in Thrace, on his road to Asia. He is called the brother of Cato Uticensis, because his mother Livia had been married previously to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis. (Plut. Cat. Min. 8, 11.)

10. 11. Servilias. [Servilia.]

12. Q. Servilius Cæpio Brutus. [Brutus, No. 21.]

13. Q. Servilius Cæpio, the father of Servilia, the wife of Claudius, perished by shipwreck. Who he was is uncertain. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 20.)

14. Q. Servilius Cæpio, of Pomponius' support in his consulship (b. c. 59) against Bibulus. He had been betrothed to Caesar's daughter Julia, but was obliged to give her up in favour of Pompey. As a compensation for her loss, he received the promise of Pompey's daughter, who had likewise been betrothed to Faustus Sulla. (Appian, B. C. ii. 14; Suet. Cæs. 21; Plut. Cæs. 14, Pomp. 47; comp. Dion Cass. xxxviii. 9.)

Cæpio, Faunius, conspired with Murena against Augustus in B. c. 22. He was accused of treason (suchestas) by Tiberius, and condemned by the judges in his absence, as he did not stand his trial, and was shortly afterwards put to death. (Dion Cass. iv. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 91; Suet. Aug. 12; Cic. de fin. 5.)

Cæpio Crispinus, quaestor in Bithynia, accused Granius Marcellus, the governor of that province, of treason in A.D. 15. From this time he became one of the state informers under Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 74.) He may be the same as the Cæpio mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 4. s. 10), who lived in the reign of Tiberius, and seems to have written a work on botany.

Cærellia, a Roman lady of the time of Cicero, who was distinguished for her requirements and a great love of philosophical pursuits. She was connected with Cicero by friendship, and studied his philosophical writings with great zeal. She was a woman of considerable property, and had large possessions in Asia. These estates and their procurators were strongly recommended, in B. c. 46, by Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 72) to the care of P. Servilius. Cicero, in his recommendatory letter, speaks of her as an intimate friend, though, on other occasions, he seems to be rather inclined to sneer at her. (Ad. Att. xii. 51, xiii. 21, 22, xiv. 19, xv. 1, 26.) Q. Fufius Calenus charges Cicero with having, in his old age, had an adulterous connexion with Cærellia. (Dion Cass. xiv. 16.) How far this charge may be true, it is not easy to say; the only facts which are attested beyond a doubt are:

On the breaking out of the social war in the following year, B. c. 90, Cæpio again accused his old enemy Scævus under the provisions of the Varian lex, which had been passed to bring all to trial who had been instrumental in causing the revolt of the allies. (Cic. pro Scaev. 1; Ascon. in Scaev. p. 22.) Cæpio took an active part in this war, in which he served as the legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus, and upon the death of the latter he received, in conjunction with C. Marius, the command of the consular army. Cæpio at first gained some success, but was afterwards decoyed into an ambush by Pompey, the leader of the enemy's army, who had pretended to revolt to him, and he lost his life in consequence. (Auc. 90.) (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 44; Liv. Epit. 79.)

Servilius Cæpio, quaestor urbano in B. C. 100. [Servilia.]

Servilius Cæpio, quaestor urbanus in B. C. 100. He may have been the son of No. 7, but as the latter in all probability obtained the consulship at the usual age, it is not likely that he had a son old enough to obtain the quaestorship six years afterwards. In his quaestorship Cæpio opposed the lex frumentaria of the tribune L. Saturninus, and when Saturninus insisted upon putting the law to the vote, notwithstanding the veto of his colleagues, Cæpio interrupted the voting by a ring at a public auction (Plin. xxxiii. 1. 26). From this time he became one of the state informers under Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 74.) He may be the same as the Cæpio mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 4. s. 10), who lived in the reign of Tiberius, and seems to have written a work on botany. (Dion Cass. xiv. 16.) are, that Cicero was intimate with her during the latter period of his life, and that letters of his addressed to her were extant in the days of Quintilian. (vi. 3. § 112.) The charge of Calenus would acquire some additional weight, if it were certain that in the 13th Idyll of Ausonius the name Cicero has dropped out before the words "in processus omnis ut cursum severitatem, in epistolis ad Cærelliam sabesse petulantiam." [L. S.]

CAESAR, the name of a patrician family of the Julia gens, which was one of the most ancient in the Roman state, and traced its origin to Julus, the son of Aeneas. [JULIA GEN.] It is uncertain which member of this gens first obtained the surname of Caesar, but the first who occurs in history is Sex. Julius Caesar, praetor in B. c. 208. The origin of the name is equally uncertain. Suetonius, in his life of Aelius Verus (c. 2), mentions four different opinions respecting its origin: 1. That the word signified an elephant in the language of the Moors, and was given to one of the Julii because he had killed an elephant. 2. That it was given to one of the Julii because he had been cut out of his mother's womb after her death; or 3. Because he had been born with a great quantity of hair (caesaries) on his head; or 4. Because he had azure-coloured (caesi) eyes of an almost supernatural kind. Of these opinions the third, which is also given by Festus (s. cæsii), seems to come nearest the truth. Caesar and caesaries are both probably connected with the Sanskrit kṣa, "hair," and it is quite in accordance with the Roman custom for a surname to be given to an individual from some peculiarity in his personal appearance. The second opinion, which seems to have been the most popular one with the ancient writers (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. i. 290; Plin. H. N. vii. 7. s. 9; Solin. i. § 62; Zonar. x. 11), arose without doubt from a false etymology. With respect to the first, which was the one adopted, says Suetonius (l. c.), by the most learned men, it is impossible to disprove it absolutely, as we know next to nothing of the ancient Moorish language: but it has no inherent probability in it; and the statement of Servius (l. c.) is undoubtedly false, that the grandfather of the dictator obtained the surname on account of killing an elephant with his own hand in Africa, as there were several of the Julii with this name before his time.

An inquiry into the etymology of this name is of some interest, as no other name has ever obtained such celebrity—"clarum et duraturum cum aeternitate mundi nomen." (Spart. Ael. Ver. 1.) It was assumed by Augustus as the adopted son of the dictator, and was by Augustus handed down to his adopted son Tiberius. It continued to be used by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members either by adoption or female descent of Caesar's family; but though the family became extinct with Nero, succeeding emperors still retained it as part of their titles, and it was the practice to prefix it to their own name, as for instance, Imperator Caesar Domitianus Augustus. When Hadrian adopted Aelius Verus, he allowed the latter to take the title of Caesar; and from this time, though the Title of Augustus continued to be confined to the reigning prince, that of Caesar was also granted to the second person in the state and the heir presumptive to the throne.

In the following stemma the connexion of the earlier members of the family is to a considerable extent conjectural. A full account of the lives of all the Caesars mentioned below is given in Drennan's Geschichtc Roms, vol. iii. p. 113, &c.

1. Sex. Julius Caesar, praetor b. c. 208, obtained the province of Sicily. On his return he was one of the ambassadors sent to the consul T. Quinctius Crispius, after the death of the other consul, Marcellus, to tell him to name a dictator, on the contrary, Caesar withdrew from Accrae in Campania, which was besieged by the enemy. Here a great number of the Numidians deserted and Caesar, saving the fidelity of the remaining, sent them back to Africa. Encouraged by this defection, Papitus Molatus, the general of the enemy, proceeded to attack Caesar's camp, but was repulsed with a loss of 6000 men. This victory caused great joy at Rome; and the citizens laid aside the military cloaks (saga), which they had assumed at the beginning of the war.
and brother of No. 9. He commenced his public career in B.C. 103, when still young, by accusing T. Albucius, who had been praetor in Sicily, of extortion (repetundae) in that province: Cn. Pompeius Strabo, who had been quaestor to Albucius, wished to conduct the prosecution, but was obliged to give way to Caesar. Albucius was condemned, and the speech which Caesar delivered on this occasion was much admired, and was afterwards closely imitated by his great namesake, the dictator, in the speech which he delivered upon the appointment of an accuser against Dolabella. (Suet. Caes. 55.) He was curule aedile in B.C. 90 in the consulship of his brother, and not in the following year, as some modern writers state; for we are told, that he was aedile in the tribunalship of C. Curius, which we know was in the year 90. In B.C. 88 he became a candidate for the consulship, without having been praetor, and was strongly supported by the aristocracy, and as strongly opposed by the popular party. This contest was, indeed, as Asconius states, one of the immediate causes of the civil war. The tribunes of the plebs, P. Sulpicius and P. Antius, contended, and with justice, that Caesar could not be elected consul without a violation of the lex Annalae; but since he persevered in spite of their opposition, the tribunes had recourse to arms, and thus prevented his election. He was afterwards aedile in Rome, and expelled the leaders of the popular party; but upon his departure to Greece to prosecute the war against Mithridates, Marius and Cinna obtained possession of the city (B.C. 87), and C. Caesar was put to death, together with his brother Lucius. It may be added, that C. Caesar was a member of the college of pontiffs.

C. Caesar was regarded as one of the chief orators and poets of his age, and is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in the second book of his "De Oratore." Wit was the chief characteristic of Caesar's oratory, in which he was superior to all his contemporaries; but he was deficient in power and energy. His tragedies were distinguished by ease and polish, though marked by the same defects as his oratory. His contemporary Accius appears, from a story related by Valerius Maximus (iii. 7. § 11), to have regarded Caesar's poetry as very inferior to his own. The names of two of his tragedies are preserved, the "Adrastus" and "Telemessa." (Orelli, Onomast. Tull. ii. p. 301, where all the passages of Cicero are quoted; Gell. iv. 6; Appian, B. C. i. 72; Val. Max. v. 3. § 3; Suet. Cat. 50; Vell. Pat. ii. 9. § 2. The fragments of his orations are given by Meyer, Orationen. Fragment. p. 330, &c. Respecting his tragedies, see Weicker, Die Griechischen Tragédien, p. 1988; and Weilhert, Poet. Lat. Rel. p. 127.)

11. L. Julius L. F. L. C. Caesar, son of No. 9, and uncle by his sister Julia of M. Antony the triumvir. He was consul B.C. 64 with C. Marcus Figulus, and belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party. In the debate in the senate, in B.C. 63, respecting the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators, he voted for the death of the conspirators, among whom was the husband of his own sister, P. Lentulus Sum. L. Caesar seems to have remained at Rome some years after his consulship without going to any province. In B.C. 52, we find him in Gaul, as legate to C. Caesar, afterwards the dictator. Here he remained till the break- ing out of the civil war in 49, when he accompanied C. Caesar into Italy. He took, however, no active part in the war; but it would appear that he deserted the aristocracy, for he continued to live at Rome, which was in the dictator's power, and he was even entrusted with the care of the city in 47 by his nephew M. Antony, who was obliged to leave Rome to quell the revolt of the legions in Italy. L. Caesar, however, was now advanced in years, and did not possess sufficient energy to keep the turbulent spirits at Rome in order: hence much confusion and contention arose during Antony's absence.

After the death of the dictator in 44, L. Caesar preserved neutrality as far as possible, though his brother, who was also his kinsman, voted for the death of the conspirators, he voted for the death of the conspirators; but he opposed the wishes of his own brother in regarding the will of Antony. He retired from Rome soon after this event, and spent some time at Neapolis, where Cicero saw him, at the beginning of May, dangerously ill. From Neapolis he went to Aricia, and from thence returned to Rome in September, but did not take his seat in the senate, either on account, or under the plea, of ill-health. L. Caesar had expressed to Cicero at Neapolis his approbation of Dolabella's opposition to his colleague Antony; and as soon as the latter left Rome for Mutina, at the close of the year, he openly joined the senatorial party. It was on the proposal of L. Caesar, in B.C. 45, that the agrarian law of Antony was repealed; but he opposed the wishes of the more violent of his party, who desired war to be declared against Antony as an enemy of the state, and he carried a proposition in the senate that the contest should be called a "tumult," and not a war. In the same spirit, he proposed that P. Sulpicius, and not C. Cassius or the consults Hirtius and Pansa, as the more violent of his party wished, should be entrusted with the war against Dolabella. His object then was to prevent matters coming to such extremities as to preclude all hopes of reconciliation; but, after the defeat of Antony in the middle of April, he was one of the first to express his opinion in favour of declaring Antony an enemy of the state. On the establishment of the triumvirate, at the latter end of this year, L. Caesar was included in the proscription; his name was the second in the list, and the first which was put down by his own uncle. He took refuge in the house of his sister, Julia, with whom he had obtained his pardon from her son. From this time we hear no more of him. He was not a man of much power of mind, but had some influence in the state through his family connexions and his position in society. (Orelli, Onomast. Tull. ii. p. 314; Sall. Cat. 17; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 6, 10; Caes. B. G. vii. 65, B. C. i. 8; Dion Cass. xiii. 39; xivii. 6, 8; Appian, B. C. iv. 12, 37; Plut. Ant. 19, Cic. 46; Liv. Epit. 120; Vell. Pat. i. 57; Flor. iv. 6. § 4.)

12. Julia, the daughter of No. 9, and sister of No. 11. [Julia.]

13. L. Julius L. F. L. N. Caesar, son of No. 11, with whom he is sometimes confounded by modern writers, though he is usually distinguished from his father by the addition to his name of filius or adolescentes. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, the younger L. Caesar joined the Pompeian party, although his father was Caesar's legate. He was probably for this reason, and on account of his family connexion with Caesar, that Pompey sent him with the proctor Roscius to Caesar, who was then at Ariminum, with some ancestors of the dictator. This Sex. Caesar must not be confused, as he is by Appian (B.C. 49), with L. Julius Caesar, who was consul in B.C. 80, in the first year of the Social war. [See No. 9.]

The following coin, which represents on the obverse the head of Pallas winged, and on the reverse a woman driving a two-horse chariot, probably belongs to this Caesar.

18. C. Julius C. F. C. N. Caesar, the dictator, son of No. 15 and Aurelia, was born on the 12th of July, B.C. 100, in the consulship of C. Marius (VI.) and L. Valerius Flaccus, and was consequently six years younger than Pompey and Cicero. He had nearly completed his fifty-sixth year at the time of his murder on the 15th of March, B.C. 44. Caesar was closely connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julia with the great Marius, who obtained the election of his nephew to the dictatorship. (Liv. xiv. 14.)

If. C. ii. 40), as is well known, came to nothing. (Caes. B.C. i. 8, 9, 10; Cic. ad Att. vili. 13, 14, 16; Dion Cass. xiii. 5.)

In the course of the same year (B.C. 49), L. Caesar repaired to Africa, and had the command of Clupea entrusted to him, which he deserted, however, on the approach of Curio from Sicily, who came with a large force to oppose the Pompeian party. (Caes. B.C. ii. 23; Dion Cass. xli. 41.)

Three years afterwards (B.C. 46), we find L. Caesar serving as proconsul at Utica in Africa. (Hirt. B. Afr. 89, 89; Plut. Cat. Min. 66; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 7; Dion Cass. xiii. 12; Suet. Caes. 75.)

14. C. Julius Caesar, the son of No. 14, and the father of the dictator, as we learn from the Fasti. It is quite uncertain who the father of this Caius was. Drummann conjectures, that his father may have been a son of No. 4 and a brother of No. 6, and perhaps the C. Julius, the senator, who is said to have written a Roman history in Greek, about B.C. 143. (Liv. Epit. 53.)

We know nothing more of the grandfather of the dictator, except that he married Marcia, whose grandson traced his descent from the king Ancus Marcius. (Suet. Caes. 6.)

It is conjectured by some writers, that the praetor Caesar, who died suddenly at Rome, is the same as the subject of the present notice. (Plin. H. N. vii. 53, vi. 54.)

15. C. Julius Caesar, the son of No. 14, and the father of the dictator, was praetor, though in what year is uncertain, and died suddenly at Piae in B.C. 84, while dressing himself, when his son was sixteen years of age. The latter, in his curule neddleship, B.C. 65, exhibited games in his father's honour. (Suet. Caes.; Plin. H. N. vii. 53, vii. 54, xxxiii. 3, s. 16.) His wife was Aurelia. (Aurella.)

17. Sex. Julius C. F. C. C. Caesar, son of No. 14, and the uncle of the dictator, was consul in B.C. 81, just before the breaking out of the Social war. (Plin. H. N. ii. 83, s. 85, xxxiii. 3, s. 17; Eutrop. v. 3; Flor. iii. 18; Oros. v. 18; Obsequ. 114.)

It is conjectured that his grandson was wanting in the Capitoline Fasti, through a break in the stone; otherwise we might have been able to trace further back the ancestors of the dictator. This Sex. Caesar must not be confused, as he is by Appian (B.C. 49), with L. Julius Caesar, who was consul in B.C. 80, in the first year of the Social war. [See No. 9.]
of Mytilene (n. c. 80), and was rewarded by the Roman general with a civic crown for saving the life of a fellow-soldier. He next served under P. Sulpicius, in Cilicia, in n. c. 78, but had scarcely entered upon the campaign before news reached him of the death of Sulla, whereupon he immediately returned to Rome.

M. Aemilius Lepidus, the consul, had already attempted to rescind the acts of Sulla. He was opposed by his colleague Q. Catulus, and the state was once more in arms. This was a tempting opportunity for the leaders of the popular party to make an effort to recover their former power, and many, who were less sagacious and long-sighted than the youthful Caesar, eagerly availed themselves of it. But he saw that the time had not yet come; he had not much confidence in Lepidus, and therefore remained neutral.

Caesar was now twenty-two years of age, and, according to the common practice of the times, he accused, in the following year (n. c. 77), Cn. Dolabella of extortion in his province of Macedonia. Cn. Dolabella, who had belonged in 81, belonged to Sulla's party, which was an additional reason for his being singled out by Caesar; but, for the same reason, he was defended by Cotta and Hortensius, and acquitted by the judges, who were now, in accordance with one of Sulla's laws, chosen from the senate. Caesar, however, gained great fame by this prosecution, and showed that he possessed powers of oratory which bid fair to place him among the first speakers at Rome. The popularity he had gained induced him, in the following year (n. c. 76), at the request of the Greeks, to accuse C. Antonius (afterwards consul in n. c. 63) of extortion in Greece; but he too escaped conviction. To render himself still more perfect in oratory, he went to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius Molo, who was also one of Cicero's teachers; but in his voyage thither he was captured off Miletus, near the island of Pharmacusa, by pirates, with whom the seas of the Mediterranean then swarmed. In this island he was detained till they could obtain fifty talents from the neighbouring cities for his ransom. Immediately he had obtained his liberty, he manned some Milesian vessels, overpowered the pirates, and conducted them as prisoners to Pergamus, where he shortly afterwards crucified them—a punishment he had frequently threatened them with in sport when he was their prisoner. He then repaired to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius for a short time, but soon afterwards crossed over into Asia, on the outbreak of the Mithridatic war again in n. c. 74. Here, although he held no public office, he collected troops on his own authority, and repulsed the commander of the king, and then returned to Rome in the same year, in consequence of having been elected pontiff, in his absence, in the place of his uncle C. Aurelius Cotta.

On his return to Rome, Caesar used every means to increase his popularity. His affable manners, and still more his unbounded liberality, won the hearts of the people. As his private fortune was not large, he soon had recourse to the usurers, who looked down upon him, and offered him enormous sums in order to obtain from the people. It was about this time that the people elected him to the office of military tribune instead of his competitor, C. Popilius; but he probably served for only a short time, as he is not mentioned during the next three years (n. c. 75-71) as serving in any of the wars which were carried on at that time against Mithridates, Spartacus, and Sertorius.

The year n. c. 70 was a memorable one, as some of Sulla's most important alterations in the constitution were then repealed. This was chiefly owing to Pompey, who proposed the law which gave the consul the power of making war in Asia. Pompey had been one of Sulla's steady supporters, and was now at the height of his glory; but his great power had raised him many enemies among the aristocracy, and he was thus led to join to some extent the popular party. It was Pompey's doing that the tribunical power was restored in this year; and it was also through his support that the law of L. Aurelius Cotta, Caesar's uncle, was carried, by which the judicia were taken away from the senate, who had possessed them exclusively for ten years, and were shared between the senate, equites, and tribuni sacri. These measures were also strongly supported by Caesar, who thus came into close connexion with Pompey. He also spoke in favour of the Plotia lex for recalling from exile those who had joined M. Lepidus in n. c. 78, and had fled to Sertorius after the death of the latter.

Caesar obtained the questorship in n. c. 68. In this year he lost his aunt Julia, the widow of Marius, and his own wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna. He pronounced orations over both of them in the forum, in which he took the opportunity of passing a panegyric upon the former leaders of the popular party. The funeral of his aunt produced a great sensation at Rome, as he caused the images of Marius, who had been declared an enemy of the state, to be carried in the procession: they were welcomed with loud acclamations by the people, who were delighted to see their former favourite brought, as it were, into public again. After the funeral of his wife, he went, as quaeator to Antistius Vetus, into the province of further Spain.

On his return to Rome, in n. c. 67, Caesar married Pompeia, the daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus and Cornelia, the daughter of the dictator Sulla. This marriage with one of the Pompeian house was doubtless intended to cement his union still more closely with Pompey, who was now more favourably inclined than ever to the popular party. Caesar eagerly promoted all his views, and rendered him most efficient assistance; for he saw, that if the strength of the aristocracy could be broken by means of Pompey, he himself would soon rise to power, secure as he was of the favour of the people. He accordingly supported the proposal of the tribune Gabinius for conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates with unlimited powers: this measure was viewed with the utmost jealousy by the aristocracy, and widened still further the breach between them and Pompey. In the same year, Caesar was elected one of the superintendents of the Appian Way, and acquired fresh popularity by expending upon its repairs a large sum of money from his private purse.

In the following year, n. c. 66, Caesar again assisted Pompey by supporting, along with Cicero, the Manilian law, by which the Mithridatic war was committed to Pompey. At the end of this year, the first Catilinarian conspiracy, as it is called, was formed, in which Caesar is said by some writers to have taken an active part. But this is probably a sheer invention of his enemies in later times, as Caesar had already, through his fa-our with the people and his connexion with Pomepay, every prospect of obtaining the highest offices in the state. He had been already elected to the curule aedileship, and entered upon the office in the following year (b. c. 65), with M. Bibulus as his colleague. It was usual for those magistrates who wished to win the affections of the people, to spend large sums of money in their aedileship upon the public games and buildings; but the aedileship of Caesar and Bibulus surpassed in magnificence all that had preceded it. Caesar was obliged to borrow large sums of money again; he had long spent his private fortune, and, according to Plutarch, was 1300 talents in debt before he held any public office. Bibulus contributed to the ex-pen ses, but Caesar got almost all the credit, and his popularity became unbounded. Anxious to revive the recollection of the people in favour of the Marian party, he caused the statues of Marius and the representations of his victories in the Jugurthine and Cimbrian wars, which had been all destroyed by Sulla, to be privately restored, and placed at night in the Capitol. In the morning the city was in the highest state of excitement:
the veterans and other friends of Marius cried with joy at the sight of his countenance again, and greeted Caesar with shouts of applause: the senate assembled, and Q. Catulus accused Caesar of a breach of a positive law; but the popular excitement was so great, that the senate dared not take any measures against him. He now attempted to obtain by a plebiscitation a mission to Egypt, with the view probably of obtaining money to pay off his debts, but was defeated in his object by the aristocracy, who got some of the tribunes to put their veto upon the measure.

In b. c. 64 he was appointed to preside, in place of the praetor, as judex quaestiones, in trials for murder, and in that capacity held persons guilty of murder who had put any one to death in the proscriptions of Sulla, although they had been specially exempted from punishment by one of Sulla's laws. This he probably did in order to pave the way for the trial of C. Rabirius in the following year. He also took an active part in supporting the agrarian law of the tribune P. Servilus Rullus, which was brought forward at the second of January, b. c. 63, immediately after the tribunes entered upon their office. The provisions of this law were of such an extensive kind, and conferred such large and extraordinary powers upon the commission for distributing the lands, that Caeser could hardly have expected it to be carried;
and he probably did not wish another person to obtain the popularity which would result from such a measure, although his position compelled him to support it. It was of course resisted by the aristocracy; and Cicero, who had now attached himself to the aristocratical party, spoke against it on the first day that he entered upon his consulship, the 1st of January, b. c. 63. The law was shortly afterwards dropped by Rullus himself.

The next measure of the popular party was adopted at the instigation of Caesar. Thirty-six years before, in b. c. 100, L. Appuleius Saturninus, the tribune of the plebs, had been declared an enemy by the senate, besieged in the Capitol, and put to death when he was obliged to surrender through want of water. Caesar now induced the tribune T. Attius Labienus to accuse C. Rabirius, an aged senator, of this crime. It was doubtless through desire of revenge on the old enemy, like Caesar set this accusation afoot, but he wanted to frighten the senate from resorting to arms in future against the popular party, and to strengthen still further the power of the tribunes. Rabirius was accused of the crime of perduellio or treason against the state, a species of accusation which had almost gone out of use, and been supplanted by that of majestas. He was brought to trial before the duumviri perduellionis, who were usually appointed for this purpose by the comitia centuriata, but on the present occasion were nominated by the praetor.
Caesar himself and his relative L. Caesar were the two judges; they forthwith condemned Rabirius, who according to the old law Rabirius had been drowned or hurled down from the Tarpeian rock.
Rabirius, however, availed himself of his right of appealing to the people; Cicero spoke on his behalf;
the people seemed inclined to ratify the decision of the duumvirs, when the meeting was broken up by the praetor Q. Metellus Celer removing the military flag which floated on the Juniciunum.
This was in accordance with an old law, which was intended to protect the comitia centuriata in the Campus Martius from being surprised by the enemy, when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city, and which was still maintained as a useful engine in the hands of the magistrates. Rabirius therefore escaped, and Caesar did not think it necessary to renew the prosecution, as the object for which it had been instituted had been already in great measure attained.

Caesar next set on foot in the same year (b. c.
65) an accusation against C. Piso, who had been consul in b. c. 67, and afterwards had the government of the province of Gallia Narbonensis.
Piso was acquitted, and became from this time one of Caesar's deadliest enemies. About the same time the office of pontifex maximus became vacant by the death of Q. Metellus Pius. The candidates for it were Q. Lutatius Catulus, Q. Servilius Iauiarius, and Caesar. Catulus and Servilius had both been consuls, and were two of the most illustrious men in their generation in the senate; but so great was Caesar's popularity, that Catulus became apprehensive as to his success, and fearing to be defeated by one so much his inferior in rank, station, and age, privately offered him large sums to liquidate his debts, if he would withdraw from the contest.
Caesar, however, replied, that he would borrow still more to carry his election. He was elected on the sixth of March, and obtained more votes even in the tribes of his competitors than they had themselves. Shortly after this he was elected praetor for the following year. Then came the detection of Catiline's conspiracy. The aristocracy thought this a favourable opportunity to get rid of their restless opponent; and C. Piso and Q. Catulus used every means of persuasion, and even bribery, to induce Cicero to include him among the conspirators. That Caesar should both at the time and afterwards have been charged by the aristocracy with participation in this conspiracy, as he was in the former one of Catiline in b. c. 66, is nothing surprising; but there is no satisfactory evidence of his guilt, and we think it unlikely that he would have embarked in such a rash scheme.
For though he would probably have had little scruple as to the means he employed to obtain his ends, he was still no rash, reckless adventurer, who could only hope to rise in a general scramble for power: he now possessed unbounded influence with the people, and was sure of obtaining the consulship; and if his ambition had already formed lofty plans, he would have had greater reason to fear a loss than an increase of his power in universal anarchy. In the debate in the senate on the 5th of December respecting the punishment of the conspirators, Caesar, though he admitted their guilt, opposed their execution, and contended, in a very able speech, that it was contrary to the principles of the Roman constitution for the senate to put Roman citizens to death, and recommended that they should be kept in custody in the free towns of Italy. This speech made a great impression upon the senate, and many who had already given their opinion in favour of death began to hesitate; but the speech of M. Cato confirmed the wavering. He asked the question in favour of death. Cato openly charged Caesar as a party to the conspiracy, and as he left the senate-house his life was in danger from the Roman knights who guarded Cicero's person.

The next year, b. c. 62, Caesar was praetor. On the very day that he entered upon his office, he brought a proposition before the people for depriving Q. Catulus of the honour of completing the restoration of the Capitol, which had been burnt down in b. c. 83, and for assigning this office to Pompey. This proposal was probably made more for the sake of gratifying Pompey's vanity, and humbling the aristocracy, than from any desire of taking vengeance upon his private enemy. As however it was most violently opposed by the aristocracy, Caesar did not think it advisable to press the motion. This, however, was a trifling matter; the state was soon almost torn asunder by the proceedings of the tribune Q. Metellus Nepos, the friend of Pompey. Metellus openly accused Cicero of having put Roman citizens to death without trial, and at length gave notice of a rogation for recalling Pompey to Rome with his army, that Roman citizens might be protected from being illegally put to death. Metellus was supported by the eloquence and influence of Caesar, but met with a most determined opposition from one of his colleagues, M. Cato, who was tribune this year. Cato put his veto upon the rogation; and when Metellus attempted to read it to the people, Cato tore it out of his hands; the whole forum was in an uproar; the two parties came to blows, but Cato eventually remained master of the field. The senate took upon themselves to suspend both Metellus and Caesar from their offices. Metellus fled to Pompey's camp; Caesar continued to administer justice, till the senate sent armed troops to drag him from his tribunal. Then he dismissed his lictors, threw away his praetexta, and hurried home. The senate, however, soon saw that they had gone too far. Two days after the people thronged in crowds to the house of Caesar, and offered to restore him to his dignity. He assuaged the tumult; the senate was summoned in haste, and felt it necessary to make concessions to its hated enemy. Some of the chief senators were sent to Caesar to thank him for his conduct on the occasion; he was invited to take his seat in the senate, loaded with praises, and restored to his office. It was a complete defeat of the aristocracy. But, not disheartened by this failure, they resolved to aim another blow at Caesar. Proceedings against the accomplices in Catiline's conspiracy were still going on, and the aristocracy got L. Vettius and Q. Curius, who had been two of the chief informers against the conspirators, to accuse Caesar of having been privy to it. But this attempt equally failed. Caesar called upon Cicero to testify that he had of his own accord given him evidence respecting the conspiracy, and so complete was his triumph, that Curius was deprived of the rewards which had been voted him for having been the first to reveal the conspiracy, and Vettius was cast into prison.

Towards the end of Caesar's praetorship, a circumstance occurred which created a great stir at the time. Clodius had an intrigue with Pompeia, Caesar's wife, and had entered Caesar's house in disguise at the festival of the Bona Dea, at which men were not allowed to be present, and which was always celebrated at the house of one of the higher magistrates. He was detected and brought to trial; but though Caesar divorced his wife, he would not appear against Clodius, for the latter was a favourite with the people, and was closely connected with Caesar's party. In this year Pompey returned to Rome from the Mithridatic war, and quietly disbanded his army.

At the expiration of his praetorship Caesar obtained the province of Further Spain, b. c. 61. But his debts had now become so great, and his creditors so zealous for payment, that he was obliged to apply to Crassus for assistance before leaving Rome. This he readily obtained; Crassus became surety for him, as did also others of his friends; but these and other circumstances detained him so long that he did not reach his province till the summer. Hitherto Caesar's public career had been confined almost exclusively to political life; and he had had scarcely any opportunity of displaying that genius for war which has enrolled his name among the greatest generals of the world. He was now for the first time at the head of a regular army, and soon showed that he knew how to make use of it. He commenced his campaign by subduing the mountainous tribes of Lusitania, which had plundered the country, took the town of Brigantium in the country of the Gallacii, and gained many other advantages over the enemy. His troops saluted him as imperator, and the senate honoured him by a public thanksgiving. His civil reputation procured him equal renown, and he left the province with great reputation, after enriching both himself and his army.

Caesar returned to Rome in the summer of the following year, b. c. 60, a little before the consular elections, without waiting for his successor. He laid claim to a triumph, and at the same time wished to become a candidate for the consulship. For the latter purpose, his presence in the city was necessary; but as he could not enter the city without relinquishing his triumph, he applied to the senate to be exempted from the usual law, and to become a candidate in his absence. As this, however, was strongly opposed by the opposite party, Caesar at once relinquished his triumph, entered the city, and became a candidate for the consulship. The other competitors were L. Lucceius and M. Calpurnius Bibulus: the former belonged to the popular party, but the
But that he might have a colleague of the aedileship and praetorship, was a warm supporter of Pompey, who had been Caesar's colleague in the consulship. It was clearly stated by the ancient writers, but its main object was to divide the rich Campanian land among the poorest citizens, especially among those who had three or more children; and if the domain land which was the property of the state among the poorest citizens, especially among those who had three or more children; and if the domain land was not sufficient for the object, more was to be purchased. The execution of the law was to be entrusted to a board of twenty commissioners. The opposition of the aristocratical party was in vain. Bibulus, indeed, declared before the people, that the law should never pass while he was consul; but Pompey and Crassus spoke in its favour, and the former declared, that he would bring both sword and buckler against those who used the sword. On the day on which the law was put to the vote, Bibulus, the three tribunes who opposed it, and all the other members of the aristocracy were driven out of the forum by force of arms: the law was carried, the commissioners appointed, and about 20,000 citizens, comprising of course a great number of Pompey's veterans, received allotments subsequently. On the day after Bibulus had been driven out of the forum, he summoned the senate, narrated to them the violence which had been employed against him, and called upon them to support him, and declare the law invalid; but the aristocracy was thoroughly frightened; not a word was said in reply; and Bibulus, despairing of being able to offer any further resistance to Caesar, shut himself up in his own house, and did not appear again in public till the expiration of his consulship. In his retirement he published "Edicta" against Caesar, in which he protested against the legality of his measures, and bitterly attacked his private and political character.

It was about this time, and before the agrarian law had been passed, that Caesar united himself still more closely to Pompey by giving him his daughter Julia in marriage. Although she had been already betrothed to Servilius Caepio, Caesar, himself, at the same time, married Calpurnia, the daughter of L. Piso, who was consul in the following year.

By his agrarian law Caesar had secured to himself more strongly than ever the favour of the people; his next step was to gain over the equites, who had rendered efficient service to Cicero in his consulship, and had hitherto supported the aristocratical party. An excellent opportunity now occurred for accomplishing this object. In their eagerness to obtain the farming of the public taxes in Asia, the equites, whose land had been taken away by Caesar, petitioned the senate to return it, and had accordingly petitioned the senate in B. C. 61 for more favourable terms. This, however, had been opposed by Metellus Celer, Cato, and others of the aristocracy; and Caesar therefore now brought forward a bill in the comitia to relieve the equites from one-third of the sum which they had agreed to pay. This measure, which was also supported by Pompey, was carried. Caesar next obtained the confirmation of Pompey's acts; and having thus gratified the people, the equites, and Pompey, he was easily able to obtain for himself the province which he wished. The senate, as we have seen, had previously assigned him the care of the woods and of the public pastures as his province, and he therefore got the tribune Vatinius to propose a bill to the people, granting to him the province of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum with three legions for five years. This was of course passed; and the senate added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, with another legion, for five years also, as they plainly saw that a bill would be proposed to the people for that purpose, if they did not grant the province themselves.
It is not attributing any great foresight to Caesar to suppose, that he already saw that the struggle between the different parties at Rome must eventually be terminated by the sword. The same causes were still in operation which had led to the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, which Caesar had himself witnessed in his youth; and he must have been well aware that the aristocracy would not hesitate to call in the assistance of the sword if they should ever succeed in detaching Pompey from his interests. It was therefore of the first importance for him to obtain an army, which he might attach to himself by victories and rewards. But he was not conducted in Spain to obtain a command in the East, for he would then have been at too great a distance from Rome, and would gradually have lost much of his influence in the city. He therefore wisely chose the Gallic provinces, as he would thus be able to pass the winter in the north of Italy, and keep up his communication with the city, while the disturbed state of Further Gaul promised him sufficient materials for engaging in a series of wars, in which he might employ an army that would afterwards be devoted to his purposes. In addition to these considerations, Caesar was doubtless actuated by the desire of finding a field for the display of those military talents which his campaign in Spain had shown that he possessed, and also by the ambition of subduing for ever that nation which had once sacked Rome, and which he believed, from the earliest times, more or less an object of dread to the Roman state.

The consuls of the following year (b.c. 58), C. Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius, were devoted to Caesar's interests; but among the praetors, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and C. Memmius attempted to invalidate the acts of Caesar's consuls, but without success. Caesar remained a short time in the city, to see the result of this attempt, and then left Rome, but was immediately accused in his absence by the tribune Antistius. This accusation, however, was dropped; and all the attempts against Caesar were as ill-advised as they were fruitless, since they only shewed more strongly than ever the weakness of his adversaries. But although Caesar had left Rome, he did not go straight to his province; he remained with his army three months before Rome, to support Clodius, who had passed over from the patricians to the plebeians of the previous year, was now tribune, and had resolved upon the ruin of Cicero. Towards the latter end of April, Cicero went into exile without waiting for his trial, and Caesar then proceeded forthwith into his province.

During the next nine years Caesar was occupied with the subjugation of Gaul. In this time he conquered the whole of Transalpine Gaul, which had hitherto been independent of the Romans, with the exception of the part called Provincia; he twice crossed the Rhine, and carried the terror of the Roman arms across that river, and he twice landed in Britain, which had been hitherto unknown to the Romans. To give a detailed account of these campaigns would be impossible in the limits of this work; we can only offer a very brief sketch of the principal events of each year.

Caesar left Rome, as has been already remarked, towards the latter end of April, and arrived at Geneva in eight days. His first campaign was against the Helvetii, a powerful Gallic people situated to the north of the lake of Geneva, and bet-country. In consequence of these representations, Caesar commanded Ariovistus, who had received the title of king and friend of the Roman people in Caesar's own consulship, to abstain from introducing any more Germans into Gaul, to restore the hostages to the Aeduli, and not to attack the latter or their allies. But as a haughty answer was returned to these commands, both parties prepared for war. Caesar advanced northwards through the country of the Sequani, and took possession of Vesontio (Besançon), an important town on the Dubis (Doubs), and some days afterwards fought a decisive battle with Ariovistus, who suffered a total defeat, and fled with the remains of his army to the Rhine, a distance of fifty miles. Only a very few, and among the rest Ariovistus himself, crossed the river; the rest were cut to pieces by the Roman cavalry. [Ariovistus.]

Having thus completed two very important wars in one summer, Caesar led his troops into their quarters for the winter early in the autumn, where he left them under the command of Labienus, while he himself went into Cisalpine Gaul to attend to his civil duties in the province.

The following year, n. c. 57, was occupied with the Belgian war. Alarmed at Caesar's success, the various Belgic tribes, which dwelt between the Sequani (Seine) and the Rhine, and were the most warlike of all the Gauls, had entered into a confederacy to oppose Caesar, and had raised an army of 300,000 men. Caesar meantime levied two new legions in Cisalpine Gaul, which increased his army to eight legions; but even this was but a small force compared with the overwhelming numbers of the enemy. Caesar was the first to open the campaign by marching into the country of the Belgic war. Alarmed at Caesar's success, the Remis, who submitted at his approach, and entered into alliance with him. He then crossed the Aixois (Aisne), and pitched his camp on a strong position on the right bank. But, in order to make a diversion, and to separate the vast forces of the enemy, he sent Divitiacus with the Aedui to the country of the Bellovacis, Andes, and Turoncs, people near the Ligeris (Loire), in the central parts of Gaul, where each people could obtain provisions and maintain themselves. This determination was fatal to them; together they might possibly have conquered; but once separated, they had no chance of contending against the powerful Roman army. Hitherto Caesar had remained in his entrenched camps; but now he retired from his quarters, and resumed the offensive. The Susissones, the Bellovacis, and Ambiani were subdued in succession, or surrendered of their own accord; but a more formidable task awaited him when he came to the Nervii, the most warlike of all the Belgic tribes. In their country, near the river Sabis (Sambre), the Roman army was surprised by the enemy while engaged in marking out and fortifying the camp. This part of the country was surrounded by woods, in which the Nervi had concealed themselves; and it seems, as Napoleon has remarked, that Caesar was on this occasion guilty of great imprudence in not having explored the country properly, as he was well provided with light armed troops. The attack of the Nervii was so unexpected, and the surprise so complete, that before the Romans could form in line, the Nervii were repulsed, paid dearly for their treachery; for on the following day Caesar took possession of the town, and sold all the inhabitants as slaves, to the number of 80,000. At the same time he received intelligence that the Veneti, Unelli, and various other states in the north-west of Gaul, had submitted to M. Crassus, whom he had sent against them with one legion. Having thus subjugated the whole of the north of Gaul, Caesar led his troops into winter-quarters in the country of the Remis, the powerful people near the Ligeris (Loire), in the central parts of Gaul, and then proceeded himself to Cisalpine Gaul. When the senate received the despatches of Caesar announcing this victory, they decreed a public thanksgiving of fifteen days—a distinction which had never yet been granted to any one: the thanksgiving in Pompey's honour, after the Mithridatic war, had lasted for ten days, and that was the longest that had hitherto been decreed.

At the beginning of the following year, n. c. 56, which was Caesar's third campaign in Gaul, he was detained some months in Italy by the state of affairs at Rome. There had been a misunderstanding between Pompey and Crassus, and L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had become a candidate for the consularship, threatened to deprive Caesar of his army and provinces. Caesar accordingly invited Pompey and Crassus to come to him at Luca (Lucca), where he reconciled them to one another, and arranged that they should be the consuls for the following year, and that Crassus should have the province of Syria, and Pompey the two Spains. They on their part agreed to obtain the prolongation of Caesar's government for five years more, and pay for his troops out of the public treasury. It was not through any want of money that Caesar made the latter stipulation, for he had obtained immense booty in his two campaigns in Gaul; but so corrupt was the state of society at Rome, that he knew it would be difficult for him to retain his present position unless he was able to bribe the people and the leading men in the city. The money which he had acquired in his Gallic wars was therefore freely expended in carrying the elections of those candidates for public offices who would support his interests, and also in prosent to the senators and other influential men who flocked to him at Luca to pay him their respects and share in his liberality. He held almost a sort of court at Luca: 200 senators waited upon him, and so many also that were invested with public offices, that 120 lectors were seen in the streets of the town.

After settling the affairs of Italy, Caesar proceeded to his army at the latter end of the spring of b. c. 56. During his absence, a powerful confederacy had been formed against him by the maritime states in the north-west of Gaul. Many of these had submitted to P. Crassus in the preceding year, alarmed at Caesar's victories; and the others, but after their defeat, when the Veneti in Boetogone, they had now all risen in arms against the Romans. Fearing a general insurrection of all Gaul, Caesar thought it advisable to divide his army and distribute it in four different parts of the country. He himself, with the main body and the fleet which he had caused to be built on the Niger, undertook the conduct of the war against the Veneti; while he sent T. Titurius Sabinus with three legions into the country of the Unelli, Curiosolitae, and Lexovii (Normandy). Labienus was despatched eastwards with a cavalry force into the country of the Treveri, near the Rhine, to keep down the Belgians and to prevent the Germans from crossing that river. Thus was sent with twelve legiary cohorts and a great number of cavalry into Aquitania, to prevent the Basque tribes in the south of Gaul from joining the Veneti. The plan of the campaign was laid with great skill, and was crowned with complete success. The Veneti, after suffering a great naval defeat, were obliged to surrender to Caesar, who treated them with merciless severity in order to strike terror into the surrounding tribes: he put all the senators to death, and sold the rest of the people as slaves. About the same time, Titurius Sabinus conquered the Veneti and the surrounding people; and Crassus, though with more difficulty, the greater part of Aquitania. The presence of Labienus, and the severe defeats they had experienced in the preceding year, seem to have deterred the Belgians from any attempt at revolt. Although the season was far advanced, Caesar resolved to invade Britain. In ten days he built a bridge of boats across the river, probably (in the neighbourhood of Calais and Boulogne), as they were the only people in Gaul that still remained in arms. On his approach, they retired into the woods, and the rainy season coming on, Caesar was obliged to lead his troops into winter-quarters. He accordingly recrossed the Sequana (Seine), and stationed his soldiers for the winter in Normandy in the country of the Auleri and Lexovii. Thus, in three campaigns, Caesar may be said to have conquered the whole of Gaul; but the spirit of the people was not yet broken. They therefore made several attempts to recover their independence; and it was not till their revolts had been again and again put down by Caesar, and the flower of the nation had perished in battle, that they learnt to submit to the Roman yoke.

In the next year, b. c. 55, Pompey and Crassus were consul, and proceeded to carry into execution the arrangement which had been entered into at Luca. They experienced, however, more opposition than they had anticipated: the aristocracy, headed by Cato, threw every obstacle in their way, but was unable to prevent the two bills proposed by the tribune Trebonius from being carried, one of which assigned the provinces of the Spains and Syria to the consuls Pompey and Crassus, and the other prolonged Caesar's provincial government for five additional years. By the law of Vatinius, passed in b. c. 59, Gaul and Ilyricum were assigned to Caesar for five years, namely, from the 1st of January, b. c. 58 to the end of December, b. c. 54; and now, by the law of Trebonius, the provinces were continued to him for five more years, namely, from the 1st of January, b. c. 53 to the end of the year 49.

In b. c. 56, Caesar left Italy earlier than usual, in order to make preparations for a war with the Germans. This was his fourth campaign in Gaul. The Gauls had suffered too much in the last few years to make any further attempt against the Romans at present; but Caesar's ambition would not allow him to be idle. Fresh wars must be undertaken and fresh victories gained to keep him in the recollection of the people, and to employ his troops in active service. Two German tribes, the Usipetes and the Tenchothri, had been driven out of their own country by the Suevi, and had crossed the Rhine, at no great distance from its mouth, with the intention of settling in Gaul. This, however, Caesar was resolved to prevent, and accordingly prepared to attack them. The Germans opened negotiations with him, and the Romans were going on, a body of their cavalry attacked and defeated Caesar's Gallic cavalry, which was vastly superior in numbers. On the next day, all the German chiefs came into Caesar's camp to apologize for what they had done; but, instead of accepting their excuse, Caesar detained them, and straightway led out his troops to attack the enemy. Deprived of their leaders, and taken by surprise, the Germans after a feeble resistance took to flight, and were almost all destroyed by the Roman cavalry. The remainder fled to the confluence of the Mosc (Meuse) and the Rheine, but few crossed the river in safety. To strike terror into the Germans, Caesar resolved to cross the Rhine. In ten days he built a bridge of boats across the river, probably in the neighbourhood of Calais and Boulogne, and razing the country of the Sigambri, he returned to Gaul and broke down the bridge.

Although the greater part of the summer was now gone, Caesar resolved to invade Britain. His object in undertaking this expedition at such a late period of the year was more to obtain some knowledge of the island from personal observation, than with any view to permanent conquest at present. He accordingly took with him only two legions, with which he sailed from the port Itius (probably Witsand, between Calais and Boulogne), and effected a landing somewhere near the South Foreland, after a severe struggle with the natives. Several of the British tribes hereupon sent offers of submission to Caesar; but, in consequence of the loss of a great part of the Roman fleet a few days afterwards, they took up arms again. Being however defeated, they again sent offers of submission to Caesar, who simply demanded double the number of hostages he had originally required; as he was anxious to return to Gaul before the season should be further advanced. He did not, therefore, wait for the hostages, but commanded them to be brought to him in Gaul. On his return, he punished the Morini, who had revoluted in his absence; and, after leading his troops into winter-quarters among the Belgians, repaired, as usual, to the north of Italy. Caesar had not gained any victories in this campaign equal to those of the three former years; but his victories over the Germans and far-distant Britons were probably regarded by the Romans with greater admiration than his conquests of the Gauls. The senate accordingly voted him a public thanksgiving of twenty days, notwithstanding the opposition of Cato, who declared, that Caesar ought to be delivered up to the Usipetes and Tenctheri, to prevent the gods from visiting upon Rome his violation of the law of nations in seizing the sacred persons of ambassadors.

The greater part of Caesar's fifth campaign, B.C. 54, was occupied with his second invasion of Britain. After making an expedition into Illyricum, and afterwards into the country of the Tréviri, which Britain should pay yearly to the Roman emperor Augustus, should marry Pompey, and that he himself should marry Pompey's daughter, who was now the wife of Faustus Sulla. This proposal, however, was declined, but for what reason we are not told.

In the next year, B.C. 53, which was Caesar's sixth campaign in Gaul, the Gauls again took up arms, and entered into a most formidable conspiracy to recover their independence. The desertion of the Roman troops under Sabinus and Cotta, and the unsettled state of Gaul during the winter, had led Caesar to apprehend a general rising of the natives; and he had accordingly levied two new legions in Cisalpine Gaul, and obtained one from Pompey, who was remaining in the neighbourhood of Rome as proconsul with the imperium. Being thus at the head of a powerful army, he was able to subdue the nations that revolted, and soon compelled the Nervii, Senones, Carnutes, Mcenapii, and Treviri to return to obedience. But as the Treviri had been supported by the Germans, he crossed the Rhine again a little above the spot where he had passed over two years before, and having received the submission of the Ubii, proceeded to march into the country of the Suervi. The latter people, however, retired to their woods and fastnesses as he advanced; and, finding it impossible to come up with the enemy, he again recrossed the Rhine, having effected as little as in his previous invasion of the country. On his return, he made a vigorous effort to put down Ambiorix, who still continued in arms. The country of the Eburones was laid waste with fire and sword; the troops of Ambiorix were again and again defeated, but he himself always escaped falling into the hands of the Romans. In the midst of this war, when the enemy were almost subdued, Cicero's camp was surrounded by an overwhelming host. Seconded by the bravery of his soldiers, Cicero, in a state of health, repulsed the enemy in all their attempts to storm the camp, till he was at length relieved by Caesar in person, who came to his assistance with two legions, as soon as he heard of the dangerous position of his legate. The forces of the enemy, which amounted to 60,000, were defeated by Caesar, who then joined Cicero, and praised him and his men for the bravery they had shown. In consequence of the unsettled state of Gaul, Caesar resolved to remain with his army all the winter, and accordingly took up his quarters at Samarobriva (Ammem). About the same time, Indutulonatus, a chief of the Treviri, attempted to form a conspiracy against the Romans, but was attacked and killed by Labienus, who was stationed in the country of the Treviri.
the Treviri, Lingones, and Senones, and departed to Cisalpine Gaul.

Upon Caesar's arrival in Cisalpine Gaul, he heard of the death of Clodius, who was killed by Milo at the latter end of January, B.C. 52. This event was followed by tumults, which rent both Rome and Italy asunder; and it was currently reported in Gaul that Caesar could not possibly leave Italy under these circumstances. The unsuccessful issue of last year's revolt had not yet dampened the spirits of the Gauls; the execution of Acco had frightened all the chiefs, as every one feared that his turn might come next; the hatred of the Roman yoke was intense; and thus all the materials were ready for a general conflagration. It was first set alight by the Carnutes, and in an incredibly short time it spread from country to country, till almost the whole of Gaul was in flames. Even the Aedui, who had been hitherto the faithful allies of the Romans, and had assisted them in all their wars, subsequently joined the general revolt.

At the head of the insurgents was Vercingetorix, a young man of noble family belonging to the Arverni, but far the ablest general that Caesar had yet encountered. Never before had the Gauls been so united: Caesar's conquests of the last six years seemed to be now entirely lost. The war, therefore, of this year, B.C. 52, was by far the most arduous that Caesar had yet encountered. He lost no time in attacking the chief towns in the province, and with those which he had himself captured on his march, he eluded the pursuit of the enemy, crossed the Ligurs (Loire), and joined Labienus in safety. The war, therefore, of this year, B.C. 52, was by far the most arduous that Caesar had yet encountered.

The revolt of the Aedui inspired fresh courage in the Gauls, and Vercingetorix soon found himself at the head of a much larger army than he had hitherto commanded. Fearing now for the safety of the province, Caesar began to march southwards towards Aliscin (Alise in Burgundy, between Scnuir and Dijon), whither he was pursued by Caesar. Alarmed at Caesar's rapid progress, Vercingetorix persuaded his countrymen to lay waste their country and destroy their towns, that Caesar might be deprived of all sustenance and quarters for his troops. This plan was accordingly carried into effect; but Avicum (Bourges), the chief town of the Bituriges, and a strongly fortified place, was spared from the general destruction, contrary to the wishes of Vercingetorix. This town Caesar accordingly laid siege to, and, notwithstanding the heroic resistance of the Gauls, it was at length taken, and all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were indiscriminately butchered by the Roman soldiery.

Caesar now divided his army into two parts: one division, consisting of four legions, he sent under the command of T. Labienus against the Senones and Parisii; the other, comprising six legions, he led himself into the country of the Arverni, and, with them, laid siege to Gergovia (near Clermont). The revolt of the Aedui shortly afterwards compelled him to raise the siege, but not until he had received a severe repulse in attempting to storm the town. Meantime, the Aedui had taken Noviodunum, in which Caesar had placed all his stores; and, as his position had now become very critical, he hastened northwards to join Labienus in the country of the Senones. By rapid marches he eluded the pursuit of the enemy, crossed the Ligeris (Loire), and joined Labienus in safety.

The victories of the preceding year had determined the fate of Gaul; but many states still remained in arms, and entered into fresh conspiracies during the winter. The next year, B. c. 51, Caesar's eighth campaign in Gaul, was occupied in the reduction of these states, into the particulars of which we need not enter. It is sufficient to say, that he conquered in succession the Carnutes, the Bellovaci, and the Armoric states in western Gaul, took Uxellodunum, a town of the Cadurci (Caubors), and closed the campaign by the reduction of Aquitania. He then led his troops into winter-quarters, and passed the winter at Nemetocenna in Belgium. He here employed himself in the pacification of Gaul; and, as he already saw that his presence would soon be necessary in Italy, he was anxious to remove all causes for future wars. He accordingly imposed no new taxes, treated the states with honour and respect, and bestowed great presents upon the chiefs. The experience of the last two years had taught the Gauls that they had no hope of contending successfully against Caesar; and as he now treated them with mildness, they were the more readily induced to submit patienty to the Roman yoke. Having thus completed the pacification of Gaul, Caesar found that he could leave his army in the spring of B. c. 50, and therefore, contrary to his usual practice, repaired at the end of the winter to Cisalpine Gaul.

While Caesar had thus been actively engaged in Gaul during the last two years, affairs at Rome had taken a turn, which threatened a speedy rupture between him and Pompey. The death of Crassus in the Parthian war in B. c. 53 had left Caesar and Pompey alone at the head of the state. Pompey had been the chief instrument in raising Caesar to power in order to serve his own ends, and never seems to have supposed it possible that the conqueror of Mithridates could be thrown into the shade by any man in the world. This, however, now began to be the case; Caesar's brilliant victories in Gaul were in every body's mouth; and Pompey saw with ill-disguised mortification that he was becoming the second person in the state. Though this did not lead him to break with Caesar at once, it made him anxious to increase his power and influence, and he had therefore resolved as early as B. c. 53 to obtain, if possible, the dictatorship. He accordingly used no effort to put an end to the disturbances at Rome between Milo and Clodius in that year, in hopes that all parties would be willing to accede to his wishes in order to restore peace to the city. These disturbances broke out into perfect anarchy on the death of Clodius at the beginning of the following year, B. c. 52, and led to the appointment of Pompey as sole consul with the concurrence of the senate. This, it is true, did not entirely meet Pompey's wishes, yet it was the first step which the aristocracy had taken to gratify Pompey, and it paved the way for a reconciliation with them. The acts of Pompey's consulship, which were all directed to the increase of his power, belong to Pompey's life; it is sufficient to mention here, that among other things he obtained the prolongation of his government in Spain for five years more; and as he was not yet prepared to move entirely with Caesar, he allowed none of the tribunes who had been exempting Caesar from the necessity of coming to Rome to become a candidate for the consulship. The ten years of Caesar's government would expire at the end of B. c. 49, and he was therefore resolved to obtain the consulship for B. c. 48, for otherwise he would become a private man.

In the following year, B. c. 51, Pompey entered into still closer connexions with the aristocracy, but at the same time was not willing to support all the violent measures of the consul M. Claudius Marcellus, who proposed to send a successor to Caesar, on the plea that the war in Gaul was finished, and to deprive him of the privilege of becoming a candidate for the consulship in his absence. At length a decree of the senate was passed, that the consuls of the succeeding year, B. c. 50, should on the first of March consult the senate respecting the disposal of the consular provinces, by which time it was hoped that Pompey would be prepared to take decisive measures against Caesar. The consuls for the next year, B. c. 50, L. Aquillius Papus and C. Claudius Marcellus, and the powerful tribune C. Curio, were all reckoned devoted partisans of Pompey and the senate. Caesar, however, gained over Papus and Curio by large bribes, and with an unsparing hand distributed immense sums of money among the leading men of Rome. Thus this year passed by without the senate coming to any decision. The great fear which Pompey and the senate entertained was, that Caesar should be elected consul while he was still at the head of his army, and it was therefore proposed in the senate by the consul C. Marcellus, that Caesar should lay down his command by the 13th of November. This it could not be expected that Caesar would do; his proconsulate had upwards of another year to run; and if he had come to Rome as a private man to sue for the consulship, there could be little doubt that his life would have been sacrificed. Cato had declared that he would bring Caesar to trial as soon as he laid down his command; but the trial would have been only a mockery, for Pompey was in the neighbourhood of the city at the head of an army, and would have overawed the judges by his military power, as at Milo's trial. The tribune Curio consequently interposed his veto upon the proposition of Marcellus. Meantime Caesar had come into Cisalpine Gaul in the spring of B. c. 50, as already mentioned. Here he was received by the municipal towns and colonies with the greatest marks of respect and affection; and after remaining there, a short time, he returned to Transalpine Gaul and held a review of his whole army, which he had so long led to victory. Anxius to diminish the number of his troops, if a senate had, under pretext of a war with the Parthians, ordered that Pompey and Caesar should each furnish a legion to be sent into the East. The legion which Pompey intended to devote to this service was the one he had sent to Caesar in B. c. 53, and which he now accordingly demanded back; and although Caesar saw that he should thus be deprived of two legions, which would probably he employed against himself, he did not think it advisable to break with the senate on this point, and felt that he was sufficiently strong to spare even two legions. He accordingly sent them to the senate, after bestowing liberal presents upon each soldier. Upon their arrival in Italy, they were not, as Caesar had anticipated, sent to the East, but were ordered to pass the winter at Cauccon. After this Caesar stationed his remaining eight legions in winter-quarters, four in Belgium and four among the Aeduœ, and then repaired to Cisalpine Gaul. He took up his quarters at Ravenna, the last town in his province bordering upon Italy, and there met C. Curio, who informed him more particularly of the state of affairs at Rome.

Though war seemed inevitable, Caesar still shewed himself willing to enter into negotiations with the aristocracy, and, accordingly sent Curio with a letter addressed to the senate, in which he expressed his readiness to resign his command if Pompey would do the same, but intimated that he would continue to hold it if Pompey did not accede to his offer. Curio arrived at Rome on the first of January, n. c. 49, the day on which the new consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Claudius Marcellus entered upon their office. It was with great difficulty that the tribunes M. Antonius and Q. Cassius Longinus forced the senate to allow the letter to be read, but they could not prevail upon the house to take the subject of it into deliberation and come to a vote upon it. The consuls, however, brought before the house the state of the republic in general; and after a violent debate the motion of Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, was carried, that Caesar should disband his army by a certain day, and that if he did not do it he should be regarded as an enemy of the state.

Upon this motion the tribunes M. Antonius and Q. Cassius put their veto; but their opposition was set at naught. Pompey had now made up his mind to crush Caesar, if possible, and accordingly the more violent counsels prevailed. Antonius and Cassius were ejected from the senate-house, and on the sixth of January the senate passed the decree, which was tantamount to a declaration of martial law, that the consuls and other magistrates "should provide for the safety of the state." Antonius and Cassius considering their lives no longer safe, fled from the city in disguise to Caesar's army, and called upon him to protect the inviolable persons of the tribunes. War was now declared. The senate entrusted the whole management of it to Pompey, made a fresh distribution of the provinces, divided the whole of Italy into certain districts, the defence of each of which was to be entrusted to some distinguished senator, determined that fresh levies of troops should be held, and voted a sum of money from the public treasury to Pompey. Pompey had had all along no apprehensions as to the result of a war; he seems to have regarded it as scarcely possible that Caesar should ever seriously think of marching against him; his great fame, he thought, would cause a multitude of troops to flock around him whenever he wished them; and thus in his confidence of success, he had neglected all means for raising an army. In addition to this he had been deceived as to the disposition of Caesar's troops, and had been led to believe that they were ready to desert their general at the first opportunity. Consequently, when the war broke out, Pompey had scarcely any troops except the two legions which he had obtained from Caesar, and on the fidelity of which he could by no means rely. So unpopular too was the senatorial party in Italy, that it was with great difficulty they could levy troops, and when levied, they took the first opportunity of passing over to Caesar.

As soon as Caesar learnt the last resolution of the senate, he assembled his soldiers, informed them of the wrongs he had sustained, and called upon them to support him. Finding them quite willing to follow him, he crossed the Rubicon which separated his province from Italy, and occupied Ariminum, where he met with the tribunes. He commenced his enterprise with only one legion, consisting of 5000 foot soldiers and 300 horse, but others had orders to follow him from Transalpine Gaul, and he was well aware of the importance of expedition, that the enemy might have no time to complete their preparations. Therefore, though it was the middle of winter, he pushed on with the utmost rapidity, and such was the popularity of his cause in Italy, that city after city opened its gates to him, and his march was like a triumphal progress. Arretium, Pisaurum, Fanum, Aenona, Iguvium, and Auxinium, fell into his hands. These successes caused the utmost consternation at Rome; it was reported that Caesar's cavalry was already near the gates of the city; a general panic seized the senate, and they fled from the city even without taking with them the money from the public treasury, and did not recover their courage till they had got as far south as Capua. Caesar continued his victorious march through Picenum till he came to Corfinium, which was the first town that offered him any vigorous resistance. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had been appointed Caesar's successor in Gaul, had thrown himself into Corfinium with a strong force; but as Pompey did not come to his assistance, he was unable to maintain the place, and fell himself into Caesar's hands, together with several other senators and distinguished men. Caesar, with the same clemency which he displayed throughout the whole of the civil war, dismissed them all uninjured, and hastened in pursuit of Pompey, who had now resolved to abandon Italy and was accordingly hastening on to Brundisium, intending from thence to sail to Greece. Pompey reached Brundisium before Caesar, but had not sailed when the latter arrived before the town. Caesar straightway laid siege to the place, but Pompey abandoned it on the 17th of March and embarked for Greece. Caesar was unable to follow Pompey for want of ships, and therefore determined to march against Afranius and Petreius, Pompey's legates in Spain, who possessed a powerful army in that country. He accordingly marched back from Brundisium and repaired to Rome, having thus in three months become the supreme master of the whole of Italy.

After remaining in the neighbourhood of Rome for a short time, he set out for Spain, having left M. Lepidus in charge of the city and M. Antonius in command of the troops in Italy. He sent Curio to drive Cato out of Sicily, Q. Valerius to take possession of Sardinia, and C. Antonius to occupy Illyricum. Curio and Valerius obtained possession of Sicily and Sardinia without opposition; and Curio then passed over into Africa, which was in possession of the Pompeian party. Here, however, he met with strong opposition, and at length was defeated and lost his life in a battle with Juba, king of Mauritania, who supported P. Atius Varus, the Pompeian commander. C. Antonius also met with bad success in Illyricum, for his army was defeated and he himself taken prisoner. These events, however, happened at a later period in this year; and these disasters were more than counterbalanced by Caesar's victories in the meantime in Spain. Caesar left Rome about the middle of April, and on his arrival in Gaul found, that Massilia refused to submit to him. He forthwith laid siege to the place, but unable to take it immediately, he left C. Trebonius and D. Brutus with part of his troops to prosecute the siege, and continued his march to Spain. In this country Pompey had seven legions, three under the command of L. Afranius in the nearer province, two under M. Petreius in the further, and two under M. Terentius Varro also in the latter province west of the Anas (Guadarrana). Varro remained in the west; but Afranius and Petreius on the approach of Caesar united their forces, and took up a strong position near the town of Ilerda (Lerida in Catalonia) on the right bank of the Secor (Segre). Into the details of this campaign we cannot enter. It is sufficient to state, that, after experiencing great difficulties at first and some reverses, Caesar at length reduced Afranius and Petreius to such difficulties that they were obliged to surrender. They themselves were dismissed uninjured, part of their troops disbanded, and the remainder incorporated among Caesar's troops. Caesar then proceeded to march against Varro; but after the victory over Afranius and Petreius, there was no army in Spain capable of resisting the conqueror, and Varro accordingly surrendered to Caesar when the latter arrived at Corduba (Cordova). Having thus subdued all Spain, which had engaged him only forty days, he returned to Gaul. Massilia had not yet yielded, but the siege had been prosecuted with so much vigour, that the inhabitants were compelled to surrender the town soon after his arrival before the walls.

While Caesar was before Massilia, he received intelligence that he had been appointed dictator by the praetor M. Lepidus, who had been empowered to do so by a law passed for the purpose. This appointment, which was of course made in accordance with Caesar's wishes, was contrary to all precedent; for a praetor had not the power of nominating a dictator, and the senate was entirely passed over: but it is idle to talk of established forms under such circumstances; it was necessary that there should be a higher magistrate than praetor to hold the comitia for the election of the consuls; and Caesar wished to enter Rome invested with some high official power, which he could not do so long as he was merely consular. Accordingly, as soon as Massilia surrendered, Caesar hastened to Rome and entered upon his dictatorship, but laid it down again at the end of eleven days after holding the consular comitia, in which he himself and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus were elected consuls for the next year. But during these eleven days he caused some very important laws to be passed. The first, which was intended to relieve debtors, but at the same time protect to a great extent the rights of creditors, was in the present state of affairs a most salutary measure. (For the provisions of this lex, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Julia Lex de Foemora.) He next obtained the reversal of the sentences which had been pronounced against various persons in accordance with the laws passed in Pompey's last consularship; he also obtained the recall of several of those exiles; he further restored the descendants of those who had been proscribed by Sulla, to the enjoyment of their rights, and rewarded the Transpadani by the citizenship for their faithful support of his cause.

After laying down the dictatorship, Caesar went in December to Brundisium, where he had prepared one of his troops. He had lost many men in the long march from Spain, and also from sickness arising from their passing the autumn in the south of Italy. Pompey had not been idle during the summer, and had employed his time in raising a large army in Greece, Egypt, and the East, the scene of his former glory. He thus collected an army consisting of nine legions of Roman citizens, and an auxiliary force of cavalry and infantry; and, though it is impossible to estimate its exact strength, as we do not know the number of men which each legion contained, it was decidedly greater than the army which Caesar had assembled at Brundisium. His fleet entirely commanded the sea, and so small was the number of Caesar's ships, that it seemed impossible that he should venture to cross the sea in face of Pompey's superior fleet. This circumstance, and also the time of the year caused M. Bibulus, the commander of Pompey's fleet, to relax in his guard; and thus when Caesar set sail from Brundisium, on the 4th of January, he arrived the next day in safety on the coast of Epeirus. In consequence, however, of the small number of his ships, Caesar was able to carry over only seven legions, which, for the causes previously mentioned, had been so thinned as to amount only to 15,000 foot and 500 horse. After landing this force, he sent back his ships to bring over the remainder; but part of the fleet was intercepted in its return by M. Bibulus, who cruelly put all the crews to death; and the Pompeian fleet kept up such a strict watch along the coast, that the remainder of Caesar's army was obliged for the present to remain at Brundisium. Caesar was thus in a critical position, in the midst of the enemy's country, cut off from the rest of his army; but he knew that he could thoroughly rely on his men, and therefore immediately commenced acting on the offensive. After gaining possession of Oricum and Apollonia, he hastened northwards, in hopes of surprising Dyrrachium, where all Pompey's stores were deposited; but Pompey, by rapid marches, reached this town before him, and both armies then encamped opposite to each other, Pompey on the right and Caesar on the left bank of the river Apsus. Caesar was at length joined by the remainder of his troops, which were brought over from Brundisium with great difficulty by M. Antonius and Q. Pufius Caelum. Pompey meantime had retired to some high ground near Dyrrachium, and as he could not venture a battle with Caesar's veterans, Caesar began to blockade him in his position, and to erect lines of circumvallation of an extraordinary extent; but when these were nearly completed, Pompey forced a passage through Caesar's lines, and drove back his legions with considerable loss. Caesar thus found himself compelled to retreat from his present position, and accordingly commenced his march for Thessaly, pursued by Pompey's army, which was not however able to come up with him. Pompey's plan of avoiding a general engagement with Caesar's veterans till he could place more reliance upon his own troops, was undoubtedly a wise one, and had been hitherto crowned with success: but his victory at Dyrrachium and the retreat of the enemy inspired him with more confidence, and induced him to give heed to those of his officers who recommended him to bring the contest to an issue by an immediate battle. Ac-accordingly, when Pompey came up with Caesar, who was encamped on the plains of Pharsalus or Pharsalia, in Thessaly, he offered him battle, which was fought and won by Caesar. Their numbers were very unequal; Pompey had 45,000 foot-soldiers and 7000 horse, Caesar 22,000 foot-soldiers and 1000 horse. The battle, which was fought on the 9th of August, B. C. 48, according to the old calendar, ended in the total defeat of Pompey's army. Pompey fled to the court of Egypt, pursued by Caesar, but was murdered there before the latter arrived in the country. [Pompeius.]

The battle of Pharsalia decided the fate of the republic. When news of it reached Rome, various measures were passed, which confirmed in fact supreme power upon Caesar. Though absent, he was nominated dictator a second time, and that not for six months or a shorter time, but for a whole year. He appointed M. Antonius his master of the horse, and entered upon the office in September of this year (B. C. 48), so that the commencement and termination of his dictatorship and consulship did not coincide, as some modern writers have represented. He was also nominated to the consulship for the next five years, but this privilege he did not avail himself of; he was invested, moreover, with the tribunical power for life, and with the right of holding all the comitia for the election of the magistrates, with the exception of those for the choice of the plebeian tribunes; and it was for this reason that no magistrates except the tribunes of the plebs were elected for the next year, as Caesar did not return to Rome till September in B. C. 47.

Caesar went to Egypt, as we have already said, in pursuit of Pompey, and upon his arrival there, he became involved in a war, which detained him several months, and gave the remains of the Pompeian party time to rally and to make fresh preparations for continuing the war. The war in Egypt, usually called the Alexandrine war, arose from Caesar's resolving to settle the disputes respecting the succession to the kingdom. Caesar determined that Cleopatra, whose connections completely won his heart, and her elder brother Ptolemy should reign in common; but as this decision was opposed by the guardians of the young king, a war broke out between them and Caesar, in which he was for some time exposed to great danger on account of the small number of his forces. But, having received reinforcements, he finally prevailed, and placed Cleopatra and her younger brother on the throne, as the elder had perished in the course of the contest. It was soon after this, that Cleopatra had a son by Caesar. [Caesarion; Cleopatra.] After bringing the Alexandrine war to a close, in the latter end of March, B. C. 47, Caesar marched through Syria into Pontus in order to attack Pharnaces, the son of the celebrated Mithridates, who had defeated Cn. Domitius Calvinus, one of Caesar's legates. This war, however, did not detain him long; for Pharnaces, venturing to come to an open battle with the dictator, was utterly defeated, on the 2nd of August, near Zela. He had been proceeded to Rome, settling the affairs of the provinces in the way, and arrived in the capital in September. As the year of his dictatorship was nearly expiring, he caused himself to be appointed to the dignity again for a year, and he nominated M. Aemilius Lepidus his master of the horse. His third dictatorship consequently begins before the termination of the year 47. The property of Pompey and of several others of the aristocracy was now confiscated and sold by public auction. That he might the more easily reward his own friends, the dictator increased the number of pretors and of the members of the priestly colleges, and also introduced a great number of his partizans into the senate. For the remainder of this year he elevated Q. Fufius Calenus and P. Vatinius to the consulsiphip, but he caused himself and his master of the horse, M. Aemilius Lepidus to be elected consuls for the next year. It was during this time that he quelled a formidable mutiny of his troops which had broken out in Campania.

Caesar did not remain in Rome more than two or three months. With his usual activity and energy, he set out to Africa before the end of the year (B. C. 47), in order to carry on the war against Scipio and Cato, who had collected a large army in that country. Their forces were far greater than Caesar could bring against them at present; but he was well aware of the advantage which a general has in acting on the offensive, and had too much reliance on his own genius to be alarmed by mere disparity of numbers. At the commencement of the campaign, however, Caesar was in considerable difficulties; but, having been joined by some of his other legions, he was able to prosecute the campaign with more vigour, and finally brought it to a close by the battle of Thapsus, on the 6th of April, B. C. 46, in which the Pompeian army was completely defeated. Cato, finding himself unable to defend Utica, put an end to his brief life. The other towns in Africa submitted to the conqueror, and Caesar was thus able to be in Rome again by the latter end of July, according to the old calendar.

Caesar was now the undisputed master of the Roman world. As he drew near to Rome, great apprehensions were entertained by his enemies lest, notwithstanding his former clemency, he should imitate Marius and Sulla, and proscribe all his opponents. But these fears were perfectly groundless. A love of cruelty was no part of Caesar's nature; and, with a magnanimity which victors rarely shew, and least of all those in civil wars, he freely forgave all who had borne arms against him, and declared that he should make no distinction between Pompeians and Caesarians. His object was now to allay animosities, and to secure the lives and property of all the citizens of his new kingdom. As soon as the news of his African victory reached Rome, and before he himself arrived there, a public thanksgiving of forty days was decreed in his honour, and the dictatorship was bestowed upon him for ten years, and the censorship, under the new title of "Praefectus Morum," for three years. Caesar had never yet enjoyed a triumph; and, as he had now no further enemies to meet, he availed himself of the opportunity of celebrating his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa by four magnificent triumphs. None of these, however, were in favour of the senate in the civil war; and consequently his African triumph was to commemorate his victory over Juba, and not over Scipio and Cato. These triumphs were followed by largesses of corn and money to the people and the soldiers, by public banquets, and all sorts of entertainments. Never before had the games of the circus and the amphitheatre been celebrated with such splendour; for Caesar well knew the temper of the Roman populace, and that they would be willing enough to surrender their so-called liberties if they were well fed and amused.

Caesar next appears in the character of a legislator. He now proceeded to correct the various evils which had crept into the state, and to obtain the enactment of several laws suitable to the altered condition of the commonwealth. He attempted by severe sumptuary laws to restrain the extravagance which pervaded all classes of society. In order to prevent any other general from following his own career, he obtained a law by which no one was to be allowed to hold a provincial province for longer than one year, or a consular for more than two years.* But the most important of his changes this year (B.C. 46) was the reformation of the calendar, which was a real benefit to his country and the civilized world, and which he accomplished in his character as pontifex maximus, with the assistance of Sosigenes, the Alexandrine mathematician, and the scribe M. Flavian, though he himself also was well acquainted with astronomy. The regulation of the Roman calendar had always been entrusted to the college of pontiffs, who had been accustomed to lengthen or shorten the year at their pleasure for political purposes; and the confusion had at length become so great, that the Roman year was three months in advance of the real time.

To remedy this serious evil, Caesar added 90 days to this year, and thus made the whole year consist of 445 days; and he guarded against a repetition of similar errors for the future by adapting the year to the sun's course. (Dict. of Ant. a. e. Calendariam.)

In the midst of these labours, Caesar was interrupted by intelligence of a formidable insurrection which had broken out in Spain, where the remains of the Pompeian party had again collected a large army under the command of Pompey's sons, Caesar and Sextus. Having been previously designated consul and dictator for the following year, Caesar set out for Spain at the latter end of B.C. 46. With his usual activity, he arrived at Olbaico near Corduba in twenty-seven days from the time of his leaving Rome. He found the enemy able to offer stronger opposition than he had anticipated; but he brought the war to a close by the battle of Munda, on the 17th of March, B.C. 45, in which he entirely defeated the enemy. It was, however, a hard-fought battle: Caesar's troops were at first driven back, and were only rallied again by their general's exposing his own person, like a common soldier, in the front line of the battle. Cn. Pompeius was killed shortly afterwards, but Sextus made good his escape. The settlement of the affairs in Spain detained Caesar in the province some months longer, and he consequently did not reach Rome till September. He entered the city at the beginning of October in triumph on account of his victories in Spain, although the victory had been gained over Roman citizens, and he also allowed triumphs to his legates Fabius Maximus and Q. Pedius. The senate received him with the most servile flattery. They had in his absence voted a public thanksgiving of fifty days on account of his victory in Spain, and various other honorary decrees, and they now vied with each other in paying him every species of adulation and homage. He was to wear, on all public occasions, the triumphal robe; he was to receive the title of "Father of his country;" statues of him were to be placed in all the temples; his portrait was to be struck on coins; the month of Quintilis was to receive the name of Julius in his honour, and he was to be raised to a rank among the gods. But there were still more important decrees than these, which were intended to legalise his power and confer upon him the whole government of the Roman world. He received the title of imperator for life; he was nominated consul for the next ten years, and both dictator and praetor for life. His person was declared sacred; a guard of senators and knights was appointed to protect him, and the whole senate took an oath to watch over his safety.

If we now look at the way in which Caesar exerted his sovereign power, it cannot be denied that he used it in the main for the good of his country. He still pursued his former merciful course; no proscriptions or executions took place; and he began to revolve vast schemes for the benefit of the Roman world. He was at the same time obliged to reward his followers, and for that reason he greatly increased the number of senators, augmented the number of public magistrates, so that there were to be sixteen praetors, forty quaestors, and six aediles, and he added new members to the priestly colleges. Among his other plans of internal improvement, he proposed to frame a digest of all the Roman laws, to establish public libraries, to drain the Pomptine marshes, to enlarge the harbour of Ostia, and to dig a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. To protect the boundaries of the Roman empire, he mediated expeditions against the Parthians and the barbarous tribes on the Danube, and had already begun to make preparations for his departure to the East. In the midst of these vast projects he entered upon the last year of his life, B.C. 44, and his fifth consulship and dictatorship. He had made M. Antony his colleague in the consulate, and M. Lepidus the master of the horse. Caesar had for some time past resolved to preserve the state from many of the evils which subsequently arose from the anomalous constitution of the Roman empire as it was finally established by Augustus. The state would then have become an hereditary and not an elective monarchy, and would not have fallen into the hands of an insolent and rapacious soldiery.

Meantime, the conspiracy against Caesar's life had been already formed as early as the beginning of the year. It had been set afoot by Cassius, a personal enemy of Caesar's, and there were more than sixty persons privy to it. Personal hatred alone seems to have been the motive of Cassius, and probably of several others. Many of them had taken an active part in the war against Caesar, and had not only been forgiven by him, but raised to offices of rank and honour; but forgiveness by an enemy, instead of exciting gratitude, only renders the benefactor still more hateful to men of low and base minds. They pretended that their object was to restore liberty to the state, and some, perhaps M. Brutus among the rest, believed that they should be doing good service to their country by the assassination of its ruler. But the majority were undoubtedly actuated by the mere fact that every open attempt to crush their enemy had failed, and that they had now recourse to assassination as the only means of accomplishing their object. Their project was nearly discovered; but Caesar disregarded the warnings that had been given him, and fell by the daggers of his assassins in the senate-house, on the ides, or fifteenth, of March, n. c. 44.

Caesar's death was undoubtedly a loss not only for the Roman people, but for the whole civilized world. The republic was utterly lost; it could not have been restored; and if there had been any possibility of establishing it again, it would have fallen into the hands of a profligate aristocracy, which would probably have sought its own aggrandizement upon the ruins of its country. Now the Roman world was called to go through many years of disorder and bloodshed, till it rested again under the supremacy of Augustus, who had neither the talents, the power, nor the inclination to carry into effect the vast and salutary plans of his uncle. When we recollect the latter years of the Roman republic, the depravity and corruption of the ruling class, the scenes of anarchy and bloodshed which constantly occurred in the streets of the capital, it is evident that the last days of the republic had come, and that its only hope of peace and security was under the strong hand of military power. And it is given in Meyer's "Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta," some of which have been mentioned in the preceding account, and a complete list of which is given in Meyer's "Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta," p. 404, &c., 2nd ed. The ancient writers speak of Caesar as one of the greatest generals that the world has ever seen.

During the whole of his busy life Caesar found time for literary pursuits, and in the society and conversation of men of learning, he himself was the author of many works, the majority of which has been lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his "Commentaries," which are his only works that have come down to us. They relate the history of the first seven years of the Gallic war in seven books, and the history of the Civil war down to the commencement of the Alexandrine in three books. In them Caesar has carefully avoided all rhetorical embellishments; he narrates the events in a clear unassuming style, and with such apparent truthfulness that he carries conviction to the mind of the reader. They seem to have been composed in the course of his campaigns, and were probably worked up into their present form during his winter-quarters. The Commentaries on the Gallic War were published after the completion of the war in Gaul, and those on the Civil War probably after his return from Alexandria. The "Epithemerides" of Caesar must not be regarded as a separate work, but only as the Greek name of the "Commentary." Neither of these works, however, completed the history of the Gallic and Civil wars. The history of the former was completed in an eighth book, which is usually ascribed to Hirtius, and the history of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars were written in three separate books, which are also ascribed to Hirtius. The question of their authorship is discussed under Hirtius.

Besides the Commentaries, Caesar also wrote the following works, which have been lost, but the merit of which is made a proof of his literary activity and diversified knowledge:—1. "Orations," some of which have been mentioned in the preceding account, and a complete list of which is given in Meyer's "Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta," p. 404, &c., 2nd ed. The ancient writers speak of Caesar as one of the first orators of his age, and describe him as only second to Cicero. (Quintil. x. § 114; Vell. Pat. ii. 30;
Cic. Brut. 73, 74; Tac. Ann. xiii. 3, Dial. de Orat. 21; Plut. Caesar 3; Suet. Caesar 53.) 2. “Epistola,” of which several are preserved in the collection of Cicero’s letters, but there were still more in the time of Suetonius (Cais. 56) and Appian (B. C. ii. 76). 3. “Anticata,” in two books, hence sometimes called “Anticamente,” a work in reply to Cicero’s “Cato,” which the Roman orator wrote in praise of Cato after the death of the latter in B.C. 46. (Suet. l. c.; Gell. iv. 16; Suid. ad Ath. xii. 40, 41, xiii. 50, &c.) 4. “De Analogia,” or as Cicero explains it, “De Ratione Iatine loquendi,” in De Analogia,” or as Cicero (Suet. Brut. 11. 16; comp. Priscian, vi. p. 719, cd. Putsch.) 5. “De Astris,” in two books, which contained investigations on the heavenly bodies. (Macrob. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xviii. 25. s. 57, &c.) 6. “De Austrin,” in which he treated of the movements of the heavenly bodies. (Macro. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xviii. 25. s. 57, &c.) 7. “Apophthe- gmata,” or “Dicta col leaps,” a collection of good sayings and witty remarks of his own and other persons. It seems from Suetonius that Caesar had commenced this work in his youth, but he kept making additions to it even in his dictatorship, so that it at length comprised several volumes. This was one of Caesar’s works which Augustus suppressed. (Suet. l. c.; Suid. ad Fam. x. 16.) 8. “Poemata.” Two of these written in his youth, “Laudes Herulis” and a tragedy “Oedipus,” were suppressed by Augustus. He also wrote several epigrams, of which three are preserved in the Latin Anthology. (Nos. 69—70, ed. Meyer.) There was, too, an astronomical poem of Caesar’s, probably in imitation of Amtus’s, and lastly one entitled “Iter,” descriptive of his journey from the city to Spain, which he wrote at the latter end of the year B.C. 46, while he was on this journey. The edict of princes of Caesar’s Commentaries was printed at Rome in 1449, fol. Among the subsequent editions, the most important are by Jungermann, containing a Greek translation of the seven books of the Gallic war made by Planudes (Francof. 1606, 4to., and 1669, 4to.); by Graevius, with the life of Caesar, ascribed to Julius Celsus (Amst. 1697, 8vo., and Lug. Bat. 1713, 8vo.); by Cellarius (Lips. 1705); by Davis, with the Greek translation of Planudes (Cant. 1706, 1727, 4to.); by Oedendorp (Lugd. Bat. 1737, 4to., Stuttgart, 1722, 8vo.); by Morus (Lips. 1730, 8vo.), re-edited by Oberlin (Lips. 1805, 1819, 8vo.). (The principal ancient sources for the life of Caesar are the biographies of him by Suetonius and Plutarch, the histories of Dion Cassius, Appian, and Valerius Paterculus, and the letters and orations of Cicero. The life of Caesar ascribed to Julius Celsus, of Constantinople, who lived in the seventh century after Christ, is a work of Petarck’s, as has been shown by C. F. Ch. Schneider in his work entitled "Petrarcha, Historia Julii Cae- saris," Lips. 1827. Among modern works the best account of Caesar’s life is in Drumann’s Geschichte der Romanen. Caesar’s campaigns have been criticized by Napoleon in the work entitled “Précis des Guerres de César par Napoléon, écrit par M. Marchand, à l’île Sainte-Hélène, sous la dictée de l’Empereur,” Paris, 1836.) For an account of Caesar’s coins, see Eckhel, vol. vi. pp. 1—17. His likeness is given in the two coins annexed; in the latter the natural baldness of his head is concealed by a crown of laurel. (See also p. 516.)

19, 20, 21. JULIUS [JULIUS.] 22. CAESARIAN. [CAESARIAN.] 23. SEX. JULIUS CAESAR, son of No. 17, was Flamen Quirinalis, and is mentioned in the history of the year B.C. 57. (Cic. de Harp. Resp. 6.) 24. SEX. JULIUS CAESAR, son probably of No. 23, as he is called by Appian with his own soldiers at the instigation of Cassius Bassus, who had revolted against the dictator. (Cais. B. C. ii. 20; Hist. B. Alex. 66; Dion Cass. xxvii. 36; Appian, B. C. iii. 77; compare BASSUS, CAESARIUS.) C. CAESAR and L. CAESAR, the sons of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, and the grandsons of Augustus. Caius was born in n. c. 20 and Lucius in n. c. 17, and in the latter year they were both adopted by Augustus. In n. c. 13, Caius, who was then only seven years of age, took part with other patrician youths in the Trojan game at the dedication of the temple of Marcellus by Augustus. In n. c. 8, Caius accompanied Tiburinius in his campaign against the Sigurians, in order to become acquainted with military exercises. Augustus carefully superintended the education of both the youths, but they early showed signs of an arrogant and overbearing temper, and imparted their grandfathers to bestow upon them public marks of honour. Their requests were seconded by the entreaties of the people, and granted by Augustus, who, under the appearance of a refusal, was exceedingly anxious to grant them the honours they solicited. Thus they were declared consuls elect, and principles juventutis before they had laid aside the dress of childhood. Caius was nominated to the consulship in n. c. 5, but was not to enter upon it till five years afterwards. He assumed the toga virilis in the same year, and his brother in n. c. 2.
CAESARION.

Caius was sent into Asia in B. C. 1, where he passed his consulship in the following year, A. D. 1. About this time Phraetates IV., king of Parthia, seized upon Armenia, and Caius accordingly prepared to make war against him, but the Parthian king gave up Armenia, and settled the terms of peace at an interview with Caius on an island in the Euphrates. (A. p. 2.) After this Caius went to take Antony, son of Antony, but was treacherously wounded before the town of Artagers in this country. Of this wound he never recovered, and died some time afterwards at Limyra in Lycia, on the 21st of February, A. D. 4. His brother Lucius had died eighteen months previously, on August 20th, A. D. 2, at Massilia, on his way to Spain. Their bodies were brought to Rome. Some suspected that their death was occasioned by their step-mother Livia. (Dion Cass. liv. 8, 18, 26, iv. 6, 9, 11, 12; Zonar. x. p. 539; Suet. Aug. 26, 56, 64, 65, 70, 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 101, 102; Tac. Ann. i. 3, ii. 4; Florus. iv. 12. § 42; Lapidis Anonymus.)

C. Caesar married Livia or Livilla, the daughter of Antonia (Antonia, No. 6), who afterwards married the younger Drusus, but he left no issue. (Tac. Ann. iv. 40.) L. Caesar was to have married Asenilla Lepida, but died previously. (Ann. iii. 23.) There are several coins both of Caius and Lucius; their portraits are given in the one annexed. (Eckhel, vi. p. 170.)

CAESARIUS. [CALIGULA.]

CAESARIUS, the son of Cleopatra, originally called Ptolemaeus as an Egyptian prince, was born soon after the departure of Julius Caesar from Alexandria in B. C. 47, and probably accompanied his mother to Rome in the following year. Cleopatra said that he was the son of Julius Caesar, and there seems little doubt of this from the time at which Caesarion was born, from the favorable reception of his mother at Rome, and from the dictator allowing him to be called after his own name. Antonius declared in the senate, doubtless after Caesar's death and for the purpose of annoying Augustus, that the dictator had acknowledged Caesarion as his son, but Oppius wrote a treatise to prove the contrary.

In consequence of the assistance which Cleopatra had afforded Dolabella, she obtained from the triumvirs in B. C. 42 permission for her son Caesarion to receive the title of king of Egypt. In B. C. 34, Antony conferred upon him the title of king of kings; he subsequently called him in his will the son of Caesar, and after the battle of Actium (A. c. 31) declared him and his own son Antyllus to be of age. When everything was lost, Cleopatra sent Caesarion with great treasures by way of Aethiopia to India; but his tutor Rhodon persuaded him to return, alleging that Augustus had determined to give him the kingdom of Egypt. After the death of his mother, he was executed by order of Augustus. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 31; xlix. 41; l. 1, 3, 6, 6; Suet. Cass. 52, Aug. 17; Plut. Cass. 19, Anton. 54, 81, 92.)

CAESARIUS, ST. (Aurelius), a physician who is however better known as having been the brother of St. Gregory Theologus. He was born of Christian parents, his father (whose name was Greg¬ory) being bishop of Nazianus. He was careful¬ly educated, and studied at Alexandria, where he made great progress in astronomy, arithmetic, and medicine. He afterwards embraced the medical profession, and settled at Constantinople, where he enjoyed a great reputation, and became the friend and physician of the emperor Constantius, A. d. 337—360. Upon the accession of Julian, Caesarius was tempted by the emperor to apostatize to paganism; but he refused, and chose rather to leave the court and return to his native country. After the death of Julian, he was recalled to court, and held in high esteem by the emperors Jovian, Valens, and Valentinian, by one of whom he was appointed quenoster of Bithynia. At the time of the earthquake at Nicaea, he was present in a remarkable manner, upon which his brother St. Gregory, moves occasion to write a letter (which is still extant, Ep. 29, vol. ii. p. 19, ed. Paris, 1840), urging upon him the duty of abandoning all worldly cares, and giving himself up entirely to the service of God. This he had long wished to do, but was now prevented from putting his design into execution by his death, which took place A. d. 369, shortly after his baptism. His brother pronounced a funeral oration on the occasion, which is still extant (Orat. 7, vol. i. p. 198), and from which the preceding particulars of his life are taken; and also wrote several short poems, or epitaphs, lamenting his death. (Opera, vol. ii. p. 1110, &c.) There is extant, under the name of Caesarius, a short Greek work, with the title Heterai, Quaestiones Theologicae et Philosophicae, which, though apparently considered, in the time of Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 210), to belong to the brother of St. Gregory, is now generally believed to be the work of some other person. The contents of the book are sufficiently indicated by the title. It has been several times published with the works of his brother, St. Gregory, and in collections of the Fathers; and also separately, in Greek and Latin, August. Vindel. 1626, 4to. ed. Elias Ebingher. The memory of St. Caesarius is celebrated in the Rom¬ish Church on Feb. 25. (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 25, vol. v. p. 496, &c.; Lambe. Biblioth. Vindicat. vol. iv. p. 66, &c., ed. Kollar; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 435, 436.)

CAESARIUS, a distinguished ecclesiastic of the fifth and sixth centuries, was born at Chalons in 468, devoted his youth to the discipline of a monastic life, and was elected bishop of Arles in 502. He presided over this see for forty years, during which period he was twice accused of treason, first against Alaric, and afterwards against Theodoric, but upon both occasions was honourably acquitted. He took an active share in the delibe¬rations of several councils of the church, and gained peculiar celebrity by his strenuous exertions for the suppression of the Semipelagian doctrines, which had been promulgated about a century before by Cassianus, and had spread widely in southern Gaul. A life of Caesarius, which however must be considered rather in the light of a panegyric than of a sober biography, was composed by his friend and pupil, Cyrilus, bishop of Toulon.
CAESIA GEN

Caesius is the author of two treatises, one entitled Regula ad Monachos, and another Regula ad Virginis, which, together with three Exhortations and some opuscula, will be found in the 8th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum, Leyden, 1677; and were printed in a separate volume, with the notes of Meynardus, at Potters' (Potterm.), 1621, 8vo. A third work, now, consist of sections or homilies. Forty of these were published by Cognatus, at Baze, 1658, 4to, and 1650, fol., and are included in the Monumenta SS. Patrum Orthodoxographa of Gymnus, Cologne, 1618, fol. p. 1861; a collection of forty-six, together with some smaller tracts, are in the 8th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum referred to above; and the 11th volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (Venice, 1776) contains fourteen more, first brought to light by Baluze (Paris, 1699, 8vo); but, besides these, upwards of a hundred out of the 317 discourses falsely attributed to Augustin are commonly assigned to Caesarius. (Vita S. Caesarii, Episc. Arretensis, a Cyriannio, ejus Discipulo, et Messamnui Pres. et Stephano Disc. conscrivis, duos libris, in the Vita SS. del Suris, 27 August. p. 364. Eccles. vol. i. p. 1339; in addition to which, Fundicius, De Inverti et Decrepti Status Generum Latinam, cap. vi. § viii.; and Baehr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, Suppl. vol. ii. p. 425.)

[W. R.]

CAESENNIUS, the name of a noble Etruscan family at Tarquinii, two members of which are mentioned by Cicero, namely, P. Caesennius and Caesennius, first the wife of M. Fulcinius, and afterwards of A. Caesinius. (Cic. pro Cæcin. 4, 6, 10.) The name is found in sepulchral inscriptions. (Müller, Études, i. p. 433.)

CAESENNIUS LENTO. [LENTO.]

CAESENNIUS PAETUS. [PAETUS.]

C. CAESTETIUS, a Roman knight, who entertained Caesar to pardon Q. Ligarius. (Cic. Verr. i. 30.)

P. CAESTETIUS, the quaestor of C. Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 65, v. 25.)

CAESTIUS FLAVUS. [FLAVIUS.]

CAESTIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

CAESSIA, a surname of Minerva, a translation of the Greek Ἰωνία (Terent. Heaut. v. 5, 18; Cic. De Nat. Diem. i. 30. [L. S.])

CAESSIA GENSI, plebeian, does not occur till towards the end of the republic. [CAESIUS.]

On the following coin of this gens, the obverse represents the head of a youthful god brandishing an arrow or spear with three points, who is usually supposed to be following the passage of A. Gallius (v. 12) to be Apollo Velivis: "Simulacrum dei Velivis — sagittas tenet, quae sunt videlicet paratae ad nocendum. Quapropertium num deum plerique Apollinem esse dixerunt." The two men on the reverse are Lores: between them stands a dog, and above them the head of Vulcan with a falx. (Eckhel, v. p. 156, &c.)

CAESIANSUS, APRONIUS. [APRONIUS, No. 3.]

CAESIUS. 1. M. CAESIUS, was præcox with C. Licinius Sacerdos in B.c. 75. (Cic. Verr. i. 50.)

2. M. CAESIUS, a prosperous farmer of the tithes in Sicily during the administration of Verres, B.c. 73. &c. (Cic. Verr. iii. 30, 43.)

3. L. CAESIUS, a freedman of Cicero's friends, and accompanied him during his proconsular administration of Cilicia, in B.C. 50. (Ad Quint. Frat. i. § 4, 2 § 2.) He seems to be the same person as the Caesius who superintended the building of Q. Cicerio's villa of the Manilianum. (Ad Quint. Frat. iii. i. § 1, 2.) There is a Roman decarius bearing the name L. Caesius (see above), but whether it belongs to our L. Caesius or not cannot be ascertained.

4. M. CAESIUS, of Arpinum, an intimate friend of Cicero, who held the office of aedile at Arpinum, the only municipal which had such a magistracy, in B.C. 47. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 47.)

5. P. CAESIUS, a Roman equestrian of Ravenna, received the Denarius of Augustus from Cn. Pompeius, the father of Pompey the Great. (Cic. pro Balb. 22.) There is a letter of Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 51) addressed to P. Caesius (B.C. 47), in which Cicero recommends to him his friend P. Messius. From the manner in which Cicero there speaks (pro nostra et pro poternia amicitia), it would almost seem as if there was some mistake in the pronouns, and as if the letter was addressed to M. Caesius of Arpinum. But it may be, that there had existed a friendship between Cicero and the father of Caesius, of which beyond this allusion nothing is known.

6. SEX. CAESIUS, a Roman equestrian, who is mentioned by Cicero (pro Flacco, 20) as a man of great honesty and integrity. (L. S.)

T. CAESIUS, a jurist, one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius, the eminent friend of Cicero. Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. us. § 44) enumerates ten disciples of Servius, among whom T. Caesius is mentioned, in a passage not free from the inaccuracy of expression which pervades the whole title De Origine Juris. His words are these: "Ab hoc (Servio) plurimi profeccrunt: fere tamcn hi libros conscripserunt: Alfinus Varus, A. Oflisius, T. Cae'sius, Aupidius Tucca, Aupidius Namusia, Flavius Priscus, Apestius Pachyus, Labbo Antistius, Labebus Antiitius pater, Cinna, Publicius Gallius. Ex his decem libros octo conscripserunt, quorum omnes qui fuerunt libri digesti sunt ab Aupidio Namusia in centum quadranginta libros." It is not clear from this account whether (according to the usual interpretation of the passage) only eight of the ten were authors, or whether (as appears to be the more correct interpretation) all the ten wrote books, but not more than eight wrote books which were digested by Aupidius Namusia. In the computation of the eight, it is probable that the compiler himself was not included. T. Caesius is nowhere else expressly mentioned in the Digest, but * Oflius, Cassellius, et Servi audiitorum. are cited Dig. 33. tit. 4. s. 6. § 1, and the phrase Servi audiitorum occurs also Dig. 33. tit. 2. 15, pr. and Dig. 33. tit. 7. s. 12, § 6. In Dig. 33. tit. 3. s. 1. § 6, where Servi audi torum is the reading of the Fiorentine manuscript of the Digest, Servii auditores has been proposed as a conjectural emendation. Under these names it has been supposed that the eight disciples of Servius, or rather Namusa's Digest of their works, is referred to. If so, it is likely that the eight included T. Caesius, and did not include A. Oflius. Dirksen (Beitraege zur Kunde des Röm. Rechts, p. 23, n. 52, et p. 329), who thinks this supposition unnecessary, does not, in our opinion, set Galilus (vs. 5) this quote the words of a treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians from Alfenus, "in libro Digestorum trigesimo et quarto, Conjectancorum [al. Coniectaneorum] autem secundo." As it is known from the Florentine Index, that Alfenus wrote forty books Digestorum, and as no other work of his is elsewhere mentioned, it has been supposed that the Conjectanea or Conjectanea cited by Galilus is identical with the compilation of Namus in which were digested the works of Servius auditors. It must be observed, however, that the Florentine Index ordinarily enumerates those works only from which the compiler of the Digest made extracts, and that the Roman jurists frequently inserted the same passages verbatim in different treatises. But the latter practice was common and may be proved by glancing at the insertions of the fragments and the formulae of citation, as collected in the valuable treatise of Ant. Augustinus, de Nominaulis Propriis Panderctorum. For example, in Dig. 4. tit. 4. a. 3. § 1, Ulpian cites Ceius, "Epitolarum libro undecimo et Digestorum secundo." (Bertrandt, Dion. Nomm. a. 18; Quil. Grotii, Vitae Dcloruma, i. 11. § 3; Zimmern, R. R. G. i. § 79.) [J. T. G.]

CAESIUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]
CAESIUS CORDUS. [Cordus.]
CAESIUS NASTCA. [Nasica.]
CAESIUS TAURUS. [Taurus.]
CAESONIA, or according to Dion Cassius (lx. 29), MILONIA CAESONIA, was at first the mistress and afterwards the wife of the emperor Caligula. She was neither handsome nor young when Caligula fell in love with her; but she was a woman of the greatest licentiousness, and, at the time when her intimacy with Caligula begun, she was already mother of three daughters by another man. Caligula was then married to Lollia Paulina, but however he divorced her in order to marry Caesonia, who was with child by him, a. d. 38. According to Suetonius (Cal. 25) Caligula married her on the same day that she was delivered of a daughter (Julia Drusilla); whereas, according to Dion Cassius, this daughter was born one month after the marriage. Caesonia contrived to preserve the attachment of her imperial husband down to the end of his life (Suet. Cal. 35, 38; Dion. Cass. liv. 20); but she is said to have effected this by love and favor, while Caligula was in his prime, and to which some persons attributed the unsettled state of Caligula's mental powers during the latter years of his life. Caesonia and her daughter were put to death on the same day that Caligula was murdered, a. d. 41. (Suet. Cal. 59; Dion Cass. liv. 29; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xii. 2. § 4.) [L. S.]

CAESONIUS. [Pros.]
CAESONIUS, SULIUS, was one of the parties accused a. d. 48, when Messalina, the wife of Claudius, was so far in contempt of her husband as to marry the young eunuch, C. Silius. Tacitus says, that Caesonia saved his life through his vices, and that on the occasion of Messalina's marriage he disguised himself in the basest manner. [Tac. Ann. xii. 86.] [L. S.]

M. CAESONIUS, one of the judges at Rome, an upright man, who displayed his integrity in the inquiry into the murder of Cluentius, n. c. 74, when C. Junius presided over the court. He was made aedile with Cicero in n. c. 70, and consequently would not have been able to act as judex in the following year, a. d. 48, but a magistrate was not allowed to discharge the duties of judex during his year of office. This was one reason among others why the friends of Verres were anxious to postpone his trial till n. c. 69. The pretorship of Caesonia is not mentioned, but he must have obtained it in the same year as Cicero, namely, n. c. 66, as Cicero writes to Atticus in 65, that there was some talk of Caesonia becoming a candidate with him for the consulship. (Cic. Ferr. Act. i. 10; Pseudo-Ascon. in loc.; Cic. ad Att. i. 1.) This Caesonia is probably the one whom Cicero speaks of in n. c. 45. (Ad Att. xii. 11.)

CAESONIUS MAXIMUS. [Maximus.]
CAESUSNLUS/PISO. A Roman orator, who was already an old man, when Cicero heard him. Cicero considered the work of Alfenus as having been done by the vices of the author, and adds, that he never heard any one who was more skilful in drawing suspicions upon persons, and in making them out to be criminals. He appears to have been one of the many low persons of those times, with whom accusation was a regular business. [L. S.]

C. CAETRONIUS, legate of the first legion in Germany at the accession of Tiberius in a. d. 14. A mutiny had broken out among the soldiers, but they soon repent, and brought their ring-leaders in chains before C. Caetronius, who tried and punished them in a manner which had never been adopted before, and must be considered as an usurpation of the soldiery. The legions (the first and twentieth) met with drawn swords and formed a sort of popular assembly. The accused individual was led to some elevated place, so as to be seen by all, and when the multitude declared him guilty, he was forthwith put to death. This sort of court-martial was looked upon in later times as a welcome precedent. (Tacit. Ann. i. 44; Ammian, Marc. xxix. 5.) [L. S.]

CAFO or CAPHO, a centurion and one of Caesar's veteran soldiers, was a zealous supporter of Antony after the murder of Caesar in n. c. 44, and is accordingly frequently denounced by Cicero. (Phil. vii. 3, 9, x. 10, xi. 5.)

CAIUS or GAIA'NUS (Palaivos), a Greek rhetorician and sophist, was a native of Athens and a disciple of Apesines and Gadaem, and he accordingly lived in the reign of the emperors Maximi and Gordianus. He taught rhetoric at Berytus, and is accordingly frequently denounced by Cicero. (Phil. vii. 3, 9, x. 10, xi. 5.)

to have been called after her. (Klause, Aeneas st. d. Pent. p. 1044, &c.)

CALIUS or GAIUS (Gaius). 1. The jurist.

2. A Platonic philosopher who is mentioned as an author by Porphyry (Vit. Phil. 14), but of his writings nothing is known. Galen (vol. vi. p. 532, ed. Paris) states, that he heard the disciples of Caius, from which we must infer that Caius lived some time before Galen.

4. A presbyter of the church of Rome, who lived about 310. He was at a later time elected bishop of the gentiles, which probably means, that he received a commission as a missionary to some heathen people, and the power of superintending the churches that might be planted among them. (Phot. Cod. 48.) While he was yet at Rome he engaged in the celebrated disputations with Proculus, the champion of the Montanist heresy, and he subsequently published the whole transaction in the form of a dialogue. (Euseb. H. E. ii. 25, iii. 23, vi. 20.) He also wrote a work against the heresy of Artemon, and a third work, called Αὐτουτος, which some consider to be the same as the work Πευκωνίως SVL, which is still extant, and is usually ascribed to Hippolytus. He denied the Epistle to the Hebrews to be the work of St. Paul, and accordingly counted only 13 genuine epistles of the latter view, Calamites would be a hero of the Great; but when he was taken ill afterwards, he refused to change his mode of living, and in order to get rid of the sufferings of human life altogether, he solemnly burnt himself on a pyre in the presence of the whole Macedonian army, without evincing any symptom of pain. (Artian, Anab. vii. 2, &c.; Aelian, V. H. ii. 41, v. 6; Plut. Alex. 69; Strab. xv. p. 686; Diod. xiv. 107; Athen. x. p. 457; Lucian, De M. Ferg. 25; Cic. Tusc. ii. 22, De Divers. i. 22, 30; Val. Max. i. 3, Ext. 10.) His real name was, according to Phutarch (Alex. 65), Sphines, and he received the name Calanus because in saluting persons he used the form καλανος instead of the Greek χαιρεται. What Phutarch here calls καλανος is probably the Sanscrit form galvans, which is commonly used in addressing a person, and signifies good, just, or distinguished. Josephus (a. Apion. i. p. 484) states, that all the Indian philosophers were called Kaalanes, but this statement is without any foundation, and is probably a mere invention. (Lassen, in the Rhein. Museum, für Philol. i. p. 176.)

5. CALAS or CALLAS (Καλας, Καλας). 1. Son of the tritor Harpalus of Eumolpos, and first cousin to Antigonus, king of Asia, held a command in the army which Philip sent into Asia under Parmenion and Attalus, n. c. 336, to further his cause among the Greek cities there. In n. c. 335, Calas was defeated in a battle in the Trond by Memnon, the Rhodian, but took refuge in Blaenaeum. (Diod. xiv. 91, xvii. 7.) At the battle of the Granicus, n. c. 334, he led the Thessalian cavalry in Alexander's army, and was appointed by him in the same year to the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellenic Pontine Phrygias, to which Paphlagonia was soon added. (Arr. Anab. i. p. 14, e., ii. p. 31, d.; Curt. iii. 1, § 24; Diod. xvii. 17.) After this we do not hear of Calas: it would seem, however, that he died before the treaty and flight of

as we know from Harpalus, p. 68, note 29; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii. p. 179, note 25. 2. One of Cassander's generals, whom he sent with a portion of his forces to keep Polyperchon employed in Perrhaibia, while he himself made his way to Macedon to take vengeance on Olympias, n. c. 317. Calas by bribes induced many of his opponent's soldiers to desert him, and blockaded Polyperchon himself in Naxium, a town of Perrhaibia, whence, on hearing of the death of Olympias, he escaped with a few attendants, and took refuge together with Aecides in Aetolia, n. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 35, 36, 52.)

CALATINUS, A. ATLILUS, a distinguished Roman general in the first Punic war, who was twice consul and once dictator. His first consulship falls in n. c. 258, when he obtained Sicily as his province according to Livy. (Livy. Epit. 19; Suet. Aug. vii. 39, where he is called C. Sulpicius Patereclus but according to other authorities alone, to conduct the war against the Carthaginians. He first took the town of Hipponia, and afterwards the strongly fortified Myrtusstatum, which the enemy was induced to leave in ashes. (Zonar. viii. 11, where he is erroneously called Latinus instead of Calatinus.) Immediately after he attacked Camarina, but during the siege he fell into an ambush, and would have perished with his army, had it not been for the generous exertions of a tribune who is commonly called Calpurnius Flamma, though his name is not the same in all authorities. (Livy. Epit. 17, xxii. 60; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6; Oros. iv. 8; Florus, ii. 2, § 13, who erroneously calls Attius Calatinus dictator; Aurel. Vict. De Vir. Illust. 39; Gell. iii. 7; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 5, § 10.) After his escape from this danger, he conquered Camarina, Enna, Drepanum, and other places, which had till then been in the possession of the Carthaginians. Towards the close of the year he made an attack upon Lipara, where the operations were continued by his successor. On his return to Rome he was crowned with a triumph. In n. c. 254 he was invested with the consulsiphip a second time. Shortly before this event the Romans had lost nearly their whole fleet in a storm off Cape Pachynum, but Attius Calatinus and his colleague Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina built a new fleet of 220 ships in the short space of three months, and both the consuls then sailed to Sicily. The main event of that year was the capture of Panormus. (Polyb. i. 38; Zonar. viii. 14.) In n. c. 249 Attius Calatinus was appointed dictator for the purpose of carrying on the war in Sicily in the place of Claudius Glycia. But nothing of importance was accomplished during his dictatorship, which is remarkable only for being the first instance in Roman history of a dictator commanding an army out of Italy. (Livy. Epit. 19; Suet. Tiber. 2; Zonar. viii. 15; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 17.)

Several years later, in n. c. 241, he was chosen as mediator between the proconsul C. Lutatius Catulus and the proetor Q. Valerius, to decide which of the two had the right to claim a triumph, and he decided in favour of the latter according to Polybius (Polyb. i. 38; Zonar. viii. 14.) Beyond the fact that he built a temple of Spes nothing further is known about him. (Cic. De Leg. ii. 11; De Nat. Deor. ii. 23; Tacit. Ann. ii. 49; comp. Liv. xxiv. 47, xxv. 7.) A. Attius Calatinus was a man highly esteemed both by his contemporaries and by posterity, and his tomb was adorned with the inscription "unum hunc plurimae consentiens gentes populi primarium frater." (Cic. De Secret. 17, De Finis, ii. 35, pro Planc. 25.)

CALAVIUS, the name of a distinguished Campanian family or gens. In conjunction with some other Campanians, the Calavi are said to have set fire to various parts of Rome, b. c. 211, in order to avenge themselves for what the Campanians had suffered from the Romans. A slave of the Calavi betrayed the crime, and the whole family, together with their slaves who had been accomplices in the crime, were arrested and punished. (Liv. xxvi. 27.)

1. 2. Novius Calavius and Ovius Calavius are mentioned as the leaders of the conspiracy which broke out at Capua in b. c. 314. C. Massinias was appointed dictator to coerce the insurgents, and the two Calavis, together with the consuls, it is said, having been captured, were made away with. (Liv. xix. 34.)

3. Opillius Calavius, son of Ovius Calavius, was a man of great distinction at Capua, and when in b. c. 321 the Campanians exulted over the defeat of the Romans at Caudium, and believed that their spirit was broken, Opillius Calavius taught his fellow-citizens to look at the matter in another light, and advised them to be on their guard. (Liv. xix. 26.)

4. Pacuvius Calavius, a contemporary of Hannibal, and a man of great popularity and influence, who, according to the Roman accounts, acquired his power by evil arts, and sacrificed everything to gratify his ambition and love of dominion. In b. c. 217, when Hannibal had gained his victory on lake Trasimenus, Pacuvius Calavius happened to be invested with the chief magistracy at Capua. He had good reasons for believing that the people of Capua, who were hostile towards the senate, intended on the approach of Hannibal to murder all the senators, and surrender the town to the Carthaginians. In order to prevent this and to secure his ascendancy over both parties, he made recourse to the following stratagem. He assembled the senate and declared against a revolt from Rome; first, because he was connected with the Romans by marriage, his own wife being a daughter of Appius Claudius, and one of his daughters married to a Roman. He then revealed to the senate the intentions of the people, and declared that he would save the senators if they would entrust himself to them. Fear induced the senators to do as he desired. He then shut all the senators up in the senate-house, and had the doors well guarded, so that no one could leave or enter the edifice. Upon this he assembled the people, told them that all the senators were his prisoners, and advised them to subject each senator to a trial, but before executing one, to elect a better and juster one in his stead. The sentence of death was easily pronounced upon the first senator that was brought to trial, but it was not so easy to elect a better one. The disputes about a successor grew more and more, and the Romans were disgusted with their own proceedings, which led to no results. They accordingly ordered that the old senators should retain their dignity and be liberated. Calavius, who by this stratagem had laid the senators under great obligations to himself and the popular party, not only brought about a reconciliation being made between the people and the senate, but secured to himself the greatest influence in the republic, which he employed to induce his fellow-citizens to espouse the cause of Hannibal. After the battle of Cannae, in b.c. 216, Hannibal took up his winter-quarters at Capua. Perolla, the son of Calavius, had been the strongest opponent of the Carthaginians, and had sided with Decius Magnus, but his father obtained his pardon from Hannibal, who even invited father and son to a great entertainment which he gave to the most distinguished Campanians. But Perolla could not conquer his hatred of the Carthaginians, and had sided with Decius Magnus, and went to the repeat armed with a sword, intending to murder Hannibal. When Pacuvius Calavius left the banquet-room, his son followed him and told him of his plan; but the father worked upon the young man's feelings, and induced him to abandon his bloody design. (Liv. xxiii. 2—4.)

cmpus met the famous soothsayer Mopsus in the wild fig-tree, or the number of pigs which a soothsayer repeated his prophecy. This excited Calchas to such a fit of laughter, that he dropped the cup and choked. (Scrv. vi. 72.)

When the grapes had grown ripe and wine was made of them, Calchas invited the soothsayer among his other guests. Even at the moment when Calchas held the cup of wine in his hand, the soothsayer repeated his prophecy. This excited Calchas so much that he dropped the cup and choked. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 72.)

A third tradition, lastly, states that, when Calchas disputed with Mopsus the administration of the oracle at Chlos, he promised victory to Amphimachus, king of the Lyceans, while Mopsus said that he would not be victorious. The latter prophecy was fulfilled; and Calchas, in his grief at this defeat, put an end to his life. (Conon, Narrat. 6.)

Respecting the oracle of Calchas in Daunia, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oraclum. [L. S.]

CALCAS (Καλχας), a son of Thestor of Mycenae or Megara, was the wisest soothsayer among the Greeks at Troy. (Hom. I. i. 60, &c., xiii. 70.)

He foretold the Greeks the duration of the Trojan war, even before they sailed from Aulis, and while they were engaged in the war he explained to them the cause of the anger of Apollo. (H. ii. 322; Ov. Met. xii. 19, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 97; Paus. i. 43, § 1.)

An oracle had declared that Calchas should die if he should meet with a soothsayer superior to himself; and this came to pass at Chlos, for Calchas met the famous soothsayer Mopsus in the grove of the Clarian Apollo, and was defeated by him in not being able to state the number of figs on a wild fig-tree, or the number of pigs which a sow was going to give birth to—things which Mopsus told with perfect accuracy. Hereupon, Calchas is said to have died with grief. (Strab. xiv. p. 642, &c., 668; Tzetz. ad Lyceoph. 427, 980.)

Another story about his death runs thus: a soothsayer saw Calchas planting some vines in the grove of Apollo near Grynium, and foretold him that the grapes would never drink any of the wine produced by them. When the grapes had grown ripe and wine was made of them, Calchas invited the soothsayer among his other guests. Even at the moment when Calchas held the cup of wine in his hand, the soothsayer repeated his prophecy. This excited Calchas so much that he dropped the cup and choked. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 72.)

A third tradition, lastly, states that, when Calchas disputed with Mopsus the administration of the oracle at Chlos, he promised victory to Amphimachus, king of the Lyceans, while Mopsus said that he would not be victorious. The latter prophecy was fulfilled; and Calchas, in his grief at this defeat, put an end to his life. (Conon, Narrat. 6.)

CALCUS or CALDUS (Καλκῆς, καλδός), a plebeian gens. The word caldus is a shortened form of calidus, and hence Cicero (de Invent. ii. 9) says, "aliquem Caldum vocari, quod temerario et repentino consilio sit." [L. S.]

a native of the town of Apri or Aprus in Thrace, and before he was made patriarch he held a high ecclesiastical office at the court of the emperor Andronicus. He delivered a great number of homilies at Constantinople, which created great sensation, and he had the reputation of being still extant in MS. But only two of them have been published by Greater (De Crucc. ii. p. 1363, &c., and 1477, &c.), and the latter under the erroneous name of Philotheus. (Cave. Hist. Lit. ii. p. 497, &c., ed. Lond.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xi. p. 591, &c.)

CALECAS, MANUEL (Μανουήλ Κάλκας), a relative of Joannes Calceas, appears to have lived about A. D. 1360, as he combated the doctrines of Palamas. He is said to have been a monk of the Dominican order, and was the author of several works. Though he himself was a Greek, he wrote against the Greek church and in favour of that of Rome, for which he is, of course, highly praised by the adherents of the Roman church. The following list contains those of his works which are published:—1. "Libri iv adversus errores Grecorum de Processione Spiritus Sanctor." The Greek original has not yet been printed, but a Latin translation was made at the command of Pope Martin V. by Ambrosius Camaldulensis, and was edited with a commentary by P. Stenartius, Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xi. p. 455, &c. (Wharton's appendix to Cave's Hist. Lit. i. p. 55, &c.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xi. p. 455, &c.)

CALENUS, [OLENUS.]

CALÉNUS, the name of a family of the Fufa gens, is probably derived from Cales, a municipium in Campania; but whether the name merely indicated the origin of the family, or whether the first who bore it, derived it from having conquered the town of Cales is uncertain, though the latter is the more probable supposition. The name occurs on a coin of the Fufa gens. (Eckhel, v. p. 220, &c.)

1. Q. Fufius Calenus is mentioned only by Cicero (Philipp. viii. 4) as one who thought, that P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica was the greatest man in the republic, because he had delivered the state from the obnoxious Tib. Gracchus. From this sentiment it may be inferred, that Fufius Calenus occupied a considerable portion of the public land.

2. Q. Fufius Q. f. C. n. Calenus, son of No. 1, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 61, and participated in the battle of Pharsalia, and is stated to have been elevated by Milo, and in the year following he was made aslegate of Caesar in Gaul. On the outbreak of the civil war in B. C. 49, Calenus hastened in the month of March to meet Caesar at Brundusium, and on his journey thither he called upon Cicero at his Formian Villa, on which occasion he called Pompey a criminal, and charged the senate with levity and folly. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 5.) When Caesar afterwards went to Spain, Calenus again followed him as legate; and after Caesar had gone to Epeirus, Calenus was sent to fetch over the remainder of the troops from Italy. But while he was crossing over from Epeirus to Italy with his empty ships, Bihulus captured most of them: Calenus himself escaped to the Italian coast and afterwards returned to Epeirus with Antony. Before the battle of Pharsalia Caesar sent him to Achaea, and there he took Delphi, Thebes, and Orchomenos, and afterwards Athens, Megara, and Patras. In B. C. 47, Caesar caused him to be raised to the consulship.

After the murder of Caesar, in B. C. 44, Calenus joined M. Antony, and during the transactions of the early part of B. C. 43, he defended Antony against Cicero. The speech which Dion Cassius (xxii. 1, &c.) puts into his mouth, does not probably, contain much genuine matter, and is, perhaps, only an invention of the historian. After the war against Brutus and Cassius, Calenus served as the legate of M. Antony, and the legions of the latter were placed under his command in northern Italy. When the Perusinian war terminated, in B. C. 41, with the defeat of L. Antonius, Octavianus was anxious to get possession of the army of Calenus, which was stationed at the foot of the Alps; fortunately for Octavianus, Calenus just then died, and his son, who was a mere youth, surrendered the army to Octavianus without striking a blow. It is related by Appian (B. C. iv. 47), that during the proscription of (B. C. 43) the life of the great M. Terentius Varro was saved by Calenus, and it is not improbable that the letter of Varro to Fufius, which is still extant (Fraum. p. 199, ed. Bipont.) was addressed to our Q. Fufius Calenus. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 6, ad Att. i. 14, 15, xi. 15, 16; Schol. Boinia. pp. 330, 295; Ascon. ad Milon. p. 43, ed. Orelli; Cic. Philipp. viii. 4, &c.; Caes. B. G. viii. 59, B. C. iii. 8, 26, 55; Dion Cass. viii. 21, ed. Reiske; Appian. B. C. ii. 58, v. 3, 12, 24, 33, 51, 61; comp. Orelli, Onom. Toli. ii. p. 259.)

CALIDus or CALID'tius. 1. CN. CALIDus, a Roman knight in Sicily, of high rank and great influence, whose son was a Roman judex and senator, was robbed of some of his plate by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 20.) 2. Q. CALIDus, tribune of the plebs in a. c. 99, carried a law in this year for the recall of Q. Metellus Numidicus from banishment. In gratitude for this service, his son Q. Metellus Pius, who was then consul, supported Calidus in his canvass for the praetorship in b. c. 80. Calidus was accordingly praetor in b. c. 79, and obtained one of the Spanish provinces; but, on his return to Rome, he was accused of extortion in his province by Q. Lollius (not Gallius, as the Pseudo-Asconius states), and condemned by his judges, who had been bribed for the purpose. As, however, the bribes had not been large, Calidus made the remark, that a man of praetorian rank ought not to be condemned for a less sum than three million sesterces. (Val. Max. v. 2, § 7; Cic. pro Planc. 28, 29; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 19; Pseudo-Ascon. ad loc.; Cic. Verr. iii. 25.) This Calidus may have been the one who went to Africa, about a. d. 82, to command Munera to de-

CA'N'IDius, L. JU'LIUS (some MSS. have CALIDius, but this last is a gentile appellation and not a cognomen), is pronounced by Cornelius Nepos (Att 12) worthy of holding the first place among the Roman poets of his day, after the death of Catullus and Lucretius. This must, of course, be understood to refer to the period immediately anterhis recall from banishment. (Quintil. x. i. § 23; Cic. post. Red. in Sen. 9.) In a. c. 54, he defended, in conjunction with Cicero and others, M. Aemilius Scannus, who was accused of extortion. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 26.) He also spoke in the same year on behalf of the freedom of the inhabitants of Tenedos, and in support of Gabinia. (Cic. ad q. Fr. i. ii. 6, i. 2.) In a. c. 52, Calidus was one of the sup-that he was born at that town. His earliest years were spent in the camp of his father in Germany, and he grew up among the soldiers, with whom he became accordingly very popular. (Tac. Annal. i. 41, 69; Suet. Cal. 9; Dion Cass. ivii. 8.) Caligula also accompanied his father on his Syrian expedition, and after his return first lived with his mother, and, when she was exiled, in the house of Livia Augusta. When the latter died, Caligula, then a youth in his sixteenth year, delivered the funeral oration upon her from the Rostra. After this he lived some years with his grandmother, Antonia. Caligula, like his two elder brothers, Nero and Drusus, was hated by Sejanus, but his favour with Tiberius and his popularity as the son of Germanicus saved him. (Dion Cass. ivii. 8.)

After the fall of Sejanus in a d. 32, when Caligula had just attained his twentieth year, Tiberius summoned him to come to Capreae. Here the young man conceived so well his feelings at the injuries inflicted upon his mother and brothers, as well as at the wrongs which he himself had suffered, that he did not utter a sound of complaint, and behaved in such a submissive manner, that those who witnessed his conduct declared, that there never was such a cunning slave to so bad a master. (Suet. Cal. 10; Tac. Annal. vi. 20.) But his savage and voluptuous character was nevertheless seen through by Tiberius. About the same time he married Junia Claudilla (Claudia), the daughter of M. Silanus, an event which Dion Cassius (ivii. 25) assigns to the year a. d. 35. Soon afterwards he obtained the quaeatorship, and on the death of his brother Drusus was made augur in his stead, having been created pontiff two years before. (Dion Cass. ivii. 8; Suet. Cal. 12.)

After the death of his wife, in March a. d. 36, Caligula began seriously to think in what manner he might secure the succession to himself, of which Tiberius had held out hopes to him, without however desiring anything. (Dion Cass. ivii. 29; Tac. Annal. vi. 45, &c.) In order to ensure his success, he seduced Ennia Naevia, the wife of Macro, whom he had then the command of the praetorian cohorts. He promised to marry her if he should succeed to the throne, and contrived to gain the consent and co-operation of Macro also, who according to some accounts introduced his wife to the embraces of the voluptuous youth. (Suet. Cal. 12; Tac. Annal. vi. 45; Dion Cass. ivii. 28; Philo, Legat. ad Col. p. 993, ed. Paris, 1640.) Tiberius died in March a. d. 37, and there can be little doubt but that Caligula either caused or accelerate his death. In aftertimes he often boasted of having attempted to murder Tiberius in order to avoid the wrongs which his family had suffered from him. There were reports that Caligula had administered to Tiberius a slow poison, or that he had withheld from him the necessary food during his illness, or lastly, that he had suffocated him with a pillow. Some again said, that he had been assisted by Macro, while Tacitus (Annal. vi. 50) mentions Macro alone as the guilty person. (Suet. Tib. 73, Cal. 12; Dion Cass. ivii. 28.) When the body of Tiberius was carried from Misenum to Rome, Caligula accompanied it in the dress of a mourner, but he was saluted by the people at Rome with the greatest enthusiasm as the son of Germanicus. Tiberius in his will had appointed his grandson Tiberius as coheir to Caligula, but the senate and the people gave the sovereign power to Caligula alone, in spite of the regulations of Tiberius. (Suet. Cal. 14; Dion Cass. lix. 1; comp. Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 6. 9.) In regard to all other points, however, Caligula carried the will of Tiberius into execution: he paid to the people and the soldiers the sums which the late emperor had bequeathed to them, and even increased these legacies by his own munificence. After having delivered the funeral oration upon Tiberius, he immediately fulfilled the duty of piety towards his mother and his brother: he had their ashes conveyed from Pandataria and the Pontian islands to Rome, and deposited them in the Mausoleum with great solemnity. But notwithstanding the feeling which prompted him to this act, he pardoned all those who had allowed themselves to be used as instruments against the members of his family, and ordered the documents which contained the evidence of their guilt to be burnt in the Forum. Those who had been condemned to imprisonment by Tiberius were released, and those who had been exiled were recalled to their country. He restored to the magistrates their full power of jurisdiction without appeal to his person, and he also endeavoured to revive the old character of the comitia by allowing the people to discuss and decide the matters brought before them, as in former times. Towards foreign princes who had been stripped of their power and their revenues by his predecessor, he behaved with great generosity. Thus Agrippa, the grandson of Herod, who had been put in chains by Tiberius, was released and restored to his kingdom, and Antiochus IV. of Commagene received back his kingdom, which was increased by the maritime district of Cilicia.

On the first of July a. d. 37, Caligula entered upon his first consularship together with Claudius, his father's brother, and held the office for two months. Soon after this he was seized with a serious illness in consequence of his irregular mode of living. He was, indeed, restored to health, but from that moment appeared an altered man. Hitherto the joy of the people at his accession seemed to be perfectly justified by the justice and moderation he shewed during the first months of his reign, but from henceforward he appears more like a dionbolic than a human being—he acts completely like a madman. A kind of savageness and gross voluptuousness had always been prominent features in his character, but still we are not justified in supposing, as many do, that he merely threw off the mask which had hitherto concealed his real disposition; it is much more probable that his illness destroyed his mental powers, and thus let loose all than a human being—he acts completely like a madman. A kind of savageness and gross voluptuousness had always been prominent features in his character, but still we are not justified in supposing, as many do, that he merely threw off the mask which had hitherto concealed his real disposition; it is much more probable that his illness destroyed his mental powers, and thus let loose all he token at random from among the spectators, and criminals to enter the arena, he ordered persons to accompany with him. Once during a public fight of hatred; it became a matter of pleasure and amusement. Once when, during a horse-race, the people claimed, "Would that the whole Roman people had only one head." But his cruelty was not greater than his voluptuousness and obscenity. He carried on an incessant intercourse with his own sisters, and when Drusilla, the second of them, died, he raved like a madman with grief, and commanded her to be worshipped as a divinity. No Roman lady was safe from his attacks, and his marriages were disgracefully contracted as they were ignominiously dissolved. The only woman that exercised a lasting influence over him was Caesonia. A point which still more shews the disordered state of his brain is, that in his self-veneration he went so far as to consider himself a god: he would appear in public sometimes in the attire of Bacchus, Apollo, or Jupiter, and even of Venus and Diana; he would frequently place himself in the temple of Castor and Pollux, between the statues of these divinities, and order the people who entered the temple to worship him. He even built a temple to himself as Jupiter Latarius, and appointed priests to attend to his worship and offer sacrifices to him. This temple contained his statue in gold, of the size of life, and his statue was dressed precisely as he was. The wealthiest Romans were appointed his priests, but they had to purchase the honour with immense sums of money. He sometimes officiated as his own priest, making his horse Incitatus, which he afterwards raised to the consulship, his colleague. No one but a complete madman would have been guilty of things like these.

The sums of money which he squandered almost surpass belief. During the first year of his reign he nearly drained the treasury, although Tiberius had left in it the sum of 720 millions of sesterces. One specimen may serve to shew in what senseless manner he spent the money. That he might have the pleasure of witnessing their agony. Once when, during a horse-race, the people were more favourably disposed to one of his competitors than to himself, he is said to have explained, "Would that the whole Roman people had only one head."

To invite men of all classes to avail themselves of it. On the birth of his daughter by Caesonia, he regularly acted the part of a beggar in order to obtain money near her. He also made known that he would receive presents on new year's day, and on the first of January he posted himself in the vestibule of his palace, to accept the presents that were brought him by crowds of people. Things like these gradually engendered in him a love of money itself without any view to the ends it is to serve, and he is said to have sometimes taken a delight in rolling himself in heaps of gold. After Italy and Rome were exhausted by his extortions, his love of money and his avarice compelled him to seek other resources. He turned his eyes to Gaul, and under the pretence of a war against the Germans, he marched, in A.D. 40, with an army to Gaul to extort money from the wealthy inhabitants of that country. Executions were as frequent here as they had been before in Italy. Lentulus Gaetulicus and Aemilius Lepidus were accused of having formed a conspiracy and were put to death, and the two sisters of Caligula were sent into exile as guilty of adultery and accomplices of the conspiracy. Ptolemeus, the son of king Juba, was exiled merely on account of his riches, and was afterwards put to death as a rich exile and disgusting to record here all the acts of cruelty, insolvency, and avarice, of which his whole reign, with the exception of the first few months, forms one uninterrupted succession. He concluded his predatory campaign in Gaul by leading his army to the coast of the ocean, as if he would cross over to Britain; he drew them up in battle array, and then gave them the signal—to collect shells, which he called the spoils of conquered Ocean. After this he returned to Rome, where he acted with still greater cruelty than before, because he thought the honours which the senate conferred upon him too insignificant and too human for a god like him. Several conspiracies were formed against him, but were discovered, until at length Cassius Chaerea, tribune of a praetorian cohort, Cornelius Sabinus, and others, entered into one which was crowned with success. Four months after his return from Gaul, on the 24th of January A.D. 41, Caligula was murdered by Chaerea near the theatre, or according to others, in his own palace while he was hearing some boys rehearse the part they were to perform in the theatre. His wife and daughter were likewise put to death. His body was secretly conveyed by his friends to the hORTI LAMIANI, half burnt, and covered over with a light turf. Subsequently, however, his sisters, after they returned from exile, were discovered to be taken out, and had it completely burnt and buried. (Sueton. Caligula; Dion Cass. lib. lix.; Joseph. Ant. xix. 1; Aurel. Vict. De Ces. 3; Zonar. x. 6.)

In the coin annexed the obverse represents the head of Caligula, with the inscription C. CAESAR AVG. GERM. P. M. TR. POT., and the reverse that of Augustus, with the inscription DIVVS AVG. PATER PATRIAE.

CALLATI'NUS, DEMETRIUS (δημήτριος Καλλατινὼς), the author of a geographical work on Europe and Asia (τῆς Ἑλλάδος καὶ Ἀσίας) in twenty books, which is frequently referred to by the ancients. ([Diog. Laer. v. 19; Steph. Byz. s. v. Άρτιγέας; Strab. i. p. 60; Dionys. Hal. de comp. Verol. i. 4; Lucian, Maxim. i. 10; Schol. ad Theocr. l. 65, x. 19; Martian, Hercul. passim.) [L. S.]

CALLI'ADES (Καλλαίδης), is mentioned by Herodotus (viii. 31) as aarchon eponymus of Athens at the time of the occupation of the city by the Persian army, B. C. 490. [E. E.]

CALLI'ADES (Καλλαίδης), a comic poet, who is mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 577), but about whom nothing further is known, than that a comedy entitled Ἀγγείαν was ascribed by some to Diphilus and by others to Calliades. (Athen. ix. p. 401.) From the former passage of Athenaeus it must be inferred, that Calliades was a contemporary of the archon Euclides, B. C. 493, and that, accordingly he belonged to the old Attic comedy, whereas the fact of the Aggaea being disputed between him and Diphilus shows that he was a contemporary of the latter, and accordingly was a poet of the new Attic comedy. For this reason Meineke ([Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. l. 450) is inclined to believe that the name Calliades in Athenaeus is a mistake for Callias. [L. S.]

CALLI'ANAX (Καλλιανάκης), a physician, who probably lived in the third century B. C. He was one of the followers of Herophilus, and appears to have been chiefly known for the roughness and brutality of his manners towards his patients. Some of his answers have been preserved by Galen. To one of his patients who said he was about to die, he replied by the verse, Ἐπεὶ μὴ σε ἀγαθῷ καλλίτιον ἔγενο: and to another who expressed the same fear he quoted the verse from Homer (I, 11. 107), ἐκείνω τῆς ἔργων, θεῷ σὲ ποιλὰν δαίμονιν. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Επιδ. VI." iv. vol. xvi. pt. ii. p. 145; Pallad. Comment. Hippocr. "Επιδ. VI." § 6, apud Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 112.) [W. A. G.]

CALLI'ARUS (Καλλιαρός), a son of Odeodocus and Laonome, from whom the Locrian town of Calliara was said to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

CALLI'AS (Καλλίας), a son of the Heracleid king Telemus, who, in conjunction with his brothers, caused his father to be killed by some hired persons, because he preferred Deiphontes, his brother, with his band of Hymetaeans to his sons. (Apollod. H. 8. § 5.) [L. S.]

CALLI'AS and HIPPO'NICUS (Καλλίας, Ηππονίκος), a noble Athenian family, celebrated for their wealth, the heads of which, from the son of Phœnippus downwards (No. 2), received these names alternately in successive generations. (Aristoph. A. v. 283; Schol. ad loc.; Perizon, ad Aet.

CALLIAS. [Callias.]

V. H. xiv. 16.) They enjoyed the hereditary dignity of torch-bearer at the Eleusinian mysteries, and claimed descent from Triptolemus. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. § 6.)

1. HIPPO'NICOΣ L, the first of the family on record, is mentioned by Plutarch (Sol. 18, comp. Pol. Praxe. 13) as one of the three to whom Solon, shortly before the introduction of his στηλάδες, B. C. 594, imparted his intention of diminishing the amount of debt while he abstained from interference with landed property. Of this information they are said to have made a fraudulent use, and to have enriched themselves by the purchase of large estates with borrowed money. Böckh thinks, however (Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. iv. ch. 3), that this story against Hippocrates may have originated in the envy of his countrymen.

2. CALLI'AS I, son of Phœnippus and probably nephew of the above, is mentioned by Herodotus (vi. 121) as a strong opponent of Peisistratus, and as the only man in Athens who ventured to buy the tyrant's property on each occasion of his expulsion. On the same authority, if indeed the chapter be not an interpolation (vi. 122; see Larcher, ad loc.), we learn, that he spent much money in keeping horses, was a conqueror at the Olympic and Pythian games, at the former in B. C. 564 (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 283), and gave large dowries to his daughters, allowing them—a good and wise departure from the usual practice—to marry any of the Athenians they pleased.

3. HIPPO'NICOΣ II, surnamed Ammon, son of Callias I, is said to have increased his wealth considerably by the treasures of a Persian general, which had been entrusted to Dionysius, a man of Eretria, on the first invasion of that place by the Persians. The invading army being all destroyed Dionysius kept the money; but his heirs, on the second Persian invasion, transmitted it to Hippocrates at Athens, and with him it ultimately remained, as all the captive Eretrians (comp. Her. vi. 119) were sent to Asia. This story is given by Athenaeus (xii. p. 536, f., 537, n.), and confirmed by the authority of Heracleides of Pontus; but it is open to much suspicion from its inconsistency with the account of Herodotus, who mentions only one invasion of Eretria, and that a successful one B. C. 490. (Herod. vi. 99—101.) Possibly the anecdote, like that of Callas λακεδαίμονες below, was one of the modes in which the gossips of Athens accounted for the large fortune of the family.

4. CALLI'AS II, son of No. 3, was present in his priestly dress at the battle of Marathon; and the story runs that, on the rout of the enemy, a Persian, claiming his protection, pointed out to him a treasure buried in a pit, and that he slew the man and appropriated the money. Hence the surname λακεδαίμονες (Plut. Arist. 5; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 65; Hesych. and Suid. s. u. λακεδαίμονες), which, however, we may perhaps rather regard as having itself suggested the tale, and as having been originally, like βασιλόκρονος, expressive of the extent of the family's wealth. (Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. iv. ch. 3.) His enemies certainly were sufficiently malignant, if not powerful; for Plutarch (Arist. 25), on the authority of Aeschines the Socratic, speaks of a capital prosecution instituted against him on extremely weak grounds. Aristideles, who was his cousin, was a witness on the trial, which must therefore have taken place before B. C. 406, the probable date of Aristides' death. In Herodotus (vii. 151) Callias is mentioned as ambassador from Athens to Artaxerxes, but this statement we might identify with that of Diodorus, who ascribes to the victories of Cimon, through the negotiation of Callias, n. c. 449, a peace with Persia on terms most humiliating to the latter, were it not that extreme suspicion rests on the whole account of the treaty in question. (Paus. i. 8; Diod. xii. 4; Wesseling, ad loc.; Mitford's Greece, ch. iii. sect. 3, note 11; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. pp. 37, 38, and the authorities there referred to; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. iii. ch. 12, b. iv. ch. 3.) Be this as it may, he did not escape impeachment after his return on the charge of having taken bribes, and was condemned to a fine of 50 talents, more than 12,000l., being a fourth of his whole property. (Dem. de Publ. Leg. p. 428; Lyse pro Aristoph. Bon. § 50.)

5. Hippocrates III., was the son of Callias II., and with Eury mendom commanded the Athenians in their successful incursion into the territory of Tanagra, n. c. 426. (Thuc. iii. 91; Diod. xii. 65.) He was killed at the battle of Delium, n. c. 424, where he was one of the generals. (Andoc. c. Alcid. p. 30.) It must therefore have been his divorced wife, and not his widow, whom Pericles married. (Plut. Peric. 24; comp. Palm. ad Aristoph. Av. 203; Wesseling, ad Diod. xii. 65.) His daughter Hipparche became the wife of Alcibiades, with a dowry of ten talents, the largest, according to Andocides, that had ever before been given. (Andoc. c. Alcid. p. 30; Palm. ad Aristoph. Av. 203.) Aelian's erroneous account of his committing suicide is clearly nothing but gossip from Athenaeus by memory. (Ael. V. V. 23; Perison. ad loc.) He left a legitimate son named Hipponicus. (Andoc. de Myst. § 126, which speech, from n. c. 110 to § 131, has much reference to the profligies of Callias.)

[CALLIAS (Καλλίας). 1. A soothsayer of the sacred Elean family of the Iamidac. (Pind. Olymp. vi.), who, according to the account of the Crotonians, came over to their ranks from those of Sybaris, when he saw that the sacrifices foreboded destruction to the latter, n. c. 510. His services to Crotona were rewarded by an allotment of land, of which his descendants were still in possession when Herodotus wrote. (Herod. v. 44, 45.)

2. A wealthy Athenian, who, on condition of marrying Callistus' sister, Elpinice, paid him the fine of fifty talents which had been imposed on Miltiades. (Plut. Crat. 4; Nepos, Com. 1.) He appears to have been unconnected with the noble family of Callias and Hipponicus, the δῆδωροι. It seems likely that his wealth arose from mining, and that it was a son or grandson of his who discovered a new source of pyrites, that of Lollia in Euboea, n. c. 391.) Aelian's description of the discovery is probably nothing but the absurd and self-glorifying speech of his (Hdt. vi. 3, § 2, &c., comp. v. 4, § 22.) A vain and silly dilettante, an extravagant and reckless profligate, he was notorious for his extravagance and profligacy. We find him accused, the bough was placed there by Callias &c.; and, if we may believe the statement of the accused, the bough was placed there by Callias himself, who was provoked at having been thwarted by Andocides in a very disgraceful and profligate attempt. (In n. c. 392, we find him accused by Andocides of having deprived the Athenians of their heavy-armed troops at Corinth on the occasion of the famous defeat of the Spartan Mora by Iphicrates. (Xen. Hell. iv. 5, § 15.) He was hereditary proconsul of Sparta, and, as such, was chosen as one of the envoys empowered to negotiate peace with that state in n. c. 371, on which occasion Xenophon reports an extremely absurd and self-glorying speech of his (Hdt. vi. 3, § 2, &c., comp. v. 4, § 22.) for aid, which was granted in opposition to the advice of Demosthenes, and an army was sent into Euboea under the command of Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tymnus, b.c. 330. (Aesch. c. Ctes.
§§ 85-88, de Pala. Leg. § 100; Dem. de Pac. § 5; Plut. Phe. 12.) After the Macedonian war, where he was for some time high in the favour of the king; but, having in some way offended him, he withdrew to Thebes, in the hope of gaining her support in the furtherance of his views. Breaking, however, with the Thebans also, and fearing an attack both from and from Philip, he applied to Athens, and through the influence of Demosthenes not only obtained alliance, and an acknowledgment of the independence of Chalcis, but even induced the Athenians to confer on him and his brother Taurosthenes the honour of Athenian citizenship.

1. One of the Thespian ambassadors, who appeared at Chalcis before the Roman commissioners, Marcus and Attilius, to make a surrender of their city, renouncing the alliance of Perseus, b.c. 172.
In common with the deputies from all the Boeotian towns, except Thebes, they were favourably received by the Romans, whose object was to discover the real state of affairs in Boeotia, but who is mentioned only by Plutarch.

2. One of the Thespian ambassadors, who appeared at Chalcis before the Roman commissioners, Marcus and Attilius, to make a surrender of their city, renouncing the alliance of Perseus, b.c. 172.
In common with the deputies from all the Boeotian
towns, except Thebes, they were favourably received by the Romans, whose object was to discover the real state of affairs in Boeotia, but who is mentioned only by Plutarch.

3. Of Argos, a Greek poet, the author of an epigram upon Polycritus. (Anth. Graec. xii. 292; Bruck, Anal. ii. p. 3.)

4. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian who wrote a great work on the history of Sicily. He lived, as Josephus (c. Apion. i. 3) expresses it, long after Philipus, but earlier than Tannus. From the nature of his work it is clear that he was a contemporary of Agathocles, who however, the historian survived, as he mentioned the death of the tyrant. This work is sometimes called 'A'eyl
'Agathokleia, or 'A'eyl 'Agathokleia Iatropia, and sometimes also by Roman writers "Historin de Rebus Siculis." (Athen. xii. p. 842; Aelian, Hist.
An. xvi. 28; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 41; Macrobi. Sat. v. 19; Dionys. i. 42; Fest. s. v. Roman.) It embraced the history of Sicily during the reign of Agathocles, from n. c. 317 to 264, and consisted of twenty-two books. (Diod. xxi. Ecor.
p. 492.)

5. Ono of the Thespian ambassadors, who appeared at Chalcis before the Roman commissioners, Marcus and Attilius, to make a surrender of their city, renouncing the alliance of Perseus, b.c. 172.
In common with the deputies from all the Boeotian
towns, except Thebes, they were favourably received by the Romans, whose object was to discover the real state of affairs in Boeotia, but who is mentioned only by Plutarch.

6. A comic poet, according to Suidas (s. v.) a son of Lysimachus, and bore the name of Schoenian because his father was a rope or basket maker (σχοινομακρος). He belonged to the old Attic comedy, for Athenaeus (x. p. 453) states, that he lived shortly before Strattis, who appears to have commenced his career as a comic poet about n. c. 412. From the Scholion on Aristophanes (Equil. 526) we further learn, that Callias was an emulator of Cratinus. It is, therefore, probable that he began to come before the public prior to n. c. 424; and it might be proved that he was the same person as Calliades [CALLIADES], he would have lived at least
n. c. 402. We still possess a few fragments of his comic poems, and the names of six are preserved in Suidas, viz. Α' θέρας, 'Α'ριστάλεως (Zemob. iv. 7), Κέλκλεας (perhaps alluded to by Athen. ii. p. 57, and Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. p. 264), Πέσθας (Athen. viii. p. 314; Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 31, 161; Diog. Lcrt. ii. 18), Β'ραχας, and Χολαleague of Callibius, was slain. Callibius on this retreated with his forces close to the walls of the city, and, while he affected to open a negotiation for which he had sent from Mantineia. On its appearance, Stasippus and his friends fled from the city and took refuge in the temple of Artemis; but the party of Callibius unroofed the building and attacked them with missiles, and being thus obliged to surrender, they were taken to Tegea and put to death after the mockery of a trial. (Xen. Hell. v. 5. §§ 6, 8.)

CALLICLES (Καλλικλῆς), a physician, who lived probably in the third or second century b. c., and who is mentioned by Galen (De Med. Mod.
ii. 7. vol. x. p. 142) as having belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici. [W. A. G.]

CALLICLES (Καλλικλῆς), 1. A statutory of Megara, who lived about b. c. 400. (See Siebellis, ad Paus. iii. p. 29.) His principal works seem to have been Olympic victors (Paus. vii. 1. §§ 1, 3), and philosophers. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19.)

2. A painter of uncertain age and country (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 37), is perhaps the same as the painter, Callicles, mentioned by Varro.
(Procop. p. 236, Bp.)

CALLICRATES (ΚΑΛΛΙΚΡΑΤΗΣ), historical. 1. A Spartan, is mentioned by Herodotus as the finest and handsomest man of all the Greeks of his time.
He was slain by an arrow just before the armies engaged at Platea (b. c. 479), and while the Greeks were waiting till the signs from the sacrifices should be favourable. (Herod. i. 72.) In Herod.
ix. 85, his name occurs among the ἱππεῖς who were buried separately from the rest of the Spartans and from the Helots. The word ἱππεῖς, ever, can hardly be used here in its ordinary meaning of "youths," but has probably its original signification of "commanders." (See Müller, Dor. ii. p. 315; Thirlwall's Greeks, ii. p. 300, note.)

2. Callocrates is the name given to the murderer of Dion by Nicias (Dion, 9); he is called Calliphus by Diocletus and Plutarch. [CALLIPUS.]

3. An accomplished flatterer at the court of Ptolemy III. (Ruergetos), who, apparently mistaking servility for knowledge of the world, affected to adopt Ulysses as his model. He is said to have worn a seal-ring with a head of Ulysses engraved on it, and to have given his children the names of Telemonus and Anticlea.
(Athen. vi. p. 251, d.)

4. A man of Leonium in Achaia, who plays a whatsoever disreputable part in the history of the Achaean league. By a decree of the Achaeanas, solemnly recorded in b. c. 181, Lacedaemon had been received into their confederacy and the resto¬ ation of all Lacedaemonian exiles had been pro¬ vided for, with the exception of those who had repaid with ingratitude their previous restoration by the Achaeanas. The Romans, however, had sent to urge the recall of these men, and in the debate in the assembly on this question, b. c. 179, Callocrates contended, in opposition to Lycurtus, that the requisition should be complied with, often maintaining, that neither law, nor solemn record, nor anything else, should be more regarded than the will of Rome. The assembly, however, favoured the view of Lycurtus, and appointed ambassadors, of whom Callocrates was one, to lay it before the Roman senate. But he grievously abused his trust, and instigated the Romans to sap the independence of his country by giving their support in every city to the Roman or anti¬ national party. Returning home with letters from the senate, pressing the recall of the exiles, and highly commendatory of himself, he was made general of the league, and used all his influence thereforthe for the furtherance of the Roman cause. (Polyb. xiv. 1, 2, xxxi. 1—3.) In b. c.
174 he successfully resisted the proposal of Xenar¬ chus, who was at that time related, for an alliance with Pergamus. (Liv. xii. 23, 24.) Early in b. c.
168 he opposed the motion of Lycurtus and his party for sending aid to the two Ptolemies (Phil¬ ometer and Phyeson) against Antiochus Epiphanes, recommending instead, that they should endeavour mediating the-yearning parties; and he carried his point by introducing a letter from Q. Marcus, the Roman consul, in which the same course was urged. (Polyb. xxxix. 3—10.) On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, b. c.
168, more than 1000 of the chief Achaeanas, point¬ ed out by Callocrates as having favoured the cause of Pergamus, were apprehended and sent to Rome, to be tried, as it was pretended, before the senate. Among these was Polybius, the historian; and he was also one of the survivors, who, after a death of 17 years, were permitted to return to their country. (Polyb. xxx. 10, xxxi. 8, xxxii. 7, 8, xxxiii. 1; Liv. xiv. 31; Paus. vii. 10.) The base¬ ness of Callocrates was visited on his head,—if, indeed, such a man could feel such a punishment, in the intense hatred of his countrymen. Men deemed it pollution to use the same bath with him, and the very boys in the streets threw in his teeth the name of traitor. (Polyb. xxx. 20.)
In b. c. 153 he dissuaded the league from taking any part in the war of the Rhodians against Crete, which the country. (Polyb. xxxiii. 15.) Years after this,
b. c. 150, Menelaides, then general of the league, having been implicated by the Orontes, a Mysian ambassador to Rome with Diaeus, to oppose the Spartan exiles, whose banishment Diaeus had procured, and who hoped to be restored by the senate.
Callocrates, however, died at Rhodes, where they died, and Callocrates retaliated on Menelaides
by a capital charge; but Menelaides escaped the danger through the favour of Dionys, his successor in the office of general, with whom he bribed with three talents. In b. c. 149, Callocrates was sent as ambassador to Rome with Dionys, to oppose the Spartan exiles, whose banishment Diaeus had procured, and who hoped to be restored by the senate.
Callocrates, however, died at Rhodes, where they died, and Callocrates retaliated on Menelaides
by a capital charge; but Menelaides escaped the ambassador to Rome with Dionys, to oppose the Spartan exiles, whose banishment Diaeus had procured, and who hoped to be restored by the senate.

Callocrates, however, died at Rhodes, where they had touched on their way; "his death," says Pausanias, "being, for ought I know, a clear gain to his country." (Paus. vii. 11, 12.) [E. E.]

CALLICRATES (ΚΑΛΛΙΚΡΑΤΗΣ), literary. 1. It is mentioned only once by Athenenes (xiiil. p. 589) as the author of a comedy called Μεσθέων, and from the connexion in which his name appears there with those of Antiphanes and Alexis, it may be inferred that he was a poet of the middle Attic comedy.

2. A Greek orator who seems to have lived about the time of Demosthenes, and to whom the tales of Pergamus ascribed the oration κατὰ Νε¬ μοντενησαν παραμυθεία, which was usually consider¬ ated the work of Deinarchus. (Diody. Deinarch.)
11.) But no work of Callicrates was known even as early as the time of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. 3. A Greek historian who lived in and after the time of the emperor Aurelian. He was a native of Tyre, and wrote the history of Aurelian. Vopiscus (Aur. 4), who has preserved a few fragments of the work, describes Callicrates as being the most learned writer among the Greeks of his time. [L. S.]

2. A Laecadanioni sculptor, celebrated for the smallness of his works. (Aelian, V. H. i. 17.) He made ants and other animals out of ivory, which were so small that one could not distinguish the different limbs. (Plin. H. N. vii. 21, xxxvi. 5, s. 4.) According to Athenaeus (ix. p. 762, α.), he also executed embossed work on vases. [W. I.]

CALLICRATIDAS (Καλλικρατίδας), a disciple of Pythagoras. Four extracts from his writings on the subject of marriage and domestic happiness are preserved in Stobaeus. (Flor. lxx. i. 11, lxviii. 16—18.) [E. E.]

CALLICRITUS (Καλλικρίτος), a Thelian, was sent as ambassador from the Boeotians to the Roman senate, b. 187, to remonstrate against the requisition of the latter for the recall of Zeuxippos from exile. The sentence of banishment had been passed against him both for sacrilege and for the murder of Brachyllas [see p. 502, a.]; and Callicritus represented to the Romans on behalf of his countrymen, that they could not annul a sentence which had been legally pronounced. The remonstrance was at first unavailing, though ultimately the demand of the senate was not pressed. (Polyb. xxii. 2.) It was probably the same Callicritus who strongly opposed in the Roman assembly the views of Pausan. He appears even to have gone to Rome to warn the senate of the king’s schemes, and was murdered, by order of the latter, on his way back. (Liv. xiii. 13, 40.) [E. E.]

CALLICTER (Καλλίκτερ), surnamed Μαριμναίος, a Greek poet, the author of four epigrams of little merit in the Greek Anthology. (Anthol. Graec. xi. 5, 6, 118, 333; Brunck, Anal. ii. pp. 294, 529.)

CALLIDEMUS (Καλλίδεμος), a Greek author about whom nothing is known, except that Pliny (H. N. iv. 12) and Solinus (17) refer to him as their authority for the statement, that the island of Eubea was originally called Chalise from the fact of brass (χαλίς) being discovered there first. [L. S.]

CALLIDUS (Καλλίδος).

CALLIGEITUS (Καλλιγέιτος), a Megarian, and TIMAGORAS (Τιμάγορας), a Cyzican, were sent to Sparta in b. c. 412 by Pharnabazus, the satrap of Bithynia, to induce the Lacedaemonians to send a fleet to the Hellespont, in order to assist the Hellasponitine cities in revolting from Athens. The Laecedaeomians, however, through the influence of Alcibiades, preferred sending a fleet to Chios; but Calligetus and Timagoras would not take part in this expedition, and applied the money which they brought from Pharnabazus to the equipment of a separate fleet, which left Peloponnesus towards the close of the year. (Thuc. viii. 6, 8, 39.)

CALLIGENEIA (Καλλιγενεία), a surname of Demeter, or of her nurse and companion, or of Gaia. (Aristoph. Thesm. 300, with the Schol.; Hesych. s. r.; Phot. Lex. s. r.) [L. S.]

CALLIGENEIA. as Diodorus and Plutarch tell it, the scowling sayer foretold the admiral’s death. His answer at any rate, μην παρενεί μεν ταξιν Πτέραν, became famous, but is mentioned with censure by Plutarch and Cicero. On the whole, Calligeneia is a somewhat refreshing specimen of a plain, blunt Spartan, the old school, with the guilelessness and simple honesty, but (it may be added) not without the bigotry of that character. Witness his answer, when asked what sort of men the Ionians were: “Bad freemen, but excellent slaves.” (Xen. Hell. ii. 6, §§ 1—33; Diod. xiii. 76—79, 97—99; Plut. Lysand. 5—7; Pelope II, Apollon. Lasos, Cio. de Off. i. 24, 30.) Aelian tells us (V. H. xii. 43), that he rose to the privileges of citizenship from the condition of a slave (μόνος); but see Mitford’s Greece, ch. xx. sec. 2, note 4.) [E. E.]

CALLICRATIDAS (Καλλικρατίδας), a disciple of Pythagoras. Four extracts from his writings on the subject of marriage and domestic happiness are preserved in Stobaeus. (Flor. lxx. i. 11, lxviii. 16—18.) [E. E.]

CALLIGENEIA.
CALLIMACHUS.

CALLIGENES (Καλλίγενης), the name of the physician of Philip, king of Macedonia, who attended him in his last illness at Amphipolis, B.C. 179, and concealed his death from the people till the arrival of Perseus, to whom he had sent intelligence of the great danger of the king. (Liv. xl. 56.)

W. A. G.

CALLIMACHUS (Καλλίμαχος). 1. Of the tribe of Aiantis and the θυγατρὶς of Aphidna, held the office of Polemarch, B.C. 490, and in that capacity commanded the right wing of the Athenian army at Marathon, where he was slain, after behaving with much gallantry. In the battle he is said to have vowed to Artemis a heifer for every enemy he should slay. By the persuasion of Matiades he had given his casting vote for fighting, when the voices of the ten generals were equally divided on the question. This is the last recorded instance of the Polemarch performing the military duty which his name implies. Callimachus was conspicuous figured in the fresco painting of the battle of Marathon, by Polygnotus, in the στυλονάπτης. (Herod. vi. 109–114; Plut. Aris. et Cat. Maj. 2, Sympos. i. 6. § 3; Schol. ad Aristoph. Eq. 689; Paus. i. 15.)

2. One of the generals of Mithridates, who, by his skill in engineering, defended the town of Amisos, in Pontus, for a considerable time against the Romans, in B.C. 71; and when Lucullus had succeeded in taking a portion of the wall, Callimachus set fire to the place and made his escape by sea. He afterwards fell into the hands of Lucullus at the capture of Nisibis (called by the Greeks Antioch) in Mygdonia, B.C. 68, and was put to death in revenge for the burning of Amisos. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 32; comp. Appian, Bell. Mithr. 78, 83; Dion Cass. xxxv. 7.) [E. E.

CALLIMACHUS (Καλλίμαχος), one of the most celebrated Alexandrine grammarians and poets, was, according to Suidas, a son of Battus and Measme, and belonged to the celebrated family of the Battidae at Cyrene, whence Ovid (Met. i. 260) and others call him Battides. (Comp. Strab. xvii. p. 837.) He was a disciple of the grammarians Hermocrates, and afterwards taught at Eleusis, a suburb of Alexandria. He was highly esteemed by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who invited him to a place in the Museum. (Suid.; Strab. xvii. p. 838.) Callimachus was still alive in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, the successor of Philippus. (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. ii. 26.) He was formerly believed, but is now established as an historical fact, that Callimachus was chief librarian of the famous library of Alexandria. This fact leads us to the conclusion, that he was the successor of Zenodotus, and that he held this office from about B.C. 260 until his death about B.C. 240. (Ritschl, Die Alexandria. Biblioth. &c. pp. 19, 84, &c.) This calculation agrees with the statement of A. Gellius (xvii. 21), that Callimachus lived shortly before the first Punic war. He was married to a daughter of Euphrates of Syracuse, and had a sister Megame, who was married to Stasikorus, and a son Callimachus, who lived shortly before the first Punic war. He was married to a daughter of Euphrates of Syracuse, and had a sister Megamela, who was married to Stasikorus, and a son Callimachus, who lived shortly before the first Punic war.

Several of the most distinguished men of that period, such as his successor Eratosthenes, Philosophus, Aristophanes of Byzantium, Appolonius Rhodius, Ister, and Hermippus, were among his pupils. Callimachus was one of the most fertile writers of antiquity, and if the number in Suidas be correct, he wrote 800 works, though we may take it for granted that most of them were not of great extent, if he followed his own maxim, that a great book was equal to a great evil. (Athen. Hist. p. 72.) The number of his works of which the titles or fragments are known to us, amounts to upwards of forty. But what we possess is very little, and consists principally of poetical productions, apparently the least valuable of all his works, since Callimachus, notwithstanding the reputation he enjoyed for his poems, was not a man of real poetical talent: labour and learning are with him the substitutes for poetical genius and talent. His prose works, on the other hand, which would have furnished us with some highly important information concerning ancient mythology, history, literature, &c., are completely lost.

The poetical productions of Callimachus still exist are: 1. Hymns, six in number, of which five are written in hexameter verse and in the Ionic dialect, and one, on the bath of Pallas, in dithyrambs and in the Doric dialect. These hymns, which bear greater resemblance to epic than to lyric poetry, are the productions of labour and learning, like most of the poems of that period. Almost every line furnishes some curious mythological information, and it is perhaps not saying too much to assert, that these hymns are more overloaded with learning than any other poetical production of that time. Their style has nothing of the easy flow of genuine poetry, and is evidently studied and laboured. There are some ancient Greek scholia on these hymns, which however have no great merit. 2. Seventy-three epigrams, which belong to the best specimens of this kind of poetry. The high estimation they enjoyed in antiquity is attested by the fact, that Archilochus, the grammarian, who lived, at the latest, one generation after Callimachus, wrote a commentary upon them, and that Marinus, in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, wrote a paraphrase of them in iambics. They were incorporated in the Greek Anthology at an early time, and have thus been preserved.

3. Elegies. These are lost with the exception of some fragments, but there are imitations of them by the Roman poets, the most celebrated of which is the De Coma Berenices of Catullus. If we may believe the Roman critics, Callimachus was the greatest among the elegiac poets (Quintil. x. § 58), and Ovid, Propertius, and Catullus took the name of Callimachus for their model in this species of poetry. We have mention of several more poetical productions, but all of them have perished except a few fragments, and however much we may lament their loss on account of the information we might have derived from them, we have very little reason to regret their loss as specimens of poetry. Among them we may mention, 1. The Aria, an epic poem in four books on the causes of the various mythical stories, religious ceremonies, and other customs. The work is often referred to, and was paraphrased by Marinus; but the paraphrase is lost, and of the original we have only a few fragments. 2. The sens hospitably when he went out to fight against the Marathonian bull. This work was likewise paraphrased by Marianus, and we still possess some fragments of the original. The works entitled Σκέτα and Παλοενηθες were in all probability likewise epic poems. It appears that there was scarcely any kind of poetry in which Callimachus did not try his strength, for he is said to have composed tragedies, and laments and eriastic poems. Respecting his poem Πειλς Ρουδιου.

Of his numerous prose works not one is extant entire, though there were among them some of the highest importance. The one of which the loss is most to be lamented was entitled Πειλς παραδότων συγγραμμάτων, or πίνακες τῶν ἐν πάγω παιδείας διαλαμψάτων καὶ δὲ συγγραφῶν, in 120 books. This work was the first comprehensive history of Greek literature. It contained, systematically arranged, lists of the authors and their works. The various departments of Literature appear to have been classified, so that Callimachus added and subtracted the names of authors, revised the classifications, of the earlier writers, the law-givers, philosophers, &c., in separate books, in which the authors were enumerated in their chronological succession. (Athen. ii. p. 70, vi. p. 252, xiii. p. 585, xv. p. 669; Diog. Laert. iv. 23, viii. 86.) It is natural to suppose that this work was the fruit of his studies in the libraries of Alexandria, and that it mainly recorded such authors as were contained in those libraries. His pupil Aristophanes of Byzantium wrote a commentary upon it. (Athen. ix. p. 408, vili. 330; Etym. Mag. a. v. Πινακ.) Among his other prose works we find mentioned the following:—I. Μουσείων, which is usually supposed to have treated of the Museum of Alexandria and the scholars connected with it. II. Περὶ στυλισμῶν. 3. Εὐνικὴ θροματικὴ. 4. Σαμαθία οἱ Χαρίσται τῶν ἐν ἡπατοῖν τῆς γῆς καὶ τῶν δυτῶν συναγωγῆ, a work similar, though probably much superior, to the one still extant by Antigonus Carystius. 5. Τραυμωμάτων ιστορικὰ. 6. Νόμιμα βαρβάρων. 7. Κρίτες νήσων καὶ πόλεων. 8. Αρχαῖα οἰκεία, Περὶ ἀνάμεως, Περὶ ἄρχων. 10. Συναγωγῶν ποταμῶν, οἱ περὶ τῶν ὁμοιώματος ποταμῶν, &c., &c. A list of his works is given by Suidas, and a more complete one by Fabricius. (Bibl. Græca. iii. p. 615, &c.) The first edition of the six hymns of Callimachus appeared at Florence in 4to, probably between 1494 and 1500. It was followed by the Aldine, Venice, 1513, 8vo., but a better edition, in which some gaps are filled up and the Greek scholia are added, is that of S. Gelenius, Basel, 1552, 4to., reprinted at Paris, 1549, 4to. A more complete edition than any of the preceding ones is that of H. Stephanus, Paris, 1556, fol. in the collection of "Poetæ principes Heroici Carminis." This edition is the basis of the text which from that time has been regarded as the vulgar. A second edition by H. Stephanus (Geneva, 1577, 4to.) is greatly improved: it contains the Greek scholia, a Latin translation, thirty-three epigrams of Callimachus, and a few fragments of his other works. Henceforth scarcely anything was done for the text, until Th. Grævius undertook a new and comprehensive edition, which was completed by his father J. G. Grævius. It appeared at Utrecht, 1697, 2 vols. 8vo. It contains the notes of the previous editors, of R. Bentley, and the famous commentary of E. Spanheim. This edition is the basis of the one edited by J. A. Ernesti at Leiden, 1761, 2 vols. 8vo., which contains the whole of the commentary of Graevius' edition, a much improved text, a more complete collection of the fragments, and additional notes by Hensterhuis and Ruhnken. Among the subsequent editions we need only mention those of Ch. F. Loesener (Leipzig, 1774, 8vo.), H. F. M. Volcker (Leipzig, 1815, 8vo.), and C. F. Blomfield (London, 1826, 8vo.). [L. S.]

CALLIMACHUS, a physician, who was one of the followers of Herophilus, and who must have lived about the second century B. C., as he is mentioned by Zeno. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." i. 5. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 827.) He wrote a work in explanation of the obsolete words used by Hippocrates, which is not now extant, but which is quoted by Erotrianus. (Gloss. Hippocr. praef.) He may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Pliny as having written a work De Coronis. (H. N. xxii. 6.)

CALLIMACHUS (κόλλαμαχος), an architect of uncertain country, who is said to have invented the Corinthian column. (Vitruv. iv. i. § 10.) As Scopas built a temple of Athena at Tenea with Corinthian columns in B. C. 536, Callimachus must have lived before that time. Pausanias (i. 26 § 7) calls him the inventor of the art of boring marble (τῶν λίθων πρῶτος ἐτήρησε), which Thiersch (Epoch. Amm. p. 69) thinks is to be understood of a mere perfection of that art, which could not have been entirely unknown to so late a period. By these inventions as well as by his other productions, Callimachus stood in good repute with his contemporaries, although he did not belong to the first-rate artists. He was so anxious to give his works the last touch of perfection, by elaborating the details with too much care, that he lost the grand and sublime. Dionysius therefore compares him and Callimachus to the cento. (Paus. i. 26 § 7.) Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8. 8. 19) says the same, and gives an exact interpretation of the surname: "Semper calumniator sini nec finem habens diligentiae ; ob id καλλιτέχνευς appellatus." Vitruvius says, that Callimachus "apparet eleganter et subtilitatem artis marmoreae ab Atheniensibus karateψευς fuerat nominatus." Sillig (Cat. Art. p. 125) conjectures, after some MSS., that κατατεχναττευς must be read instead of καλλιτεχνευς; but this is quite improbable on account of Pliny's translation, "calumniator sini." Whether the κατατεχναττευς of Vitruvius is corrupt or a second surname (as Siehele supposes, ad Paus. i. 26 § 7), cannot be decided. So much is certain, that Callimachus' style was too artificial. Pliny (i. c.), speaking of a work representing some dancing Laesdonian women, says, that his excessive elaboration gave it anauthentication of beauty. Pausanias (i. 26 § 7) describes a golden lamp, a work of Callimachus dedicated to Athene, which if filled with oil, burnt precisely one whole year without ever going out. It is scarcely probable that the painter Callimachus, mentioned by Pliny (i. c.), should be our statuary, although he is generally identified with him. [W. L.]
CALLIMACHUS was reestablished at Athens by Antipater, a Macedonian upon the death of Alexander the Great, in 323 B.C. Great in Macedoniana interest, and accordingly fled from the city to Kephalos, or the crab, on account of his fondness for that kind of shell-fish (Athen. iii. p. 100, c.), was one of the orators at Athens by Antipater, Callimachus returned to the city, but was obliged to fly from it again upon the outbreak against Phocion in B.C. 317. The orators Hegemon and Pythodorus were put to death along with Phocion, and Callimachus was also condemned to death, but escaped in safety. (Plut. Dem. 27, Phoc. 27, 33, 35.) Callimachus was ridiculed by the comic poets.

CALLIMORPHUS (Καλλιμορφος), an army-surgeon attached to the sixth legion or cohort of contarii, who lived probably in the second century after Christ. He wrote a work entitled Περὶ Μακεδονικῶν Περὶ Παρθικῶν, which may perhaps have been an account of Agyian's campaigns (Plut. iii. p. 104, c. d., viii. p. 339, f., xiv. p. 614, d.).

CALLIMORPHUS of Macedoniana, a veteran officer in the royal companion-cavalry (τῆς ἔτοιμης τῆς ἑταρικῆς) of Alexander the Great, took an active part in the reconciliation between him and his army in B.C. 324. (Arrian, Anab. vii. 11.)

CALLINUS (Καλλίνος) was a Greek sophist and rhetorician, was a native of Syria, or, according to others, of Arabia Petraea. He taught rhetoric at Athens in the reign of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 259—268), and was an opponent of the rhetorician Genethlius. (Suid. & Eudocia, and referred to by Jerome in the preface to his commentary on Daniel. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 36, vi. p. 54.)

CALLINUS the preface to his commentary on Daniel. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 36, vi. p. 54.)

CALLINUS SELEUCUS. (Seleucus.)

CALLINUS (Καλλίνος). 1. Of Ephesus, the earliest Greek elegiac poet, whom either he or Archilochus is usually regarded by the ancients as the inventor of elegiac poetry. As regards the time at which he lived, we have no definite statement, and the ancients themselves endeavoured to determine it from the historical allusions which they found in his elegies. It has been fixed by some at about B.C. 634, and by others at about B.C. 680, whereas some are inclined to place Callinus as far back as the ninth century before the Christian era, and to make him more ancient even than Homer. The authorities for determining his age are Strabo (xiv. p. 647), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 333), and Athenaeus (xii. p. 525). But the interpretation of these passages is involved in considerable difficulty, since the Cimmerian invasion of Asia Minor, to which they allude, is itself very uncertain; for history records three different invasions of the Cimmerians into Asia Minor. We cannot enter here into a refutation of the opinions of others, but confine ourselves to our own views of the case. From Strabo it is evident that Callinus wrote during the time of Magnesia on the Maeander as still existing, and at war with the Ephesians. Now, we know that Magnesia was destroyed by the Trenos, a Cimmerian tribe, in B.C. 727, and consequently the poem referred to by Strabo must have been written previous to that year, perhaps about B.C. 730, or shortly before Archilochus, who in one of his earliest poems mentioned the destruction of Magnesia. Callinus himself, however, appears to have long survived that event; for there is a line of his (Fragm. 2, comp. Fragm. 8, ed. Bergk) which is usually referred to the destruction of Sardis by the Cimmerians, about B.C. 678. If this calculation is correct, Callinus must have been in the bloom of life at the time of the first Cimmerian invasion of Ephesus, when he himself perhaps took a part. We possess only a very few fragments of the elegies of Callinus, but among them there is one of twenty-one lines, which forms part of a war-elegy, and is consequently the most ancient specimen of this species of poetry extant. (Stobaeus, Floril. ii. 19.) In this fragment the poet exhorts his countrymen to courage and perseverance against their enemies, who are usually supposed to be the Magnesians, but the fourth line of the poem seems to render it more probable that Callinus was speaking of the Cimmerians. This elegy is one of great beauty, and gives us the highest notion of the power of Callinus. It is printed in the various collections of the "Poete Græci Minores." All the fragments of Callinus are collected in N. Bach's Calliás, Tyrtaei et Aishi Fragments (Leipzig, 1831, 8vo.) and Bergk's Poetas Lyrici Græci, p. 303, &c. (Comp. Frankse, Calliés, sive Quaestiones de Originis Carminis Elegiaci, Altona, 1816, 8vo.; Thiersch, in the Acta Philol. Monacens. iii. p. 571; Bode, Gesch. der Lyrisch. Dichtkunyst, i. pp. 143—161.)

2. A disciple and friend of Theophrastus, who left him in his will a piece of land at Stageira and 3000 drachmae. Callinus was also appointed by the testator one of the executors of the will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 52, 55, 36.)

3. Of Hermione, lived at a later period than the preceding one, and was a friend of the philosopher Lycon, who bequeathed to him in his will the works which he had not yet published. (Diog. Laërt. v. 70—74.)

CALLIOPE. (Musae.)

CALLIOPIUS. In all, or almost all, the MSS. of Terence, known not to be older than the ninth century, we find at the end of each play the words "Calliopius recensuit," from whence it has very naturally been inferred, that Calliopius was some grammarian of reputation, who had revised and corrected the text of the dramatist. Eugraphins, indeed, who wrote a commentary upon the same comedian about the year A.D. 500, has the following note on the word plaudite at the end of the Andria: Verba sunt Calliopii ejus recensoris, qui, cum usus formidabilis exeunte annorum secessit, et alque nebulam populum, vos volet, vos plaudite savisse vetat," but this notion is altogether inconsistent with the established meaning of recensiti.
in the ensuing battle, took to flight. He now wandered about in Sicily from town to town, at the head of a band of licentious mercenaries, but could not maintain himself anywhere. At last he and Leptines, with their mercenaries, crossed over into Italy, and laid siege to Rhegium, which was occupied by a garrison of Dionysius the Younger. The garrison was expelled, and the citizens of Rhegium were restored to autonomy, and Callippus himself remained at Rhegium. He treated his mercenaries badly, and being unable to satisfy their demands, he was murdered by his own friends, Leptines and Polyperchon, with the same sword, it is said, with which he had assassinated Dion. (Plut. Dion. 26—58, de Sera Num. Vide, p. 533; Ν. Δ io. xvi. 31, 36, 45; Athen. xi. p. 506.)

2. Of Athens, took part in the Olympic games in n. c. 352. He bribed his competitors in the pantomime to allow him to conquer and win the prize. But the fraud became known, and the Eleans condemned both Callippus and his competitors to pay a heavy fine. The Athenians, who considered the affair as a national one, sent Hypo¬rides to petition the Eleans to desist from their demand. When the request was refused, the Athenians neither paid the fine nor did they frequent the Olympic games any longer, until at last the Delphic god declared that he would not give any oracle to the Athenians, unless they satisfied the demand of the Eleans. The fine was now paid, and the money was spent in erecting six statues to Zeus, with inscriptions by no means flattering to the Athenians. (Paus. v. 21, § 3, &c.)

3. Of Athens, a son of Moerocles, a brave commander of the Athenians in the war against the Gauls, b. c. 279. He was stationed with his Athenians at Thermopylae to guard the pass. (Paus. i. 3, § 4, x. 20, § 3.)

4. An admiral of king Perseus of Macedon. He and Antenor were sent by the king, in b. c. 168, with a fleet to Tenedos, to protect the transports that came with provisions for the Macedonians from the islands of the Aegan. (Liv. xiv. 28.)

CALLIPPUS (Καλλίππος), literary. 1. A comic poet, who is mentioned only by Athenaeus (xxv. 568) as the author of a comedy entitled Pan¬nychis. Person proposed to read in this passage Hipparchus instead of Callippus, because it is known that Hipparchus composed a comedy Pan¬nychis. Person proposed to read in this passage Hipparchus instead of Callippus, because it is known that Hipparchus composed a comedy Pan¬nychis. (Athen. x. p. 691.) But this is not a sufficient reason for striking the name of Callippus from the list of comic writers. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Gr. p. 490.)

2. Of Athens, is mentioned by Aristotile (Rhet. ii. 23) as the author of a τέχνη βετορική, but nothing further is known about him.

3. A Stoic philosopher of Corinth, who was a pupil of Zeno, the founder of the school. (Diog. Laert. ii. 23. He was another person as the Callippus mentioned by Pausanias (ix. 29. § 2, 38, § 10) as the author of a work entitled οὐραγράφος εἰς Ὀρχομενοὺς, of which a few frag¬ments are preserved there.

4. Surnamed Petenus, was mentioned by Dio¬genes Laërtius (v. 57) as one of the witnesses to the will of Theophrastus. (L. S.)

CALLIPPUS or CALLIPPUS (Καλλίππος or Κάλλιππος), an astronomer of Cyzicus. He was a disciple of one of Eudoxus's friends, and followed him to Athens, where he became acquainted with the philosopher Aristotle. (Diod. v. 45.)

with Aristotle (who mentions him Metaph. xi. 8), and assisted that philosopher in rectifying and completing the discoveries of Euclides. (Simplic. in ib. II. de Coel. p. 120. a.) His observations are frequently referred to by Geminus and Ptolemy in their meteorological calendars (see Geminus, Elem. Astron. cap. 16, in Ptolemy Uralolog. p. 64, &c. and Ptol. fæces de Callip. in synaegyra Ætewv, ibid. p. 71, &c.), and were probably made at Cyzicus, since Ptolemy (ad fin.) says, that his observations are "made at Cyzicus, since Ptolemy (ad fin.) says, that

It must have begun near the time of the summer solstice, since Ptolemy refers to an observation of that solstice made at the end of the 50th year (την ὥραν της θερμαινης) of the first period (μεγ. νύκτας, i. 2, vol. i. p. 163, ed. Halma); and out of a number of other observations recorded by the same writer, all but two, according to Ideler, indicate the year B.C. 350, whilst four of them require the evening of June 28 for the epoch in question.

It is not certain at what time the period came into civil use; it would naturally be employed not to supersede, but to correct from time to time, the Metonic reckoning. The inaccuracy of the latter must have become quite sensible in B.C. 350; and it is evident, from the praise which Diodes (xii. 36) bestows upon it, that it could not have remained uncorrected to him and his followers. CALLISTHENES.

Laërt. v. 4, 5; Suidas, s. v. Callusthenes; Thrill- wall’s Greece, vol. vi. pp. 317—325; Blakesley’s Life of Aristotle, pp. 56, 73—84.)

Some manuscripts are still extant, professing to contain writings of Callisthenes; but they are spurious, and none of his works have come down to us. Besides an account of Alexander’s expedition (which he arrogantly said would be the main support of the conqueror’s glory, and which is referred to in several places by Plutarch and Strabo), he also wrote a history of Greece, in ten books, from the peace of Antalcidas to the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus. (n. c. 387—357.)

Cicero mentions a work of his on the Trojan war. The loss, however, of his writings has not much reason to regret, if we may trust the criticisms passed on them by those to whom they were known. Thus Polybius censures him for his unskilfulness in his relation of military affairs; Cicero finds fault with his style as fitted rather for rhetorical declamation than for history, and contrasts it with that of Xenophon; and Strabo speaks disparagingly of his accuracy and veracity. He seems indeed to have been far more a rhetorician than either a philosopher or a historian, and, even as a rhetorician, to have had more of the spirit of Isocrates than of his own great master. His readiness and fluency, no less than his extreme indiscretion, are illustrated by the anecdotes given by Plutarch (Alex. 58) of his speaking with great applause in praise of the Macedonians at a banquet, and then, on Alexander’s challenging him to take the other side, launching forth into the bitterest invective against them. In philosophy he probably followed Aristotle, so far indeed as he threw himself into any system at all. The recension of Homer (β ἀρχηγός), kept by Alexander in a precious casket, and usually ascribed to Aristotle, was made, according to Simo (xii. p. 594), by Callisthenes and Anaxarchus. (Diod. iv. 1, xiv. 117, xvi. 14; Cit. ad Fam. v. 15, ad Q. Prut. ii. 12, de Ort. lii. 14, de Div. iii. 34, ii. 25; Strab. xii. 531, xii. 542, xiv. p. 680, xvii. p. 614; Plut. Alex. 27, 39; Polyb. xii. 17—21; Suidas, s. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 480; Cl. Curt. viii. 10, note k.)

2. An Athenian orator, and, according to Plutarch, one of the eight whom Alexander, after the destruction of Thebes (n. c. 335), required to be delivered up to him,—on which occasion Demosthenes is said to have quoted the fable of the wolf, who demanded up to the sheep the surrender of their dogs. Demades, however, who, it seems, received a fee of five talents for the service, succeeded in propitiating Alexander, and in saving all whose lives were threatened, except the general Charidemus. Arrian gives the number and lists somewhat differently, and neither he nor Diodorus mentions Callisthenes. (Plut. Dem. 23, Alex. 13; Diod. xvi. 15; Arr. Anab. i. 10.)

3. A freedman of Lucullus, who, according to Cornelius Nepos (ap. Plut. Lucull. 45), administered to his master a certain drug (intended as a charm to increase his affection for him), which caused the failure of intellect that he laboured under in his latter years. [E. B.]

CALLISTRATUS.

Stoehens (Floril. c. 14) has preserved a fragment of it which belonged to the twenty-third book. [L. S.]

CALLISTO (Ка́ллисто), is sometimes called a daughter of Lycean in Arcadia and sometimes of Nycteus or Celeus, and sometimes also she is described as a nymph. (Schol. ad Euryl. Orest. 1842; Apollod. iii. 8. § 2; comp. Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 1.) She was a huntress, and a companion of Artemis, Zeus, however, enjoyed her charms; and, in order that the deed might not become known to Hera, he metamorphosed her into a she-bear. But, notwithstanding this precaution, Callisto was slain by Artemis during the chase, through the contrivance of Hera. Areas, the son of Callisto, was given by Zeus to Maia to be brought up, and Callisto was placed among the stars under the name of Arctos. (Apollod. ii. 1.) According to Hyginus, Artemis herself metamorphosed Callisto, as she discovered her pregnancy in the bath. Ovid (Met. E. 410, &c.) makes Juno (Hera) metamorphose Callisto; and when Areas during the chase was on the point of killing her mother, Jupiter (Zeus) placed both among the stars. The tomb of Callisto thirty stadia from the well Crumi: it was on a hill planted with trees, and on the top of the hill there was a temple of Artemis Callistis or Callistos. (Paus. viii. 35. § 7.) A statue of Callisto was dedicated at Delphi by the citizens of Tegea (v. 9. § 3), and in the Lesche of Delphi Callisto was painted by Polygnotus, wearing the skin of a bear instead of a dress. (x. 31. § 3.) While tradition throughout describes Callisto as a companion of Artemis, Müller (Dor. ii. 9. § 3) endeavours to shew that Callisto is only another form of the name of Artemis Calliste, as he infers from the fact, that the tomb of the heroine was connected with the temple of the goddess, and from Callisto being changed into a she-bear, which was the symbol of the Arcadian Artemis. This view has indeed nothing surprising, if we recollect that in many other instances also an attribute of a god was transformed by popular belief into a distinct divinity. Her being mixed up with the Arcadian genealogies is thus explained by Müller: the daughter of Lycean means the daughter of the Lycean Zeus; the mother of Areas is equivalent to the mother of the Arcadian people. CALLISTO, a female Pythagorean, to whom Thaneo, the wife of Pythagorn, addressed a letter on the proper way of governing a family. The letter is extant, and printed in the Aldine collection published at Rome in 1499, and at Geneva, with the Latin translation, in 1606. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 10.)

CALLISTONICUS (Ка́ллисто́ницус), a Thessalian stationary mentioned by Pausanias (ix. 16. § 1), made a statue of Tyche carrying the god Plutus. The face and the hands of the statue were executed by the Athenian Xenophon. [W. I.]

CALLISTRATUS (Καλλιστράτος), historical.

1. Son of Empeus, is mentioned by Pausanias as the commander of a body of Athenian cavalry in Sicily during the expedition of Nicias. When his countrymen were nearly cut to pieces at the river Assinarus, b. c. 413, Callistratus forced his way through the enemy and led his men safe to Catana. Thence returning to Syracuse, he attacked those who were plundering the Athenian camp, and fell, selling his life dearly. (Paus. vii. 16; comp. Thuc. viii. 74, 85.)

2. One of the body of knights under the command of Lysimachus, who were employed by the government of the Ten to keep in check the exiles under Thrasylus in the Pelopæae. Lysimachus having massacred some countrymen, with whom he fell in as they were going from the Pelopæae to their farms to procure provisions, transferred the property in the two small dikes which belonged to the twenty-third book. [L. S.] Stobaeus (c. 14) has preserved a fragment of Apollod. iii. 8. §§ 1642; comp. llygin. Eurip. Orest. ad 1642; sparsed as a nymph. (Schol. Nycteus or Ceteus, and sometimes also she is de¬

The tomb of Callisto thirty stadia from the well Crumi: it was on a hill planted with trees, and on the top of the hill there was a temple of Artemis Callistis or Callistos. (Paus. viii. 35. § 7.) A statue of Callisto was dedicated at Delphi by the citizens of Tegea (v. 9. § 3), and in the Lesche of Delphi Callisto was painted by Polygnotus, wearing the skin of a bear instead of a dress. CALLISTRATUS.

Orus by a body of Oropian exiles and the consequent loss of it to Athens, the Athenians, having sent an army against it under Chares, were induced by Chabrias and Callistratus to compromise the matter by delivering the place as a deposit to the Thebans pending the adjustment of their claims. The Thebans refused afterwards to surrender it, and the consequence was the prosecution of the advisers of the compromise. At first the eloquence of Callistratus was successful, and they were acquitted; but the loss of so important a frontier town rankled in the minds of the people, and Callistratus had been condemned to death in 361, and to have gone into banishment to Methone in Macedonia. In 356 (see Clinton on the year) he seems to have been still an exile, but he ultimately returned to Athens,—a step which the orator Lycurgus refers to as a striking instance of judicial infatuation,—and was put to death, though he had fled for refuge to the altar of the twelve gods. (Xen. Hell. vi. 7. § 13.)

3. A comic actor of the time of Aristophanes, in whose comedies Achaeamenes, Aves, and Vespuce Callistratus performed, as we learn from the scholia on those plays.

CALLISTRATUS, a Roman jurist, who, as appears from Dig. 1. tit. 10. s. 3. § 2, and from other passages in the Digest, wrote at least as late as the reign (A. D. 198-211) of Severus and Antoninus (i.e. Septimus Severus and Caracalla). In a passage of Lampadius (Alex. Ser. 60) which, either from interpolation or from the inaccuracy of the author, abounds with anachronisms, Callistatus is stated to have been a disciple of Papinian, and that he and Menecles had been one of the council of Alexander Severus. This statement may be correct, notwithstanding the suspicious character of the source whence it is derived.

The numerous extracts from Callistratus in the Digest occupy eighteen pages in Hommel's Palaeographia Pandectarum; and the fact that he is cited by no other jurist in the Digest, may be accounted for by observing, that the Digest contains extracts from few jurists of importance subsequent to Callistratus. The extracts from Callistratus are taken from works bearing the following titles: 1. "Leges Institutionum." 5. "Leges Institutionum.

CALLISTRATUS.

Questionum." The titles of the first three of these works require some explanation.

1. The treatise "de Cognitionibus" relates to those causes which were investigated, and decided by the emperor, the governor of a province, or other magistrate, without the intervention of judges. This departure from the ordinary course of the civil law took place, even before Diocletian's general abolition of the ordo judiciorum, sometimes by virtue of the imperial prerogative, and in some cases of the civil law. These works require some explanation.

2. What is meant by "Edictum Monitorium" is by no means clear. Huebold ("Edictis Monitoricis & Brevibus, Lips. 1804"), thinks, that monitory edicts are not special writs of notice or summons directed to the parties in the course of a cause, but those general clauses of the edictum perpetuum which relate to the law of procedure, giving actions and other remedies on certain conditions, and therefore, tacitly at least, containing warnings as to the consequences of irregularity or nonfulfilment of the prescribed conditions. The fragments of Callistratus certainly afford much support to this view. Huebold distinguishes the edictum monitorium from the edictum breve, upon which Paulus wrote a treatise. The latter he supposed to consist of those new clauses, which, in process of time, were added as an appendage to the edictum perpetuum, after the main body of it had acquired a constant form.

3. The phrase "de Jure Fisci et Populi" appears anomalous, but it occurs elsewhere. (See Paulus, Recept. Sent. v. 12.) Lampridius also ("Alex. Sec. 15") writes, that Alexander Severus "leges de jure populi et fisci moderae et infinitas (?) sanxit." Probably under the phrase "jus populi" must here be understood the law relating to the aerarium, or property of the state. (Pohl. Lips. 1804, §§ 34, 41.) [J.T.G.]

place. But when afterwards Joannes Palaeologus had gained possession of the imperial throne, Callixenus was restored to the patriarchal seat. The year after his restoration he was sent as ambassador to the Serbian princess Elizabeth to conclude a peace, and during this embassy he prevailed with her to transfer her residence to Thessalonica, the capital of the Serbians. There is a Greek homily on the exaltation of the cross by one Callixenus, which is printed with a Latin translation in Gresner (De Cruce, ii. p. 1247), but whether it is the work of our Callixenus, or of another who was patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 1406, is uncertain. There are some other works of a theological nature which are ascribed to one Callixenus, but they have never been printed. (Wharton's Appendix to Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 46, &c., ed. London.)

CALLISTUS, C. JULIUS, a freedman of Caligula, in whose reign he possessed very great influence and power, though in the end he was an accomplice in the conspiracy by which this emperor was murdered. In the reign of Claudius, Callistus continued to have great influence, and he endeavoured secretly, in conjunction with others, to counteract the attachment of Messalina to C. Silius; but Callistus was afraid of losing his position, and gave up opposing the scheme of Messalina. When she had been put to death, Callistus supported the designs of Lollia Paulina, who wished to become the emperor's wife; but he did not succeed in this point, for Claudius married Agrrippina, who was supported by Pallas. This Callistus is undoubtedly the person to whom the physician Sertobonius Largus dedicate his work; and from it we learn that the full name of Callistus was C. Julius Callistus. (Tac. Ann. xi. 28, 36, xii. 1, &c.; Dion Cass. ix. 10; Senec. Epist. 47; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xix. 1, § 10.)

CALLITHELES (Kalllitheus), thought by Pausanias (v. 27. § 5) to be a son or pupil of Onatas, in company with whom he wrote a Hermes carrying a ram. [W. J.]

CALLIXENUS (Kallixenos) was the mover in the Athenian Boule of the following decree against the generals who had conquered at Arginusae, b.c. 406,—a decree as false in its preamble as it was illegal and iniquitous in its substance: "Whereas the accusation against the generals, as well as their defence, has been heard in the previous assembly, be it enacted that all the Athenians give their votes on the case according to their tribes; and that for each tribe there be set two urns to receive the ballots of condemnation or acquittal. And if they be found guilty, let them suffer death; and let their property be confiscated, and a tenth of it be set apart for the goddess." The decree, in fact, took away from the accused the right of separate trials and a fair hearing; and, when it was brought before the assembly, Eurypomemon and some other friends of the generals threatened Callixenus with a prosecution for his illegal proposition, but were compelled by the clamours of the multitude to drop their proceedings. The Prytanes then refused to put the motion to the vote; but they too, with the single exception of Socrates (who was eisosthentos for that day) were obliged to give way before the invincible clamours of the multitude. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. §§ 8—16, Memorab. i. § 12; Plat. Apol. p. 322, b.; Pseudo-Plat. Aristoc. p. 368, ad fin.) Not long after the death of the generals the Athe-

CALO-JOANNES or JOANNES II. COMNENUS (Καλοκαιρινος Κομνηνους), one of the greatest and best emperors of the East, the eldest son and successor of Alexis I. Comnenus, was born in 1088. His real name was Joannes. His descriptive stature, tawny complexion, and ugly features, distinguished him not to his advantage, from among the other princes of the handsome Comnenian race; and it would seem that his name Calo-Joannes, or John the Handsome, was a nickname, were we not justified in believing that that name was given him for the beauty of his mind. His virtues were acknowledged by his father, who, when urged on his death-bed to leave the empire to Bryennius, his excellent son-in-law, resisted the persuasion of his wife and his daughter Anna, and appointed Calo-Joannes his successor. The new emperor ascended the throne on the 15th of August, 1118. It is related under Anna Comnenus, and Nichphoros Bryennius, that their conspiracy to depose Calo-Joannes, and to make Bryennius emperor, proved abortive, and that the property of both was confiscated. The emperor was especially protected by his younger brother, Isaac Selastoeoront, and by his minister, Alexi, a Turk who had been made prisoner during the reign of Alexis I., and who, joining great talents and knowledge with honesty and affable manners, advanced from one eminent post to another, till he became magnus domesticus, or prime minister, an office which he held during the whole reign of Calo-Joannes. The conspiracy of Anna and Bryennius was the only event that troubled the reign of Calo-Joannes, who won the hearts of his subjects to such a degree, that he ventured to abolish the punishment of death, and deserved to be called the Byzantine Marcus Aurelius. His relations with his brother Isaac were a model of brotherly affection, and though their friendship was on one occasion disturbed by the slander of some courtiers, it was but for a short time. The reign of Calo-Joannes is a series of wars, and each war was a triumph for the Greek arms. But while Nicetas and Comnenus, the chief sources, dwell with prolixity on the description of so many glorious deeds, they have neglected to give us a satisfactory exposition of the position of the administration, and their chronology is very confused. This circumstance has probably induced Gibbon to relate the reign of Calo-Joannes without any chronology except the dates of his accession and his death. Le Beau, in his Histoire du Bas Empire (vol. xix. 1. 66), gives a careful chronology which he has established by comparing the Latin historians, especially Guilielmus Tyrmessis and Otho Prisingensis; and Du Cange (†Familiæ Byzantinæ*, pp. 178, 179) gives an account of the different statements respecting the year in which Calo-Joannes died. We follow Le Beau and Du Cange.

The wars of Calo-Joannes with the different princes of the Turks lasted during his whole reign with scarcely any interruption. In the first campaign, in 1119, he took Laodicea, and spared the lives of the garrison, and in 1120 he took Scopolus. An invasion of the Petchenegues or Pathinae, who had crossed the Danube, called him to Thrace, and in 1122 he obtained a complete victory over them in Macedonia, giving the example at once of a general and a soldier. This war was finished to the advantage of the Greeks: the Petchenegues returned into their Scythian steppes, and great numbers of them who had been made prisoners received lands from the emperor in the very districts which their brethren had laid waste. In 1123 he took the field against the revolted Servians, who were supported by Stephen II., king of Hungary, who took Belgrade and Bransov. But in the following year, 1124, Calo-Joannes advanced with a strong army, took Francochorium near Sirmium, conquered the country between the Save and the Danube, and forced the king to desist from further attempts on the Greek empire. According to the Greek historians, the advantages of this war were rather on the side of king Stephen; while, strange enough, the Hungarian annalists attribute both victories and advantages to the Greeks. Thence Calo-Joannes turned once more against the Turks of Ioniwm, and took Castamania and Gangr, which his garrisons were, however, obliged to surrender to the Turks a short time afterwards. The emperor was more fortunate, in 1131, against the Armenians of Cilicia, or Armeana Minor, under their prince Livo or Leo, who was vanquished in several engagements; and in 1137, all his dominions were annexed to the Greek empire, and received the name of the fourth Armeni. This conquest brought him in contact with Raymond, prince of Antioch, who, according to the treaties made between Alexis I. and prince Bohemond I. of Antioch, was obliged to recognize the Greek emperor as his liege lord, but refused doing so, till Calo-Joannes compelled him, partly by negotiations, partly by threats. The emperor entered Antioch in 1136, and prince Raymond and the count of Edessa held the bridges of his house, as a token of Their vassalship. During his stay in that town, the emperor was exposed to great danger by a sudden uproar of the people, who fancied that the town was about to be given over to the Greeks. The emperor saved himself by a sudden flight, and was going to storm Antioch, when prince Raymond came into his camp, made an apology for the reckless conduct of his subjects, and soothed the emperor's anger by a new protestation of his faith. Calo-Joannes and Raymond now joined their troops, and made a successful campaign against the Turks.

CALPURNIUS.

Titus, in others as Cnatinus, in a great number the praenomen is altogether wanting, while the only evidence for the determination of the epoch when he flourished rests upon the gratuitous assumption that he is identical with the Junius or Julius Calpurnius commemorated by Vopiscus in the life of Cnatinus. In like manner we are left in uncertainty whether we ought to consider the term Siculus as a cognomen, or as an appellation pointing out his native country, or as an epithet bestowed upon him because he cultivated the same style of composition as that he is identical with the genuine, and this is far from certain, it does not necessarily follow, that this must be the same Cnatinus who was contemporary with Numerianus. The literary merits of Cnatinus may be briefly discussed. In all that relates to the mechanism of his art he deserves much praise. His versification is smooth, flowing, and sonorous, and his diction is deficient in the simplicity, freshness, and reality which lend such a charm to the Idylls of Theocritus—a deficiency which he awkwardly endeavours to supply by occasionally foisting harsh and uncouth expressions into the mouths of his speakers. He evidently was a careful student of Horace, like the Mantuan bard, he was raised from a humble station by the favour of some exalted patron, and in like manner we are left in uncertainty whether we ought to consider the term calvere as derived by some from the verb calvere, to mock or annoy, and is believed to refer to the captives of lovers. Others relate, that Ancus Marcius dedicated the temple of Venus Calva near the Capitol at the time when his wife's hair began to fall off; whereas a third account connects the foundation of this temple with the war against the Gauls, during which the Roman women were said to have cut off their hair for the purpose of making bow-strings of it. (Suet. Aug. ii. 724; Lactant. i. 20, 27.) Hartung (Die Relig. d. Rom. ii. p. 251) thinks this last account the most probable, and believes that the name referred to a real or symbolical cutting off of the hair of brides on their marriage day. (Comp. Pers. Sat. ii. 70, with the Schol.) [L. S.]

CVALVASTER, JULIUS, a laticlave tribune of the soldiers under Domitian, took part in the revolt of Antonius in Germany, but was pardoned because he pretended that his intercourse with Antonius was confined to a licentious connexion. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 11; Suet. Domus. 10.)

CVALENNA, C. MATIUS, usually called Matius, without his cognomen Calvena, which he received on account of his baldness, belonged to the equestrian order, and was one of Caesar's most intimate friends. He was a learned, amiable, and accomplished man; but, through his love of retirement and literature, he took no part in the civil war, and did not avail himself of Caesar's friendship to obtain any public offices in the state. Unlike many, who called themselves the friends of Caesar, he took no part in the conspiracy against his life, but on the contrary was deeply affected by his death. He immediately espoused the side of Octavianus, with whom he became very intimate; and at his request, and in memory of his departed friend, he presided over the games which Octavianus exhibited in a. c. 44, on the completion of the temple of Venus Genetrix, in honour of Caesar's victories. The conduct of Matius excited the wrath of Caesar's murderers; and there is a beautiful letter of his to Cicero (ad Fam. xi. 28), in which he justifies his conduct, avows his attachment to Caesar, and deprecates his loss. Matius was also an intimate friend of Cicero and Trebatius. Cicero first speaks of him in a letter to Trebatius, written in a. c. 59, in which he congratulates the latter upon having become a friend of Matius, whom he calls "suavissimus doctissimique homo" (ad Fam. vii. 15); but Cicero himself had been intimate with him some time before. Matius paid Cicero a visit at his Formian villa in a. c. 49, when he was on his way to join Caesar at Brundusium; and when Cicero returned to Italy after the battle of Pharsalia, in a. c. 48, greatly alarmed at the reception which Caesar might give him, Matius met him at Brundusium, did his best to console him, and promised to exert his influence with Caesar to obtain his pardon. From that time till Caesar's death, Matius and Cicero appear to have seen a good deal of each other; and he is frequently mentioned by Cicero in the period immediately following Caesar's death. (Cic. ad Att. xi. 11, 12, 15, a., ad Fam. vi. 12, ad Att. xiv. i. 1, 2, 4, 5, 8, xx. 26, xvi. 11, but the fullest information respecting Matius is in the two letters ad Fam. xi. 27, 28.)

Matius' friendship with Caesar is mentioned by Suetonius (Cæs. 52), and his intimacy with Augustus by Pliny (H. N. xii. 2, s. 6), who erroneously calls him Cn. Matius, and who speaks of him as alive about 80 years before his time. Tacitus (Ann. xii. 60) also alludes to the power and influence which Matius possessed.

This C. Matius is in all probability the same as the C. Matius (not Cn. as Gelius calls him), who translated the Iliad into Latin verse, and was the author of several other works. His version of the Iliad is first quoted by his contemporary Varro (L. L. viii. 93, 96, ed. Müller), and is referred to by A. Gelius (vi. 6, ix. 14) and the Latin grammarians. Matius also wrote "Mimiannæ," which were as celebrated as his translation of the Iliad, and were particularly admired for the elegance of the new words which he introduced in them. (Gell. xv. 29, xx. 8.) Matius also paid great attention to agriculture and economy, and wrote a work on the whole art and science of cookery, in three books, which was translated respectively Coenæ, Cætarius, Saluyanitæs. (Columella, xii. 4, 44.) It was probably from this Matius that the modern C. Matius derived its name (Plin. H. N. xiv. 14, 15; Columella, v. 10, 19; Suet. Dom. 21; Macrob. Saturn. ii. 10; Athen. iii. p. 82, c.), and the Opowium Matianum, praised by Apicius (iv. 3).

CALVENTIUS, an Insubrian Gaul, of the town of Placentia, and a merchant, whose daughter married L. Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus, the father of L. Calpurnius Piso Caesoninus, consul in c. 58. In his speech against the latter, Cicero upbraids him with the low origin of his mother, and calls him Caesonins Semplacensinus Calventiun (in Pison, vi. 23; Ascon in Pison, p. 5, ed. Orelli; comp. Cic. de proo. Caus. 4, pro Sest. 9); and in a letter to his brother Quintus (ii. 1. § 4), Piso is also meant by the name of Calventius Maris.

CALVIA CRISPINILLA. [CRISPINILLA.] CALVINA, JULIA, the sister of L. Silanus, was at first married to a son of Vitellius, but afterwards, for the sake of doing a favour to Agrippina, Vitellius accused her of incestuous intercourse with her brother, L. Silanus. There was, however, according to the concurrent testimony of the ancients, no ground whatever for that charge, except that Silanus was attached to his sister, and perhaps expressed his love for her in too unguarded a manner, surrounded as he was by spies and enemies. When Silanus had put an end to his own life, Calvina was expelled from Italy. (The. An. xii. 4, 8; L. Silanus.) It is highly probable that this Calvina is the same as the Julia (Julia?) Calvina mentioned by Suetonius (Vesp. 23) as still alive towards the end of the reign of Vespasian, for it is stated there, that she belonged to the family of Augustus, and it is well known that the Silani were great-grandsons of Augustus. [La S.]

CALVIVUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Domitia gens.

1. CN. DOMITIUS CALVINUS, consul in B.C. 332. (Livy, vii. 17.)
2. CN. DOMITIUS CN. F. CALVINUS, son of the above, married Maxinia, offered himself as a candidate for the curatorship in B.C. 304; but, although his father had been consul, CN. Flavius, the famous scribe of Appius Claudius, was preferred to him.

CALVINUS.

Five years later, however, in B.C. 299, he was elected curule aedile. (Livy, x. 9; where instead of the phenomenon C. we ought to read Cn.) He was raised to the consulship in B.C. 283, together with P. Cornelius Dolabella. The name of Calvinus scarcely appears during the year of his consulship, though he must have been very actively engaged, for Rome was just then threatened by a coalition of all her enemies in Italy. Stimulated by the LOCANTII and Bruttii, and more especially by the Tarentines, the Etruscans, Gauls, Lucanians, and Sammites took up arms against her. The Senones, allied with the Etruscans, attacked the town of Arretium; and as the consuls were probably engaged in other parts of Italy, the pretor L. Caecilius was sent out to the relief of the place; but he lost a battle and his life near Arretium. His successor, M. Curius, sent ambassadors to the Senones to effect an exchange of prisoners, but the ambassadors were murdered by the Senones. In order to avenge this breach of the law of nations, the consul P. Cornelius Dolabella marched through the country of the Sabines and Picentes into that of the Senones, conquered their army and ravaged their country. The Etruscans, with which the colony was established in it. The events which we have just described are not mentioned by all authorities in the same succession. According to Orosius (iii. 22; comp. Liv. Epit. 12), the murder of the Roman ambassadors preceded the campaign of L. Caecilius; whereas, according to Appian, the campaign of Dolabella followed immediately after the murder, and the object of the embassy was to remonstrate with the Senones for serving against the Romans, their allies. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 437, &c.) In what manner Calvinus was engaged during this time, is not known.

When the Boians saw that the Senones were expelled from their country, they began to dread the same fate, joined the remaining Senones and the Etruscans, and marched against Rome. But in crossing the Tiber they met a Roman army, and in the ensuing battle most of the Etruscans were slain, and only a few of the Gauls escaped. Our accounts differ as to the Roman commanders in this battle; for some represent Dolabella and others Calvinus as the victorious general, whereas it is most probable that both consuls gained laurels on that day. It was undoubtedly to this victory that Calvinus owed the surname of Maximus, and in B.C. 269 he was further honoured by being made dictator.

On laying down this office in the same year, he was elected censor—the first instance of a plebeian being raised to that office. (Plin. H. N. xxxii. 1; Polyb. ii. 19, 20; Liv. Epit. 13; Appian, Samnit. 6, Gall. 11; Flor. i. 13; Eutrop. ii. 10; Dion Cass. Ezechtr. Vet. p. 163, ed. Sturz; Fast. Cap.)

3. DOMITIUS CALVINUS, probably a son of No. 2, conquered the Etruscan town of Luna, which was occupied by the Illyrians. He seems to have been praetor when he made the conquest. The year to which it belongs is unknown, though it is clear that the event must have occurred after the first Punic war, that is, after B.C. 206. (Frontin. Strateg. iii. 2. § 1; Liv. Epit. 20; Zonar. viii. 19, &c.)

4. CN. DOMITIUS, M. P. N. CALVINUS, appears, in B.C. 62, as legate of L. Valerius Flaccus in Asia, and in B.C. 59 as tribune of the people, in which capacity he supported the consul M. Bibulus against the other consul, C. Julius Caesar, and the tribune Vatinius, who allowed himself to be used by Caesar as a tool. Three years later, Calvinus was praetor, and presided at the trials of L. Calpurnius Batiatus, who was accused of ambitus, and of M. Caelius, who was charged with having attempted to poison Clodia. In a. c. 54 he offered himself as a candidate for the consulship, on which occasion he, as well as his competitors, was guilty of enormous bribery; and, in conjunction with C. Memmius, he entered into a most disgraceful compact with the consuls of the year, who were to preside at the elections. The two candidates promised to procure for the consuls in office certain lucrative provinces by perjury, if they would lend them their assistance in the elections; and in case the plan with the provinces should fail, the candidates promised to give to the consuls a compensation in money of forty millions of sestercies. C. Memmius himself afterwards denounced the whole plan to the senate; but the appointment of a court to investigate the conduct of Calvinus was prevented by intrigues. The election of the consuls also was delayed on account of unfavourable auspices. In the beginning of October, however, all the candidates were to be tried for ambitus; but they escaped judgment by the interregnum which the party of Pompey tried to use as a means for getting him appointed dictator. The interregnum lasted for nearly nine months, and Calvinus, who had in the meantime gained the favour of Pompey by voting for the acquittal of A. Gabinius, was at length made consul through the influence of Pompey. His colleague was M. Valerius Messalla. During the year of their consulship the disturbances at Rome continued: the candidates for the consulship for the year following, Milo, Hypaeus, and Metellus Scipio, as well as P. Clodius, who sued for the praetorship, carried on their contests with bribes, and had recourse even to force and violence. The consuls were unable to get their successors elected; a decree of the senate which they effected, that no one should obtain a foreign province till five years after he had held the consulship or praetorship, did not produce the desired results. During an attempt of the consuls to get their successors elected in an assembly of the people, stones were thrown at the consuls, and Calvinus was wounded.

For some years we now lose sight of Calvinus; but after the outbreak of the civil war in a. c. 49, we find him actively engaged in the service of Caesar's party, and commanding the cavalry under Curio in Africa. After the unfortunate battle on the Bagradas, he advised Curio to take to flight, and promised not to forsake him. In the year following, Caesar sent Calvinus with two legions from Illyricum to Macedonia, where he met Metellus Scipio, without however any decisive engagement taking place between them. But, according to Dion Cassius (xii. 51), he was driven by Flavius from Macedonia, and penetrated into Thessaly, where he gained a victory over Metellus Scipio, and took several towns. When Caesar broke up the civil war in a. c. 40, Calvinus, the latter was in the north of Macedonia, and had nearly fallen into the hands of Pompey, but succeeded in effecting his union with Caesar on the frontier of Thessaly. In the battle of Pharsalia Calvinus commanded the centre, and was faced by Metellus Scipio.

After the close of the war in Thessaly, when Caesar went to Egypt, he entrusted to Calvinus the administration of the province of Asia and the neighbouring countries. While Caesar was engaged in the Alexandrine war, for which Calvinus served him two legions from Asia, the latter became involved in a war with Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates; he was defeated in the neighbourhood of Nicopolis, and escaped with only a few remnants of his small army. After his return from Egypt, Caesar defeated Pharnaces near Zela, and Calvinus was sent to pursue the enemy, who was compelled to surrender Sinope. But soon after, a peace was concluded with him. As Caesar wanted to hasten to Italy, he left Calvinus behind to complete the settlement of the affairs in Asia. This does not appear to have occupied much time, for in the year following, a. c. 46, we find him engaged in Africa in besieging Considius at Thysdrus, and in a. c. 45, he was present at Rome at the time when Cicero defended King Deiotarus. Caesar appointed Calvinus his magister equitum for the year following, but the murder of the dictator prevented his entering upon the office.

During the war of Octavianus and Antony against the republicans, Calvinus was ordered by the former to bring over reinforcements from Brundisium to Illyricum; but while crossing the Ionian sea, he was attacked by L. Statius Marcus and Cn. Domitius Ahemobarbus. His ships were destroyed, and he himself succeeded with great difficulty in escaping back to Brundisium. In a. c. 40 he was elected consul a second time; but before the end of the year he, and his colleague were obliged to resign, in order to make room for others. In the year following, he fought as proconsul against the revolted Cretans in Spain. Here he acted with the greatest vigour towards his own soldiers, and afterwards defeated the enemy without difficulty. His occupations in Spain, however, appear to have lasted for several years, for the triumph which he celebrated for his exploits in Spain is assigned to the triumphal Fasti to the year a. c. 36. The sums of money which he had raised in the towns of Spain were spent partly on the celebration of his triumph, and partly upon the restoration of the regia on the via sacra, which had been burnt down. (Orelli, Onom. Toll. ii. p. 226; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 6, xl. 43, 46, 56, xlii. 46, 49, xliv. 47, xlv. 15, 32, 42; Plut. Pompe. 54, Cass. 44, 50, Dion. Cass. xlvii. 47; Appian, B. [LS.]

CALVINUS. 1. Consul in a. c. 124. In the year following, he had the administration of Gaul, and carried on a war against the Salluvii. After having conquered them, he founded the colony of Aquae Sextiae. (Liv. Epit. 81; Strab. iv. p. 180; Vell. Pat. i. 15.)

2. Is mentioned only by Cicero as an elegant orator, but of a sickly constitution, so that persons might have his advice whenever they pleased, but could employ him as their pleader in the courts only when his health permitted it. (Cic. De Orat. i. 70.) He seems to be the same as the C. Sextius who was a friend of C. Caesar Strabo, and is described as one-eyed. (Cic. De Orat. i. 60, 61.) PDigius thinks him to be also the same as the C. Sextius who was praetor in a. c. 39, and afterwards obtained Macedonia as his province. But in the passage of Cicero in which he is mentioned (c. Pison, CALVUS.

34) the better MSS. read Sentius instead of Sextius.

[L. S.]

CALVYNNUS, T. VETURIUS, was twice consul, in b. c. 354 and 321. In his second consularship he and his colleague Sp. Posturaius Albinus commanded the Roman army at Caudium against the Samnites, where the Romans suffered the well-known defeat, and passed under the yoke. The consuls concluded a treaty with the Samnites; but as this treaty was not approved of by the Romans, the consuls who had concluded it, and several other officers, were delivered up to the Samnites.

(Liv. viii. 16, l. 1, 6; Appian, Sumnit. 6; Cic. De Senece. 12, De Offi. iii. 30; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 211, &c.)

[CALVISIUS, a client of Junia Silana. This lady had been grievously injured by Agrippina, and now resolved to take vengeance. She therefore sent Calvisius and a fellow-client to bring against Agrippina the charge of endeavouring to place Rubellius Plautus on the throne instead of Nero. It was so contrived that the charge came to the emperor's ears in a round-about way, and did not appear an intentional denunciation. Hereupon, Nero resolved not to put Agrippina to death; but the former times were yoked for a few years, and Junia Silana and her two clients were sent into exile; but after the murder of Agrippina they were all recalled.

(Tac. Ann. xiii. 19, 21, 22, xiv. 12.)

CALVISIUS. A person of this name was entrusted by Pliny the Younger with the task of informing the deacons of Comum that Pliny was willing, as a matter of bounty, not of right, to effectuate the intention of one Saturninus, who, after leaving 400,000 sesterces to the republic Comensium (a legacy which was legally void), gave the residue of his property to Pliny.

(Ep. v. 7.) Hence Guili. Grotius (Vida JClorasi. iii. 5, § 19) has clased Calvisius among the jurists, although his duties might have been undertaken by any one of moderate discretion and delicacy of feeling. Upon the same slight ground, Guili. Grotius builds the supposition, that the Calvisius mentioned by Pliny was the author of the Actio Calvisiana. This action was introduced, probably in the time of the republic, by some prouter of the name Calvisius (Hugo. R. G. p. 335), to protect the patron's rights of succession to a portion of his freedman's property against fraudulent alienations made in the lifetime of the freedman.

(Dig. 38, tit. 5, s. 3, § 3; Heineccius, Hist. Jur. Rom. § 264.)

[J. T. G.]

CALVISIUS, FLAVIUS, the governor of Egypt under M. Aurelius, took part in the revolt of Avidius Cassius, but was treated by the emperor with great leniency, and only banished to an island.

(Dion Cass. lxxi. 28.)

CALVISIUS NEPOS. [NEPOS.]

CALVISIUS SABI'NUS. [SABINUS.]

CALVUSIUS, a soldier who distinguished himself by his insollence to Germanicus, when the legions in Germany revolted on the death of Augustus in a. d. 14. (Tac. Ann. i. 35, 43.)

CALVUS, the "bald-head," the name of a family of the Licinia gens.

1. P. LICINIIUS CALVUS, consul in b. c. 400, and the first plebeian who was elected to that magistracy.

(Liv. v. 12.)

2. P. LICINIIUS CALVUS, a son of No. 1, was made consul in b. c. 396, in the place and on the proposal of his father, who had been elected to this office, but declined it on account of his advanced age.

(Liv. v. 18.)

3. C. LICINIIUS CALVUS, a son of No. 2, was consul in b. c. 377, and magistrate equum to the dictator P. Manlius in b. c. 368,—an office which was then conferred upon a plebeian for the first time.

(Liv. vi. 31, 39; Diod. xv. 37.)

Plutarch (Camil. 59) considers this magistrate equum to be the same as the famous law-giver C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, who was then tribune of the people; but it is inconceivable that a tribune should have held the office of magistrate equum.

Dion Cassius (Fragm. 33) likewise calls the magistrate equum erroneously Licinius Stolo. (Comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 27, n. 35.)

4. C. LICINIIUS CALVUS, surnamed Stolo, which he derived, it is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprung up from the roots of his vines. He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a crisis and a happy termination, and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from b. c. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleague L. Sexius. The laws which he proposed were passed. Thus in future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected as in former times, one of whom should always be a plebeian. 2. That no one should possess more than 500 jugers of the public land, or keep upon it more than 100 head of large and 500 of small cattle.

3. A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor, which ordained that the interest already paid for borrowed money should be deducted from the capital, and that the remainder of the latter should be paid back in three yearly instalments. 4. That the Sibylline books should be entrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians, that no falsifications might be introduced in favour of the patricians. These rogations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sexius was the first plebeian who, in accordance with the first of them, obtained the consulship for the year b. c. 366.

Licinius himself too received marks of the people's gratitude and confidence, by being elected twice to the consulship, in b. c. 364 and 361; but some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Laenas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. Avarice had tempted him to violate his own salutary regulations, and in b. c. 357 he was sentenced to pay a heavy fine.

(Plin. H. N. xvii. 1, xviii. 4; Varro, De Re Rust. i. 2; Liv. vi. 35, 43, iv. 1, 2, 16; Florus, i. 26; Liv. De Vir. Illust. 20; Plut. Camil. 59; Diod. xvi. 82, 95; Zonar. vii. 24; Val. Max. viii. 6, § 3; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 1, &c.)

CALVUS, C. LICINIUS MACER, who, as a forensic speaker, was considered by his countrymen generally as not unworthy of being ranked with Caesar, Brutus, Pollio, and Messalla, while by some he was thought to rival even Cicero himself, and who as a poet is commonly placed side by side with Catullus, was born on the 28th of May, n. c. 82, on the same day with M. Ciccius Rufus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 50.) He was the son of C. Licinius Macer, a man of praetorian dignity, who, when impeached (n. c. 66) of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial.
CALVUS.

CALYDONIUS.
Dionysus, whose image was carried from Melegeton to Patrae (Paus. vii. 21. § 1), and of Meligyta in the Caledonian hunt. (Ov. Met. viii. 231.)

CALYPSO (Καλυψώ), a statuary of uncertain country, contemporary with Onatas, b. c. 468-448. (Paus. x. 13. § 5.) [W. L.]

CALYPSO (Καλυψώ). Under this name we find in Hesiod (Theog. 359) a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and in Apollodorus (i. 2. § 7) a daughter of Nereus, while the Homeric Calypso is described as a daughter of Atlas. (Od. i. 50.) This last Calypso was a nymph inhabiting the island of Ogygia, on the coast of which Odysseus was thrown when returning from the Skik. She fell in love with him and promised him eternal youth and immortality if he would remain with her. She detained him in her island for seven years, until at length she was obliged by the gods to allow him to continue his journey homewards. (Od. v. 28, &c., vii. 254, &c.) [L. S.]

CAMATINGUS, ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος Καυσατόρ), a relative of the emperor Manuel Comnenus (a. p. 1143 to 1180), who honoured him with the title of Sebastus, and promoted him to the offices of prefect of the city and prefect of the Býla, i.e. praefectus vigilum, or prefect of the imperial guards. Camatines is said to have been a man of great intellect and a powerful speaker. He is the author of several theologico-political works, an extract from one of which is all that has appeared in print. Among them we may mention one entitled Αὐτοφράγια, a dialogue against the Latins. A portion of this work which relates to the Processio Spiritus Sancti, was subsequently refuted by J. Vееcus, and both the original and the refutation are printed in L. Allatius' Graeda Orthodox, ii. p. 287, &c. His other works are still extant in MS. Andronicus Camatines was the father of Johannes Ducas, to whom Eustathius dedicated his commentary on Dionysius Periegetes. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 675, with Wharton's Append. p. 24; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 278.) [L. S.]

CAMATINGUS, IOANNES (Ἰωάννης Καματήρ), patriarch of Constantinople from a. d. 1198 to 1204. We have four important lines in praise of him, which were written by Ephremus, and are printed in Leo Allatius' De Consensu, &c. (i. p. 724.) Nicolaus Commenus (Praeot. Mystag. p. 251) mentions an oration of his on homicide, and another, on the marriage of Consobrini, is printed in Freher's Jux Graecum (iv. p. 283). An epistle of J. Camatines addressed to Innocent III. is printed in a Latin translation among the letters of Innocent, with the reply of the latter. In this letter Camatines expresses his wonder at the Roman church assuming the title of the universal church. Among the other works of his which are still extant in MS. there is an inarticulate poem inscribed to the emperor Manuel Commenus, and an entitled τοῦ ἱεραμμένου ἁγίου τοῦ Ἡλία οὗτος ἐκτάσεως ἡμῶν ἐν ζωῇ ἡμῶν ἐκτάσεως τῷ ἐν οἰκογενείᾳ. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 693; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 154, &c., xi. p. 279, &c.) [L. S.]

CAMAULES (Καμαύλη), the leader of a band of Gauls before they invaded Greece in b. c. 279. The barbarians were at first few in number, but when they reached Thrace their forces had increased to such an extent, that they were divided into three great armies, which were placed under Cerethrius, Brenmus, and Bolgius; and Camaulus is no longer heard of. (Paus. x. 19. § 4.) [L. S.]

CAMBYLUS (Καμβύλους), commander of the Cretans engaged in the service of Antiochus III. in b. c. 214. He and his men were entrusted with the protection of a fort near the acropolis of Sardis during the war against Achaean, the son of Andromachus. He allowed himself to be drawn into a treacherous plan for delivering up Achaean to Antiochus, by Bols, who received a large sum of money from Scalius, the agent of Ptolemy, for the purpose of assisting Achaean to escape. But the money was divided between Bols and Cambylus, and instead of setting Achaean free, they communi- cated the plan to Antiochus, who again rewarded them richly for delivering Achaean up to him. (Paus. vii. lvi. 17-23 comm. Man. 1. S.)

CAMBYSES (Καμβύρης). 1. The father of Cyrus the Great, according to Herodotus and Xenophon, the former of whom tells us (i. 107), that Astyages, being terrified by a dream, restrained from marrying his daughter Mandane to a Mede, and gave her to Cambyses, a Persian of noble blood, but of an unambitious temper. (Comp. Just. i. 4.) The father of Cambyses is also called 'Cyrus' by Herodotus (i. 111). In so rhetorical a passage as the speech of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 11) we must not look for exact accuracy in the genealogy. Xenophon (Cyrop. i. 2) calls Cambyses the king of Persia, and Cambyses speaks of him as Cyrop. viii. 5 as still reigning after the capture of Babylon, b. c. 539. But we cannot of course rest much on the statements in a romance. The account of Ctesias differs from the above. [ASTYAGES.]

2. A son of Cyrus the Great, by Amytia according to Ctesias, by Cassandane according to Herodotus, who sets aside as a fiction the Egyptian story of his having had Nitetis, the daughter of Apries, for his mother. This same Nitetis appears in another version of the tale, which is not very consistent with chronology, as the concubine of Cambyses; and it is said that the detection of the fraud of Amasis in substituting her for his own daughter, whom Cambyses had demanded for his semele, was the cause of the invasion of Egypt by the latter in the fifth year of his reign, a. d. 525. There is, however, no occasion to look for any other motive than the same ambition which would have led Cyrus to the enterprise, had his life been spared, besides that Egypt, having been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, seems to have formed a portion of the Babylonian empire. (See Jerem. xliii. xlvii.; Ezek. xxix.—xxxii.; Newton, On the Prophecies, vol. i. p. 357, &c.; comp. Herod. i. 77.) In his invasion of the country, Cambyses is said by Herodotus to have been aided by Phanes, a Greek of Halicarnassus, who had fled from the service of Amasis; and, by his advice, the Persian king obtained the assistance of an Arabian chief, and thus secured a safe passage through the desert, and a supply of water for his army. Before the invading force reached Egypt, Amasis died and was succeeded by his son, who is called Psammenitus by Herodotus, and Amyrtaeus by Ctesias. According to Ctesias, the conquest of Egypt was mainly effected through the treachery of Combusphes, one of the favourite eunuchs of the Egyptian king, who put Cambyses in possession of the passes on condition of being made viceroy of the country. But Herodotus makes no mention either of this intrigue, or of the singular stratagem by which Psammenitus says (vii. 9), that Pelusium was taken almost without resistance. He tells us, however, that a single battle, in which the Persians were victorious, decided the fate of Egypt; and, though some of the conquered held out for a while in Memphis, they were finally obliged to capitulate, and the whole nation submitted to Cambyses.

He received also the voluntary submission of the Greek cities, Cyrene and Barca [see p. 477, b.], and of the neighbouring Libyan tribes, and projected fresh expeditions against the Aethiopians, who were called the "long-lived," and also against Carthage and the Ammonians. Having set out on his march to Aethiopia, he was compelled by want of provisions to return; the army which he sent against the Ammonians perished in the sands; and the attack on Carthage fell to the ground in consequence of the refusal of the Phoenicians to act against their colony. Yet their very refusal serves to shew what is indeed of itself sufficiently obvious, how important the expedition would have been in a commercial point of view, while that against the Ammonians, had it succeeded, would probably have opened to the Persians the caravan-trade of the desert. (Herod. ii. i., iii. 1-26; Ctes. Pers. 9; Just. i. 9; comp. Heren's African Nations, vol. i. ch. 6.)

Cambyses appears to have ruled Egypt with a stern and strong hand; and to him perhaps we may best refer the prediction of Isaiah: "The Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord" (Is. xix. 4; see Vitringa, ad loc.); and it is possible that his tyranny to the conquered, together with the insults offered by him to their national religion, may have caused some exaggeration in the accounts of his madness, which, in fact, the Egyptians ascribed to his impiety. But, allowing for some over-statement, it does appear that he had been subject from his birth to epileptic fits (Herod. iii. 83); and, in addition to the physical tendency to insanity thus created, the habits of despotism would seem to have fostered in him a capricious self-will and a violence of temper bordering upon frenzy. He had long set the laws of Persia at defiance by marrying his sisters, one of whom he is said to have murdered in a fit of passion because she lamented her brother Smerdis, whom he had caused to be slain. Of the death of this prince, and of the events that followed upon it, different accounts are given by Herodotus and Ctesias. The former relates that Cambyses, alarmed by a dream which seemed to portend his brother's greatness, sent a confidential minister named Prexaspes to Susa with orders to put him to death. Afterwards, a Magian, who bore the same name as the deceased prince and greatly resembled him in appearance, took advantage of these circumstances to personate him and set up a claim to the throne [Smerdis], and Cambyses, while marching through Syria against this pretender, died at a place named Ecbatan of an accidental wound in the thigh, B.C. 521. According to Ctesias, the name of the king's murdered brother was Tanuxares, and a Magian named Sphendadates accused him to the king of an intention to revolt. After his death by poison, Cambyses, to conceal it from his mother Amytis, made Sphendadates personate him. The fraud succeeded at first, from the wonderful likeness between the Magian and the murdered prince; at length, however, Amytis discovered it, and died of poison, which she had voluntarily taken, impressing curses on Cambyses. The king died at Babylon of an accidental wound in the thigh, and Sphendadates continued to support the character of Tanyoxares, and maintained himself for some time on the throne. (Herod. iii. 27-38, 61-66; Ctes. Pers. 9; Diod. v. 57; Pind. Ol. vii. 135, with the School; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 315.) [L. S.]

CAMEBLUS, one of the physicians of Augustus, who appears to have lived after Artorius, and to have been succeeded by Antonius Musa. Pliny in rather an obscure passage (H. N. xix. 38), tells us, that he would not allow the emperor to eat lettuce in one of his illnesses, from the use of which plant afterwards, at the recommendation of Antonius Musa, he derived much benefit. [W. A. G.]

CAMENAE, not Camenaeae, were Roman divinities whose name is connected with curnen (an oracle or prophecy), whence we also find the forms Casmenae, Carmenaeae, and Carmencae. The Carmencae were accordingly prophetic nymphs, and they belonged to the religion of ancient Italy, although later traditions represent them as having been introduced into Italy from Arcadia. Two of the Camenae were Anteverta and Postverta. [Antevorta.] The third was Carmenta or Carmentis, a prophetic and healing divinity, who had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline hill, and altars near the ports of Camarinae. Respecting the festival celebrated in her honour, see Dict. of Rom. Antiquity, s.v. Carmenlia. The traditions which assigned a Greek origin to her worship at Rome, state that her original name was Nicostrate, and that she was called Carmentia from her prophetic powers. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 51, 536; Dionys. i. 15, 32.) According to these traditions she was the mother of Evander, the Arcadian, by Hercules, and after having endeavoured to persuade her son to kill Hercules, she fled with him to Italy, where she gave oracles to the people and to Hercules. She was put to death by her son at the age of 110 years, and then obtained divine honours. (Dionys. i. 31, &c.) Hyginus (Fab. 277) further relates, that she changed the fifteen characters of the Greek alphabet, which Evander introduced into Latium, into Roman ones. The fourth and most celebrated Camena was Aegeria or Egeria. [Aegeria.] It must be remarked here, that the Roman poets, even as early as the time of Livius Andronicus, apply the name of Camenae to the Muse. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Romans, ii. p. 198, &c.) [L. S.]

CAMENIATA, JOANNES (Παντοκράτορ Σμερδής), a son of Cambyses and Cydippe, and a grandson of Helios. The town of Cameiros, in Rhodes, is said to have derived its name from him. (Diod. v. 57; Pind. Ol. vii. 135, with the School; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 315.) [L. S.]

The Arabs, however, did not restore him to liberty, but carried him to Tarsus in Cilicia for the purpose of exchanging him for Arab prisoners who had been taken by the Greeks. At Tarsus, Cameniata wrote a description of the capture of Thessalonica, entitled τὴν Πλατάνεως οἰς κατακαταλείπουσαν τοῦ Καμεινίου ἐπὶ τὴν Ἀμύνον τῆς Θεσσαλονίκης, which is commonly called by its Latin title "De Excidio Thessalonensi." It is divided into seventy-nine chapters, and is as important for the plunder of Thessalonica by the Arabs as the work of Ioannes Anagnosta for the sack of the same town by the Turks in 1430. The Greek text of this elegant work was first published, with a Latin translation, by Leo Allatius in his Λατιν. Ἐραδήμ. Ιαυβαν. του Καμεινίου, 1653-1658, where it is divided into forty-five sections. The second edition is by Combesius, who published it with an improved Latin translation in his "Historiae Byzantinæ Scriptores post Theopham. Par. 1665, fol., which forms part of the Parisian "Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant." Combesius divided it into seventy-nine chapters. The third and last edition, in the Jahrbuch Collection, was published by Em. Bckckr together with Theophanes (centurians), Symon Magister, and Georgius Menouchus, Bonn, 1838, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. p. 695; Handkkn, De Script. Hist. Byzant. p. 403, &c.; the "Annales" of Ioannes Cameniata.) [W.P.]

CAMERINUS, the name of an old patrician family of the Sulpicia gens, which probably derived its name from the ancient town of Cameria or Curnerium, in Latium. The Camerini frequently held the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic; but after B.C. 345, when Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus Rufus was consul, we do not hear of them again for upwards of 400 years, till Q. Sulpicius Camerinus obtained the consulship in A. D. 9. The family was reckoned one of the noblest in Rome in the early times of the empire. (Juv. v. 90, vili. 38.)

1. SER. Sulp. P. P. Camerinus Cornutus, consul b. c. 500 with M. Tullius Longus in the tenth year of the republic. Livy says, that nothing memorable took place in that year, but Dionysius speaks of a formidable conspiracy to restore the Tarquins which was detected and crushed by Camerinus. After the death of his colleague, Camerinus held the consulship alone. Dionysius puts a speech into the mouth of Camerinus respecting a renewal of the league with the Latins in B.C. 496. (Liv. ii. 19; Dionys. v. 52, 55, 57, vi. 20; Cic. Brut. 10; Zonar. vili. 13.)

2. Q. Sulpi. Camerinus Cornutus, consul b. c. 490 with Sp. Luecius Flaveus. He was afterwards one of the embassy sent to intercede with Coriolanus when the latter was advancing against Rome. (Dionys. vii. 68, viili. 22.)

3. SER. Sulpi. F. SER. N. Camerinus Cornutus, consul b. c. 461, when the lex Terent.-

tilla was brought forward a second time for a reform in the laws. (Liv. i. 10; Dionys. x. 1; Diod. xii. 34; Plin. H. N. ii. 57.) This law, however, was successfully resisted by the patricians; but when in b. c. 451 it was resolved to send three ambassadors to Greece to collect information respecting the laws of the Greek states, Ser. Camerinus was one of their number, according to Dionysius (x. 52), though Livy calls him (iii. 31) Publius. The ambassadors remained three years in Greece, and on their return Ser. Camerinus was appointed a member of the deecurionate in B.C. 451. (Liv. iii. 33; Dionys. x. 56.) In b. c. 448 he commanded the cavalry under the consul T. Quinctius Capitolinus and Agrippa Furius Medullinus in the great battle against the Volsci and Aequi fought in that year. (Liv. iii. 70.)

4. P. Sulpi. Camerinus. (Liv. iii. 31.)

See No. 3.

5. Q. Sulpi. F. SER. N. Camerinus Cornutus, son or grandson of No. 3, consul tribune in b. c. 492 and again in 398. (Liv. vi. 8, 14; Diod. xiv. 38, 62.)

6. SER. Sulpi. Q. P. SER. N. Camerinus, son of No. 5, consul b. c. 393, and military tribune in b. c. 391, in the latter of which years he conducted the war against the Salpinates, and carried off a great quantity of booty from their territory. (Liv. vi. 29, 32; Diod. xiv. 99, 107.) He was one of the three interreges in b. c. 387. (Liv. vi. 5.)

7. C. Sulpi. Camerinus, consul tribune in b. c. 382, and censor in 380 with Sp. Postumia-

Regillensis Albinus. But no census was taken in this year, as Camerinus resigned his office on the death of his colleague. (Liv. vili. 32; Diod. xiv. 41; Liv. vii. 28.)

8. SER. Sulpi. Camerinus Rufus, consul b. c. 345. (Liv. vii. 28; Diod. xiv. 96.)

9. Q. Sulpi. Q. P. Q. N. Camerinus, was consul in A. D. 9, the birth-year of the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 3; Plin. H. N. vii. 48. a. 49.)

10. Sulpi. Camerinus, was proconsul of Africa together with Pomponius Silvanus, and on their return to Rome in A. D. 59, they were both accused on account of their exertions in their province, but were acquitted by the emperor Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 52.) Soon afterwards, however, Nero put Camerinus and his son to death, according to Dion Cassius (xili. 19), for no other reason but because they ventured to make use of the surname Pythicus, which was hereditary in their family, and which Nero claimed as an exclusive prerogative for himself. It appears from Pliny (Ep. v. 3), that they were accused by M. Regulus.

CAMERINUS, a Roman poet, contemporary with Ovid, who sang of the capture of Troy by Heracles. No portion of this lay has been preerved, nor do we find any allusion to the work or its author except in a single line of the Epistles from Pontus. The supposition, that the Ecdasium Trojanæ mentioned by Apuleius (de Orthograph. § 18) is the production in question, seems to rest on no evidence whatever. (Ov. Ep. 14; Pont. iv. 16. 20.)

CAMERINUS, SCRIBONIA'NUS, the assumed name of a runaway slave, whose real name was afterwards found out to be Geta. He made his appearance in the reign of Vitellius, and his object seems to have been to upset the government of Vitellius. He pretended to have been obliged to quit Rome in the time of Nero, and to have ever since lived concealed in Hestia, because he belonged to the family of the Cressi, who had large possessions there. He succeeded in assembling around him the populace, and even some soldiers, who were misled by him or wished for a revolution. The pretender, however, was seized and brought before Vitellius; and when his real origin was discovered, he was executed as a common slave. (Tac. Hist. ii. 72.)

CAMERS, the name of two mythical personages in Virgil. (Aen. x. 562, xii. 224, &c.) [L.S.]
CAMILLA, a daughter of king Metabus of the Volscian town of Privernum. When her father, expelled by his subjects, came in his flight to the river Amasenus, he tied his infant daughter, whom he had previously devoted to the service of Diana, to a spear, and hurled it across the river. He himself then swam after it, and on reaching the opposite bank he found his child uninjured. He took her with him, and had her suckled by a mare. He brought her up in pure maidenhood.

In the war between Aenens and Turnus she assisted the latter, and was slain by Aruns. Diana avenged her death by sending Opia to kill Aruns, and to rescue the body of Camilla. (Virg. Aen. vii. 803, &c., xi. 432, &c., 648, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 252.) Servius (ad Aen. xi. 543 and 558) remarks, that she was called Camilla because she was engaged in the service of Diana, since all youthful priestesses were called Camilae by the Etruscans. That there were such Camilae as well as Camilli engaged in the service of Diana, since all youthful citizen girls were compelled by a decree of the senate to lay down their homes and emigrate to Veii, were prevailed upon to give up this plan, and then Camillus laid down his dictatorship.

In b. c. 391, Camillus was chosen interrex to take the auspices, as the other magistrates were attacked by an epidemic then raging at Rome, by which he also lost a son. In this year he was accused by the tribune of the plebs, L. Appuleius, with having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii; and, seeing that his condemnation was unavoidable, he went into exile, praying to the gods that, if he was wronged, his unfortunate country might soon be in a condition to stand in need of him. During his absence he was condemned to pay a fine of 15,000 heavy asses. The time for which he had prayed soon came; for the Gauls advanced through Etruria towards Rome, and the city, with the exception of the capitol, was taken by the barbarians, and reduced to ashes. In the first instance, Camillus, who was living in exile at Ardea, was recalled by a lex curiata, and while yet absent was appointed dictator a second time, b. c. 390. He made L. Valerius Potitus his magister equitum, assembled the scattered Roman forces, consisting partly of fugitives and partly of those who had survived the day on the Alia, and marched towards Rome. Here he took the Gauls by surprise, and defeated them completely. He then entered the city in triumph, saluted by his fellow-citizens as alter Romulus, pater patriae, and conditor urbis. His first care was to have the temples restored, and then to rebuild the city. The people, who were at first inclined to quit their destroyed homes and emigrate to Veii, were prevailed upon to give up this plan, and then Camillus laid down his dictatorship.

In b. c. 389 Camillus was made interrex a second time for the purpose of electing the consular tribunes; and, as in the same year the neighbouring tribes rose against Rome, hoping to conquer the weakened city without any difficulty, Camillus was again appointed dictator, and he made C. Servilius Ahala his magister equitum. He first defeated the Volscans, and took their camp; and they were now compelled to submit to Rome after a contest of seventy years. The Aequians were also conquered near Bolsi, and their capital was taken in the first attack. Sutrium, which had been occupied by Etruscans, fell in like manner. After the conquest of these three nations, Camillus returned to Rome in triumph.

In b. c. 386 Camillus was elected consular tribune for the fourth time, and, after having declined the dictatorship which was offered him, he defeated the Antiates and Etruscans. In b. c. 384 he was consular tribune for the fifth, and in 381 for the sixth time. In the latter year he conquered the revolted Volscians and the Praenestines. During the war against the Volscians L. Furius Medullinus was appointed as his colleague. The latter disapproved of the cautious slowness of Camillus, and, without his consent, he led his troops against the enemy, who by a feigned retreat had induced the consul to give up the pursuit. But Camillus now appeared, compelled the fugitives to return from Veii, he entered Rome in triumph, riding in a chariot drawn by white horses. In b. c. 383, Camillus was again consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. The story of the schoolmaster who attempted to betray the town of Falerii to Camillus, belongs to this campaign. Camillus had him chained and sent back to his fellow-citizens, who were so much affected by the justice of the Roman general, that they surrendered to the Romans. (Liv. v. 27; comp. Val. Max. vi. 5. § 1, who calls Camillus consul on this occasion, although, according to the express testimony of Plutarch, he was never invested with the consulsiphip.)

stand, led them back to battle, and gained a complete victory. Hereupon Camillus received orders to make war upon the Tusculans for having assisted the Volscians; and, notwithstanding the former conduct of Medullinus, Camillus again chose him as his colleague, to afford him an opportunity of wiping off his disgrace. This generosity and moderation deserved and excited general admiration.

In b.c. 368, when the patricians were resolved to make a last effort against the rogueries of C. Lacinius Stole, the senate appointed Camillus, a faithful supporter of the patricians, dictator for the fourth time. His magister equitum was L. Aemilius Mamercinus. But Camillus, who probably saw that it was hopeless to resist any further the demands of the plebeians, resigned the office soon after, and P. Manlius was appointed in his stead. In the following year, b.c. 367, when a fresh war with the Gauls broke out, Camillus, who was now nearly eighty years old, was called to the dictatorship for the fifth time. His magister equitum was T. Quinctius Flaminus. He gained a great victory, for which he was rewarded with a triumph. Two years later, b.c. 365, he died in the plague. Camillus is the great hero of his time, and stands forth as a resolute champion of his own order until he became convinced that further opposition was of no avail. His history, as related in Plutarch and Livy, is not without a considerable admixture of legendary and traditional fable, and requires a careful critical sifting. (Plut. Life of Camillus; Liv. v. 10, 12, 14, 17, 19, &c., 31, 32, 46, 49-53, vi. 1-4, 6, &c., 18, &c., 22, &c., 38, 42, vii. 1; Diod. xiv. 92; Ennius, i. 29; Val. Max. iv. 1, &c.; Gell. vii. iv. 24; Cic. pro Dom. 33; de Re Publica, i. 8, Tusc. i. 37, Frug. p. 492; Ascon. pro Senatu p. 30, ed. Orelli.)

2. St. Furius Camillus, a son of No. 1. When the pretorship was instituted in b.c. 367, Camillus was one of the two who were first invested with it. (Liv. vii. 1; Suid. s. v. Πρατηρ.)

3. L. Furius M. F. Camillus, a son of No. 1. In b.c. 350, when one of the consuls was ill, and the other, Popilius Laenas, returned from the Gallic war with a severe wound, L. Furius Camillus was appointed dictator to hold the comitia, and P. Cornelius Scipio became his magister equitum. Camillus, who was as much a patrician in his feelings and sentiments as his father, did not accept the names of any plebeians who offered themselves as candidates for the consulship, and thus caused the consulship to be given to patricians only. The senate, delighted with this, exerted all its influence in raising him to the consulship in b.c. 349. He then nominated Appius Claudius Crassus as his colleague, who however died during the preparations for the Gallic war. Camillus, who now remained sole consul, caused the command against the Gauls to be given to himself extra sortem. Two legions were left behind for the protection of the city, and eight others were divided between him and the praetor L. Pinarius, whom he sent to protect the coast against some Greek pirates, who in that year infested the coast of Latium. Camillus routed the Gauls in the Pomptine district, and compelled them to seek refuge in Apulia. This battle against the Gauls is famous in Roman story for the single combat of M. Var- rius Corvus with a bold and presumptuous Gaul. After the battle, Camillus honoured the gallantry of Varrius with a present of ten oxen and a golden crown. Camillus then joined the praetor Pinarius on the coast; but nothing of any importance was accomplished against the Greeks, who soon after disappeared. (Liv. vii. 24-28; Cic. De Senect. 12; Gell. vii. iv. 18.)

4. L. Furius Sp. F. M. N. Camillus, son of No. 2, consul in b.c. 338, together with C. Maenius. He fought in this year successfully against the Tibrutines, and took their town Tibur. The two consuls united completed the subjugation of Latium; they were rewarded with a triumph, and equestrian statues, then a rare distinction, were erected to them in the forum. Camillus further distinguished himself by advising his countrymen to treat the Latins with mildness. In b.c. 335 he was elected consul a second time, together with D. Junius Brutus Scamn. In this year war was declared against the Vestinians, and Camillus obtained Samnium for his province; but while he was engaged in the war, he was attacked by a severe illness, and was ordered to nominate L. Papirius Cursor dictator to continue the war. (Liv. viii. 13, 16, &c., 29; Plin. H. N. xxiii. 5.)

5. M. Furius Camillus, consul in a. d. 8 (Fast. Cap.), and procenius of Africa in the reign of Tiberius, defeated in a. d. 17, the Numidian Taenarins, together with a great number of Numinidians and Mauretanians. It is expressly stated, that after the lapse of several centuries, he was the first who revived the military fame of the Furii Camilli. The senate, with the consent of Tiberius, honoured him with the insignia of a triumph, a distinction which he was allowed to enjoy with impunity on account of his unassuming character. (Tac. Ann. ii. 32, 34.)

6. M. Furius Camillus, surnamed Sciponianus, was consul in the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 92, together with Cn. Domitius. At the beginning of the reign of Claudius he was legate of Dalmatia, and revolted with his legions, probably in the hope of raising himself to the throne. But he was conquered on the fifth day after the beginning of the insurrection, a. d. 42, sent into exile and died in a. d. 53, either of an illness, or, as was commonly reported, by poison. (Tac. Ann. vi. 1, xili. 52, Hist. i. 69, ii. 75; Suet. Claud. 13.)

7. Furius Camillus, likewise surnamed Sciponianus, was sent into exile by the emperor Claudius, together with his mother Junia, a. d. 54, for having consulted the Chaldaeans about the time when Claudius was to die. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 32, Hist. ii. 75.)

C. CAMILLUS, a Roman jurist, and a particular friend of Cicero, who had a high opinion of his worldly prudence and judgment, and often consulted him on matters connected with his business and law. At Cicero's table he was a frequent guest, and was remarkable for his love of news, and extreme personal neatness. His name often occurs in the letters of Cicero (ad Att. v. 8, vi. 1, 5, xi. 16, 23, xili. 6, 33, ad Fam. ix. 20, xiv. 5, 14), from one of which (ad Fam. v. 20) it appears, that Camillus was console by Cicero upon a matter connected with the jus praedialorum, which was a branch of the revenue law of Rome, and was so difficult and intricate that some jurists specially devoted themselves to its study. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Praes.[J.T.G.])

CAMISSARES, a Carian, father of Datames, was high in favour with Artaxerxes H. (Maemon), by whom he was made satrap of a part of Cilicia bordering on Cappadocia. He fell in the war of Artaxerxes against the Cadusii, c. 385, and was succeeded in his satrapy by his son. (Nep. Diod. i. 1; comp. Diod. xvi. 8, 10; Plut. Artax. 24.)

CAMEOENA. [CAMENA.]

CAMPANUS, one of the leaders of the Tungri in the war of Celas against the Romans, in a. d. 71. (Tac. Hist. iv. 66.)

[Campanus, a Roman jurist, quoted in the Digest, once by Valens (Dig. 38, tit. 1, s. 47), and once by Pomponius. (Dig. 40, tit. 5, s. 34. § 1.) As both Valens and Pomponius lived about the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, Campanus probably flourished about the commencement of the second century. Both the passages quoted from him relate to fideicommissa.

A Cecelian Campus, to whom was addressed a rescript of the emperors Severus and Antoninus (Dig. 36, tit. 1, s. 29), must have been of later date, though he is confounded with the jurist by Bertand. (Menag. Ameo. Jur. 38; Maians, 30. J.Cissio. p. 197.)

CAMPASPE, called Pancate (Πανκάττερα) by Aelian, and Pacte (Πακάτερα) by Lucian, of Larissa, the favourite concubine of Alexander, and the first with whom he is said to have had intercourse. Apelles being commissioned by Alexander to paint Campaspe, naked, full in love with her, whereas Alexander gave her to him as a present. According to some she was the model of Apelles' celebrated picture of the Venus Anadyomene, but according to others Phryne was the original of this painting. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 54; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10. s. 36. § 12; Lucian, Imag. 7; Athen. xiii. p. 591; comp. Anadyomene.)

CAMPES (Καμπέ), a monster which was appointed in Tartarus to guard the Cyclopes. It was killed by Zeus when he wanted the assistance of the Cyclopes against the Titans. (Apollod. i. 2. § 1.) Diodorus (iii. 72) mentions a monster of the same name, which was slain by Dionysus, and which Nonnus (Dions. xviii. 237, &c.) identifies with the former.

CAMPUS, a common soldier of the tenth legion, who was the murderer of the emperor Galba according to all authorities consulted by Tacitus. (Hist. i. 41.)

CANACE (Κανα), a daughter of Aeolus and Enareta, whence she is called Aeolis (Callim. Hymn in Cer. 100), who had several children by Poseidon. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3, &c.) She entertained an unnatural love for her brother Macareus, and on this account was killed by her own father; but according to others, she herself, as well as Macareus, put an end to her life. (Hygin. Fab. 239, 242; Or. Her. 11.)

CANACCIUS (Κανατείος). 1. A Sicyonian artist, about whose age the greatest uncertainty long prevailed, as one work of his is mentioned which must have been executed before ol. 75, and another 80 years later, which seems to be, and indeed is, impossible. The fact is, that there were two artists of the name of Canaccus, both of Sicyon, and probably grandfather and grandson. This was first suggested by Schor (Ueber d. Stud. d. Griech. Kunstler, p. 199) and adopted by Thiersch (Epoch. Anm. pp. 38-44), K. O. Müller, and Böckh. The work which must have been finished a. d. 480, was a colossal statue of Apollo Philesius at Mileitus, this statue having been carried to Ephatana by Xerxes after his defeat in Greece, a. d. 479. Müll.

CANDACE. [Candace.] 593

CANDACE (Κανδάκη), a queen of that portion of Aethiopia which had Moroc for its metropolis. In a. d. 22, she invaded Egypt, being encouraged by supposing that the unsuccessful expedition of Aelius Gallus against Arabia, in a. d. 24, had weakened the Romans. She advanced into the Thebaid, ravaging the country, and attacked and captured the Roman garrisons at Elephante, Syene, and Philae; but Petronius, who had succeeded Gallus in the government of the province, compelled her to retreat, and defeated her with great loss in her own territory near the town of Psiche. This place he took, and also Premnus and Nebata, in the latter of which the son of the queen commanded. After he had thus been defeated, Candace attacked the garrison he had left in Premnus; but Petronius hastily returned, and again defeated her. On this she sent ambassadors to Augustus, who was then at Samos, and who received them favourably, and even remitted the tribute which had been imposed on their country. Strabo, who tells us that Candace was a woman of a manly spirit, also favours us with the information二 that she was blind of one eye. (Strab. xvii. pp. 819—821; Dion Cass. lxxii. 29, liv. 5.) Her name seems to have been common to all the queens of Aethiopia (Plin. H. N. vii. 29; Joseph. Ant. viii. 6. § 5; Acts, viii. 27); and it appears from Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 1. § 10), that it was customary for the Aethiopians to be governed by women, though Oecumenius thinks (Comm. in Acts, l. c.), that Candace was only the common name of the queen-mothers, the nation regarding the sun alone as their father and king, and their princes as the sun's children. [E. E.]

CANDAULES (Κανδαύλης), known also among the Greeks by the name of Myrsilus, was the last Heracleid king of Lydia. According to the Greek historians, Heracleus, the father of Candaules, being extremely proud of his wife's beauty, and insisted on exhibiting her unveiled charms, but without her knowledge, to Gyges, his favourite officer. Gyges was seen by the queen as he was stealing from her chamber, and the next day she summoned him before her, intent on vengeance, and bade him choose whether he would undergo the punishment of death himself, or would consent to murder Candaules and receive the kingdom together with her hand. He chose the latter alternative, and became the founder of the dynasty of the Hermansae, about B.C. 715. In Plato, the story, in the form of the well-known fable of the ring of Gyges, serves the purpose of moral allegory. Plutarch, in the Life of Lycurgus, tells the whole story, following in one place the story of Herodotus, and in another of the queen-mothers, the nation regarding the sun alone as their father and king, and their princes as the sun's children.

CA'NDIDUS (Καντίδος), a Greek author, who lived about the time of the emperors Commodus and Severus, about A.D. 200, and wrote a work on the Hexameron, which is referred to by Eusebius. (Hist. Eccl. v. 27; comp. Hieronym. De Script. Eccl. 48. 7.)

CA'NDIDUS, an Arian who flourished about the middle of the fourth century, the author of a tract "De Generatione Divina," addressed to his friend Marius Victorinus, who wrote in reply "De Generatione Verbi Divini sive Contrafuturum Candidi Ariani ad eundem." Mabillon published in his Anecdotum (Paris, 1685, fol.) a "Fragmentum Epistolae Candidi Ariani ad Marium Victorimum," which Oudin first pointed out to be in reality a portion of the "De Generatione Divina." Both are printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. (Victorinus.) (Oudin, De Script. Eccl. vol. i. p. 528; Schöneumann, Bibl. Patrum Latinarum, c. iv. 13 and 14, Lips. 1752.)

CA'NDIDUS, ISA'URUS (Καντίδος, Ισαύρος), a Byzantine historian, a native of Isauria, whence his surname Isaurus. He lived in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, and held a high public office in his native country. He is called a man of great influence and an orthodox Christian, which is inferred from his advocating the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. His history of the Byzantine empire, in three books, which is now lost, began with the election of the emperor Leo the Thracian, and came down to the death of Zeno the Isaurian. It therefore embraced the period from A. D. 457 to 491. A summary of its contents is preserved in Photius (cod. 79), to whom we are also indebted for the few facts concerning the life of Candidus which we have mentioned, and who censure the style of the historian for its affectation of poetical beauties. A small fragment of the work is preserved by Suidas (s. v. ἡγίστ." The extant fragments of Candidus are printed in the appendix to "Eclogae Historiarum de Reb. Byz.," ed. Labbe, which forms an appendix to "Excerpta de Legationibus," &c. ed. D. Hoesselleus, published by C. A. Fabrotus, Paris, 1648. They are also contained in the edition of Dezrippus, Ennemius, &c. published in the Bonn collection of Byzantine writers. (Comp. Hanke, Byz. Rev. Script. ii. 3, p. 672, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 545.)

CA'NDIDUS, VESPRO'NIUS, one of the consular envoys despatched by Didius Julianus and the senate in A. D. 192, for the purpose of inducing the troops of Septimius Severus to abandon their leader, who had been declared a public enemy. Not only did Candidus fail in accomplishing the object of his mission, but he very narrowly escaped being put to death by the soldiers, who recollected the harshness he had formerly displayed towards those under his command. We find, however, at a subsequent period (193) employed as a legate by Severus, first in Asia Minor, against Pacennus Niger, and afterwards (194) against the Africans and other barbarous tribes on the confines of Syria and Mesopotamia. On both occasions he did good service; for, by his exertions and example, the fortune of the day was turned at the great battle of Nicaea; and, acting in conjunction with Lateranus, he reduced to submission the turbulent chiefs of Adiabene and Osroene. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 16, lxxiv. 6, lxxv. 2; Spartan. Julian. 5.)

CANDYBUS (Καντίδος), a son of Decallion, from whom Candyba, a town in Lydia, was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L.S.]

CAN'THUS (Καντίδος), one of the mythical personages, one a son of Lycaon, and the second the son of Atlas and father of Cynthus in Euboea, from whom a mountain in Euboea near Chalcis derived its name. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. i. 19. 24.)

CA'NDIJA, whose real name was Gratidia, as we learn from the scholiasts, was a Neapolitan hetaira beloved by Homece; but when she deserted him, he revenged himself upon her by holding her up to contempt as an old sorceress. This was the object of the 5th and 7th Epodes, and of the 8th Satire of the first book. The Palinode in the 16th ode of the 1st book is supposed to refer to these poems. Horace attacks her by the name of Candidia because her real name Gratidia conveyed the idea of what was pleasing and agreeable, while the assumed one was associated with grey hairs and old age. (Comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 1. 48; Schol. Aen. and Crutius. ad loc. and ad Sat. i. 8. 24.)

P. CA'NDIUS CRASSUS. (Crasius.)

CA'NINA, C. CLAUDIUS, consul in B. c. 235 and 273. [Claudius.]

CA'NINIA GEN'S, plebeian, is not mentioned in early Roman history. It came into notice at the beginning of the second century before Christ. C. Caninia Reblus, praetor in B. c. 171, was the also meet with the surname of Satrius, performing religious rites and sacrifices, and it may have been frequently used by the Egyptians in the purchase of some property. (Cile de Orn. ii. 69, de Off. ii. 14.)

Also seen on Egyptian, especially Canobian, coins. (Description de VEngypte, ii. 2, pi. 132-134.) Such jars are capliq.

The identification of an animal or a god called Canobus may be some other divinity besides the supposed founder, who lived in the latter part of the eleventh and the early part of the twelfth century. There are at present several Greek nobles who style themselves princes Cantacuzeni, but it is very doubtful whether they are descended from the imperial Cantacuzeni, of whom, however, there are probably descendants living in Italy, although they have dropped the name of their ancestors.

1. The first Cantacuzenus who became distinguished in history was the commander of the Greek fleet in the reign of Alexis I. Comnenus. He besieged Levadia, and was victorious in Dalmatia in the war with Bohemond in 1107.

2. Ioannes Cantacuzenus, the son or grandson of No. 1, married Maria Comnena, the daughter of Andronicus Comnenus Sebastocrator and the niece of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, and was killed in a war with the Turks-Seljuks about 1174.

3. Manuel Cantacuzenus, son of No. 2, blinded by the emperor Manuel.

4. Ioannes Cantacuzenus, perhaps the son of No. 3, blinded by the emperor Andronicus Comnenus, but nevertheless made Caesar by the emperor Isaac Angelus, whose sister Irene he had married. He was killed in a war with the Bulgarians after 1195.

5. Theodorus, perhaps the brother of the preceding, was one of the most courageous opponents of Andronicus I. Comnenus; he was killed in 1183.

6. Manuel Cantacuzenus, dux under John Vatatzes, emperor of Nicea; died subsequently to the year 1261; his children probably were,

Manuel, prince of Messene, submitted to Sultan Mohammed II. about 1460. He fled to Hungary, where he died. He married Maria, surnamed Cludia, but no issue is known.

There are several other Cantacuzeni conspicuous in Byzantine history, whose parentage cannot be correctly established. (Du Cange, Famille Byzant. p. 238, &c.)

CA'NTHARIUS (Κάνθαρος), a comic poet of Athens. (Suid. a. v.; Eudoc. p. 269.) The only thing we have to guide us in determining his age is, that the comedy entitled Symmachia, which commonly went by the name of Plato, was ascribed Dionys. xi. 57, 58.)

2. M. CANULEIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 420, accused C. Sempronius Atratinus, who had been consul in b. c. 423, on account of his misconduct in the Volscian war. (Atratinus, No. 5.) Canuleius and his colleagues introduced in the senate this year the subject of an assignment of the public land. (Liv. iv. 44.)

3. L. CANULEIUS, one of the five Roman legates sent by the senate to the Aetolians, b. c. 174. (Liv. xli. 25.)

4. CANULEIUS, a Roman senator, who had been one of the ambassadors sent into Egypt previously to b. c. 160. (Polyb. xxxi. 18.)

5. C. CANULEIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 100, accused P. Furius, who was so much detested by the people, that they tore him to pieces before he commenced his defence. (Appian, B. C. i. 33 ; comp. Cic. pro Rabir. 9 ; Dion Cass. Frag. 106, p. 43, ed. Reimar.)

6. L. CANULIUS, one of the publicani, engaged in farming the duties paid on imported and exported goods at the harbour of Syracuse, when Verres was governor of Sicily, b. c. 79—71. (Cic. Verr. ii. 70, 74.)

7. M. CANULIUS, defended by Hortensius and Cotta, but on what occasion is unknown. (Cic. Brut. 92.)

8. CANULIUS, mentioned in one of Cicero's letters in b. c. 49 (ad Att. x. 5), is otherwise unknown.

9. L. CANULIUS, one of Caesar's legates in the war with Pompey, b. c. 48, was sent by Caesar into Epirus in order to collect corn. (Caes. B. C. iii. 43.)

CANUSIUS, a friend of T. Pomponius Atticus, was struck out of the proscription in b. c. 43 by Antony on account of the friendship of the latter with Atticus. (Nepos, Att. 10; comp. Cic. ad Att. xiii. 31, xv. 21.) The Cana to whom there was some talk of marrying young Q. Cicero, was probably the daughter of this Gallius Canus. (Ad Att. xiii. 41, 42.)

CANUSIUS, a Stoic philosopher, who promised his friends, when he was condemned to death by Caligula, to appear to them after his death, and inform them of the state of the soul after quitting the body. He is said to have fulfilled this promise by appearing in a vision to one of his friends named Antiochus. (Senec. de Ant. Tranqu. 14; Plut. ap. Syncell. p. 330, d.)

CANUSIUS or GANUSIUS (Ταυροῦρας), ap-apparently a Greek historian, who seems to have been a contemporary of Julius Caesar; for it is on the authority of Plutarch (Caes. 29) that relates, when the senate decreed a supplication on account of the successful proceedings of Caesar in Gaul, B. C. 55, Cato declared that Caesar ought to be delivered up to the barbarians, to atone for his violation of the laws of nations. [L. S.]

P. CANUTIUS, or CANNUTIUS, was born in the same year as Cicero, B. C. 106, and is described by the latter as the most eloquent orator out of the senatorial order. After the death of P. Sulpicius Rufus, who was one of the most celebrated orators of his time, and who left no ornaments behind him, P. Canutius composed some and published them under the name of Sulpicius. Canutius is frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius as having been engaged in the prosecution of several of the parties connected with that disgraceful affair. (Cic. Brut. 56, pro Client. 10, 18, 21, 27.)

TI. CANUTIUS or CANNUTIUS, tribune of the plebs in the year that Caesar was assassinated, B. C. 44, was a violent opponent of Antony. When Octavianus drew near to Rome towards the end of October, Canutius went out of the city to meet him, in order to learn his intentions; and upon Octavianus declaring against Antony, Canutius conducted him into the city, and spoke to the people on his behalf. Shortly afterwards, Octavianus went into Etruria and Antony returned to Rome; and when the latter summoned the senate on the Capitol on the 28th of November, in order to declare Octavianus an enemy of the state, he would not allow Canutius and two of his other colleagues to approach the Capitol, lest they should put their veto upon the decree of the senate. After the departure of Antony from Rome to prosecute the war against Dec. Brutus in Cisalpine Gaul, Canutius had full scope for indulging his hostility to Antony, and constantly attacked him in the most furious manner (continua rabie lacevrat, Vell. Pat. ii. 64). Upon the establishment of the triumvirate in the following year, B. C. 43, Canutius is said by Velleius Paterculus (Ec. c.) to have been included in the proscription and put to death; but this is a mistake, for he was engaged in the Perusinian war, B. C. 40. As Octavianus had deserted the senatorial party, Canutius became one of his enemies, and accordingly joined Fulvia and L. Antonius in their attempt to crush him in B. C. 40; but falling into his hands on the capture of Perusa, Canutius was put to death by his order. (Appian, B. C. iii. 41; Dion Cass. xiv. 6, 12; Cic. ad Fam. iii. 23, Philipp. iii. 9; Appian, B. C. vi. 49; Dion Cass. xlviii. 14.)

The C. Canutius, whom Suetonius (de Clar. Rhet. 4) mentions, is in all probability the same as this Ti. Canutius. Whether the Canutius spoken of in the Dialogue "De Oratoribus" (c. 21) is the same as either P. or Ti. Canutius, or a different person altogether, is quite uncertain.

CAPANEUS (Kapanevs), a son of Hyperion and Acripe, the younger of the Iphians. (Hygin. Fab. 70; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 181; ad Pind. Nem. ix. 30.) He was married to Eudane or Ianeim, who is also called a daughter of Iphes, by whom he was the father of Sthenes. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. vi. 46; Apollod. iii. 10, § 8.)

He was one of the seven heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes, where he had his station at the Ogygian or Eleutrian gate. (Apollod. iii. 6, § 6; Asclepy. Sept. c. Theb. 125; Paus. ix. 8, § 3.) During the siege of Thebes, he was presumptuous enough to say, that even the fire of Zeus should not prevent his scaling the walls of the city; but when he was ascending the ladder, Zeus struck him with a flash of lightning. (Comp. Eurip. Phoen. 1172, &c.; comp. Soph. Antig. 183; Apollod. iii. 6, § 7; Ov. Met. ix. 404.) While his body was burning, his wife Eudane leaped into the flames and destroyed herself. (Apollod. iii. 7, § 1; Eurip. Supplig. 993, &c.; Philostr. Ion. ii. 31; Ov. Ars Am. iii. 21; Hygin. Fab. 243.) Capaneus is one of those heroes whom Asclepius was believed to have called back into life. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 3.) At Delphi there was a statue of Capaneus dedicated by the Argives. (Paus. x. 10, § 2.)

CAPPADOCUS. [Coubiandius.]

CAPELLA, a Roman elegiac poet named by Ovid, concerning whom we know nothing. (Ovid, Ep. ex Post. iv. 16, 36.)

CAPELLA, ANTISTIUS, the preceptor of the emperor Commodeus. (Lampad. c. i.) [W. R.]

CAPELLA, MARTIUS MINUSUS FELIX, is generally believed to have flourished towards the close of the fifth century of our era, although different critics have fixed upon different epochs, and some, in opposition to all internal evidence, would place him as high as the reigns of Maximinus and the Gordians. In MSS. he is frequently styled Afer Carthaginensis; and since, when speaking of himself, he employs the expression "Beatus alium urbs Elisione quem velit," it seems certain that the city of Dioeces was the seat of his education, if not of his birth also. The assertions, that he rose to the dignity of proconsul, and composed his book at Rome when far advanced in life, rest entirely upon a few ambiguous and probably corrupt words, which admit of a very different interpretation. (Lib. ix. § 999.) Indeed, we know nothing whatever of his personal history, but an ancient biography is said to exist in that portion of Barth's Historia which has never yet been published. (Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. c. 17.)

The great work of Capella is composed in a medley of prose and various kinds of verse, after the fashion of the Satyrus Menippus of Varro and the Satyricon of Petronius Arbiter; while, along with these, it probably suggested the form into which Boethius has thrown his Consolation Philosophica. It is a voluminous compilation, forming a sort of encyclopaedia of the polite learning of the middle ages, and is divided into nine books. The first two, which may be regarded as a mystical introduction to the rest, consist of an elaborate and complicated allegory, entitled the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury, while in the remaining seven are expounded the principles of the seven liberal arts, which once were believed to embrace the whole circle of philosophy and science. Thus, the third book treats of Grammar; the fourth of Dialectics, divided into Metaphysics and Logic; the fifth of Rhetoric; the sixth of Geometry, containing chiefly the propositions, which are appended a few simple propositions on lines, surfaces, and solids; the seventh of Arithmetic, devoted in a great measure to the properties of numbers; the eighth of Astronomy; and the last of Music, including Poetry. We find here an immense mass of learning, but the materials are ill-selected, ill-arranged, and ill-digested; though from amidst much that is dull and frivolous, we can occasionally extract curious and valuable information, derived without doubt from treatises which has long since perished. Thus, for example, in one remarkable passage (viii. § 857) we detect a hint of the true constitution of the solar system. It is here so distinctly maintained that the planets Mercury and Venus revolve round the sun, and not round the earth, and their position with regard to these bodies and to each other is so correctly described, that historians of science have considered it not improbable that Copernicus, who quotes Martianus, may have derived the first germ of his theory from this source. The style is in the worst possible taste, and looks like a caricature of Apuleius and Tertullian. It is overloaded with far-fetched metaphors, and has all the sustained grandiloquence, the pompous pretension, and the striving after false sublimity, so characteristic of the African school, while the diction abounds in strange words, and is in the highest degree harsh, obscure, and barbarous. Some allowance must be made, however, for the circumstances under which the book has been transmitted to us. It was highly esteemed during the middle ages, and extensively employed as a manual for the purposes of education. Hence it was copied and re-copied by the monks, and being of course many times quite unintelligible to them, corruptions crept in, and the text soon became involved in inextricable confusion. The oldest MSS. are those in the Bodleian library, in the British Museum, in the public library of the University of Cambridge, and in the library of Corpus Christi College in the same university. A MS. exposition of Capella, written by Jo. Scotus, who died in 875, is mentioned by L’Abbe (Bibl. Nat. MSS. p. 45); another, the work of Alexander Neckam, who belongs to the thirteenth century, is described by Leland (Commentar. de script. Brit. p. 214); and Perizonius possessed a commentary ascribed to Remigius Antissiodorensis about the year 888. In modern times, Ugoletus had the merit of first bringing Capella to light; and the editio princeps was printed at Vicenza by Henricus de S. Urso, in 1599, with the remarks of Hugo Grotius, who at one time kept Flavia Domitilla, afterwards the wife of Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 3.) [I. S.]

CAPELLA, STATILLUS, a Roman eques, who at one time kept Flavia Domitilla, afterwards the wife of Vespasian. (Suet. Vesp. 3.) [I. S.]

CAPER (Κάπηρ), of Elis, the son of one Pythagoras, who acquired great renown from obtaining the victory in wrestling and the pancratium on the same day, in the Olympic games. (Ol. 142, n. c. 212.) He is said to have been the first after Hercules, according to Pausanias, or the second, according to Africanus, who conquered in these two contests on the same day. (Paus. v. 21, § 5, vi. 15, §§ 3, 6; Euseb. E.A. ἀκ. p. 42, ed. Scaliger: Krause, Olympia, p. 306.)

CAPER, FLAVIUS, a Roman grammarius of uncertain date, whose works "de Latinitate," &c., are quoted repeatedly with the greatest respect by Charsius, Rufinus, Servius, and others, but especially by Priscian. We possess two very short tracts entitled "Flavii Capri grammatici vetustissimi de Orthographia libellus," and "Caper de Verbis medii." Battinus (Advers. xxi. 1, xxxv. 9) has conjectured, with much plausibility, that these are not the original works of Caper, but mere abridgments by a later hand. Servius (ad Verg. Aen. x. 344) cites "Caper in libris enucleati sermonis," and (ad Aen. x. 377) "Caper in libris dubii gentis." St. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. ii.) speaks of his grammatical "commentarii" as a book in common use; and Agosteo, who wrote a supplement to the "Libellus de Orthographia et Proprietate ac Differentia Sermonum," refers to his annotations on Cicero as the most celebrated of his numerous productions. He is also frequently ranked among the scholiasts upon Terence, but apparently on no good grounds. (Schopfen, de Terentio, &c., Bom. 1821.)

Caper was first published among a collection of Latin grammarians printed at Venice about 1476, and reprinted in 1480, 1491, and often afterwards. The best edition is that contained in the "Grammat. Lat. Antiqui."" By Putzsch. (pp. 2269-2318), Hanover 1605. [W. R.]

CAPETUS SULVIIUS. [SILVIUS.] Capha. [Theodosa.]

CAPHIO. [Capo.]

CAPITO, the father of Bettillenus Bassius, or Cassius Bettillinus as Dion Cassius calls him, was compelled to be present at the execution of his son by order of Caligula, and was then put to death himself. (Dion Cass. lix. 25.) [Bassus, p. 471.]

CAPITO (Καπήρος). 1. Of Alexandria, is called by Athenaeus (x. p. 425) an epic poet, and the author of a work Eporuçu, which consisted of at least two books. In another passage (viii. p. 350) he mentions a work of his entitled τὸς Φάλαρης Μελωμάτων, from which he quotes a statement. It is not improbable that the Capito of this epigram in the Greek Anthology (v. 67, ed. Tauchn.) may be the same person as the epic poet.

2. A native of Lycia, is called by Suidas (s. a. Karpirr) and Eudocia (p. 267) an historian, and the author of a work on Iasius (Iaouppou), which consisted, according to Suidas, of eight books, and is frequently referred to by Stephanus of Byzantin-CAPITO.

tium. The latter writer (s. v. Vlouc), quotes the fifteenth book of it; but the reading in that passage seems incorrect, and Capito has in stead of raccanoantd. This Capito also made a Greek translation of the sketch of Roman history which Eutropius had drawn up from Livy. The translation, which is mentioned by Suidas (c. c.) and Lydus (De Magistr. Proocm.), is lost, and his work or works on Lycia and Pamphylia have likewise perished. (Comp. Tschucke’s preface to his edition of Eutropius, p. lxvi. &c.) [L. S.]

CAPITO (Καρίτων), a physician, who probably lived in the first or second century after Christ, and who appears to have given particular attention to diseases of the eyes. His prescriptions are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medic. sec. Loc. iv. 7. vol. xii. p. 731) and Aetius (ii. 3. 77, p. 393). He may perhaps be the same person as Arzmondorus Capito [Arzmondontes], but this is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.]

CAPITO, C. ATEIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, was tribune of the people in B. C. 55, and with his colleague, Aquilinus Gallus, opposed Pompey and Crassus, who were consuls that year. Capito in particular opposed a bill, which the tribune Trebonius brought forward, concerning the distribution of the provinces, but in vain. Capito and Gallus afterwards endeavoured to stop the levy of the troops and to render the campaigns, which the consuls wished to undertake, impossible; and when Crassus, nevertheless, continued to make preparations for an expedition against the Parthians, Capito announced awful prodigies which were disregarded by Crassus. Appian, the censor, afterwards punished Capito with a nota censoria, as he was charged with having fabricated the prodigies by which he had attempted to deter Crassus from his undertaking. Dion Cassius (xxxix. 34) says, that Capito, as tribune, also counteracted the measures adopted by the tribunals in favour of Caesar; but some time afterwards Cicero (ad Famili. xiii. 29), who speaks of him as his friend, says that he favoured the party of Caesar, though it may be inferred from the whole tone of the letter of Cicero just referred to, that Capito had made no public declaration in favour of Caesar, as Cicero is at so much pains to induce Flavius to interfere with Caesar on behalf of Capito. It is not impossible that Capito, as a senator, might attempt to check the rashness of Capito, whose name is also borne by a praetorian, is the same as the one whom Appian (B. C. v. 33, 50) mentions as a legate of Antony. (Comp. Dion Cass. xxxi. 42, xxxix. 33—39; Appian, B. C. ii. 18; Plut. Crass. 19; Cic. de Divinat. i. 16. [L. S.] CAPITO, C. ATEIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, was the son of the preceding. He became a disciple of the jurist Oflinius, who is said by Pomponius to have been more learned than Trebatius. Labeo, too, his elder contemporary and subsequent rival, had studied under Oflinius, but had received his elementary education from Trebatius, and had listened to all the other eminent jurists of the time. Capito, when he was tribune of the people, first called a praetorian, is the same as the one whom Appian spoke of (B. C. v. 33, 50) mentions as a legate of Antony. (Comp. Dion Cass. xxxi. 42, xxxix. 33—39; Appian, B. C. ii. 18; Plut. Crass. 19; Cic. de Divinat. i. 16. [L. S.]

CAPITO found favour with Augustus, who accelerated his promotion to the censorship, in order, says Tacitus (Ann. iii. 75), that he might obtain precedence over Labeo. It may be that Capito was made consul before the proper age, that is, before his 43rd year. He was made consul with L. Vitius Postumus in A. D. 5. Several writers erroneously confound the jurist with C. Fonteius Capito, who was consul with Germanicus in A. D. 12.

Pomponius says (as we interpret his words), that Labeo refused the offer of Augustus to make him the colleague of Capito. "Ex his Ateius consul fuit; Labeo noluit, quem offerretur ei ab Augusto consulatum, et honorem suscipere." (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 47.) We cannot agree with the commentators who attempt to reconcile the statement of Pomponius with the inference that would naturally be drawn from the antithesis of Tacitus: "Illi [Labeoni], quod praetura intra statit, commen datio ex injuria, huic [Capitoi] quod consulatum adeptus est, odiun ex invisid orichitur." In A. D. 13, Capito was appointed to succeed Messalla in the important office of "curator aquarum publicorum," and this office he held to the time of his death. (Frontinus, de Aquad. 1.02, ed Diederich.)

Capito continued in favour under Tiberius. In A. D. 15, after a formable and mischievous inundation of the Tiber, he and Arruntius were intrusted with the task of keeping the river within its banks. They submitted to the senate whether it would not be expedient to divert the course of the tributary streams and lakes. Deputies from the colonies and municipal towns, whose interests would have been affected by the change, were heard against the plan. Piso led the opposition, and the measure was rejected. (Tac. Ann. i. 76, 79.)

The grammarian, Ateius Philologus, who was a freedman, was probably (if we may conjecture from his name and from some other circumstances) the freedman of Capito. (Aetius, p. 392, b.)

The few recorded incidents of Capito's life tend to justly the imputation of servility which has been attached to his name; while Labeo, as if for the sake of contrast, appears to have fallen into the opposite extreme of superfluous incivility. Tiberius, in his edict relating to new years' gifts to the colleague of Capito. Ex his Atcius consul was the freedman of Capito. Ex his Atcius consul tribune in favour of Caesar; but some time afterwards Cicero (ad Famili. xiii. 29), who speaks of him as his friend, says that he favoured the party of Caesar, though it may be inferred from the whole tone of the letter of Cicero just referred to, that Capito had made no public declaration in favour of Caesar, as Cicero is at so much pains to induce Flavius to interfere with Caesar on behalf of Capito. It is not impossible that Capito, as a senator, might attempt to check the rashness of Capito, whose name is also borne by a praetorian, is the same as the one whom Appian (B. C. v. 33, 50) mentions as a legate of Antony. (Comp. Dion Cass. xxxi. 42, xxxix. 33—39; Appian, B. C. ii. 18; Plut. Crass. 19; Cic. de Divinat. i. 16. [L. S.]

CA'PITO (Kairlrai'), a physician, who probably lived in the first or second century after Christ, as if from some other circumstances) the freedman of Capito. Ex his Atcius consul Capito ridiculed his promotion to the consulship, in order, says Tacitus (Ann. iii. 45) calls a praetorian, is the same as the one whom Appian (B. C. v. 33, 50) mentions as a legate of Antony. (Comp. Dion Cass. xxxi. 42, xxxix. 33—39; Appian, B. C. ii. 18; Plut. Crass. 19; Cic. de Divinat. i. 16. [L. S.]

CA'PITO. 599
CAPITO.

10) under the name De Jure Sacrificiorum. 3. A treatise, De Officio Senatorio. (Gell. iv. 19.)

Frontinus (De Aquae duct. 97) cites Capito on the law of the public waters of Rome, and it is very likely that he wrote specially on a subject with which his official duties connected him.

We have already seen Capito in the character of a verbal critic. The meaning and proper usage of words constitute a branch of study of considerable importance to a jurist, who has to interpret wills and other private dispositions of property, and to construe laws. There is a title de Significentiorum Verborum in the Digest. The subject engaged the attention of Labeo, and we are strongly disposed to believe that it was treated of by Capito. In Pliny (H. N. xiv. 15), Capito is cited as agreeing with the jurist Scaevola, and with Ulpian (Aedius?) in holding (as Plautus, Pseud. ii. 4. 51), seems to have held, that the word unglirhra comprehended sweets (dulcia), as well as wines. In another passage of Pliny (H. N. xviii. 22), we find Capito tracing the variations in meaning of the words coquus and pistor. In Servius (ad Virg. Aen. v. 45), Varro and Ateius are cited as holding a peculiar opinion on the distinction between Divus and Dens. We take Ateius here to be the jurist Capito, for Ateius is the name by which he is generally denoted in the Digest; but it is not impossible that the freedman Ateius Philologus may be meant.

Aymarus Rivalius, one of the earliest writers on the history of Roman law (v. 2) says, that Capito wrote commentaries on the 12 Tables, but no authority is produced for this assertion, which, however, is followed by Val. Forster (in i. Zileti Tractatus Tractatorum p. 48), and Rutilius. (De Jurispr. c. 48.)

Gellius (xii. 12) cites a certain epistle of Capito, the authenticity of which has been called in question. It speaks in the past tense of Labeo, who died in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius. It commends the great legal learning of Labeo, while it charges him with a love of liberty so excessive, that he set no value upon anything "but quod justum sanctumque esse in Romanis antiquitatis legisvet." It then relates an instance of Labeo's refusing to obey the summons of a tribune, while he admitted the right of a tribune to arrest. Gellius thereupon takes occasion to shew, very clearly and satisfactorily, from Varro, why it was that tribunes, having power to arrest, had not the apparently minor and consequential power of summons. That Capito should charge Labeo with adherence to the strict letter of constitutional law seems to be at variance with the character of the two jurists as drawn by Pomponius: " Capito kept to that which he received from his instructors; Labeo, who possessed an intellect of a different order, and had diligently cultivated other departments of human knowledge besides law, introduced many innovations." (Dig. 1. tit. 2, n. 2, § 47.) For the purpose of reconciling these apparently conflicting testimonies, it has been supposed that Capito was a follower of the Old in private law, and Labeo in public law; while, on the contrary, in public law, Capito was an advocate of the New; in private law, Labeo.

Capito and Labeo became the founders of two celebrated schools of Roman law, to which most of the distinguished jurists belonged. Their respective followers, mentioned by Pomponius, are—corn the spirit of a couturier, without anything to call for serious blame, but Tactius relates an incident which exhibits Capito in the shameful character of a hypocrite playing the game of a hypocrite—of a lawyer perverting his high authority, and using the pretence of adherence to constitutional freedom in order to encourage cruel tyranny. L. Ennianus, a Roman knight, was accused by some informer of treason, for having melted down a small silver statue of the emperor, and converted it into common plate. Tiberius employed his right of intercession to stop the accusation. Capito complained of such an interference with the jurisdiction of the senate, and deprecated the impunity of such an atrocious delinquent as L. Ennianus. "Let the emperor," said he, "be as slow as he likes in avenging his merely private griefs, but let his generosity have some limits—let it stop short of giving away the wrongs of the state." The men understood each other. The mock magnanimity of the emperor was proof against the mock remonstrance of the lawyer. (Tac. Ann. iii. 70.)

Shortly after this disgraceful scene Capito died, A. D. 22. It is remarkable that, notwithstanding the great legal reputation of Capito, not a single pure extract from any of his works occurs in the Digest, though there are a few quotations from him at second hand. His works may have perished before the time of Justinian, though some of them must have existed in the fifth century, as they are cited by Macrobius. It may be that he treated but little of private law, and that his public law soon became superseded.

Capito is quoted in the Digest by his contemporary Labeo: Dig. 23, tit. 3, s. 79, § 1; 32, s. 30, § 6; by Proculius, B. tit. 2, s. 13, § 1; by Javolethus, 34, tit. 2, s. 39, § 32; by Ulpian, 23, tit. 2, s. 29 (where mention is made of Capito's consulsship), by Paulus, 39, tit. 3, s. 2, § 4; 39, tit. 3, s. 14; though, in this last-mentioned passage, the Florentine manuscript has Antaeus, but there is no authority is produced for this assertion, which, however, is followed by Val. Forster (in i. Zileti Tractatus Tractatorum p. 48), and Rutilius. (De Jurispr. c. 48.)

Capito and Labeo became the founders of two celebrated schools of Roman law, to which most of the distinguished jurists belonged. Their respective followers, mentioned by Pomponius, are—
Of Antistius Laboe.
M. Cocceius Nerva pater.
Sempronius Proculus.
Nerva filius.
Pegasus.
P. Juventius Celsus pater.
Celsus filius.
Neratius Priscus.
To the list of Capito's followers may be added with certainty, Gaius; with the highest probability, Pomponius; and, with more or less plausible conjecture, a few others, as T. Aristo.

The schools, of which Capito and Labeo were the founders, took their respective names from distinguished disciples of those jurists. The followers of Capito were called from Masanius Sabinius, Sabinianus; and afterwards, from Cassius Longinus, Cassiani. The followers of Labeo took from Proculeanuus, not Proculeianus, the ill-formed name Proculeiani (so spelt, not Proculeiani, in all old manuscripts wherever it occurs). From a misunderstanding of the phrase Peganismunus jus, (meaning, the legal writings of Pegasus,) in the scholiast on Juvenal (iv. 77), some have supposed that the followers of Labeo were also called from Pegasus, Peganiamini. (Dist. of Anti. s. n. Ferciscumili.) The schools vary as to the characteristic differences between these schools has been endless, and most writers on the subject have endeavoured to refer those differences to some general principle. When continental jurists were disputing about the relative importance of equity, as compared with strict law, the Roman schools were supposed to be based upon a disagreement between the admirers of equity and the admirers of strictness. Those who thought Labeo the better man were anxious to enlist him upon their side of the question. According to Mascovius and Hommel, Labeo was the advocate of sound and strict interpretation; according to Buch and Tydemann, Capito was an opponent of that enlightened equity which seeks to penetrate beyond the literal husky rind. When modern jurists were divided into the philosophical (dyslogistically, unphilosophical), and the historical (dyslogically, unphilosophical), schools, Capito and Labeo were made to belong to one or other of these parties. Dirksen (Beiträge zur Kenntniss des Römischen Rechts, pp. 1-159) and Zimmer (R. R. G. l. § 68) think, that the schools differ chiefly in their mode of handling legal questions; that the votaries of Sabinius look for something external to hang their reasoning upon, whether it be ancient practice, or the text of a law, or the words of a private disposition, or analogy to a positive rule, and only at last, in defiance of all these, resort to the general principles of right and the natural feelings of equity; whereas the votaries of Proculeanuus on the other hand, looking in the first instance, more freely to the inner essence of rules and institutions, and anxious to construct law on the unchanging basis of morality, sometimes by an apparent deviation from the letter, arrive at results more correspondent with the nature of the subject. Puchta (Inst. i. § 86) refers the original divergence to the personal characters of the founders, the acquisitence of Capito in received doctrines, the liberal and comprehensive intellect of Labeo, urging philosophical progress and scientific development.

Whether the original differences rested on general principles, or whether they consisted in discordant opinions upon isolated particular points, it is clear that the political opposition between Capito and Labeo had not long any important influence on their respective schools, for Cocceius Nerva, the immediate successor of Labeo, did not adopt the political opinions of his master, which, as the empire became consolidated, must have soon grown out of fashion, the more especially, since jurists now began to receive their authorization from the prince. Proculeanus was a still stronger imperialist than Nerva. Even in private law, the subsequent leaders on either side modified, perhaps, the original doctrines originally introduced. The distinction of the schools is strongly manifested in Gaius, who wrote under Antoninus Pius, but soon after that time it seems to have worn out from the influence of independent eclecticism. Even in earlier times, a jurist was not necessarily a bigoted supporter of every dogma of his school. Thus, we find a case in Gaius (iii. 140) where Cassius approves the opinion of Labeo, while Proculeanus follows that of Oiffius, the master of Capito. Not every question, on which the opinions of Roman jurists were divided, was a school question. When Justinian found it necessary to settle any disputed questions in the interval between the first and second editions of his Constitutionum Codex, he was obliged to look back to ancient controversies, and sometimes to annul by express sanction that which was already antiquated in practice. The consideration of this fact alone shows that, from his L. Decisiones, it would be wrong to infer, as some have done, that the old separation of the schools existed in his time; but further, there is no proof that any of the questions he settled were ever party questions of the schools.

Though the distinctions of the schools gradually wore out, as eminent and original men arose, who thought for themselves, there is no proof that there was ever a distinct middle school. A school of Miscellaneous has been imagined in consequence of a passage of Pustus, which, however, has nothing to do with the profession of the law: "Miscellanea appellatur, qui non certae sunt sententiae, sed variorum mixtumque judiciorum." Cujas, from a false reading of Servius (ad Virg. Aen. liii. 68), imagined the existence of an eclectic sect of Herciscandii. Servius, speaking of the opinions of the ancients concerning the soul, says that some believed that consciousness ceased with death; others, that the soul was immortal; while the Stoics, pursuing a middle course, held that it was buried in the earth, and lived as long as the body endured. "Stoici vero, terris condit, i.e. mediumaceti, tam diu durare dicit, quamdiu durat et corpus." Cujas, for terris condit, deciphered, as he thought, in his nearly illegible copy, herciscandii, a technical word, which appears in the Familiaris herciscandi causa. (Dig. 10. tit. 2.) The error of Cujas, in referring a name so strangely gotten to an eclectic sect of Roman jurists, gained general reception among the civilians of his day, on account of his great learning and authority.

Though Capito is little quoted—not once by his own follower, Gaius—though there are many (60) more citations bearing the name of Laboe in the Digest, and a vast number of citations of Laboe in fragments bearing the name of other jurists—the conclusions of Capito's school seem, in a majority of cases, to have prevailed in practice. This proceeded partly, perhaps, from the great authority acquired by Masurinus Sabinus, and from the numerous commentators who wrote libri ad Sabinum. Among these, indeed, were some of the opposite party. According to Blume's celebrated hypothesis, first suggested by Jac. Godefroi, one of the great divisions in most of the titles of the Digest consisted of extracts from the writings of annotations on Sabinus. Some Sabinian influence may also have been exerted upon Roman jurisprudence through the labour of the Sabinian Salius Julianus in recasting the prœtor's edict. But there never was any general determination in favour of either school. In some points, Proculus and his party were preferred. For example, Gaius (ii. 21) mentions a rescript of Hadrian, and (ii. 195) another of Antoninus Pius, against certain theoretical conclusions of the Sabinians ( 'nostri sentence') and in favour of the 'diversa scholae auctores.'

The agreement of the majority of the jurists authorized by the emperor juræ condere, rather than the crassus of this or that sect, became under the empire the test of legal orthodoxy. (Plin. H. N. xiv. 13; Rutulius, c. 48, in Francilii Vite Tripliades J. Cloruni, contains several questionable statements about giving his authorities. He enters into conjectures as to the family of the jurist, and treats of several Romans of the name of Capito. Bertrand, i. 51. 3; Guili. Grot. i. 12. 6; Ant. CA'PITO, CLAUD'IUS, a Roman orator, a contemporary of the younger Plaut. (Ep. vi. 13.)

CA'PITO, COSSET'IUS' ANUS, a Roman advocate in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, who appears to have used his profession as a mere means for enriching himself. For this reason he and some of his profession opposed a law by which advocates were to be forbidden to accept any fees from their clients. In a. d. 56 he obtained Cilicia as his province, and there he acted with the same avarice and impudence as he had done before at Rome. In the year following, the Cilicians accused him of extortion, and he was condemned, in consequence of which he lost his senatorial rank. But this he afterwards received back, through the mediation of Tigellinus, his father-in-law; and shortly after, a. d. 62, he accused the prætor Antiistus Sesianus of high treason. In a. d. 66, Aemilius Mela, the brother of the philosopher Semece, and father of the poet Ammianus Marcellus, left a large legacy to Tigellinnsus and Cossutianus Capito, the latter of whom came forward in the same year as the accuser of Thrasea Paetus, for Thrasea had formerly supported the cause of the Cilicians against him, and had been instrumental in bringing about his condemnation. Capito was rewarded by Nero for this base act with an immense sum of money. (Tac. Ann. vi. 6, &c., x. 9, 67; xiii. 17, iv. 72, 25, 26, 28, 33; Liv. Sat. viii. 93, &c.)

[PL. II.]

CA'PITO, FONTEIUS. J. T. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, was prætor in B. C. 178, and obtained the command in Hispania Ulterior, which was left to him also for the year following, with the title of proconsul. (Liv. xii. 59, xii. 2, 19.)

2. P. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, was prætor in B. C. 169, and obtained Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xii. 13, 17.)

3. C. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, a friend of M. Antony, accompanied Maccenas, in B. C. 37, when he was sent by Octavianus to Antony to restore friendship between Octavianus and Antony. Capito remained with Antony, and was soon after sent by him to Egypt, to fetch Cleopatra to Syria. He is probably the same person as the C. Fonteius Capito who was appointed consul suffectus, in B. C. 33, together with M. Aelius. There is a coin of his extant with the heads of Antony and Cleopatra, and on which Capito is called propraetor, and bears the prænomen Cains. (Horat. Sat. i. 5. 32; Plut. Anton. 36; Eckhel, Doctr. Num. v. p. 219.)

4. C. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, a son of C. Fonteius Capito, the friend of M. Antony. (No. 3.) He was consul in A. D. 12, together with Germanicus, and afterwards had, as proconsul, the administration of the province of Asia. Many years later, in A. D. 25, he was accused by Vibius Scenius, apparently on account of his conduct in Asia; but, as no sufficient evidence was adduced, he was acquitted. (Fasti Cap.; Suet. Cal. 8; Tac. Ann. iv. 36.)

5. C. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, consul in A. D. 59 together with C. Vipsas. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 1; Plin. H. N. ii. 72, vii. 20; Solin. 6.)

6. L. FONTEIUS CA'PITO, consul in A. D. 67 together with C. Julius Rufus, as we learn from the Fasti Sienii and the Chronicle of Cassiodorus; but whether he is the same as the Fonteius Capito who was put to death in Germany in the reign of Galba, A.D. 68, on the ground of having attempted to excite an insurrection, is uncertain. (Tac. Hist. i. 7, 37, 57, ii. 62, iv. 13; Suet. Gall. 11; Plut. Gall. 15, where Αὐρωπή should be changed into Αὐρωπή.)

It is uncertain to which of the Capitos the two following coins belong: the prænomen Publius would lead us to refer them to No. 2. The former contains on the obverse a head of Mars with a trophy behind it and the inscription P. FONTEIVS P. F. CA'PITO III. VIT., and on the reverse a man riding on horseback at full gallop, with two men below fighting, and the inscription MANI. FON'T. TR. MIL. [L. S.]
CAPITOLINUS.

CAPITO, INSTEIUS, a centurion in the Roman army which carried on the war under Domitian Corbulon against the Parthian Vologeses, a. d. 54. The king, after being defeated, sent hostages who were delivered up. Capito is the same whom we meet with three years later, in those same regions as praefectus castrorum, to whom Corbulon entrusted some of the smaller fortresses in Armenia. (Tac. Ann. a. d. 23, was accused by the provincials of malversation, and was tried by the senate. (Tac. Ann. i. 3, 4; Dion Cass. iv. 15.; [L. S.] CAPITO, LUCILIIUS, procurator of Asia in a. d. 253, was accused by the provincials of malversation, and was tried by the senate. (Tac. Ann. i. 15.; Dion Cass. iv. 23.; [L. S.]

CAPITO, MA'RIUS, occurs on several coins of the Maria gens, a specimen of which is given below, but this Marius Capito is not mentioned by any ancient writer. The obverse represents the head of Ceres, the reverse a man ploughing.

CAPITO, VIRGINTIIUS. During the war between the supporters of Vitellius and Vespasian, a. d. 69, Virginus Capito sent a slave to L. Vitelliu, the emperor's brother, promising to surrender to him the citadel of Terracina, if he would receive the garrison. The slave was afterwards hanged for having assisted in carrying out a treacherous design. (Tac. Hist. iii. 77, iv. 3.; [L. S.]

CAPITOLINIUS, a family-name in several Roman gentes, which was no doubt originally given to a person who lived on the hill Capitolius. In the same way Aventhisis, Caeliomanthus, Esquilinthus, frequently occur as the names of families at Rome.

CAPITOLINUS, JULIIUS. We possess a volume containing the biographies of various Roman emperors and pretenders to the purple, compiled by writers who flourished towards the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century, dedicating their works for the most part to Diocletian or Constantine. The number of pieces is in all thirty-four. They reach from Hadrian to the death of Carinus, that is, from a. d. 117 to a. d. 284, extending over a space of 167 years, and forming a sort of supplement to the Caesars of Suetonius, which terminate with Domitian. No immediate connexion, however, is established with the last-named work; although since Nerva and Trajan are passed over; nor is the series absolutely complete, even within its own proper limits, for there is a gap of nine years, from the third Gordian to Valerianus, that is, from a. d. 244 to a. d. 253, including the reigns of Philippes, Decius, Gallus, and Aemilius. It is by no means unlikely, indeed, that these, as well as Nerva and Trajan, may originally have formed a part of the whole, and that the existing blanks are owing to the mutilation of the MS., which formed the archetype; but this is merely a probable conjecture. The authors of the collection are commonly classed together under the title "Historie Augustae Scriptores sex," their names being Aelius Spartianus, Iulius Capitolinus, Vulciatus Gallicanus, Aelius Lampridius, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopisicus. In consequence of the confusion which prevails in the MSS. it is impossible to assign each section with absolute certainty to its real owner, and no trustworthy conclusions can be arrived at upon the subject of the different portions, for the lives do not exhibit the well-digested result of careful and extensive research, but are in many instances evidently made up of scraps derived from different sources and possessing different degrees of merit, loosely tacked together, and often jumbled into a rough mass deaktis of form and symmetry. Hence we find numerous repetitions of frivolous details, a strange mixture of what is grave and valuable with the most puerile and worthless rubbish, and a multitude of irreconcilable and contradictory statements freely admitted without remark or explanation. We have history here presented to us in its lowest and crudest shape—a total want of judgment in the selection and classification of facts; an absence of all unity of purpose, no attempt being made to establish a relation between the circumstances recorded and the character of the individual under discussion; and a total disregard of philosophical combination and inference. The narratives have all the bareness and disjointed incoherence of a meagre chronicle without possessing simplicity and methodical arrangement. These strictures may perhaps be slightly modified in favour of Vopisicus, who appears to have had access to valuable public records, and to have taken some pains to extract what was most interesting, although he often exhibits as little discretion as the rest in working up his raw materials. But, notwithstanding all these defects, this compilation is of no small importance, enabling us to form a just conception of an important period of Roman history.

We have no reason to question the general accuracy of the great events recorded, although blended with idle rumours and false details; nor the general fidelity of the portraits of the leading men, although the likenesses may be in some instances flattened and in others caricatured, according to the predilections of the artist. The antiquarian, above all, will here discover a mass of curious statements with regard to the formal administration of public affairs and the history of jurisprudence, together with a multitude of particulars illustrating the state of literature and the arts, the social usages and modes of thought and feeling which prevailed among the different classes of the community during this stormy period.

Nay, the very frivolous minuteness with which these writers descant upon matters connected with the private life and habits of the personages who pass under review, although unworthy of the dignity of history, opens up to us a very singular region for observation and inquiry, the more interesting because usually inaccessible. In these departments also we may receive the information conveyed without suspicion, for upon such topics there could be no conceivable motive for falsehood or misrepresentation; and the worst we have to fear is, that the love of the marvellous may occasionally have given rise to exaggeration in describing the fantastic extravagance and profusion so characteristic of that epoch.

CAPITOLINUS.

these Antoninus Plus and L. Verus are inscribed to Diocletian, who is also addressed in M. Aurelius (c. 19); Pertinax and Maximus with Balbinus bear no inscription; the rest are inscribed to Constantine. Salmasius, following the authority of the Palatine MSS., assigns the first five to Spartanus, and acknowledges the sixth, seventh, and eighth only, as the genuine productions of Capitolinus; but these are points on which it is foolish, in the absence of all satisfactory evidence, internal or external, to hazard even an opinion.

The edict of the Historiae Augustae was printed at Milan in 1475 by Philip de Lavagna, in a folio volume divided into three parts, of which the first contains Suetonius; the second a piece entitled de ascerto Nerva, followed by the Augustan Historians; the third Eutropius and Paulus Diaconus. It is excessively rare, and bears a high price. It was reprinted at Venice by Bernardinus, fol. 1489, and by Rubens, fol. 1490. These lives are also to be found in various miscellanies containing the history of the Caesars which appeared during the 16th century; but they were first brought out in an independent form at Paris, 4to. 1603, under the inspection of Isaac Casaubon; this was followed by the edition of Salmasius, fol. Par. 1620, which exhibits a text greatly improved by a careful examination of MSS. and copious notes containing a prodigious but ill-digested mass of erudition. The most useful edition is that of Schrevelius (Lugd. Bat. 1671); but much remains to be done, for palpable corruptions appear in every page.

The most famous deliverer of the Capitol from the Gauls, was roused from his sleep by the cackling of the geese, and on discovering the cause of it, he and as many men as he could collect at the moment hastened to the spot where the Gauls were ascending, and succeeded in repelling them. This gallant and successful deed was rewarded the next day by the assembled people with all the simple and rude honours and distinctions which were customary at the time. He is said to have received the surname of Capitolinus from this circumstance; but this is probably a mistake, as it had become a regular family-name in his gens before his time, and he would thus have inherited it from his father. In B. C. 387 he was appointed interrex, but two years later, B. C. 385, he abandoned the cause of the patricians, to whom he belonged, and placed himself at the head of the plebeians, who were suffering severely from their debts and the harsh and cruel treatment they experienced from their patrician creditors. The motive, however, from which Manlius came forward to support them was not pure; it appears that after his delivery of the Capitol he was so intoxicated with his exploit, that he could not bear seeing any man placed on an equality with or raised above himself, and it is even believed that he harboured the scheme of making himself tyrant or king of Rome. With such or similar intentions he excites the plebeians against their oppressors, who became so alarmed that they resolved upon the appointment of a dictator, A. Cornelius Cossus. While the dictator was absent from Rome, Manlius had recourse to violence to rescue the plebeians from the hands of their creditors, and conducted himself altogether like a complete demagogue. When the dictator returned to the city in order to put a stop to the proceedings of Manlius, he summoned Manlius to appear before him. The rebel came accompanied by a host of plebeians; but the dictator had him arrested by one of his victors and consigned to prison as a seditious citizen. The plebeians, though they did not venture anything against the orders of the dictator, displayed their grief by putting on mourning for their champion, and gathering around his prison. The attempts of the senate to allay the indignation of the plebeians by assignments of land, only irritated them the more, as they regarded these favours as bribes to betray their patron, and the insurrection rose to such a height, that the senate and patricians saw themselves obliged to liberate Manlius. By this step, however, nothing was gained; the plebeians now had a leader, and the insurrection instead of decreasing spread further and further. In the year following, B. C. 384, the Romans had not to fight against any foreign enemy, and as Manlius did not scruple to instigate the plebs to open violence, the consular tribunes of the year received orders, aviderent ne quis novis publicis detrimentis caesar. Manlius was charged with high treason, and brought before the people assembled in the campus Martius, but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Postelainian grove outside the porta Nomentana. Here Manlius was condemned to death, and his former military glory and his appeals to the gratitude of the people, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian rock. The members of the Manlia gens considered that he had brought disgrace upon them, and accordingly resolved that none of them should ever have in future the praenomen of Marcus. (Liv. v.

5. A. MANLIUS A. F. A. N. CAPILNIIUS, consul in b. c. 389, 385, 383, and 370. In his first tribuneship Rome was attacked by several enemies at once, and A. Manlius obtained the command of one of the three armies then raised for guarding the city. In the second tribuneship he persuaded the senate to appoint a dictator to carry on the war against the Volscians, Latins, and Hernicians. (Liv. vi. 11, 21, 36.)

6. C. MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, consul in b. c. 383. (Liv. vi. 50.)

7. P. MANLIUS A. F. A. N. CAPITOLINUS, consul in b. c. 379. He was created dictator in b. c. 368, as the successor of M. Furius Camillus, for the purpose of restoring peace between the two orders, and during his government the Licinian laws were carried. In the year following he was elected consul and carried a second time. (Liv. vi. 30, 38, &c.; Plut. Cam. 39, 42.)

9. C. MANLIUS L. F. A. N. CAPITOLINUS IMPERIOUS, was dictator in b. c. 363 claudi figendi causa. (Liv. vii. 3.)

CAPITOLINUS, PETILLIUS, was according to the Scholiast on Horace (Sat. i. 4. 94) entrusted with the care of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol, and was accused of having stolen the crown of Jupiter, but was acquitted by the judges in consequence of his being a friend of Augustus. The Scholiast states that Petillius received the surname of Capitolinus from his being placed over the Capitol, but whether this be so, or whether it was a regular family-name of the gens, so much is certain, that the annexed coin of the gens refers to the connexion of one of the Petilli with the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, for the obverse represents the head of Jupiter, and the reverse the temple.

CAPITOLINUS, QUINCTIUS. 1. T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS BARRATUS, was consul in b. c. 471 with App. Claudius Sabinus Regilensis. During the disputes about the Publilian law, he opposed his colleague and conciliated the plebeians, and the law was carried. He then conducted the war against the Aequians and it is certain, that the annexed coin of the gens refers to the connexion of one of the Petilli with the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, for the obverse represents the head of Jupiter, and the reverse the temple.

try. The immense booty acquired in this campaign was all distributed among the soldiers. He obtained a consulship a second time in b. c. 468, during which year he again carried on a war against the Volscians and Aequians, and by his presence of mind saved the Roman camp, which was attacked by the enemy during the night. After this war he was honoured with a triumph. In b. c. 365 he was made consul a third time. The war against the Aequians and Volscians was still continued, and Capitolinus, who was stationed on mount Algidus and there heard of the ravaging inroads of the Aequians in the Roman territory, returned to Rome and delivered his fellow-citizens from their terror. The senate proclaimed a justitium, and the consul again marched out to protect the Roman frontier; but as he did not meet with the enemy, who had in the meantime been defeated by his colleague Q. Fabius, Capitolinus returned to Rome four days after he had left it. The consulship was given him for the fourth time in b. c. 446, together with Agrippa Furius. During the quarrels which were then going on at Rome between the patricians and plebeians, the Aequians and Volscians again took up arms, began ravaging Latium, and advanced up to the very walls of the city. The people of Rome were too distracted among themselves to take the field against the enemy, but Capitolinus succeeded in allaying the discontent of the plebs, and in reusing the nation to defend itself with all energy. The supreme command of the Roman army was given him with the consent of his colleague, and he routed the enemy in a fierce contest. In b. c. 448 he obtained his fifth consulship. In this year the censorship was instituted at Rome as an office distinct from the consulship. While his colleague M. Geganus Macedinus was engaged in a war against Ardea, Capitolinus gained equal laurels at home by acting as mediator between the patricians and plebeians, with both of whom he had acquired the highest esteem. The extraordinary wisdom and moderation he had shewn on all occasions, obtained for him the sixth consulship in b. c. 439, together with Agrippa Menenius. Rome was at that time visited by a famine, and when he pointed out the necessity of appointing a dictator under the circumstances, the dignity was offered him, but he declined it on account of his advanced age, recommending L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, who was accordingly raised to that dignity. In b. c. 437, he accompanied the dictator Mam. Aemilius Mamercinus as legate in his campaign against Fidenae, and a few years later he came forward as a suppliant for the son of the dictator Cincinnatus, who was tried before the comitia, and the prayer of the aged Quinctius procured his acquittal. After this time we hear no more of him. (Liv. ii. 65—66, 64, iii. 2, &c., 66, &c., iv. 8, 10, 13, 17, 41; Dionys. ix. 45, &c., 57, 61, xl. 63; Zonar. vii. 19.)

2. T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS BARRATUS, a son of No. 1, was consul in b. c. 421, together with N. Pabius Vibulanus. (Liv. iv. 43.)

3. T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS BARRATUS, a son of No. 2, was consul in b. c. 405. (Liv. iv. 61; Zonar. vii. 20.)

4. T. QUINCTIUS CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in b. c. 393, and magister equitum in the same year to the dictator Q. Cornelius Cosmas. (Liv. vii. 11.)

5. T. QUINCTIUS CINCEIUTIUS CAPITOLINUS, consul tribune in b. c. 388. [CINCEIUTIUS.]
6. T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus, consul at Rome in B.C. 366. [Cincinnatus.]

7. T. Quinctius T. Pennus Capitolinus Crispinus, was appointed dictator in B.C. 361, to conduct the war against the Gauls, as Livy thinks, who is supported by the triumphal fasti, which ascribe to him a triumph in this year over the Gauls. In the year following he was magister equitum to the dictator, and likewise fought against the Gauls. In B.C. 354 he was consul with M. Fabius Ambustus, and in that year the Triburtines and Tarquinianae were subdued. In B.C. 354 he was appointed consul a second time, and received the conduct of the war against the Faliscans as his province, but no battle was fought, as the Romans confined themselves to ravaging the country. (Liv. vii. 9, 11, 18, 22.)

8. T. Quinctius T. Pennus Capitolinus Crispinus. In B.C. 214, when M. Claudius Marcellus went to Rome to sue for his third consulship, he left Capitolinus in Sicily in command of the Roman fleet and camp. In B.C. 209, he was elected praetor, and obtained Capua as his province. The year after B.C. 208, he was elected consul together with M. Claudius Marcellus, and both consuls were commissioned to carry on the war against Hannibal in Italy. In a battle which was fought in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, Capitolinus was severely wounded and retreated. He was afterwards carried to Capua and thence to Rome, where he died at the close of the year, after having proclaimed T. Manlius Torquatus dictator. (Livy. xxi. 1, xxi. 6, 7, 21, 27, 28, 31; Polyb. x. 32.)

CAPITOLIUS, P. Sextius, surnamed Vaticanus, was consul in B.C. 452 with T. Menenius Agrippa. In this year the ambassadors whom had been sent to Athens for the purpose of consulting its laws and institutions, returned to Rome, and in the year following P. Sextius was one of the decemvirs appointed to draw up a new code of laws. Festus (s.e. poculatus) mentions a lex multunctia which was carried by P. Sextius and his colleague during their consulship. (Livy. iii. 32, &c.; Dionys. x. 54.)

CAPITOLIUS, SP. Tarpeius Montanus, consul in B.C. 454 with A. Aternius Varus. A lea de multis sacramento which was carried in his consulship, is mentioned by Festus (s.e. poculatus, comp. Cic. de Ree Publ. ii. 35; Liv. iii. 31; Dionys. x. 48, 50). After the close of their office both consuls were accused by a tribune of the people for having sold the booty which they had made in the war against the Aequians, and giving the proceeds to the acrarium instead of distributing it among the soldiers. Both were condemned notwithstanding the violent opposition of the senate. In B.C. 449, when the Roman army advanced towards Rome to revenge the murder of Virginia, and had taken possession of the Aventine, Sp. Tarpeius was one of the two ambassadors whom the senate sent to the revolted army to re-establish their authority with them. In the year following, he and A. Aternius, though both were patricians, were elected tribunes of the plebs by the cooperation of the college to support the senate in its opposition to the roguery of the tribune L. Trebonius. (Liv. iii. 50, 55.)

CAPRA'RIUS, a surname of Q. Caecilius Metellus, consul in B.C. 113. [METELLIUS.]

CAPRA'RIUS, a surname of Juno at Rome, of which the origin is related as follows:—When the Roman state was in a very weak condition, after the ravages of the Gauls, the neighbouring people under Postumius Livius advanced from Sidonius before the gates of Rome, and demanded Roman women in marriage, threatening to destroy Rome completely unless their demand was complied with. While the Roman senate was yet deliberating as to what was to be done, a slave of the name of Tutela or Philolus, offered to go with her fellow slaves, in the disguise of free women, to the camp of the enemy. The strategem succeeded, and when the Latins in their camp, intoxicated with wine, had fallen asleep, the slaves gave a signal to the Romans from a wild fig-tree (caprifolium). The Romans now broke forth from the city, and defeated the enemy. The senate rewarded the generosity of the female slaves by restoring them to freedom, and giving to each a dowry from the public treasury. The day on which Rome had thus been delivered, the 7th of July, was called nonae Caprotinae, and an annual festival was celebrated to Juno Caprotina in all Latium, by free women as well as by female slaves, with much mirth and merriment. The ceremony took place under the ancient caprifolium, and the milky juice flowing from the tree was offered as a sacrifice to the goddess. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 11; Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 16; Plut. Romul. 29, Comn. 33.) [L.S.]

CAPREOLUS, succeeded Aurelius in the episcopate of Carthage in the year 439, at the period when all Africa was overrun and ravaged by the Vandals. The state of the country rendering it impossible to send a regular deputation to the council of Ephesus, summoned in 431 for the purpose of discussing the doctrines of Nestorius, Capreolus despatched thither his deacon Besula, with an epistle, in which he deprecates the circumstances which compelled his absence, and denounces the tenets of the patriarch of Constantinople. Capreolus is believed to have died before 439, the year in which Carthage was stormed by the Vandals.

We possess, 1. Epistola ad Simeonem Ephasianam, written, as we have seen above, in 431. It is extant both in Greek and Latin.

2. Epistola de una Christi veri Dei aut Hominis Persona contra recens damnatum Haeresin Nestorii, a long and learned letter, addressed to two persons named Vitalis and Constantius, or Tonantius, who had written from Spain to consult Capreolus concerning the controversy which was then agitating the church. It is contained in the Varior. Opusc. of Sirmond, vol. i. Paris, 1675, 8vo.

Both of the above works, together with the epistle of Vitalis and Tonantius to Capreolus, will be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 490.

3. A fragment in reply to the letter addressed by Theodosius to Augustin with regard to the council of Ephesus, is preserved by Ferrandus in his "Epistola ad Pelagium et Anatolium," and quoted by Galland.

4. Tillemon believes Capreolus to be the author of the Sermon de Tempore Basiilirico, on the invasion of Afir by the Vandals, usually included among the works of St. Augustin. Galland, Bibl. Patrum. vol. ix. Prolegg. p. 31; Schoenemann, Bibl. Patrum Latinarum, c.v. 32, who enumerates all the editions.

[W. R.]

CAPTA or CAPITA, a surname of the Minerva worshipped on the Caelian hill at Rome. Its origin was not known. Ovid (Fast. iii. 837, &c.) proposes various conjectures about it. [L.S.]

CAPUSA, the son of Oesalces, who was the uncle of Maximian. While the latter was in Spain fighting on behalf of the Carthaginians, his father Gala died, and was succeeded in the sovereignty by his brother Oesalces. Oesalces also dying shortly afterwards, his son Capusa obtained the throne; but as he had not much influence among his people, one Mezetulus laid claim to the kingdom, and defeated and killed Capusa in battle. (Liv. xxix. 29.)

CAPYS (Κάτος). 1. A son of Assaracus and Hieromneme, and father of Anchises. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 2; Hom. II. xx. 229; Virg. Aen. vi. 768; Diod. iv. 73.)

2. One of the companions of Aeneas, from whom the town of Capua was said to have derived its name. (Virg. Aen. x. 145.) This Capys was a Trojan, and is mentioned by Virgil among those who were of opinion that the wooden horse should be thrown into the water. (Aen. lii. 35.) Livy (iv. 37) states, that according to some traditions the town of Capua, which was previously called Vulturum, derived its name from a Samnite chief of the name of Capys. [L.S.]

CAPYS SILVIUS. [Silvius.]

CAR (Κάρ), a son of Phorcmenus, and king of Megara, from whom the acropolis of this town derived its name Caria. (Paus. i. 39. § 4, 40. § 5.)

His tomb was shown as late as the time of Pausanias, on the road from Megara to Corinth. (i. 44. § 9.) Another mythical personage of the name of Car, who was a brother of Lydus and Myus, and was regarded as the ancestral hero of the Carians, is mentioned by Herodotus. (i. 171.) [L.S.]

CARACALLA or CARACALLUS. The genealogy of this emperor and of many other historical personages will be readily understood from the following table. An account of each individual is given in its proper alphabetical place.

Bassianus.

Julia Domna Augusta, second wife of L. Septimius Severus Augustus.

M. Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, commonly called CARACALLA.

Julia Soennia Augusta, wife of Sex. Varius Marcellus.

Julia Mannea Augusta, wife of Gessius Marcellus.

M. Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, commonly called Elagabalus.

M. Aurelius Severus Augustus, commonly called Alexander Augustus.

Camellus or Carcellus, son of Septimius Severus and his second wife Julia Domna, was born at Lyons on the 4th or 6th of April, A.D. 188, while his father was governor of Gallia Lugdunensis. The child was originally called Bassianus after his maternal grandfather, but when Severus thought fit to declare himself the adopted offspring of M. Aurelius, he at the same time changed the name of his boy to M. Aurelius Antoninus, a designation retained by him ever after. Caracalla or Carcellus, which never appears on medals or inscriptions, was a nickname derived from a long tunic or great coat with a hood, worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favourite dress after he became emperor, and introduced into the army. These vestments found great favour, especially among the lower orders, and were known as Antonineae Carcellus.

Young Bassianus is said to have been remarkable in early life for a gentle and pleasing address. At this period he was beloved alike by his parents and the people, and displayed no indication of that ferocious temper which subsequently rendered him the scourge of the world. At the age of eight (196) he received the title of Caesar and Princeps Juventutis, in Maesia, while his father was marching from the East to encounter Albinus, and the year following (197) he was admitted an extraordinary member of the pontifical college. After the overthrow of Albinus, we find him styled Destinatus Imperator; and in 198, when ten years old, he was invested with the tribunician power, and created Augustus. He accompanied Severus in the expedition against the Parthians, sharing his victories.
native on the guards and the people, and a negotiation was commenced for a peaceful partition of the empire. But the passions of Caracalla could never be appeased by treaties, and the murder of his brother Geta was followed by a far more crude and brutal practice. The victims of Geta's deposition were not few; but Caracalla would vouch-slave them over with his own hands, and this was the first intimation of the vast sums lavished on these amusements and on his soldiers, which he deluged against himself and his mother; and the murdered Geta stood by him, in the dead of night, while the elder son of the empress in his mother's arms, when the emperor ordered the guards to be concerned in completing the deed. The murderer sought to appease the irritated troops by pretending that he had only acted in self-defence; but was eventually compelled to purchase their forbearance by distributing among them the whole wealth accumulated during his fa-thor's reign. The senate he treated with well-deserved contempt, and, feeling now secure, proceded to glut his vengeance by massacring all who he suspected of having favoured the preten-sions or plighted the fate of Geta, whose name was forthwith erased from the public monuments. The number of persons sacrificed is said to have amount-ted to twenty thousand of both sexes, among the number of whom was Papinius, the celebrated jurist.
But these crimes brought their own retrimption. Wandering with restless activity he resolved if possible to escape from himself by change of place. Wandering with restless activity from land to land, he sought to drown the recollection of his past guilt by fresh enormities. Gaul, Germany, Dacia, Thrace, Asin, Syria, and Egypt, were visited in succession, and were in succession
the scene of varied and complicated atrocities.
Its sojourn at Alexandria was marked by a general slaughter of the inhabitants, in order to avenge certain sacrilegious pleased in which they had indulged against himself and his mother; and the numbers of the slain were so great, that no one ventured to make known the amount, but orders were given to cast the bodies instantly into deep trenches, that the extent of the calamity might be more effectually concealed. The Greeks now believed that the furies of his brother pursued him with their scourgings. It is certain that his bodily health became seriously affected, and his intellects evidently deranged. He was tormented by fearful visions, and the spectres of his father and the murdered Geta stood by him, in the dead of night, with swords pointed to his bosom. Believing himself spell bound by the incantations of his foes, he had recourse to strange rites in order to evoke the spirits of the dead, that from them he might seek a remedy for his tortures; but it was said that none would answer to his call except the kindred soul of Commodus. At last, he bought the aid of the gods, when he was tormented by day and night with prayers and many victims; but no deity would vouchsafe a word of comfort to the fratricide.

While in this excited and unhappy condition, he demanded in marriage the daughter of Artaba-nus, the Parthian king; but the negotiation having been abruptly broken off, he suddenly passed the Euphrates in hostile array. The enemy was totally unprepared to resist an invasion so unexpected, and could offer no effectual resistance. Mesopotamia was wasted with fire and sword, Arbela was captured, and the emperor, after digging up the sepulchres of the Parthian kings and scattering their bones, returned to winter at Edessa. Having tre-cherously gained possession of the person of Abgarus, king of the Osroeni, he seized upon his territory, and took the field in spring with the intention of carrying his arms beyond the Tigris. His course was first directed towards Carrhae, that he might offer homage at a celebrated shrine of the Moon-deity in that neighbourhood; but during the march he was assassinated, at the instigation of Macrinus, the praeconest praeconest, by a veteran named Mar-talis, on the 8th of April, 217, in the thirteenth year of his age and the seventh of his reign.

The chronology of the last years of Caracalla is full of difficulty, and it is almost impossible to arrange the different events recorded in their proper order with anything like certainty. We hear of an expedition against the Alemanni and another against the Gotae. The former, commemorated by the epithet Germanicus, terminated in a purchased peace; the latter appears to have been partially successful. The portion of Dion Cassius which refers to this period consists of disjointed and imperfect chapters, between which we can seldom establish any connexion. They contain, however, much curious information, to which considerable additions have been made by the fragments recently discovered by Mal. Dion tells us, that after death Caracalla was usually spoken of under the insulting name of Turanath, taken from a gladiator remarkable for his short stature, ugly features, and sanguinary disposition. The historian himself, having explained this term (Ixxviii. 9), invariably employs it in the subsequent portions of his work.

We must not omit to observe, that Gibbon, following Spanheim and Burmann, ascribes to Carcalla the important edict which communicated to all free inhabitants of the empire the name and privileges of Roman citizens, while several ancient authors attribute this document to M. Aurelius.
The truth seems to be, that M. Aurelius was the author of a very broad and liberal measure in favour of the provincials, clogged, however, by certain conditions and restrictions which were waived by Caracalla, in order that he might introduce an uniform system of taxation and extort a larger revenue in return for a worthless privilege.

[WR.]

CARACTACUS (or, as Dion Cassius calls him,

Cara'tac, or Cara'tac, was a king of the Britis of the Silures, and by various prosperous enterprises had raised himself above all the other British chiefs. He appears to have been a most formidable enemy of the Romans. When they made their last attack upon him, he transferred the war into the country of the Ordovices, horted his men either to die or to conquer in the approaching battle. The Roman propurator, P. Ostianus, of the praetorian guard, an officer under whom the Roman forces were labouring, would not have ventured upon an engagement, had not the courage of his soldiers and officers demanded it. The superior military skill of the Roman legions overcame all the difficulties, and a splendid victory was gained: the wife and daughters of Caractacus fell into the hands of the Romans, and his brothers surrendered. Caractacus himself sought the protection of Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him, and he was delivered up to the Romans, and carried to Rome, A.D. 51, after the war in Britain had lasted for nine years, as Tacitus says. The emperor Claudius wished to exhibit to the people this old and formidable foe in his humiliation, and ordered Caractacus and the members of his family, with their clients and ornaments, to be led in a sort of triumph before an assembly of the people and an array of soldiers. The emperor himself was present. The relatives of Caractacus walked by his side east down with grief, and entreated the mercy of the Romans; Caractacus alone did neither of these things, and when he approached the seat of the emperor, he stopped and addressed him in so noble a manner, that Claudius pardoned him and his friends. They appear, however, not to have returned to Britain, but to have spent the remainder of their life in Italy. (Tac. Ann. xii. 53-55; Hist. iii. 45; s. alx.) [L. S.]

CARANUS. (Kapawos or Kapavos). 1. A Heracleid of the family of the Teneidae, and according to some accounts, the founder of the Argive dynasty in Macedonia, about the middle probably of the eighth century B.C., since he was brother to Ephion, the Argive tyrant. The legend tells, that he led into Macedonia a large force of Greeks and, following a flock of goats, entered the town of Edessa in the midst of a heavy storm of rain and a thick mist, unobserved by the inhabitants. Remembering the oracle which had desired him "to seek an empire by the guidance of goats," he fixed here the seat of government, and named the place Agge in commemoration of the miracle. Heracleus gives a different tradition of the origin of the dynasty, and his account seems to have been adopted by Thucydides, who speaks of Archelaus I. as the ninth king, and therefore does not reckon Caranus and the other two who come before Perdiccas I. in the lists of Dexippus and Eusebius. Müller thinks that the two traditions are substantially the same, the one in Herodotus being the rude native legend, while the other, of which Caranus is the hero, was the Argive story; and he further suggests that Kapawos is perhaps only another form of Kapavos. (Diod. Fragm. ix. p. 697, ed. Wess.; Hist. of Greece, who saw the disadvantages under which the Macedonians were labouring, would not have ventured upon an engagement, had not the courage of his soldiers and officers demanded it. The superior military skill of the Roman legions overcame all the difficulties, and a splendid victory was gained: the wife and daughters of Caractacus fell into the hands of the Romans, and his brothers surrendered. Caractacus himself sought the protection of Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him, and he was delivered up to the Romans, and carried to Rome, A.D. 51, after the war in Britain had lasted for nine years, as Tacitus says. The emperor Claudius wished to exhibit to the people this old and formidable foe in his humiliation, and ordered Caractacus and the members of his family, with their clients and ornaments, to be led in a sort of triumph before an assembly of the people and an array of soldiers. The emperor himself was present. The relatives of Caractacus walked by his side east down with grief, and entreated the mercy of the Romans; Caractacus alone did neither of these things, and when he approached the seat of the emperor, he stopped and addressed him in so noble a manner, that Claudius pardoned him and his friends. They appear, however, not to have returned to Britain, but to have spent the remainder of their life in Italy. (Tac. Ann. xii. 53-55; Hist. iii. 45; s. alx.) [L. S.]

CARANUS. 2. Mentioned by Justin (xi. 2) as a son of Philip and a half-brother of Alexander the Great. The latter suspected him of aiming at the throne, and put him to death soon after his accession, b.c. 336. 3. A Macedonian of the body called ἄσσιος or guards (comp. Polyb. v. 53, xxxi. 3), was one of the generals sent by Alexander against Satibarzanes when he had a second time excited Aria to revolt. Caranus and his colleagues were successful, and Satibarzanes was defeated and slain, in the winter of b.c. 330. (Arrian. Amb. iii. 23, 29; Curt. vi. 6. § 20, &c., vii. 3. § 2, Ptolemy, ad loc., vii. 4. § 32, &c.; comp. Dion. Dixv. viii. 61.) In b.c. 329, Caranus was appointed, together with Andronicus and Menedemus, under the command of the Lycian Pharnaces, to act against Spithames, the revolted satrap of Sogdiana. Their approach compelled him to raise the siege of Maracanda; but, in a battle which ensued, he defeated them with the help of a body of Scythian cavalry, and forced them to fall back on the river Polymenticus, the wooded banks of which promised shelter. The rashness however or cowardice of Caranus led him to attempt the passage of the river with the cavalry under his command, and the rest of the troops plunging in after him in haste and disorder, they were all destroyed by the enemy. (Arr. Amb. iv. 3, 5; comp. Curt. vii. 6. § 24, 7. § 31, &c.) [E.B.E.] CARANUS. M. AURELIUS VALERIUS. Maximianus Herculus having equipped a naval force at Boulogne for the purpose of repressing the outrages of the Franks, who cruising from place to place in their light sloops were devastating the coasts of Holland, Gaul, and Spain, gave the command of the armament to a certain Caranus, a man of humble extraction, born in Me¬nadia, a district between the Scheldt and Meuse, who had been bred a pilot and had distinguished himself as a soldier in the war against the Bagaudae. Caranus was by no means deficient in zeal and energy, but after a time his peculiar tactics and rapidly increasing wealth gave rise to a suspicion, probably not ill founded, that he permitted the pirates to commit their ravages unmolested, and then watching for their return, seized the ships laden with plunder and appropriated to his own use the greater portion of the spoils thus captured. Herculus accordingly gave orders for his death, but the execution of this mandate was anticipated by the vigilance of the intended victim, who having crossed the channel with the fleet, which was devoted to his interests, and having succeeded in gaining over the troops quartered in Britain, established himself in that island and assumed the title of Augustus. His subsequent measures are characterised by the greatest vigour and prudence. A number of new galleys was constructed with all speed and the officer of aitarmy to be sent against the tribes, who were carefully disciplined as sailors, and the usurper soon became master of all the western seas. After several ineffectual attempts to break his power, Diocletian and Maximianus found it necessary to acknowledge him as their colleague in the empire, an event commemorated by a medal bearing as a device three busts with appropriate emblems and the legend CARAVYNS. ET. FRATRES. s.vii, while on the reverse we read the words PAN. 2 A
On a second coin we find a laureled head with IMP. C. CARAVANTUS F. P. AVG., and on the reverse JOVL. EX. HERCIVL. CONS. AVG., indicating Jovius Diedelians and Hercules Maximianus, and to a third we are indebted for the name M. Aurelius Valerius, an appellation probably borrowed from his recently adopted brother. These transactions took place about A.D. 287, and for six years the third Augustus maintained his authority without dispute; but upon the elevation of Constantius the efforts of the new Caesar were at ones directed to the recovery of Britain. Boulogne fell after a protracted siege, and Constantius was making active and extensive preparations for a descent upon the opposite coast, when Carausus was murdered by his chief officer, Allectus. This happened in 289. Such are the only facts known to us with regard to this remarkable man. Of his private character and domestic policy we are unable to speak, for the abusive epithets applied to him so liberally by the panegyrists indicate nothing except the feelings entertained at the imperial court, which could have been of no friendly description. (Eutrop. ix. 21; Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxxix., Epit. xxxix., who calls this emperor Charauidi; Oros. vii. 25; Panegyr. Vet. ii. 12, 131.)

CARAVA'NTIUS, the brother of Gentius, king of the Illyrians, against whom the praetor L. Anicius Gallus was sent in B.C. 168. Caravan-tius fell into the hands of Gallus, and with his brother Gentius and the rest of the royal family walked before the chariot of Gallus in his triumph in the following year. (Liv. xlv. 30, 32, xlv. 43.) CARBO, the name of a plebeian family of the Papius gens.

STEMMA CARBONUM.

1. C. Papius Carbo, Pr. B. c. 168.
2. C. Papius Carbo, Cons. ii. 129.
4. M. Papius Carbo.
5. P. Papius Carbo.

7. Cn. Papius Carbo, Cons. B. c. 85, 84, 82.

1. C. PAPIRIS CARBO, praetor in B. C. 168, when he obtained the province of Sardinia; but he appears not to have gone into his province, as the senate requested him to remain at Rome and there to exercise jurisdiction in cases between citizens and peregrini. (Liv. xlv. 17, xlv. 12.)

2. C. PAPIRIS CARBO, born about B.C. 164, a son of No. 1, and a contemporary and friend of the Gracchi; but though he apparently followed in the footsteps of Cn. Gracchus, yet his motives widely differed from those of his noble friend, and towards the end of his life he showed how little he had acted upon conviction or principle, by deserting his former friends and joining the ranks of their enemies. After the death of Tiberius Gracchus he was appointed his successor as tribune agrorum dividendorum, and shortly after, in B.C. 151, he was elected tribune of the same division, and, though in the third year of his tribuneship he brought forward two new laws: 1. That a person should be allowed to be re-elected to the tribuneship as often as might be thought advisable; this law, which was strenuously opposed by P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the younger, was supported by C. Gracchus; and 2. A tax tabellariae, which ordained that the people should in future vote by ballot in the enactment and repeal of laws. In his tribuneship he continued to hold the office of tribunus agrorum dividendorum. The difficulties connected with carrying out the division of land according to the Sempronian agrarian law created many disturbances at Rome, and Scipio Africanus, the champion of the aristocratic party, was found one morning dead in his bed. Among the various suspicions then afloat as to the cause of his death, one was that Carbo had murdered him, or at least had had a hand in the deed; and this report may not have been wholly without foundation, if we consider the character of Carbo. After his tribuneship, Carbo continued to act as the friend and supporter of the Gracchi. Upon the death of C. Gracchus, L. Opimius, his murderer, who was consul in B.C. 121, put to death a great number of the friends of the Gracchi: but at the expiration of his consulship he was accused of high treason by the tribune Q. Decius, and Carbo, who was now raised to the consulsip himself (b. c. 120), suddenly turned round, and not only undertook the defence of Opimius, but did not scruple to say, that the murder of C. Gracchus had been an act of perfect justice. This inconsistency drew upon him the contempt of both parties, so that, as Cicero says, even his return to the aristocratic party could not secure him their protection. The aristocracy could not forget that he was suspected of having murdered Scipio, and seem to have been waiting for an opportunity to crush him. In B.C. 119 the young orator L. Licinius Crassus brought a charge against him, the exact nature of which is not known, but as Carbo foresaw his condemnation, he put an end to his life by taking cantharides. Valerius Maximus (iii. 7. § 6) states, that he was sent into exile. Carbo was a man of great talents, and his oratorical powers are mentioned by Cicero with great praise, although he otherwise abominates the man. There can be no doubt that Carbo was a person of no principle, and that he attached himself to the party from which he hoped to derive most advantages. (Liv. Epit. 55, 61; Appian, B. C. i. 18, 20; Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. De Amici. 25, De Leg. iii. 16, Ad Fam. ix. 21, De Orat. ii. 2, 25, 39, 40, i. 10, ii. 7, 20, Brut. 27, 34, 43, Tuscull. i. 5; Tacit. Hist. 34.)

1. Cn. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, was consul in B. c. 113, together with C. Cornelius Metellus. He was according to Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 21) the father of Cn. Papirius Carbo, who was thrice consul [No. 7], whereas this latter is called by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 26) a brother of No. 6. This difficulty may be solved by supposing that our Cn. Papirius Carbo and C. Papirius Carbo [No. 2] were brothers, so that the word frater in Velleius is equivalent to frater patres or cousin. (Perizon. Animato. Hist. p. 96.) In his consulship the Cimbrians advanced from Gaul into Italy and Illyricum, and Carbo, who was sent against them, was put to flight with his whole army. He was killed the following year by M. Antonius Primus, not for what reason, and put an end to his own life by taking a solution of vitriol (statorium) as having violated the laws. (ad Fam. i. 3; Tacit. Ann. 25, De Amici. 60.)

2. C. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, is mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 21) as having fled from Sicily.

3. P. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, is likewise mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 21) as having been accused by Flaccus and condemned.

4. C. Papirius Carbo, with the surname Arvina, was a son of No. 2 (Cic. Brut. 52), and throughout his life a supporter of the aristocracy, whence Cicero calls him the only good citizen in the whole family. He was tribune of the people in B. c. 90, as we may infer from Cicero (Brut. 89), though some writers place his triennium a year earlier, and others a year later. In his tribunitianship Carbo and his colleague, M. Plautius Silvanus, carried a law (lex Plautia et Papiria), according to which a citizen of a federal state, who had his domicile in Italy at the time the law was passed, and had sent in his name to the praetor within sixty days after, should have the Roman franchise. Carbo distinguished himself greatly as an orator, and though according to Cicero he was wanting in acuteness, his speeches were always weighty and carried with them a high degree of authority. We still possess a fragment of one of his orations which he delivered in his tribunitianship, and which Orelli (Onom. Tull. ii. p. 440) erroneously attributes to his father. [No. 2.] In this fragment (Cic. Orat. 63) he approves of the death of M. Livius Drusus, who had been murdered the year before, B. c. 91. Cicero expressly states, that he was present when the oration was delivered, which shows incontrovertibly, that it cannot belong to C. Papirius Carbo, the father, who died long before Cicero was born. He was murdered in B. c. 82, in the curia Hostilia, by the praetor Brutus Damasippus [Brutus, No. 19], one of the leaders of the Marian party. (Cic. pro Arch. 4, Brut. 62, 90, Ad Fam. ix. 21, De Orat. iii. 3; Schol. Bobiens. p. 353, ed. Orelli; Vell. Pat. ii. 26; Appian, B. C. i. 88.)

5. P. Papirius Carbo, a son of No. 1, is mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. ix. 21) as having fled from Sicily.

Claudius Pulcher made a report to the senate about his seditious proceedings. (Cic. De Legg. iii. 19.) He was one of the leaders of the Marian party, and in B. c. 87, when C. Marius returned from Africa, he commanded one of the four armies with which Rome was blockaded. In B. c. 86, when L. Valerius Flaccus, the successor of Marius in his seventh consulship, was killed in Asia, Carbo was chosen by Cinna for his colleague in B. c. 85. These two consuls, who felt alarmed at the report of Sulla's return, sent persons into all parts of Italy to raise money, soldiers, and provisions, for the anticipated war, and they endeavoured to strengthen their party, especially by the new citizens, whose rights, they said, were in danger, and on whose behalf they pretended to exert themselves. The fleet also was restored to guard the coasts of Italy, and in short nothing was neglected to make a vigorous stand against Sulla. When the latter wrote to the senate from Greece, the senate endeavoured to stop the proceedings of the consuls until an answer from Sulla had arrived. The consuls declared themselves ready to go to Rome to hold the comitia for the elections. Legions upon legions were raised and transported across the Adriatic to oppose Sulla; but great numbers of the soldiers began to be discontented and refused to fight against their fellow-citizens. A mutiny broke out, and Cinna was murdered by his own soldiers. Carbo now returned to Italy with the troops which had already been carried across the Adriatic, but he did not venture to go to Rome, although the tribunes urged him to come, nor do declare that a successor to Cinna might be elected. At length, however, Carbo returned to Rome, but the attempts at holding the comitia were frustrated by prodigies, and Carbo remained sole consul for the rest of the year.

In B. c. 83, Sulla arrived in Italy. Carbo, who was now proconsul of Gaul, hastened to Rome, and there caused a decree to be made, which declared Metellus and all the senators who supported Sulla, to be enemies of the republic. About the same time the capital was burnt down, and there was some suspicion of Carbo and Sulla. While Sulla and his partizans were carrying on the war in various parts of Italy, Carbo was elected consul a third time for the year B. c. 82, together with C. Marius, the younger. Carbo's army was in Cisalpine Gaul, and in the spring of 82 bis legate, C. Carrinas, fought a severely contested battle with Metellus, and was put to flight. Carbo himself, however, pursued Metellus, and kept him in a position in which he was unable to do any thing; hearing of the misfortunes of his colleague Marius at Preneste, he led his troops back to Ariminum, whither he was followed by Pompey. In the mean time Metellus gained another victory over an army of Carbo. Sulla, after entering Rome and making some of the most necessary arrangements, marched out himself against Carbo. In an engagement on the river Gianis, several of the Spaniards, who had joined his army a little while before, deserted to Sulla, and Carbo, either to avenge himself on those who remained with him, or to set a fearful example, ordered all of them to be put to death. At length a great battle was fought at Clusium between Carbo and Sulla: it lasted for a whole day, but the victory was not decided. Pompey and Cassius were engaged against Carrinas in the neighbourhood of Spoleto, and when Carbo sent out an army to his relief, Sulla, who was informed of the route which they took, attacked it from an ambush and killed nearly 2000 men. Carrinas himself however escaped. Marcus, who was sent by Carbo to the relief of Preneste, was likewise attacked from an ambuscade by Pompey, and lost many of his men. His soldiers, who considered him to be the cause of their defeat, deserted him, with the exception of a few cohorts, with which he returned to Carbo. Shortly after Carbo and Norbanus made an attack upon the camp of Metellus near Faventia, but time and place were unfavourable to them, and they were defeated: about 10,000 of their men were slain, and 6000 deserted to Metellus, so that Carbo was obliged to withdraw to Arretium with about 1000 men.

The desertion and treachery in the party, which had hitherto supported the cause of Marius, increased every day: Norbanus despairing of success fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life soon afterwards; and when Carbo found that the relief of Preneste, whither he had sent two legions under Damasippus, was hopeless, he too resolved to quit Italy, although he had still large forces at his command, and his generals, Carrinas, Marcus, and Damasippus, were continuing the war in Italy. Carbo fled to Africa. After his party in Italy had been completely defeated, Pompey was sent against the remains of it in Sicily, whither Carbo then repaired. From thence he went to the island of Cosyra, where lie was taken prisoner by the emissaries of Pompey. His companions were put to death at once, but Carbo himself was brought in chains before Pompey at Lyibioum, and after a bitter inveigh against him, Pompey had him executed and sent his head to Sulla, b. c. 82. (Appian, B. C. i. 69—95; Liv. Epit. 79, 83, 89, 98; Pint. Sull. 25, ec. Pomp. 10, &c.; Cic. c. Ferr. i. 4, 13; Pseudo-Aeson. in Porr. p. 126, ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. i. x. 21; Eutrop. v. 6, 9; Oros. v. 20; Zonar. x. 1.)

It is often said that Carbo was the son of Rhocus, who is mentioned only by Cicero (ad Fam. i. x. 21), and is ironically called there a friend of Cicero. Who he was is unknown. [L. S.]

CARC'NUS, the father of Agathocles. [Aga-thoclers.]

CARCINUS (Kapivivos). 1. Suidas mentions three distinct poets of this name. The first he calls a native of Agrigentum in Sicily; the second an Athenian, and son of Theodectes or Xenoecles; and the third simply an Attic poet. The first of these poets is not mentioned any where else, and his existence is more than doubtful. The investigations of Meineke on the poets of the name Carcinus have shown incontrovertibly that we have to distinguish between two tragical poets of this name, both of whom were natives of Athens. The first, or elder one, who was a very skilful scenic dancer (Athen. i. p. 22), is occasionally alluded to by Aristophanes (Nub. 1263, Pax, 794, with the Schol.); but his dramas, of which no fragments have come down to us, seem to have perished at an early time.

The younger Carrinas was a son either of Theodectes or of Xenoecles; and if the latter statement be true, he is a grandson of Carcinus the elder. (Comp. Harpocrat. s. v. Kepiirvoic.) He is in all probability the same as the one who spent a great part of his life at the court of Dionysius II. in Syracuse. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 7.) This supposition agrees with the statement of Suidas, according to which Carcinus the son of Xenoecles lived about B. C. 380; for Dionysius was expelled from Syracuse in B. C. 356. (Comp. Diod. v. 5, where Xen¬"selaing is thinking of the fictitious Carcinus of Agrigentum.) The tragedies which are referred to are the ancients under the name of Carcinus, probably all belong to the younger Carrinas. Suidas attributes to him 160 tragedies, but we possess the titles and fragments of nine only and some fragments of uncertain dramas. The following titles are known: Alope (Aristot. Ethic. Neom. v. 7.), Achilles (Athen. v. p. 189), Thyestes (Aristot. Post. 10), Semele (Athen. xiii. p. 539), Agamemnon (Aristot. Post. 17), Medea (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23), Oedipus (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 15), Terus (Stobac. Sermon. ciii. 3), and Orestes. (Phot. Lex. p. 132.) As regards the character of the poems of Carcinus, it is usually inferred, from the phrase Kapirov tovjiara, used to designate obscure poetry (Phot. Lex. s. v.), and is also attested by other authorities (Athen. viii. p. 351), that the style of Carcinus was of a studied obscurity; though in the fragments extant we can scarcely perceive any trace of this obscurity, and their style bears a close resemblance to that of Euripides. (Michel., Hist. Crit. comm. Grece, p. 505.)

2. Of Naupactus, is mentioned by Pausanias (x. 38. § 6) among the cyclical poets; and Charon of Lampacus, before whose time Carrinas must have lived, attributed to him the epic poem Naarderca, which all others ascribed to a Milesian poet.

3. A Greek rhetorician, who is referred to by Alexander (De Fig. Dict.), but of whom nothing further is known. [L. S.]

CA'RCIUS, the commander of a portion of the fleet of Octavianus in the war against Sext. Pompeius, b. c. 38. (Appian, B. C. v. 111.) [L. S.]

CA'RD'EA, a Roman divinity presiding over the hings of doors (cardo). What Ov. (Fast. vi. 101, &c.) relates of Caron belongs to Cardianus, who is a son of Rhucus, and who is supposed to Cardca: the poet seems, in fact, in that passage to confound three distinct divinities—Carna, Carden, and Crane, the last of whom he declares to be merely an ancient form of Carnum. Caro was beloved by Janus, and after yielding to his embraces, the god rewarded her by giving her the protection of the hinges of doors, and the power of preventing evil demons from entering houses. She especially protected little children in their cradles against formidable night-birds, which witches used to metamorphose themselves into, and thus to attack children by night time, tearing them from their cradles and sucking the blood out of them. Cardenas exercised this power by means of white thorn and other magic substances, and is said to have done so first in the case of Procas, prince of Alba. (Tertull. de Cor. 13.) [L. S.]

CARDI'ANUS HIE'RO'NYMUS. [Hier-ony'mus.]

CARNES or CARRHE'NES, a general of the Parthians who was defeated in a battle with Gotarzes in a.d. 49. (Tha. Anu. xii. 13—14.) [L. S.]

D. CARFULE'NUS, called Careseulus by Appian, served under Julius Caesar in the Alexandrine war (b. c. 47), in which he is spoken of as a man of great military skill. (Hirt. B. Alex. 31.) He was tribune of the plebs at the time of Caesar's death (a. d. 44); and as he was a supporter of the aristocratic party, and an opponent of Antony, was excluded from the senate by the latter on the 28th of November. (Cic. Philipp. iii. 9.) [Tt. Canutius.] He took an active part in the war against Antony in the following year, and fell in the battle of Mutina, in which Antony was defeated. (Appian, B. C. iii. 66, &c.; Cic. ad Fam. x. 33, xv. 4.)
CARINUS.

CARIOUS. [Cariinns.]

CARIUS, M. Aurelius, the elder of the two sons of Carus. Upon the departure of his father for the Persian war (a. d. 282), he was appointed supreme governor of all the Western provinces, and received the titles of Caesar and Emperor. After the death of Carus in 283, he assumed the purple conjointly with his brother, and upon receiving intelligence of the untimely fate of Numerianus and the elevation of Diocletian to the throne by the army of Asia, he set forth in all haste from Gaul to encounter his rival. The opposing hosts met in Mœania, several engagements followed, and at length a decisive battle was fought near Margum, in which Carinus gained the victory, but, in the moment of triumph, was slain by some of his own officers, whose honour he had wounded in the course of his profligate indulgences. Historians agree in painting the character of this emperor in the darkest colours. When roused he was unquestionably not deficient in valour and military skill, as was proved by the vigour with which he repressed certain seditious movements in Gaul, and by the successful conduct of his last campaign. But during the greater part of his short career he abandoned himself to the gratification of the most brutal passions, and never scrupled at any act of oppression or cruelty. State affairs were totally neglected—the most upright of those by whom he was surrounded were banished or put to death, and the highest offices bestowed upon degraded ministers of his pleasures. Nine wives were wedded and repudiated in quick succession, while the decrepit monarch was callous to the feelings of his mistresses. Nine wives were wedded and repudiated in quick succession, while the decrepit monarch was callous to the feelings of his mistresses. Nine wives were total (Vopiscus ion to the day of the death of Carinus, Eckhel seems inclined to fix it at the close of the year 284, but it is generally referred to the May following. (Vopisc. Caria. ; Aurel. Vict. Caes. xxxviii. Epit. xxxviii.; Zonar. xii. 30; Eutrop. ix. 12.) [W. R.]

T. CARUSIUS, defeated the Astures in Spain, and took their chief town, Lancia, about b. c. 25; but in consequence of the cruelty and insolence of Carinianus, the Astures took up arms again in b. c. 22. (Florus, i. 12. § 55, &c.; Oros. vi. 21; Dion Cass. liii. 25, liv. 5.) There are several coins bearing the name of Carinus upon them, two specimens of which are given below. The former has on the obverse the head of a woman, and on the reverse a sphinx, with the inscription T. CARISIVS III. VIR: the latter has on the obverse the head of Augustus, with the inscription IMP. CESAR AVGVRST., and on the reverse the gate of a city, over which is inscribed IMIRITA, and round it the words P. CARISIVS LEG. PROP. There is nothing in the former coin except the praenomen Titus to identify it with the subject of this article; but the latter one would appear to have been struck by the conqueror of the Astures, and perhaps Dion Cassius has made a mistake in calling him Titus. The word IMIRITA, which is also written EMIRITA and IMIRITA on some of the coins, seems to refer to the fact mentioned by Dion Cassius (liii. 26), that after the conquest of the Cantabri and Astures, Augustus dismissed many of his soldiers who had served their time (emeriti), and assigned them a town in Lusitania, to which he gave the name of Augusta Emerita. (Eckhel, p. 162, &c.)

CARUSUS (Kâpors), the Carian, a surname of Zeus, under which he had a temple at Mylassa in Caria, which belonged to the Carians, Lydians, and Myrians in common, as they were believed to be brother nations. (Herod. i. 171, v. 66; Strab. xiv. p. 659.) In Thessaly and Boeotia, Zeus was likewise worshipped under this name. (Phot. Lex. a.)

CARMA'NOR (Kapudûw), a Cretan of Tarrha, father of Eubulus and Chrysosthemus. He was said to have received and purified Apollo and Artemis, after they had slain the monster Python, and it was in the house of Carmanor that Apollo formed his connexion with the nymph Aescallis. (Paus. ii. 7. § 30, 3. § 3, x. 16. § 2, 7. § 2; comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 1. § 5, 8. § 11.)

CARMA'NOR (Kâpdrn), a daughter of Eubulus, who became by Zeus the mother of Britonartia. (Paus. ii. 30. § 2.) Antoninus Liberalis (40) describes her as a grand-daughter of Agenor, and daughter of Phoebus. [L. S.]

CARMEN'TA, CARMENAE, CAR'MENTIS. [CARMENAE.]

CARNA, or CARNEA, a Roman divinity, whose name is probably connected with coro, flesh, for she was regarded as the protector of the physical well-being of man. It was especially the chief organs of the human body, without which man cannot exist, such as the heart, the lungs, and the liver, that were recommended to her protection. Junius Brutus, at the beginning of the commonwealth, was believed to have dedicated to her a sanctuary on the Caelian hill, and a festival day was celebrated to her on the first of June, which day was called fabarvae calendae, from beans (fabae) and bean being offered to her. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 12; Varro, ap. Numism. x. x. Mactare; Ovid, Fast. vi. 101, &c., who however confounds Caro Comata, and Caro Cornuta.) [L. S.]

CARNEADES. 1. The son of Epicurus or Philoëmus, was born at Cyrene about the year B.C. 213. He went early to Athens, and attended the lectures of the Stoics, and learnt there logic from Diogenes. His opinions, however, on philosophical subjects differed from those of his master, and he was fond of telling him, "if I reason right, I am satisfied; if wrong, give me the mima," which was the fee for the logic lectures. He was six years old when Chrysippus died, and never had any personal intercourse with him; but he deeply studied his works, and exerted all the energy of a very acute and original mind in his reputation. To this exercise he attributed his own eminence, and often repeated the words:

El μη γαρ ἐν Χρυσίππως, ἐκ δὲ ἐν ἰεν εὐδ.

He attached himself as a zealous partizan to the Academy, which had suffered severely from the attacks of the Stoics; and on the death of Hegesinus, he was chosen to preside at the meetings of Academy, and was the fourth in succession from Arcesilaus. His great eloquence and skill in argument revived the glory of his school; and, defending himself in the negative vacancy of asserting nothing (not even that nothing can be asserted), carried on a vigorous war against every position that had been maintained by other sects.

In the year B.C. 155, when he was fifty-eight years old, he was chosen with Diogenes the Stoic and Critolaus the Peripatetic to go as ambassador to Rome to deprecate the fine of 500 talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. During his stay at Rome, he attracted great notice from his eloquent declamations on philosophical subjects, and it was here that, in the presence of Cato the Elder, he delivered his famous orations on Justice. The first oration was in commendation of the virtue, and the next day the second was delivered, in which all the arguments of the first were answered, and justice was proved to be not a virtue, but a mere matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. The honest mind of Cato was shocked at this, and he moved the senate to send the philosopher home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demonizing doctrines.

Carneades lived twenty-seven years after this at Athens, and died at the advanced age of eighty-five, or (according to Cicero) 50, B.C. 129. He is described as a man of unwearied industry. He was so engrossed in his studies, that he let his hair and nails grow to an immoderate length, and was so absent at his own table (for he would never dine out), that his servant and concubine, Melissa, was constantly obliged to feed him. In his old age, he suffered from cataract in his eyes, which bore with great impatience, and was so little resigned to the decay of nature, that he used to ask angrily, if this was the way in which nature undid what she had done, and sometimes expressed a wish to poison himself.

Carneades left no writings, and all that is known of his lectures is derived from his intimate friend and pupil, Cleitomachus; but so true was he to his own principles of withholding assent, that Cleitomachus confesses he never could ascertain what his master really thought on any subject. He, however, appears to have defended atheism, and consistently enough to have denied that the world was the result of anything but chance. In ethics, which much particularly was the subject of his long and laborious study, he seems to have denied the conformity of the moral ideas with nature. This he particularly insisted on in the second oration on Justice, in which he manifestly wished to convey his own notions on the subject; and he there maintains that ideas of justice are not derived from nature, but that they are purely artificial for purposes of expediency.

All this, however, was nothing but the special application of his general theory, that man did not possess, and never could possess, any criterion of truth.

Carneades argued that, if there were a criterion, it must exist either in reason (νοησις), or sensation (αισθησις), or conception (φαντασια). But then reason itself depends on conception, and this again on sensation; and we have no means of judging whether our sensations are true or false, whether they correspond to the objects that produce them, or carry wrong impressions to the mind, producing false conceptions and ideas, and lending reason also into error. Therefore sensation, conception, and reason, are alike disqualified for being the criterion of truth.

But after all, man must live and act, and must have some rule of practical life; therefore, although it is impossible to pronounce anything as absolutely true, we may yet establish probabilities of various degrees. For, although we cannot say that any given conception or sensation is in itself true, yet some sensations appear to us more true than others, and we must be guided by that which seems the most true. Again, sensations are not single, but generally combined with others, which either confirm or contradict them; and the greater this combination the greater is the probability of that being true which the rest combine to confirm; and the case in which the greatest number of conceptions, each in themselves apparently most true, should combine to affirm that which also in itself appears most true, would present to Carneades the highest probability, and his nearest approach to truth.

But practical life needed no such rule as this, and it is difficult to conceive a system more barren of all help to man than that of Carneades. It is not, indeed, probable that he aspired to any such designs of benefiting mankind, or to anything beyond his own celebrity as an acute reasoner and an eloquent speaker. As such he represented the spirit of an age when philosophy was fast losing the earnest and serious spirit of the earlier schools, and was degenerating to mere purposes of rhetorical display. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 62—66; Orelli, Onom. Tull. ii. p. 180, &c., where are given all the passages of Cicero, in which Carneades is mentioned; Sextus Empiricus, Adv. Math. vii. 159, CARPINATIUS.

2. An Athenian philosopher and a disciple of Anaxagoras. (Suidas, s. v. Καρποδόνως.)

CARNEIUS (Κάρπειός), a surname of Apollo under which he was worshipped in various parts of Greece, especially in Peloponnesus, as at Sparta and Seycon, and also in Thera, Cynre, and Magna Graecia. (Paus. iii. 13, § 5, &c., ii. 10, § 2, i. 7; Pind. Ἀνθ. v. 106; Plut. Sall. 41; Paus. i. 24, § 5, iv. 31, § 1, 33, § 5.)

The origin of the name is explained in different ways. Some derived it from Carmus, an Achaean soothsayer, whose murder by Hippotes provoked Apollo to send a plague into the army of Hippotes while he was on his march to Peloponnesus. Apollo was afterwards propitiated by the introduction of the worship of Apollo Carneius. (Paus. iii. 13, § 3; Schol. ad Theocr. v. 83.) Others believed that Apollo was thus called from his favourite Carneius or Carneus, a son of Zeus and Europa, whom Leto and Apollo had brought up. (Paus. l.c.; Hesych. s. v. Καρπείων.)

Several other attempts to explain the name are given by Pausanias and the Scholion on Theocritus. It is evident, however, that the worship of the Carneian Apollo was very ancient, and was probably established in Peloponnesus even before the Doric conquest. Respecting the festival of the Carneia see Dict. of Ant. &c. v. Κάρπεια. [L. S.]

CARNEIUS (Κάρπειός), a Cynic philosopher, who is surmounted Cynulicus (Κύνουλικος), that is, the leader of dogs or Cynics, or, in other words, the leader and teacher of Cynic philosophers. He was a native of Megara, but nothing further is known of him. (Athen. iv. p. 156.) [L. S.]

CARPATHIUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης Καρπαθιός), a bishop of the island of Carpathos, of uncertain date. At the request of the monks of India he wrote to them a consolatory work in 100 chapters, entitled τα θεολογία και την Ιουδαϊκα προφητειας μεταφορὰς τοιν Μεγαλομελος. (Plut. Cod. 201.) This work is still extant, and a Latin translation of it by J. Pontanus is printed at the end of his "Divi tae Philippi Solitarii," Ingolstadt, 1654, 4to, and in the "Bibliotheca Patrum," xii. p. 535, &c., The Greek original, as well as some other ascetic works of his, are still extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. x. p. 738, &c., xi. p. 173.) [L. S.]

CARPATHIUS PHILO. [PHLO.]

CARPHYLLIDES (Καρφυλλίδης), a Greek poet, of whom there are extant two elegant epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 260, lx. 62.) The name of the author of the second epigram is sometimes written Carphyllides; but whether this is a mere mistake, or whether Carphyllides is a different person from Carphyllides, cannot be ascertained. [L. S.]

L. CARPINATIUS, the pro-magister or de-against the Morini and other tribes, and drove the Suevi across the Rhine back into Germany. For those exploits he was honoured with a triumph in 29. (Appian, B. C. iv. 83, v. 26, 112; Dion Cass. xlvii. 15, ii. 21, 22.)

3. CARRINAS, whom Cicero speaks of in B. C. 43, as an unpleasant person, who visited him in his Tusculum. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 33.)

4. CARRINAS SECUNDUS, a rhetorician of the time of Caligula, by whom he was expelled from Rome for slaving, by way of exercise, declined against tyrants and commerce. (Dion Cass. lix. 20; Juven. vii. 204.) He is identified as the Secundus Carrinas whom Nero, in B. C. 65, sent to Asia and Achaea to plunder those countries, and carry the statues of the gods from thence to Rome. (Tacit. Ann. xv. 45.) [L. S.]

CARSIGNATUS (Καρσιγνατός), a Galatian prince, who was at one time allied with Pharnaces. When the latter threatened to invade Galatia, and Carusignatus had in vain endeavoured to maintain peace, he and another Galatian, Gzeotorsia, marched against him, but the war was prevented by a Roman embassy. (Polyb. xxv. 4.) [L. S.]

CARSILEIUS, [Carfulknus.]

CARSIGNATUS (Καρσιγνατός), a friend of C. Cassius, who was with him in Syria in B. C. 43. (Cass. op. Cic. ad Fam. xi. 11.)

CARTHALO (Καρθάλαο). 1. A commander of the Carthaginian fleet in the first Punic war, who was sent by his colleague Adherbal, in B. C. 249, to burn the Roman fleet, which was riding at anchor off Lilybaeum. While Carthalo was engaged in this enterprise, Himilco, the governor of Lilybaeum, who perceived that the Roman army on land was anxious to afford their support to the fleet, sent out his mercenaries against the Roman troops, and Carthalo endeavoured to draw the Roman fleet into an engagement. The latter, however, withdrew to a town on the coast and prepared themselves for defence. Carthalo was repulsed with some loss, and after having taken a few transports, he retreated to the nearest river, and watched the Romans as they sailed away from the coast. When the consul L. Junius Pulius, on his return from Symecea, had doubled Pachynum, he ordered his fleet to sail towards Lilybaeum, not knowing what had happened to those whom he had sent before him. Carthalo informed of his approach, immediately sailed out against him, in order to meet him before he could join the other part of the fleet. Pulius fled for refuge to a rocky and dangerous part of the sea, where Carthalo did not venture to attack him; but he took his station at a place between the two Roman fleets to watch them and prevent their joining. Soon after a fearful storm arose which destroyed the whole of the Roman fleet, while the Carthaginians, who were better sailors, had sought a safe place of refuge before the storm broke out. (Polyb. i. 53, 54.)

2. The Carthaginian commander of the cavalry in the army of Hannibal. In B. C. 217, he fought against L. Hostilius Mancinus, in the neighbourhood of Caesilium, and put him to flight. The Carthaginian commander Mancinus, who was flying, was mortally wounded by a commotting band which had been sent out by the dictator, Q. Fabius, at last resolved to make a stand against the enemy, but nearly all of them were cut to pieces. This Carthalo is probably the noble Carthaginian of the same name, whom Hannibal, after the battle of Cannae, in B. C. 216, sent to Rome with ten of the Roman prisoners to negotiate the ransom of the prisoners, and to treat about peace. But when Carthalo approached Rome, a lictor was sent out to bid him quit the Roman territory before sunset. In B. C. 206, when Tarentum was re-conquered by the Romans, Carthalo was commander of the Carthaginian garrison there. He laid down his arms, and as he was going to the consul to sue for mercy, he was killed by a Roman soldier. (Liv. xxix. 15, 58, xxvii. 18; Appian, de Bell. Afr. 49; Dion Cass. li. 21.)

3. One of the two leaders of the popular party at Carthage after the close of the second Punic war. He held an office which Appian calls boecatharchus, and which seems to have been a sort of tribuniship; and while in his official capacity he was travelling through the country, he attacked some of the subjects of Mæsinius, who had pitched their tents on controveeted ground. He killed several of them, made some booty, and excited the Africans against the Numidians. These and other acts of hostility between the Carthaginians and Mæsinius called for the interference of the Romans. But whether the latter rose in self-defence or in hostile feeling, they allayed it. The result was an open war between the Carthaginians and Mæsinius. When at length the Romans began to make preparations for the third Punic war, the Carthaginians endeavoured to conciliate the Romans by condemning to death the authors of the war with Mæsinius; and Carthalo was accordingly executed. (Appian, de Bell. Pun. 63, 74.) [L. S.]

CARTYLIUS, an early Roman jurist, who probably lived not later than the time of Caligula, as in Dig. 26, tit. 5, s. 69, he is cited by Proculus, who adopts his opinion in the case in question in preference to that of Tretacatus. The case was this—Let A or B, whichever wishes, be my heir. They both wish. Cartilius says, Both take: Tretacatus, Neither. In Dig. 13, tit. 6, s. 5, § 13, he is cited by Ulpian. It was Ant. Augustinus who (Emend. 3, 9) first brought these passages into notice, and rescued the name of Cartilius from oblivion. In the former passage the Haloandrirne editions of the Digest have Carlinius, and, in the latter, an early corrector of the Florentine manuscript, not being familiar with the name Cartilius, enclosed it in brackets as a mark of condemnation.

The jurist Cartilius is evidently different from the Catilius, not Cartilius Severus, who was propositus Syriae, praefectus urbi, and great-grandfather of the emperor M. Antoninus. (Plin. Ep. i. 29; ii. 12; Spart. Hadr. 5, 15, 29; Capitol. Anton. Pius 2; M. Ant. 1; Dion Cass. ix. 21.) The name of this Cartilius appears in the Fasti, A. D. 121, as consul for the second time, three years after the death of Trajan. His first consulate does not appear in the Fasti, and therefore it may be inferred that he was consul suffectus. If the rescript of Trajan, cited Dig. 29, tit. 1, s. 24, were addressed, according to the Haloandrirne reading, to Catilius Severus, it is probably referable to the time of the proconsulate succeeding his first consulship. (Bertrandus, 2, 22, 1. Maininus, ii. p. 273—287.) [J. T. G.]

CARTIMANDUA, or CARTISMUNDUA, queen of the Brigantes in Britain, about A. D. 50, in which year she treacherously delivered up to the Romans Caractacus, who had come to seek her protection. By this act of treachery towards her own countrymen, she won the favour of the Romans, and increased her power. Hence, says Tacitus, arose wealth and luxury, and Cartimandua repudiated her own husband Venutius to share her bed and throne with Vellocatus, the arm-bearer of her husband. This threw her state into a civil war, a portion of her people supporting Venutius against the adulterer. Venutius collected an army of auxiliaries, defeated the Brigantes, and reduced Cartimandua to the last extremity. She solicited the aid of the Romans, who rescued her from her danger; but Venutius remained in possession of her kingdom, A.D. 69. (Tac. Ann. xii. 36, 40, Hist. iii. 45.) [L.S.]

CARVILIA GENn, plebeian, came into distinction during the Samnite wars. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was Sp. Carvilius in B.C. 293, who received the surname of Maximus, which was handed down as a regular family-name. For those whose cognomen is not mentioned, see Carvilius.

The following coin is referred to this gens, and the three names upon it. Car. Ovul. Ver., are those of three triumvirs of the mint.

CARVILIUS. 1. and 2. L. Carvilius and Sp. Carvilius, tribunes of the plebs B.C. 212, accused M. Postumius. [Postumius.] (Liv. xxv. 5.)

3. Sp. Carvilius, was sent by Cn. Sicinius to Rome in B.C. 171, when Perseus despatched an embassy to the senate. When the senate ordered the ambassadors to quit Italy within eleven days, Carvilius was appointed to keep watch over them, till they embarked on board their ships. (Liv. xiii. 36.)

4. C. Carvilius of Spoletium, negotiated on behalf of the Roman garrison the surrender of Uscana, a town of the Penestae, to Perseus in B.C. 169. (Liv. xiii. 18, 19.)

CARUS, a Roman poet, and a contemporary of Ovid, who appears to have written a poem on Hercules. (Ovid, Epist. ex Pont. iv. 16, 7.)

CARUS, M. Aurelius, according to Victor, whose account is confirmed by Sidonius Apollinaris and Zonaras, was a native of Narbonne in Gaul; but Vopiscus professes to be unable to speak with certainty either of his lineage or birth-place, and quotes the conflicting statements of older authorities, who variously represented that he was born at Milan; or in Illyria, of Carthaginian ancestors; or in the metropolis, of Illyrian parents. He himself undoubtedly stood high before his elevation to the throne: no credit is to be attached to the rumour that he was accessory to the death of his predecessor. The campaign which followed was most glorious for the Roman arms. The enemy, distracted by internal dissensions, were unable to oppose a vigorous resistance to the invaders. All Mesopotamia was quickly occupied; -Seleucia and Ctesiphon were forced to yield. But the career of Carus, who was preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris, was suddenly cut short, for he perished by disease, or treachery, or, as the ancient historians commonly report, by a stroke of lightning, towards the close of 263, after a reign of little more than sixteen months. The account of his death, transmitted by his secretary Junius Calphurnius to the prefect of the city, is not inconsistent with the supposition that we can scarcely avoid the surmise that his end was hastened by foul play, and suspicion has rested upon Arrius Aper, who was afterwards put to death by Diocletian on the charge of having murdered Numerianus.

According to the picture drawn by the Augustan historian, Carus held a middle rank between those preeminent in virtue or in vice, being neither very bad nor very good, but rather good than bad. His character undoubtedly stood high before his elevation to the throne: no credit is to be attached to the rumour that he was accessory to the death of his predecessor, Probus, whose murderers he sought out and punished with the sternest justice, and the short period of his sway was unstained by any great crime. But the atrocities of Carinus threw a shade over the memory of his father, whom men could not forgive for having bequeathed his power to such a son. (Vopisc. Carus; Aurel. Vict. Cae. xxviii. Epist. xxviii.; Zonar. xii. 30; Eutrop. ix. 12.) [W. R.]

CARUS, JULIUS, one of the murderers of T. Vinius when Galba was put to death in A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 42.)

CARUS, METIUS, one of the most infamous informers under Domitian. (Tac. Agric. 45; Juv. i. 35; Martial, xii. 33; Plin. Ep. i. 5, vii. 10, 27.)

CARUS, SEIUS, son of Pascianus, at one time prefect of the Praetorian guard, was put to death by Flaga-balus under the pretext that he had stirred up a mutiny among some of the soldiers quartered in the camp under the Alban Mount, but in reality because he was rich, elevated in station, and high in intellect. He was brought to trial in the palace and there executed, no one appearing to give evidence against him except his accuser the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxxix. 4.) [W. R.]
The foregoing coin of the Servilia gens belongs either to No. 2 or No. 3; it contains on the obverse the head of Neptune, and on the reverse a figure of Victory.

A. CASCELLIUS, an eminent Roman jurist, contemporary with Trebatius, whom he exceeded in eloquence, though Trebatius surpassed him in legal skill. Their contemporary, Offilius, the disciple of Servius Sulpicius, was more learned than either. Cascellius, according to Pliny the Elder (H. N. viii. 40), was the disciple of one Volcatius, who, on a certain occasion, was saved by a dog from the attack of robbers. Pomponius (Dig. 1, tit. 2, s. 2, § 43), according to the Florentine manuscript, writes thus—"Fuit Cascellius, Mucius, Volusii audito: denique in illius honore testamento P. Mucium nepotem e jam reluit heredem.

This may be understood to mean that, at the end of a long life, Cascellius made his grandson of his fellow-pupil his heir, but a man is more likely to honour his preceptor than his fellow-pupil, and, on this construction, the Latinity is harsh, both in the use of the singular for the plural, and in the reference of the word illius to the former of the two names, Mucius and Volusius, which are connected merely by collocation. Hence the conjectural reading of Baldinus adopted by Bertrand (Cascellius, 2, 10), viz. "Fuit Cascellius Mucii et Volcatii auditor," has gained the approbation of many critics.

Cascellius was a man of stern republican principles: of Caesar's proceedings he spoke with the utmost freedom. Neither hope nor fear could induce him, b. c. 41, to compose legal forms for the donations of the triumvirs, the fruits of their prescriptions, which he looked upon as wholly irregular and illegal. His independence and liberty of speech he ascribed to two things, which most men regarded as misfortunes, old age and childlessness. In offices of honour, he never advanced beyond the first step, the quaestorship, though he survived to the reign of Augustus, who offered him the consulship, which he declined. (Val. Max. vi. 2, § 12, Dig. l. c.)

Cascellius is frequently quoted at second hand in the Digest, especially by Javolenus. In Dig. 35, tit. 1, s. 40, s. 1, and 22, s. 100, § 1, we find him differing from Offilius. In the latter passage, the case proposed was this:—A man leaves by will two specific marble statues, and all his marble. Do his other marble statues pass? Cascellius thought not, and Labeo agreed with him, in opposition to Offilius and Trebatius.

In Dig. 38, tit. 5, s. 17, § 5, the following words occur in a quotation from Ulpian, "Labeo quidem posteriorum scriptor, nec Aristot., vel Aulinus, utoque probabile, notat." For Aulinus here it is not unlikely that Paulus ought to be read, for Cascellius is no where else in the Digest called Aulinus simply. Moreover, he was of older standing than Labeo, and the only work of Cascellius extant in the time of Pomponius (who was anterior to Ulpian), was a book of legal bons mots (beneficiorum liber).

In conversation, Cascellius was graceful, amusing, and witty. Several of his good sayings are preserved. When a client, wishing to sever a partnership in a ship, said to him, "Nayem dividere volo," his answer was, "You will destroy your ship." He probably remembered the story of the analogous quibble on the words of a treaty, which, to the disgrace of the Romans, deprived Antiochus the Great of his whole fleet. Vatinius, an unpopular personage, for whom it is to be presumed that Cassellius had no great liking, had been pelted with stones at a gladiatorial show, and consequently got a clause inserted in the edict of the aediles, "ne quis in arenam nisi pomum mitteret." About this time, the question was put to Cascellius, whether a nux pinea were a pomum; it being a legal doubt whether fruits with hard as well as with soft external rind, were included in the term. "Si in Vatiniun missarum as, pomum est." (Quintil. vi. 3; Macrobr. Soterai. i. 6.)

Horace (Ars Poet. 371, 372) pays a compliment to the established legal reputation of Cassellius—

"—nec sit quantus Cassellianus Aulus, Et tamen in proteo est."

The old scholar on this passage remarks, that Gellius mentions Cassellius with praise, but this seems to be a mistake, unless the lost portions of Gellius should bear out the scholar's assertion. He probably confounds the jurist with Cassellius Vindianus the grammarian, who is frequently cited by Gellius. The name of the jurist is often corruptly spelt Cassellius, Cesellius, &c.

When an interdictum recuperandae possessionis was followed by an action on a sponsio, if the claimant were successful in recovering on the sponsio, he was entitled as a consequence to the restitution of possession by what was called the Cassellianum or securitium judicium. (Odtius, iv. 161, 162.) It is likely that this judicium was devised by A. Cassellius.

Civilis (pro Aulo, 20) and Val. Maximus (viii. 12, 14), among others, quote that Q. Mucius Scaevola, the nagur, a most accomplished lawyer, when he was consulted concerning jus praedietorium, used to refer his clients to Furius and Cassellius, who, being themselves praedietores, and consequently personally interested in that part of the law, had made it their peculiar study. The quotations from our Cassellius in the Digest, do not point to praedietoriana law, and a consideration of dates goes far to prove, that Cassellius praedietor, was not our jurist, but perhaps his father. The old nagur died when Cicero was very young, but our Cassellius might still have been his disciple.

[CASPERIUS.] A centurion who served under the praefect Caelius Pollio, and commanded the garrison of a stronghold called Gornae in A. D. 62, during a war between the Armenians and Hiberians. Caelius Pollio acted the part of a traitor towards the Armenians, but found an honest opponent in Casperius, who endeavoured, though in vain, to induce the Hiberians to raise the siege. In A. D. 62 we find him still serving as centurion in Armenia, and Corbulo sent him as ambassador to Vologeses to expostulate with him respecting his conduct. (Tac. Ann. xii. 45, xv. 5.)

[CASSANDA'NE (Kassandhia), a Persian lady of the family of the Achemenides, daughter of Pharamses, who married Cyrus the Great, and became queen by him. She was taken captive and died before her husband, who much lamented her loss, and ordered a general mourning in her honour. (Herod. i. 1, iii. 2.)

[CASSANDER (Kassander)]] 1. King of Macedonia, and son of Antipater, was 85 years old before his father's death, if we may trust an incidental notice to that effect in Athenaeus, and must, therefore, have been born in or before n. c. 354. (Athen. i. p. 16, a.; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexanders, p. 256.) His first appearance in history is on the occasion of his being sent from Macedonia to Alexander, then in Babylon, to defend his father against his accusers here, according to Plutarch (Alex. 74), Cassander was so struck by the sight, to him new, of the Persian ceremonial of prostration, that he could not restrain his laughter, and the king, incensed at his rudeness, is said to have seized him by the hair and dashed his head against the wall. Allowing for some exaggeration in this story, it is certain that he met with some treatment from Alexander which left on his mind an indelible impression of terror and hatred,—a feeling which perhaps nearly as much as ambition urged him afterwards to the destruction of the royal family. The story which ascribed Alexander's death to poison [see pp. 201, 320], spoke also of Cassander as the person who brought the deadly water to Babylon. With respect to the satrapy of Caria, which is said by Dio, Justin, and Curtius to have been given to Cassander among the arrangements of n. c. 323, the confusion between the names Cassander and Asander is pointed out in p. 379, a. (Comp. Dio. xviii. 68.) On Polyperchon's being appointed to succeed Antipater in the regency, Cassander was confirmed in the secondary dignity of Chilarch (see Wess. ad Dion. xviii. 46; Philolog. Mus. i. 380)—an office which had previously been conferred on him by his father, that he might serve as a check on Antigonus, when (n. c. 321) the latter was entrusted by Antipater with the command of the forces against Eumenes. Being, however, dissatisfied with this arrangement, he strengthened himself by an alliance with Ptolemy Lagi and Antigonus, and entered into war with Polyperchon. For the operations of the contend¬ing parties at Athens in n. c. 316, see p. 125, b. The failure of Polyperchon at Megalopolis, in the same year, had the effect of bringing over most of the Greek states to Cassander, and Athens also surrendered to him, on condition that she should keep her city, territory, revenues, and ships, only continuing the ally of the conqueror, who should be allowed to retain Mancyia till the end of the war. He at the same time settled the Athenian constitution by establishing 10 minae (half the sum that had been appointed by Antipater) as the qualification for the full rights of citizenship (see Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, i. 7, iv. 3); and the union of clemency and energy which his general conduct exhibited, is said to have procured him many adherents. While, however, he was success¬fully advancing his cause in the south, intelligence reached him that Eurydice and her husband Archelaus had fallen victims to the vengeance of Olympias, who had also murdered Cassander's brother Nicomen, together with 100 of his principal friends, and had even torn from its tomb the corpse of Iollas, another brother of his, by whom she asserted (the story being now probably propagated for the first time), that Alexander had been poisoned. Cassander immediately rais’d the siege of Tegae, in which he was engaged, and hastened with all speed into Macedon, though he thereby left the Peloponnesian open to Polycperchon's son [ALEXANDER], and cutting off from Olympia all hope of aid from Polycperchon and Aeacides [CALAS, ATARRHIAS], besieged her in Pydna throughout the winter of B.C. 317. In the spring of the ensuing year she was obliged to surrender, and Cassander shortly after caused her to be put to death in defiance of his positive agreement. The way now seemed open to him to the throne of Macedon, and in furtherance of the attainment of this object of his ambition, he placed Roxana and her young son, Alexander Aegus, upon the throne at Amphipolis, not thinking it safe as yet to murder them, and ordered that they should no longer be treated as royal persons. He also connected himself with the regal family by a marriage with Thessalonica, half-sister to Alexander the Great, in whose honour he founded, probably in 316, the town which bore her name; and to the same restoration of Thebes in the 20th year after its destruction by Alexander (B.C. 315), a measure highly popular with the Greeks, and not least so at Athens, besides being a mode of venting his hatred against Alexander's memory. (Comp. Paus. ix. 7; Plut. Pol. Ptrac. c. 17; for the date see also Ptol. op. Athen. i. p. 19, c; Csasaub. ad loc.; Clinton, Fathi, ii. p. 174.) Thence advancing into the Peloponnesus, he retrock most of the towns which the son of Polycperchon had gained in his absence; and soon after he succeeds also in attaching Polycperchon himself and Alexander to his cause, and withdrawing them from that of Antigonus, against whom a strong coalition had been formed. [See pp. 126, a, 167, b.] But in B.C. 313, Antigonus contrived, by holding out to them the prospects of independence, to detach from Cassander all the Greek cities where he had garrisons, except Corinth and Sicyon, in which Polycperchon and Cratapsis (Alexander’s widow) still maintained their ground; and in the further operations of the war Cassander’s cause continued to decline till the hollow peace of 311, by one of the terms of which he was to retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Aegus should be grown to manhood, while it was likewise provided that all Greek states should be independent. In the same year Cassander made one more step towards the throne, by the murder of the young king and his mother Roxana. In B.C. 310, the war was renewed, and Polycperchon, who once more appears in opposition to Cassander, advanced against him with Hercules, the son of Alexander the Great and Barsine, whom, acting probably under instructions from Antigonus, he had put forward as a claimant to the crown; but being a man apparently with all the unscrupulous cruelty of Cassander without his talent and decision, he was bribed by the latter, who promised him among other things the government of the Peloponnesus, to murder the young prince and his mother, B.C. 309. [BASINE, No. 1.] At this time the only places held by Cassander in Greece were Athens, Corinth, and Sicyon, the two latter of which were betrayed to Demetrius by Cratespils, in B.C. 308; and in 307, Athens was recovered by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, from Demetrias the Pleistarchus, who had held it for Cassander from B.C. 318, with the specious title of “Guardian” (πεισμαργες). In B.C. 306, when Antigonus, Lysimachus, and Demetrius took the name of king, Cassander was saluted with the same title by his subjects, though according to Plutarch (Demetr. 18) he did not assume it himself in his letters. During the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius in 305, Cassander sent supplies to the besieged, and took advantage of Demetrius being thus employed to assail again the Greek cities, occupying Corinth with a garrison under Cassander’s brother Pleistarchus. But, in B.C. 304, Demetrius having concluded a peace with the Rhodians, obliged him to raise the siege and to retreat to the north, whither, having made himself master of southern Greece, he advanced against him. Cassander first endeavoured to obtain peace by an application to Antigonus, and then falling in this, he induced Lysimachus to effect a division by carrying the war into Asia against Antigonus, and sent also to Seleucus and Demetrius for assistance. Meanwhile Demetrius, with far superior forces remained unaccountably inactive in Thessaly, till, being summoned to his father’s aid, he concluded a hostile treaty with Cassander, providing nominally for the independence of all Greek cities, and passed into Asia, B.C. 302. In the next year, 301, the decisive battle of Ipsus, in which Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated and the former slain, removed Cassander from his chief cause of apprehension. After the battle, the four kings (Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus) divided among them the dominions of Antigonus as well as what they already possessed; and in this division Macedonia and Greece were assigned to Cassander. (Comp. Daniel viii.; Polyb. v. 67; App. Bel. Syr. p. 125, ad fin.) To B.C. 299 or 298, we must refer Cassander’s invasion of Corcyra, which he recouped himself free since its deliverance by Demetrius, B.C. 303, from the Spartan adventurer Cleonymus (comp. Liv. x. 2; Dio. xx. 105), which may perhaps have been ceded to Cassander as a set-off against Demetrius’ occupation of Cilicia, from which he had driven Cassander’s brother Pleistarchus. The island, however, was delivered by Agathocles of Syracuse, who compelled Cassander to withdraw from it. In B.C. 296, we find him carrying on his intrigues in southern Greece, and assailing Athens and Elatea in Phocis, which were successfully defended by Olympiodorus, the Athenian, with assistance from the Delphi. Not being able therefore to succeed by force of arms, Cassander encouraged Laches to seize the tyranny of Athens, whence however Demetrius expelled him; and Cassander’s plans were cut short by his death, which was caused by dropsy in the autumn of B.C. 297, as Drayton places it; Clinton refers it to 296. (Dio, xliii.—xx. xxi. Exc. 2; Plut. Phocam, Tyrrius, Demetrius;
CASSANDRA.

Just. xii.-xv.; Arrian, Abh. vii. 27; Paus. ii. 25, 26, x. 34; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alexanders; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vii.) It will have appeared from the above account that there was no act, however cruel and atrocious, from which Cassandra ever shrunk, where the object he had in view required it; and yet this man of blood, this ruthless and unscrupulous murderer, was at the same time a man of refinement and of cultivated literary tastes,—one who could feel the beauties of Homer, and who knew his poems by heart. (Caryst. Ap. Athen. xiv. p. 620, b.) For a sketch of his character, eloquently drawn, see Droysen, pp. 256, 257. The head on the obverse of the annexed coin of Cassander is that of Hercules.

2. A Corinthian, who with his countryman Agathynus, having unscrupulously entered the port of Leucas with four ships of Tyrian's squadron, was treacherously seized there by the Illyrians, and sent to Scenulidae, the Illyrian King. The latter had thought himself wronged by Philip V. of Macedon, in not receiving the full sum agreed on for his services in the social war, and had sent out 15 cutters to pay himself by piracy, b. c. 218. (Polyb. x. 32.)

3. An Aeginetan, who, at the Achaean congress, held at Megalopolis, n. c. 186, followed Apollonides in dissuading the assembly from accepting the 120 talents proffered them as a gift by King Eumenes II. (See p. 237, a.) He reminded the Achaeans, that the Aeginetans, in consequence of their adherence to the league, had been conquered and enslaved by P. Sulpicius (B. c. 208), and that their island, having been given up by Rome to the Aetolians, had been sold by them to Attalus, the father of Eumenes. He called on Eumenes to shew his good-will to the Achaeans, and to pay him 30 talents as a present of himself by piracy. (Comp. Liv. xxvii. 33, 8.)

4. An officer in the service of Philip V. of Macedon, whom the king, exasperated by the Romans calling on him to give up Aenus and Marnoeia in Thrace, employed as his chief instrument in the cruel massacre of the Maronites, b. c. 185. Being desired by the Romans to send Cassander to Rome for examination before the senate on the subject of the massacre, he caused him to be poisoned on his way, in Epirus, to prevent any untoward revelations. (Polyb. xii. 13, 14; Liv. xxxiv. 27, 34.)

CASSANDRA (Κασσάνδρα), also called Alexandra (Paus. iii. 19, § 5, 26, § 3), was the fairest among the daughters of Priam and Hecabe. There are two points in her story which have furnished the ancient poets with ample materials to dilate upon. The first is her prophetic power, concerning which we have the following traditions: Cassandra and Hellenus, when yet children, were left by their parents in the sanctuary of the Thyrabraean Apollo. The next morning they were found en¬

CASSIA GENs. 621
The family in the time of the republic bears the name of Longinius; the other cognomina during that time are Hamina, Parmensis, Ravilla, Sabaco, Varus, Vischerinus. Under the empire, the alphabetical list is given below. The few persons of this gens mentioned without any cognomen are given under CASSIUS.

CASSIUS (Kassianos), a Christian writer who was, according to Clemens of Alexandria (Ep. Hieron. Catul. Script. Ecdcs. 38), the author of a chronological work (Chronoupolos). He may be the same as the Julius Cassianus from whose work "De Continencia" a fragment is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Ecdcs. vi. 13), and is perhaps also no other person than the Cassianus whose first book of a work entitled Εὐγενεία is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 136.).

CASSIUS, otherwise called JOANNES MASSILIENSIS and JOANNES EREMITA, is celebrated in the history of the Christian church as the champion of SemiPelagianism, as one of the first founders of monastic fraternities in Western Europe, and as the great lawyer by whose codes such societies were long regulated. The date of his birth cannot be determined with certainty, although a. d. 360 must be a close approximation, and the place is still more doubtful. Some have fixed upon the shores of the Euxine, others upon Syria, others upon the South of France, and all alike appeal for confirmation of their views to particular expressions in his works, and to the general character of his phraseology. Without pretending to decide the question, it seems on the whole most probable that he was a native of the East. At a very early age he became an inmate of the monastery of Bethlehem, where he received the first elements of religious instruction, and formed with a monk named Germanus an intimacy which exercised a powerful influence over his future career. In the year 390, accompanied by his friend, he travelled into Egypt, and after having passed seven years among the Ascetics who swarmed in the deserts near the Nile, conforming to all their habits and pursuits, and exercising himself in the acts of devotion and prayer, he turned for a short period to Bethlehem, but very soon again retired to consort with the eremites of the Thebaid. In 403 he repaired to Constantinople, attracted by the fame of Chrysostom, and received ordination as deacon from his hands. When that great prelate was driven by persecution from his see, Cassianus and Germanus were employed by the friends of the patriarch to lay a statement of the case before Pope Innocent I., and since Pelagius is known to have been at Rome about this period, it is highly probable that some personal intercourse may have taken place between him and his future opponent. From this time there is a blank in the history of Cassianus until the year 415, when we find him established as a presbyter at Marseilles, where he passed the remainder of his life in godly labours, having founded a convent for nuns and the celebrated abbey of St. Victor, which while under his control is said to have numbered five thousand inmates. These two establishments long preserved a high reputation, and served as models for many similar institutions in Gaul and Spain. The exact year of his death is not known, but the event must be placed after 435, at least the chronicle of Prosper represents him as being alive at that epoch. He was eventually canonized as a saint, and a great religious festival used to be celebrated in honour of him at Marseilles on the 25th of July.

The writings of Cassianus now extant are—

1. De Institutio Coenobiorum Libri XII., composed before the year 418, and the request of Castor [Castor], bishop of Apt, who was desirous of obtaining accurate information with regard to the rules by which the cloisters in the East were governed. This work is divided into two distinct parts. The first four books relate exclusively to the mode of life, discipline, and method of performing sacred offices, pursued in various monasteries; the remainder contains a series of discourses upon the eight great sins into which mankind in general and monks in particular are especially liable to fall, such as gluttony, pride, passion, and the like. Hence Photius (Cod. exvii.) quotes these two sections as two separate treatises, and this arrangement appears to have been adopted to a certain extent by the author himself. (See Praef. Collatt. and Collat. xx. 1.) The subdivision of the first part into two, proposed by Gennadius, is unnecessary and perplexing.

2. "Collationes Patrum XXIV.," twenty-four sacred dialogues between Cassianus, Germanus, and Egyptian monks, in which are developed the spirit and object of the monastic life, the end sought by the external observances previously described. They were composed at different periods between 419 and 427. The first ten are inscribed to Leontius, bishop of Frigandus, and to Halcarius, abbot of St. Castor, the following seven to Honomatus, afterwards bishop of Arles, the last seven to Jovianus, Minervius, and other monks. In the course of these conversations, especially in the 13th, we find an exposition of the peculiar views of Cassianus on certain points of dogmatic theology, connected more especially with original sin, predestination, free-will, and grace, constituting the system which has been termed SemiPelagianism because it steered a middle course between the extreme positions occupied by St. Augustin and Pelagius; for while the former maintained that man was by nature good, incapable of error and incapable of emerging from his lost state by his own efforts, the latter held, that the new-born infant was in the state of Adam before the fall, hence morally pure and capable in himself of selecting between virtue and vice; while Cassianus, rejecting the views of both, asserted, that the natural man was neither morally dead nor morally sound, but morally sick, and therefore stood in need of medical aid, that aid being the Grace of God. Moreover, according to his doctrine, it is necessary for man of his own free will to seek this aid in order to be made whole, but at the same time the free-will of man cannot set limits to the Grace of God which may be exerted on behalf of those who seek it not, as in the case of the Apostle Paul and others. Cassianus certainly rejected absolute predestination and the limitation of justification to the elect, but his ideas upon these topics are not very clearly expressed. Those who desire full information with regard to SemiPelagianism will find them fully developed in the works enumerated at the end of this article.

3. "De Incarnatione Christi Libri VII.," a controversial tract in confutation of the Nestorian heresy, drawn up about 430 at the request of Leo, at that time archdeacon and afterwards bishop of Rome.

The following essays have been ascribed erroneously, or at all events upon insufficient evidence, to Cassianus: — "De spirituali Medicina Monachi seu Doxis medica ad eximianudos Animi Affectus;" "Theologia Confessio et De Conflictu Neutris;" "Vita S. Victoris Martyris," etc. There are no grounds for believing that he wrote, as some have asserted, a Regula Monastica, now lost.

The attentive reader of this father will soon perceive that he was thoroughly engrossed with his subject, and paid so little attention to the graces of style, that his composition is often careless and unpremeditated. At the same time he disdained, although it bears both in words and in construction a bar-

The earliest edition of the collected works of Cassianus is that of Basle, 1559, 8vo., in a volume containing also Joannes Damascenus. It was republished at Basle in 1569 and 1575. These were followed by the edition of Antwerp, 1578, 8vo. The most complete and best edition is that printed at Frankfort, 1722, fol., with the commentaries and preliminary dissertations of the Benedictine Gazetus (Gazet), and reprinted at Leipzig in 1733, fol. The edition superintended by Gazet himself was published at Douay in 1618, 3 vols. fol., and again in an enlarged form at Arras in 1628.

The Institutions appeared at Basle in 1485 and 1497, fol., and at Leyden, 1516, fol. The existence of the Venice edition of 1481, mentioned by Fricrius, is doubtful.

The Institutions and Conlallations appeared at Venice, 1491, fol.; at Bologna, 1521, 8vo.; at Leyden, 1525, 8vo., at Rome, 1583 and 1611, 8vo.

The De Incarnatione, first published separately at Basle in 1534, and reprinted at Paris in 1545 and 1569, is included in Simler's "Scriptores veteres Latini de una Persona et duabus Naturis Christi," Zurich, 1752, fol.

There is a translation of the Institutions into Italian by Bufl, a monk of Camaldoli, Venice, 1563, 4to., of the Conlallations into French by De Salgny, Paris, 1683, 8vo., and of the Institutions, also by De Salgny, Paris, 1687, 8vo.

Wignall, On the Life of Cassianus Bassus, in the Encyclopaedia of Erard and Gruter. See also Jecken, Historia Seminopelanismi antiquissima, Gottingae, 1826. CASSIODORUS.

cap. v. 26 (Lipa. 1792); Dnchr. Geschichte der Romischen Literatur, Suppl. Band, ii. Abtheil. p. 328. [W. R.]

CASSIA'NUS BASSUS. [Bassus.]

CASSIOPEIA or CASSIOPEIA (Kassidze or Kassidze), the wife of Cepheus in Aethiopia, and mother of Andromeda, whose beauty she extolled above that of the Nereids. This pride became the cause of her misfortunes, for Poseidon sent a monster into the country which ravaged the land, and to which Andromeda was to be sacrificed. But Perseus saved her life. (Hygin. Fab. 64; comp. ANDROMEDA.) According to other accounts Cassiopsea boasted that she herself surpassed the Nereids in beauty, and Andromeda in beauty and grace, presented, when placed among the stars, as turning backwards. (Aar. Phara. 187, &c.; Manil. Astron. i. 355.)

CASSIODORUS, MAGNUS AURELIUS, or CASSIODORIUS, for the MSS. vary between these two forms of the name, although the former has been generally adopted, was born about a. d. 468, at Scevcaulce (Squilace), in the country of the Bruttii, of an ancient, honourable, and wealthy Roman family. His father was at one period secretary to Valentinian the Third, but retired from public life upon the death of that prince and the ascension of Theodosius. Cassiodorus was soon discovered to be a boy of high promise, and his talents were cultivated with anxious assiduity and care. At a very early age his genius, accomplishments, and multifarious learning, attracted the attention and commanded the respect of the first barbarian king of Italy, by whom he was chosen Comes rerum privatarum and eventually Comes sacrorum togitiium, an appointment which placed him at the head of financial affairs. But when Odoncer after a succession of defeats was shut up in Ravenna by Theodoric, Cassiodorus withdrew to his estates in the south, and hastened to recommend himself to the conqueror by persuading his countrymen and the Sicilians to submit without resistance. Hence, after the murder of his former patron, he was received with the greatest distinction by the new sovereign, was nominated to all the highest offices of state in succession, and under a variety of different titles (for the parade and formality of the old court were studiously maintained), regulated for a long series of years the administration of the Ostrogothic power with singular ability, discretion, and success, possessing at once the full confidence of his master and the affection of the people. Perceiving, however, that Theodoric, enfeebled by age, was beginning to yield to the selfish suggestions of evil counsellors and to indulge in cruelty towards his Italian subjects, Cassiodorus wisely resolved to seek shelter from the approaching storm, and, resigning all his honours, betook himself to the country in 524, thus avoiding the wretched fate of Boethius and Symmachus. Recalled after the death of Theodoric, he resumed his position, and continued to discharge the duties of chief minister under Ama-losauntion, Athalaric, Theodatus, and Vitiges, exerting all his energies to prop their tottering dominion. But when the triumph of Belisarius and the downfall of the Ostrogoths was no longer doubtful, being now 70 years old, he once more retired to his native province, and having founded the monastery of Viviers (Coenobium Vivarienses, Castellenses), passed the remainder of his life, which was prolonged until he had nearly completed a century, in the seclusion of the cloister. Here his activity of mind was no less conspicuous than when engaged in the stirring business of the world, and his efforts were directed towards the accomplishment of designs not less important. The great object which he kept steadily in view and prosecuted with infinite labour and unflagging zeal, was to elevate the standard of education among ecclesiastics by inducing them to study the models of classical antiquity, and to extend their knowledge of general literature and science. To accomplish this he formed a library, disbursed large sums in the purchase of MSS., encouraged the monks to copy these with care, and devoted a great portion of his time to labour of this description and to the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the seven liberal arts, and divinity, which have rendered him not less celebrated as an author and a man of learning than as a politician and a statesman. The leisure hours which remained to him were filled with the composition of philosophical toys, such as sun-dials, water-clocks, everlasting lamps, and the like. The benefit derived from his precepts and example was by no means confined to the establishment over which he presided, nor to the epoch when he flourished. The same system, the advantages of which were soon perceived and appreciated, was gradually introduced into similar institutions, the transcription of ancient works became one of the regular and stated occupations of the monastic life, and thus, in all probability, we are indirectly indebted to Cassiodorus for the preservation of a large proportion of the most precious relics of classical genius. The following is a list of all the writings of Cassiodorus with which we are acquainted:

1. "Variarum (Epistolarum) Libri XII.," an assemblage of state papers drawn up by Cassiodorus in accordance with the instructions of the sovereigns whom he served. In the first ten books the author always speaks in the person of the ruler for the time being; in the last two, in his own. The first five contain the ordinances of Theodoric, the sixth and seventh regulations (formule) with regard to the chief officers of the kingdom, the eighth, ninth, and tenth, the decrees promulgated by the imperial governors; the eleventh and twelfth the edicts published by Cassiodorus himself during the years 534—538, when prefect of the praetorium. This collection is of the greatest historical importance, being our chief and most trustworthy source of information in regard to everything connected with the constitution and internal discipline of the Ostrogothic dominion in Italy. We must not, however, expect to find much that is attractive or worthy of imitation in the style of these documents. While we cannot help admiring the ingenuity displayed in the selection and combination of phrases, moulded for the most part into natural, but most artificial forms, and polished with patient toil, we at the same time feel heartily wearied and disgusted by the sustained affectation and declamatory glitter which disfigure every page. The language is full of strange and foreign words, and little attention is paid to the delicacies of syntax, but Funcius is too harsh when he designates it as a mere mass of Gothic solemnities. Perhaps the best description which can be given of the general effect produced upon the reader by these compositions is contained in the happy expression of Tiraboschi, who characterizes the diction of Cassiodorus as "barbara eleganza."

The Editio Princeps of the "Variarum" was printed under the inspection of Accursius by Henr. Sileceus, at Augsburg, in the month of May, 1533 (fol.), the disquisition "De Anima" being included in the same volume.

2. "Chronicon," a dull, pompous, clumsy summary of Universal History, extending from the creation of the world down to A. D. 519, derived chiefly from Eusebius, Hieronymus, Prosper, and other authorities still accessible. It was drawn up in obedience to the orders of Theodoric, and by no means deserves the respect with which it was regarded in the middle ages, since it is carelessly compiled and full of mistakes.

3. "Historiae Ecclesiasticae Tripartite ex tribus Graecis Scriptoribus, Sommense, Socrate, ac Theodoreto ab Epiphanio Scholastico Versis, per Cassiodorum Senatum in Epitomen redactae Libri XII." The origin of this work is sufficiently explained by the title. It contains a complete survey of ecclesiastical history from Constantine down to the younger Theodosius. This, like the Chronicon, is of little value in the present day, since the authorities from which it is taken are still extant, and are infinitely superior both in matter and manner to the epitomizer. Prefixed we have an introduction, in which Cassiodorus gives full scope to his taste for inflated grandiloquence. The editio princeps of the Ecclesiastical History was printed by Johannes Schussler, at Augsburg, 1472, fol.

4. "Computus Paschalis sive de Indictionibus, Cyclis Solis et Lunae," &c., containing the calculations necessary for the correct determination of Easter. This treatise belongs to the date 562, and this is the latest year in which we can prove the author to have been alive.

5. "De Orthographia Liber," compiled by Cassiodorus when 93 years old from the works of nine ancient grammarians,—Agaucus Cornutus, Veit Longus, Curtius Valerianus, Papirianus, Amandus Martius, Eutyches, Cesellius, Lucius Caecilius, Vindex, and Frisianus, in addition to whom we find quotations from Varro, Donatus, and Philostratus.

6. "De Arte Grammatica ad Domati Mentem," of which a fragment only has been preserved. This tract, together with the preceding, will be found in the "Grammaticae Latini Auctorum antiqui" of Putschius, Hanov. 1605, p. 2275 and p. 2392.

7. "De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Literarum," in two books, a compilation from the best authorities, much esteemed and studied during the middle ages. It contains a compendium of the seven liberal arts which were at one time supposed to embrace the whole circuit of human knowledge,—Grammar, Rhetoric, Dialectics, Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, Music.

Angelo Mai has recently published from a Vatic. MS. some chapters, hitherto unedited, which seem to have formed the conclusion of the work. (Classorum Auctorum et Vat. Cod. vol. iii. p. 349.)

8. "De Anima," on the name, origin, nature, qualities, abode, and future existence of the soul, together with speculations upon other topics connected with the same subject.
9. "De Institutione Divinorum Librarum," an introduction to the profitable reading of the Holy Scriptures, intended for the use of the monks. This is perhaps the most pleasing of all our author's works. His profound and varied knowledge is here displayed to the best advantage, his instructions are conveyed in more plain and simple phraseology than he elsewhere employs, while a truly Christian tone and spirit pervades the whole.

10. "De Institutione Divinorum Librarum," by Cassiodorus the son, the former having been supposed of the Royal Academy of Munich, p. 79. There is frequently much confusion in biographical disquisitions between Cassiodorus the father and Cassiodorus the son, the former having been supposed by many to be the individual who held office under Odoacer, whose downfall took place in 493, the young secretary, although still "adolescens," could not by any possibility have been born so late as 479. Some remarks upon this point will be found in the Beiträge zur Gr. und Röm. Literatur Geschichte, vol. ii. p. 169, Cassel. 1839. The different dignities with which he was invested are enumerated, and their nature fully explained, in Manso, Geschichte des Ostgotischen Reichs. [W.R.]

CASSIPHONE (Κασσιφώνη), a daughter of Odysseus by Circe, and sister of Telegonus. After Odysseus had been restored to life by Circe, when he had been killed by Telegonus, he gave Cassipphone in marriage to Telemachus, whom, however, she killed, because he had put to death her mother Circe. (Schol. ad Ioseph. 755, &c.) [L.S.]

CASSIVELAUNUS, a British chief, who fought against Caesar in his second campaign against Brington b.c. 54. He ruled over the country north of the river Tamesis (Thames), and as by his perpetual wars with his neighbours he had acquired the reputation of a great warrior, the Britons gave him the supreme command against the Romans. After the Britons and Romans had fought in several engagements, the former abstained from attacking the Romans with their whole forces, which embodied Caesar to march into the dominions of Cassivellaunus: he crossed the Thames, though its passage had been rendered almost impossible by artificial means, and put the enemy to flight; but he continued to be much harassed by the ailments of the Britons from their forests. The Trinobantes, however, with whom Cassivellaunus had been at war, and some other tribes submitted to the Romans. Through them Caesar became acquainted with the site of the capital of Cassivellaunus, which was not far off, and surrounded by forests and marshes. Caesar forthwith made an attack upon the place and took it. Cassivellaunus escaped, but as one or two attacks which he made on the naval camp of the Romans were unsuccessful, he sued for peace, which was granted to him on condition of his paying a yearly tribute and giving hostages. (Caes. B. G. v. 11-23; Dion Cass. xi. 2, 3; Polyben. Strat. viii. Cosc. 5; Beda, Ecles. Hist. Gent. Angil. i. 2.) [L.S.]

CASSIUS. I. C. CASSIUS, tribune of the soldiers, b. c. 168, to whose custody the Illyrian king Gentius was entrusted by the praetor Anicius, when he fell into the hands of the latter in the Illyrian war. (Liv. xiv. 31.)

2. L. CASSIUS, proconsul in Asia in b. c. 90, which province he probably received after his praetorship with the title of proconsul, as we know that he never obtained the consulship itself. In conjunction with M. Aquillius he restored Ariovistus to Cappadocia, and Nicomedes to Bithynia; but when Ariovistus was again driven out of his kingdom by Mithridates in the following year, Cassius made preparations to carry on war against the latter. He was, however, obliged to retire before Mithridates, and fled to Rhodes, where he was when Mithridates laid siege to the place. He afterwards fell into the hands of the king of Pontus, though on what occasion is not mentioned, but was restored to freedom at the end of the first Mithridatic war. (Appian, Mithr. 11, 17, 24, 112.)

3. L. CASSIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 39, at the time of the Marse war, when the value of landed property was depreciated, and the quantity of money in circulation was comparatively small. Debtors were thus unable to pay the money they owed, and as the praetor A. Sempronius Aselli decided against the debtors in accordance with the old laws, the people became exasperated, and L. Cassius excited them still more against him, so that he was at length murdered by the people while offering a sacrifice in the forum. (Var. Max. ix. 7 § 4; comp. Liv. Epit. 74.)

4. Q. CASSIUS, legate of Q. Cassius Longinus in Spain in b. c. 46, and probably the same to whom Antony gave Spain at the division of the provinces at the end of b. c. 44. (Hirt. B. Abc. 52, 57; Cic. Philipp. iii. 10.)

CASSIUS (Káastos), a Socratic philosopher, who wrote against Zeno the Stoic. (Diog. Laert. iii. 10.)

CASSIUS, AGRIPPAA, is called a most learned writer. He lived about a. d. 152, in the reign of Hadrian, and wrote a work entitled Apologieiae ad Herennium, in which he refuted the heresies of Basillides the Gnostic and his son Isidorus. A fragment of this work is preserved in Eusebius. (Hist. Eccles. iv. 7; comp. Hieron. Script. Eccles. 21, Indica. Haeres. 2; Theodoret. De Haeret. Pah. i. 4.)

CASSIUS APRONIAIUS. [APRONIAIUS, No. 2.]

CASSIUS ASCLEPIODOTUS. [ASCLEPIODOTUS.]

CASSIUS, AVTIUS, one of the most able and successful among the generals of M. Aurelius, was a native of Cyrrhus in Syria, son of a certain Helliodorus, who in consequence of his eminence as a rhetorician had risen to be prefect of Egypt. While Verus was abandoning himself to all manner of profligacy at Antioch, the war against the Parthians was vigorously prosecuted by Cassius, who closed a most glorious campaign by the capture of Seleucia and Ctesiphon. He subsequently quelled a formidable insurrection in Egypt, organized by a tribe of marauders who dwelt among the fens; and having been appointed governor of all the Eastern provinces, discharged his trust for several years with fidelity and firmness. The history of his rebellion and his miserable death are narrated under M. Aurelius. While we can believe in the authenticity of the documents produced by Gallicanius, the conduct of Cassius excited the suspicion of Verus at a very early period, but Antoninus refused to listen to the representations of his colleague, ascribing them doubtless, and with good cause, to jealousy. (In addition to the notices contained in Dion Cassius lxxi. 2, 21, &c., we have a formal biography from the pen of one of the Augustan historians, named Valutacius Gallicanus, but the style of this production is not such as to inspire much confidence in its author.) [W. R.]

CASSIUS BARBA. [BARBA.]

CASSIUS BETTILIUS. [BETTIUS, BEITILIUS.]

CASSIUS CHAEREA. [CHAEREA.]

CASSIUS CLEMENS. [CLEMENS.]

CASSIUS DION. [DION CASSIUS.]

CASSIUS, DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος Κάστρος), a native of Utica, lived about b. c. 40. He translated the great work of the Carthaginian Mago on agriculture from the Punic into Greek, but in such a manner that he condensed the twenty-eight books of the original into twenty, although he made numerous additions to it from the best Greek writers on agriculture. He dedicated this work to the praetor Sextilius. Diophanes of Bithynia, again, made a useful abridgment of the work in six books, which he dedicated to King Deiocrates. The work of Dionysius Cassius is mentioned among those used by Cassianus Bassus in compiling the Geoponica at the command of Constantinus Porphyrogenneta. (Varro, De Re Rost, i. 1; Columella, i. 1; Athen. xiv. p. 648; Plin. H. N. xx. 44; Geoponica, i. 11.) Cassius also wrote a work Ποιοτακιχ. (Schol. ad Nicias. 520; Steph. Byz. s. r. Τρετικ). With the exception of the extracts in the Geoponica, the works of Cassius have perished. [L. S.]

CASSIUS IATROSOPISTA, or CASSIUS FELIX, the author of a little Greek medical work entitled Ταρπεαλ Αναπαλω καὶ Προθεσμα Φιλοσοφω, Questiones Medicæ et Problematum Naturali. Nothing is known of the events of his life, nor is it possible to identify him with certain of any of the individuals of this name. With respect to his date, it can only be said that he quotes Asclepiades, who lived in the first century b. c., and that he is generally supposed to have lived himself in the first century after Christ. His title Iatrosophista is explained in the Dict. of Ant. His work consists of eighty-four questions on medical and physical subjects, with the solutions, and contains much curious matter. It was first published in Greek at Paris, 1541, 12mo, and translated into Latin the same year by Hadriamus Junius, Paris, 4to. A Greek and Latin edition appeared in 1653, 4to. Lipsi, together with the work of Theophylactus Simocatta; and the Greek text alone is inserted in the first volume of Ideler's Physic et Medicis Graeci Minoris, Berol. 1841, 8vo. The work is also to be found in various old editions of Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 169, ed. not.; Choum., Handbuch der Bücherkunde für die Altere Medicin.) [W. A. G.]

CASSIUS LONGUS. [LONGUS.]

CASSIUS PARMENIS, so called, it would appear, from Parma, his birth-place, is in most works upon Roman literature styled C. Cassius Severus Parmenis, but erroneously, since there is no authority whatsoever for assigning the praenomina of Caius or the cognomen of Severus to this writer. [N. L.]

CASSIUS, HORACE (Ep. i. 10, 61), when clearing careless and rapid compositions, illustrates his observations, by referring to a Cassius Erotucus, whom he compares to a river in flood rolling down a turbulent torrent, and adds, that the story ran that this poet, his works, and book-boxes, were all consigned together to the flames. Here Acer, Porphyric, and the Scholastic of Crerquiinus agree in expressly declaring that the person spoken of is Cassius Parmenis, and the latter makes mention of a tragedy by him, called Thyestes, as still extant. [W. S.]

Again, Horace (Ep. i. 4. 5), when writing to Albinus, who is generally believed to be Tibullus, speaks very freely with regard to his occupations, and asks whether he is writing anything "qua Cassii Parmensis opuscula vincat." Here the old commentators quoted above again agree in asserting that this Cassius served as tribune of the soldiers in the army of Brutus and Cassius, that he returned to Athens after their defeat, that L. Varus was in the army of Brutus and Cassius, that he returned; whence a report became current, that the Threatae published by Varus was really the work of Cassius stolen and appropriated by his executer. To this narrative Arcio and the Scholiast of Cruquius add, that he composed in various styles, and that his elegies and epigrams were especially admired.

These two passages and the annotations upon them have been the foundation of a lengthened controversy, in which almost all writers upon Roman literature have taken part. A variety of opinions have been expressed and hypotheses pronounced, many of them supported with great learning and skill. A full account of these will be found in the essay of Welchert, "De Lucili Varrii et Cassii Parmensis Vita et Carminibus," (Grima, 1836,) who, after patient examination, has shown by many arguments, that the following conclusions are the most probable which the amount and nature of the evidence at our disposal will enable us to form:

1. Cassius Etruscanus and Cassius Parmensis were two separate personages. It is the intention of Horace to hold up the first to ridicule, while his words imply a compliment to the second.

2. Cassius Parmensis was one of the conspirators who plotted the death of Caesar. He took an active part in the war against the triumvirs, and, after the defeat and death of Brutus and Cassius, carried over the flames which he had kindled to Sicily, and joined Sextus Pompeius, with whom he seems to have remained up to the period of the great and decisive sea-fight between Mylae and Naulochus. He then surrendered himself to Antonius, whose fortunes he followed until after the battle of Actium, when he returned to Athens, and was there put to death by the command of Octavianus. These facts are fully established by the testimony of Appian (B. C. v. 2) and of Valerius Maximus (i. vi. § 7), who tells the tale of the vision by which Cassius was forewarned of his approaching fate, and of Velleius (ii. 80), who distinctly states, that as Trebonius was the first, so Cassius Parmensis was the last, of the murderers approaching fate, and of Velleius (ii. 80), who distinctly states, that as Trebonius was the first, so Cassius Parmensis was the last, of the murderers of Caesar who perished by a violent end. The death of Cassius probably took place about B. C. 30; and this fact alone is sufficient to prove that Cassius Parmensis and Cassius Etruscanus were different personages; the former had held a high command in the struggle in which Horace had been himself engaged, and had perished but a few years before the publication of the epistles; the former is spoken of as one who had been long dead, and almost if not altogether forgotten.

3. We have seen that two of the Scholiasts on Horace represent that Cassius composed in different styles. We have reason to believe that he wrote tragedies, that an epistle of one of his pieces were Theostes and Bratus, and that a line of the latter has been preserved by Varro (L. L. vi. 7, ed. Müller). In like manner, a single line of one of his epigrams is quoted by Quintilian (v. 2, § 24), and a single sentence from an abusive letter addressed to Octavianus is to be found in Suetonius (Aug. 4); in addition to which we hear from Pliny of an epistle to Antonius. (Pline. H. N. xxxi. 8.) Many persons, and among these Drummian, believe that the letter to be found in Cicero (ad Pum. xii. 13) is from the pen of Cassius Parmensis, and strong arguments may be adduced in support of this opinion; but, on the whole, we are led to conclude from its tone, that it proceeded from some person younger and holding a less distinguished position than Cassius Parmensis at that time occupied.

We have a little poem in hexameters, entitled Orpheus, in which it is set forth, that the Thracian bard, although at first an object of ridicule to his contemporaries, by assiduous study and unwavering perseverance, at length acquired such heavenly skill by which he was enabled to charm the ears of listening rocks and woods, and draw them in his train. These verses were first published by Achilles Statius in his edition of Suetonius, "de Clar. Rheto," and we are told by the editor that they were found among the Bruttii and communicated to him by a very learned youth, Suetonius Quadrimumus; they were published again by Fabricius in his notes to Seneca. Hor. Oct. 1034, as having been discovered anew at Florence by Petrus Victorius, and are to be found in Darmann's "Anthologia" (i. 112, or n. 112, ed. Meyer), in Wernsdorff's "Poetae Latini Minoris" (vol. ii. p. 310), and many other collections. Various conflicting opinions were long entertained with regard to the author of this piece, which commonly bears prefixed the name of Cassius Parmensis or Cassius Severus, but is now proved to have been written by Antonius Thylesius, a native of Coscinum in Calabria, a distinguished poet of the sixteenth century. See the edition of his works by F. Daniele, Naples, 1762, and the authorities quoted by Meyer in his edition of the Anthologia. An edition in a separate form was printed at Frankfort, 1585, 8vo., and two years afterwards "Cassius of Parma his Orpheus with Nathan Chitraeus his commentator abridged into short notes translated by Roger Rawlins of Lincoln's Inn, 8vo. Lond. 1587." [W. R.]

CASTIUS SCAEA. [Scaeva.] CASTIUS SEVERUS. [Severus.] CASSOTIS (Karwçrjv), a Parnassian nymph, from whom was derived the name of the well Cassotis at Delphi, the water of which gave the priestess the power of prophecy. (Paus. vii. 3.)

CASTALLIA (KavrraAia), the nymph of the Castalian spring at the foot of mount Parnassus. She was regarded as a daughter of Acheleus (Paus. x. 8, § 5.), and was believed to have thrown herself into the well when pursued by Apollo. (Lutat. ad Stat. Theb. i. 697.) Others derived the name of the well from one Castalius, who was either a simple mortal, or a son of Apollo and father of Delphis, who came from Crete to Crissa, and there founded the worship of the Delphian Apollo. (Igen. ed. Hom. i. p. 541.) A third account makes Castalissa a son of Delphus and father of Thryais. (Paus. vii. 13, § 6, x. 6, § 2.)

CASTALIDES (KarwrAale), the Castalian nymphs, by which the Muses are sometimes designated, as the Castalian spring was sacred to them. (Theoret. vii. 148; Martial, vii. 11.)

CASTALIUS. [Castalia.]

CASTICUS, the son of Catamantades, a Sequant, seized the government in his own state, which his father had held before him, at the instigation of Orgetorix, about B. C. 50. (Ctes. B. G. i. 3.)
CASTOR.

CASTINUS, a general of the emperor Honorius, who was sent, in A.D. 422, with an army into Spain against the Vandals. At the same time Bonifacius, another general of Honorius, was likewise engaged against the Vandals in Spain, but Castinus offended him so much by his arrogant and imprudent conduct, that he withdrew from the war. After the death of Honorius, in 423, Castinus was believed to be supporting secretly the usurper Joannes; and accordingly he was supporting the usurper. (Prosp. Aquit. a.d. 425, when the usurper was put to death in A.D. 425, Castinus was sent into exile. (Prosp. Aquit. a.d. 425.)

CASTRION (Καστρίον), a distinguished citizen of Phanagoria, who had once been ill treated by Tryphon, a eunuch of Mithridates the Great. When the king, after his defeat by Pompey, came to Phanagoria, Castor avenged himself by murdering Tryphon. Pompey afterwards honoured him with the title of friend of the Roman people. (Appian, Mithrid. 108, 114.)

CASTOR, brother of Polydeuces. [DION].

CASTOR, grandson of Deiotarus. [DEOTARUS].

CASTOR (Καστόρ), either a native of Rhodes, of Massilia, or of Gaetia, was a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, who was surmised to be the relative of Deiodorus, and is usually believed to have lived about the time of Cicero and Julius Caesar. He wrote, according to Suidas (if we adopt the readings of Bernhardy, the last editor): 1. Ἀναγραφὴ τῶν Σαλαμανθικήστων, in two books. 2. Χρονικά δραγομαστα, which is also referred to by Appollodorus (i. 1. § 3). 3. Περὶ εὐφροσύνης, in nine books. 4. Περὶ τοῦ Νεότατος. 5. Τέχνη γιόροιμα, of which a portion is still extant and printed in Walz's "Rhodores Graeci," i. p. 712, &c., to these works Clinton (Fast. Hellen. iii. p. 546) adds a great chronological work (χρονικά και χρονολογία), which is referred to several times by Eusebius (Chron. ad Ann. 889, 161, 562, &c.), though it is not quite certain whether this is not the same work as the χρονικά δραγομαστα mentioned above. He is frequently referred to as an authority in historical matters, though no historical work is specified, so that those references may allude to any of the above-mentioned works. (Euseb. Prosp. Evang. x. 9, Chron. i. 13, p. 36; Justin Mart. Parven. ad Graec. p. 9.) His partiality to the Romans is indicated by his surname; but in what manner he showed this partiality is unknown, though it may have been in a work mentioned by Plutarch (Quaest. Rom. 10, 76, comp. De Is. et Os. 31), in which he compared the institutions of the Romans with those of Philagoria. Suidas describes the grammarian and rhetorician Castor as a son-in-law of the Galatian king Deiotarus (whom, however, he calls a Roman senator), who notwithstanding afterwards put to death both Castor and his wife, because Castor had brought charges against him before Caesar—evidently alluding to the affair in which Cicero defended Deiotarus. The Castor whom Suidas thus makes a relative of Deiotarus, appears to be the same as the Castor mentioned above. He is frequently referred to as an authority in historical matters, though no historical work is specified, so that those references may allude to any of the above-mentioned works. (Euseb. Chron. ad Ann. 889, 161, 562, &c.)

CASTORION, about b.c. 150, and can have had no connexion with the Deiotarus for whom Cicero spoke. (Compare Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 202, ed. Westermann; Orelli, Onomast. Toll. ii. p. 138, in both of which there is much confusion about Castor.)

CASTOR (Καστόρ), a distinguished citizen of Phanagoria, who had once been ill treated by Tryphon, a eunuch of Mithridates the Great. When the king, after his defeat by Pompey, came to Phanagoria, Castor avenged himself by murdering Tryphon. Pompey afterwards honoured him with the title of friend of the Roman people. (Appian, Mithrid. 108, 114.)

CASTOR, the chamberlain and confidential adviser of Severinus Septimus. Being the most upright of all the courtiers, he became an object of suspicion and hatred to Caracalla, who upon ascending the throne immediately put him to death, having failed in an attempt, during the lifetime of Severus, to destroy him by treachery. (Dion Cass. lixvi. 14, lixvii. 1.)

CASTOR, bishop of Apt, was born at Nimes about the middle of the fourth century, and married an heiress, by whom he had a daughter. The family being fired with holy zeal, agreed to separate, in order that they might devote their lives to seclusion and sanctity. Accordingly, they founded an abbey and a convent in Provence; the husband retired to the former, the wife and her daughter took the veil in the latter. There is still extant a letter addressed by Castor to Cassianus [CASSIANUS], soliciting information with regard to the rules observed in the monasteries of Palestine and Egypt. This request was speedily complied with, and produced the work "Institutiones Coenobiorum," dedicated to Castor, which was followed by the "Collationes Patrum," addressed to his brother, Leontius. The death of Castor took place in September, 419. We are told by Vincent St. Laurent, in the "Biographic Universelle," that at a recent period the archives of the cathedral of Apt contained a MS. life of its canonized prelate, in which were enumerated with circumstantial details all the miracles ascribed to him.

The letter above-mentioned, which is composed in a very rude and harsh style, was first discovered by Gazet, was prefixed to the "Institutiones" in his edition of Cassianus, and republished in a more correct form, from a MS. in the Royal Library at Paris, by Baluze in his edition of saladianus and Vincentius Lirinensis, Paris, 1685, 9vo., and in the reprint at Munich, 1840. It is also found in the edition of Vincentius, Paris, 1669. (Schonenmann, Bibli. Patrim Latit. v. 27.)

CASTOR, ANTONIUS, an eminent botanist at Rome in the first century after Christ, who is several times quoted and mentioned by Pliny. He enjoyed a great reputation, possessed a botanical garden of his own (which is probably the earliest on record), and lived more than a hundred years, in perfect health both of body and mind. (Plin. H.N. xxv. 5.)

CASTOR, TARCONDAIUS, of Galatia, with Dorylaus, gave 300 horsemen to Pompey's army in b.c. 49. (Inseler, Hist. Rom. iv. 41.)

CASTORION (Καστρίον), of Soli, is mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 454) as the author of a poem on Pan, of which he quotes a fragment: but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]
CATILINA.

CASTRI'CIUS. 1. M. CASTRI'CIUS, the chief magistrate of Placentia, who refused to give hostages to Cn. Papirius Carbo, when he appeared before the town in B. c. 94. (Val. Max. vi. 2. § 10.)

2. M. CASTRI'CIUS, a Roman merchant in Asia, who received a public funeral from the inhabitants of Smyrna. (Cic. pro Fann. 23, 31.) He is probably the same person as the M. Castricius mentioned in the Verrine Orations (iii. 30), but must be different from the one spoken of in B. c. 44 (ad Att. xii. 28), as the speech for Fannius, in which the death of the former is recorded, was delivered as early as B. c. 59.

3. CASTRI'CIUS gave information to Augustus respecting the conspiracy of Marius. (Suet. Aug. 56.)

4. T. CASTRI'CIUS, a rhetorician at Rome, contemporary with A. Gellius, by whom he is frequently mentioned. (Gell. i. 6, xi. 13, xiii. 21; comp. Front. Epist. ii. 2, p. 210.)

I. CASTR'I'NIUS PAETUS. [PAETUS.]

L. CASTR'I'NIUS PAETUS. [PAETUS.]

CATA'BATES (Karaud'anes), occurs as a surname of several gods. 1. Of Zeus, who is described by it as the god who descends in thunder and lightning. Under this name he had an altar described as a quiet inoffensive man, and having been disqualifed in consequence of an impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Codium Pulcher, afterwards so celebrated as the implacable enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Antonius and Catiline forthwith formed a project along with a certain Cn. Calpurnius Piso, a young man of high family, but turbulent, needy, and profligate, to murder the new consuls upon the first of January, when offering up their vows in the Capitol, after which Antonius and Catiline were to seize the fasces, and Piso was to be despatched with an army to occupy the Spanis. Some rumour of what was in contemplation having been spread abroad, such prosecutions were to be brought that the conspirators were induced to delay the execution of their plan until the 5th of February, resolving at the same time to include many of the leading men of the state in the proposed massacre. This extraordinary design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, before the whole of the armed agents had assembled, and thus confounded the preconcerted combinations. The danger being past, certain resolutions were proposed in the senate with regard to the authors of this abortive attempt; but the proceedings were quashed by the intercession of a tribune. The plot was, however, a matter of common discussion, and no one seems to have entertained any doubt of its reality, while many did not scruple to assert that M. Crassus, and Julius Caesar, who was then aedile, were deeply involved. (Q. Cic. de leg. cons. 2, &c. ; Asconius ad Qu. Fr. fri. 2, § 2.)

CATIL'INA. L. SE'RGIIUS, the descendant of an ancient patrician family which had sunk into poverty, first appears in history as a zealous partisan of Sulla. During the horrors of the great proscription, among many other victims, he killed, with his own hand, his brother-in-law, Q. Caecilius, described as a quiet inoffensive man, and having seized and tortured the well-known and popular M. Marius Gratidianus, the kinsman and fellow-townman of Cicero, cut off his head, and bore it in triumph through the city. Plutarch accuses him in two places (Sall. 92, Cic. 10) of having murdered his own brother at the same period, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, but there is probably no connection between the brother and the brother-in-law, for Sallust, when enumerating the crimes of Catiline, would scarcely have failed to add such a monstrous deed as this to the black catalogue. Although his youth was spent in the most reckless extravagance, and in the open indulgence of every vice; although he was known to have been guilty of various acts of the foulest and most reckless extravagance; although he had acknowledged the suspicion of an intrigue with the Vestal Favia, sister of Terentia; and although it was said and believed that he had made away with his first wife and afterwards with his son, in order that he might wed the fair and rich but worthless Aurelia Orestis, who objected to the presence of a grown-up step-child, yet this complicated infamy appears to have formed no bar to his regular political advancement,—for he attained to the dignity of praetor in B. c. 68, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 66, in order to press his suit for the consulship. The election for 65 was carried by P. Antonius Paetus and P. Cornelius Sulla, both of whom were soon after convicted of bribery, and their places supplied by their competitors and accusers, L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, Catiline, who was desirous of becoming a candidate, having been disqualified in consequence of an impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Codium Pulcher, afterwards so celebrated as the implacable enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Antonius and Catiline forthwith formed a project along with a certain Cn. Calpurnius Piso, a young man of high family, but turbulent, needy, and profligate, to murder the new consuls upon the first of January, when offering up their vows in the Capitol, after which Antonius and Catiline were to seize the fasces, and Piso was to be despatched with an army to occupy the Spanis. Some rumour of what was in contemplation having been spread abroad, such prosecutions were to be brought that the conspirators were induced to delay the execution of their plan until the 5th of February, resolving at the same time to include many of the leading men of the state in the proposed massacre. This extraordinary design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, before the whole of the armed agents had assembled, and thus confounded the preconcerted combinations. The danger being past, certain resolutions were proposed in the senate with regard to the authors of this abortive attempt; but the proceedings were quashed by the intercession of a tribune. The plot was, however, a matter of common discussion, and no one seems to have entertained any doubt of its reality, while many did not scruple to assert that M. Crassus, and Julius Caesar, who was then aedile, were deeply involved. (Q. Cic. de leg. cons. 2, &c. ; Asconius ad Qu. Fr. fri. 2, § 2.)

Encouraged rather than disheartened by a failure which had so nearly proved a triumph, and which had so distinctly demonstrated the practicability of such a project, if conducted with common prudence and caution, Catiline was soon after (B. c. 65), left completely unmuttered by his acquisitual upon trial. The result was a reversal; it was alleged, by the Liberal tribunes administered to the accused as well as to the jury. From this time he seems to have determined to proceed more systematically; to extend a more numerous body of supporters; to extend the sphere of operations, and to organize a more comprehensive and sweeping scheme of destruction. Accordingly, about the beginning of June, n. c. 64, probably soon after the successful termination of his second trial, when called to account for the blood which he had shed during the proscription of Sulla (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 2), be began, while canvassing vigorously for the consulship, to sound the dispositions of various persons, by pointing out the probable success of a great revolutionary movement, and the bright prospect of power and profit opened up to its promoters. After having thus ascertained the temper of different individuals, he called together those who from their necessities, their characters, and their sentiments, were likely to be most eager and most resolute in the undertaking. The meeting, according to Sallust, was attended by eleven senators, by four members of the equestrian order, and by several men of rank and influence from the provincial towns. The most conspicuous were P. Cornelius Lentulus Burnum, who had been consul in n. c. 71, but having been passed over by the censors had lost his seat in the senate, which he was now seeking to recover by standing a second time for the praetorship (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 30); C. Cornelius Cethegus, distinguished throughout by his impudence, headstrong impetuosity, and sangrius violence (Sall. Cat. 43; Cic. pro Sull. 19); P. Antonius spoken of above; L. Cassius Longinus, at this time a competitor for the consulship, dull and heavy, but bloodthirsty withal (Cic. in Cat. iii. 4—6; Pro Sulla, 13); L. Vargunteius, who had been one of the colleagues of Cicero in the quaestorship, and had subsequently been condemned for bribery (Pro Sull. 5, 6, 18); L. Calpurnius Beattis, tribune elect; Publius and Servius Sulla, nephews of the dictator; M. Porcius Laeca (Cic. in Cat. i. 4, ii. 6, Pro Sull. 2, 18); Q. Annius; Q. Curius; M. Fulvius Nobilior; L. Statilius; P. Gabinius Capito; C. Cornelius. In addition to these, a great body of the younger nobility were known to be favourably inclined although they had not openly committed themselves, and now, as on the former occasion, rumour included Crassus and Caesar, although the report does not appear to have gained general belief. [Comp. p. 541, b.]

At this assembly Catiline, after expatiating upon a number of topics calculated to rouse the indignation and stimulate the cupidity of his audience, proceeded to develop his objects and resources. He proposed that all debts should be cancelled, that the most worthy citizens should be proscribed, and that all officials of honour and emolument should be divided among the associates, while for support he counted upon Piso in Hither Spain, P. Sittius Nuerus, with the army in Mauritania, and at home confidently anticipated the co-operation of C. Antonius, whom he expected to be chosen consul along with himself for the following year, having formed a coalition with him for the purpose of excluding Cicero. The votes of the people, however, in some measure dammaged these calculations. Cicero and C. Antonius were returned, the former nearly unanimously, the latter by a small majority over Catiline. One of the most high-born, abandoned, but at the same time, weak and vacillating, among the conspirators, was a certain Q. Curias, who had been expelled from the senate by the censors on account of the infamy of his life. This man had long consorted with a noble mistress named Fulvia, who appears to have acquired complete control over his mind, and to have been made the depository of all his secrets. Fulvia, alarmed by the intelligence obtained from her lover, divulged what she had learned to several of her acquaintances and, through them, opened a correspondence with Cicero, to whom she regularly communicated all the particulars she could collect, and at length persuaded Curias himself to turn traitor and betray his comrades. Thus the consul was at once put in possession of every circumstance as soon as it occurred, and was enabled to keep vigilant watch over the conduct of every individual from whom danger was to be apprehended. By imparting to a certain extent his fears and suspicions to the senators and monied men, he excited a general feeling of distrust and suspicion towards Catiline, and bound firmly together, by the tie of common interest, all who having property to lose looked forward with dread to confusion and anarchy; Antonius, whose good faith was more than doubtful, he gained over by at once resigning to him the province of Macedonia, while he protected his own person by a numerous body of friends and dependants who surrounded him whenever he appeared in public. These preliminary measures being completed, he now ventured to speak more openly; prevailed upon the senate to defer the consular elections in order that the state might be fully investigated; and at length, on the 21st of October, openly denounced Catiline, charged him broadly with treason, predicted that in six days from that time Manlius would take the field in open war, and that the 28th was the period fixed for the murder of the leading men in the commonwealth. Such was the construction produced by these disclosures that many of those who considered themselves peculiarly obnoxious instantly fled from Rome, and the senate being now thoroughly roused, passed the decretum ultimum, in virtue of which the consuls were invested with the highest powers of government and military. Thus supported, Cicero took such precautions that the Comitia passed off without any outbreak or even attempt at violence, although an attacked upon the magistrates had been meditated. Catiline was again rejected; was forthwith impeached of sedition, under the Plautian law, by L. Aemilius Paullus; was forced to abandon the expectation he had entertained of surprising the strong fortress of Praeneste, which would have formed an admirable base for his warlike operations; and found himself every hour more and more closely confined and pressed by the net in which he was entangled through the activity of Cicero. Driven to despair by this accumulation of disappointments and dangers he resolved at once to bring matters to a crisis, and no longer to waste time by persevering in a course of policy in which he had been so repeatedly foiled. Accordingly, while he still endeavoured to keep up appearances by loud protestations of innocence, and by offering to place himself under the control and surveillance of M. Lepidus, of Q. Metellus, the pretor, or of M. Marcellus, in whose house he actually took up his abode, or even of Cicero himself; on the night of the 6th of November he met the ringleaders at the dwelling of M. Porcius Læcæ, and after complaining of their backw ardness and inactivity, informed them that he had despatched Manlius to Etruria, Septimius of Camers, to Picenum, C. Julius, to Apulia, and others of less note to different parts of Italy to raise open war, and to organize a general rev olution of the slave population. He added that he was desirous to place himself at the head of his troops, but that it was absolutely necessary in the first place to remove Cicero, whose vigilance was most injurious to their cause. Upon this L. Vargunteius, a senator, and C. Cornellus, a knight, undertook to repair at an early hour the following morning to the house of the consul, to make their way into his chamber as if for the purpose of paying their respects, and then to stab him on the spot. The whole of these proceedings were instantly reported to their intended victims; the assassins, when they presented themselves, were refused admission, and certain intelligence having been now received that the rebellion had actually broken out on the 27th of October in Etruria, Cicero, on the 8th of November, went down to the scene which, for greater security, had been summoned to meet in the temple of Jupiter Stator, and there delivered his celebrated oration, "Quousque tandem abutatur, Catilina, patientia nostra?" which paralysed the traitor, not so much by the vehemence of the invective, as by the intimate acquaintance which it displayed with all his most hidden contrivances. Catiline, who upon his entrance had been avoided by all, and was sitting alone upon a bench from which every one had shrank, rose to reply with downcast countenance, and in humble accents implored the fathers not to listen to the malignant calumnies of an upstart foreigner against the noblest blood in Rome; but scarcely had he commenced when his words were drowned by the shouts of "enemy" and "parricide" which burst from the whole assembly, and he rushed forth with threats and curses on his lips. On his return home perceiving that there was now no hope of destroying his hated foe, and that the strict watch kept throughout the city rendered tumult and fire-raising difficult if not impossible for the present; he resolved to strike some decisive blow before troops could be levied to oppose him, and accordingly leaving the chief control of affairs at Rome in the hands of Lentulus and Cæcrops, with the promise at the same time to march with all speed to their support at the head of a powerful army, set forth in the dead of night (8th—9th November), and after remaining for a few days with his adherents in the neighbourhood of Arretium, where he assumed the fasces and other ensigns of lawful military command, proceeded to the camp of Manlius, having previously addressed letters to the most distinguished consuls and others, solemnly protesting his innocence, and declaring that unable to resist the cabal formed among his enemies he had determined to retire to Marseilles that he might preserve his country from agitation and disturbance.

On the 9th, when the flight of Catiline was known, Cicero delivered his second speech, which was addressed to the people in the forum, the senate proceeded to declare Catiline and Manlius public enemies, despatched officers of high standing to Etruria, Picenum, Campania, Apulia, and the different districts from which danger was apprehended, directed the consuls to hold a levy with all speed, decreed that Antonius should go forth to the war, and that Cicero should remain to guard the city; offering at the same time an amnesty to all who should quit the rebels, and free pardon and great rewards to any who should give such information as might lead to the discovery and conviction of the conspirators within the walls. It is a remarkable fact, and one which indicates most strongly the disaffection of the lower classes to the existing order of things, that not one man could be found to take advantage of this proclamation, and that not a single soldier deserted from the rebel standard. This circumstance threatened to prove a source of most serious embarrassment. Although the existence of the conspiracy and the names of the leading conspirators were known, not only to the magistrates, but to the public at large, yet there was no legal evidence against any individual, for Curius, while he faithfully supplied secret intelligence, could not come forward openly without blasting himself for ever, and at the same time depriving the government of its most powerful auxiliary. But such a state of things did not extend to certain foreigners belonging to a race proverbial in ancient times for the lightness of their faith. There was at Rome at this period a party of Allobroges, deputies despatched by their nation to seek relief from certain real or alleged grievances. Their suit, however, had not prospered, and their complaints of the stupidity of the magistrates and of the indifference of the senate were open and loud. Lentulus, conceiving that their discontent might be made available for his own purposes, opened a negotiation through the medium of P. Umbrenus, a freedman, who, in the course of mercantile transactions, had become acquainted with most of the Gallic chiefs, and who now assuming a tone of warm sympathy with their wrongs, undertook to point out an easy method by which they might obtain ample redress. Finding that these mysterious hints were greedily caught up, he gradually disclosed the nature of the plot, and invited them to co-operate by stimulating their countrymen to insurrection. The men for a long while hesitated, but prudence prevailed. After calculating and balancing the chances, they resolved to secure a certain and immediate recompense, rather than to speculate upon doubtful and distant advantages. Accordingly, they revealed all to Q. Fabius Sanga, the patron of their STATE, who in his turn acquainted Cicero, and by the instructions of the latter enjoined the ambassadors to affect great zeal in the undertaking, and if possible to gain possession of some tangible documentary proof. The Gauls played well the part assigned to them. A written agreement, signed by Lentulus, Cathegus, and Statilius, was placed in their hands, and they quitted Rome soon after midnight on the 3rd of December, accompanied by T. Volumnius, of Crotona, who was charged with despatches for Catiline, it being arranged that the Allobroges were to visit his camp on their way homewards for the double purpose of receiving his orders and obtaining a ratification of the pledges given by his agents. The whole cavalcade was surrounded and seized as it was crossing the Milvian bridge, by two of the praetors who had been stationed in ambush to intercept them. The Gauls quietly surrendered; Volumnius, after having vainly endeavoured to resist, was overpowered and forced to yield.

Cicero, who informed of the complete success of his scheme, instantly summoned Lentulus, Cathegus, Statilius, and Gabinius to his presence. Lentulus being praetor, the consul led him by the hand to the fane of Concord where the senate was already met; the rest of the accused followed closely guarded. The praetor Placitus was also in attendance, bearing the portfolio with the papers still sealed. Volumnius finding escape impossible, agreed, upon his own personal safety being insured, to make a full confession. His statements were confirmed by the Allobroges, and the chain of testimony was rendered complete and conclusive, by the signatures in the handwriting of the ringleaders, which they were unable to deny. The guilt of Lentulus, Cathegus, and seven others being thus established beyond a doubt, Lentulus was forced to abdicate his office, and then along with the rest was consigned to the charge of certain individuals of high station who became responsible for their appearance.

These circumstances as they had occurred having been fully detailed by Cicero in his third oration delivered in the forum, a strong reaction took place among the populace, who all now joined in executino Catiline and demanding vengeance, from the well-founded conviction, that although they might have derived profit from riot or even from civil war, yet the general conflagration, which had always formed a leading feature in the schemes of the conspirators, must have been prevented by the tumultuous mechanisms as well as upon the wealth of the aristocracy. On the other hand, a vigorous effort was made by the clients of Lentulus to excite the dregs of the multitude to attempt his rescue. The danger appearing imminent, the senate was called together on the nones (5) of December, the day so frequently referred to by Cicero in after times with triumphant pride, and the question was put, what was their pleasure with regard to those who were now in custody. After an animated debate, of which the leading arguments are strongly and pointedly expressed in the two celebrated orations assigned by Sallust to Caesar and to Cato, a decree was passed, that the most signal punishment should be inflicted according to ancient usage upon the convicted traitors. Thereupon the consul led away Lentulus to the subterranean prison on the slope of the capitol, and the others were conducted thither by the praetors. On the selfsame night the high-born patrician Lentulus, a member of the noble Cornelia gens, was strangled in that loathsome dungeon by the common executioner, and the rest of his associates shared his fate. The legality of this proceeding, which was afterwards so fiercely impugned, is discussed in the Life of Cicero.

While these things were going on at Rome, Catiline had gradually collected a force amounting to two legions, although not above one-fourth part of the whole, or about 5000 men, were fully equipped, the rest being armed with pikes, clubs, and other rude weapons which chance presented. On the approach of Antonius, Catiline fearing to encounter regular troops with this motley crowd, threw himself into the mountains and by constantly shifting his ground and moving rapidly in different directions, contrived to avoid a collision, while at the same time he exercised and disciplined his followers, whose numbers daily increased, although he now refused to enrol slaves, multitudes of whom flocked to his banner, deeming that it might prove injurious to his prospects were he to identify their interests with what he termed the cause of Roman freedom. But when the news arrived of the disclosures that had taken place in the city, of the complete suppression of the plot, and of the execution of the leading conspirators, many who had joined his standard, from the love of excitement and the hope of plunder, gradually sunk away. Those who remained firm he led into the territory of Pistoria with the design of crossing the Apennines and taking refuge in Gaul. But this movement was anticipated by the vigilance of Metellus Celer, who guarded Pcenenum with three legions, and had marched straight to the foot of the hills that he might intercept the insurgents on their descent.

Catiline, therefore, at the beginning of the year 62, finding that escape was cut off in front, while Antonius was pressing on his rear, turned fiercely on his pursuers and determined as a last resource to hazard an engagement, trusting that, if successful, all Etruria would be thrown open for the maintenance of his soldiers, and that he would be able to keep his ground in the disaffected districts until some diversion in his favour should be made in the metropolis. The battle, in which the legions of the republic were commanded by M. Petreius, in consequence of the real or pretended illness of the proconsul Antonius, was obstinate and bloody. The rebels fought with the fury of despair, and long kept at bay the veterans by whom they were assailed. Catiline, in this his last field, nobly discharged the duties of a skilful general and a gallant soldier; his eye and his hand were everywhere; he brought up columns to support those who were most hotly pressed; withdrew the wounded and the weary, and supplied their place with the sound and fresh; flew from rank to rank encouraging the combatants, and strove by repeated feats of daring valour to turn the fortune of the day. But at length, perceiving that all was lost, he charged headlong where the foes were thickest, and fell sword in hand fighting with absolute courage, worthy of a better cause and a better man. His body was found after the struggle was over far in advance of his own ranks in the midst of a heap of his enemies; he was yet breathing, and his features in the agonies of death still wore their habitual expression of reckless daring. His adherents, to the number of 3000, included the mass of their leader. Each perished at his post, and not one freeborn citizen was taken alive either in the fight or in the pursuit. The victory cost the consular army dear, and not one freeborn citizen perished at his post, and not one freeborn citizen imitated the example of their leader. Each wounded.

Although we possess only a one-sided history of this famous conspiracy; although much that has been recorded seems so marvellous and incredible, that many have regarded the whole narrative as a wild glance, and the unsteady step, so graphically depicted by the historian—must have given them a chance of becoming oppressors, robbers, and murderers in their turn.

Never was the executive weaker. The senate and magistrates were wasting their energies in petty disputes, indifferent to the great interests of the commonwealth; Pompey, at the head of all the best troops of the republic, was prosecuting a long-protracted and doubtful war in the East; there was no strong arm. It was not the right time to bid defiance to any force which could have been so freely neglected or violated by his patron. The wealth quickly acquired was recklessly squandered in the indulgence of coarse sensuality; and, although his shattered fortunes may have been so freely neglected or violated by his patron, he was by a large body of retainers all devotedly attached to his person, and detached from society at large by the crimes which he had suggested or promoted, had succeeded in striking his first great blow, had he assassinated the consuls and the most able of the senators, the chances were, that the wavering among the higher ranks would have at once espoused his cause, that the populace would have been intimidated or gained over, and that thousands of ruined and desperate men would have rushed from all quarters to his support, enabling him to bid defiance to any force which could have been brought to bear upon the city until the return of Pompey from the East. But Pompey might never return, or might not return victorious; or, at all events, a long period must elapse, and ample time would be given for negotiations or resistance. Such were the probabilities which led on Catiline to hazard all upon one great throw;—but the Fortune of Rome prevailed, the gambler was ruined, and the state saved.

Muretus, ad Cic. Cat. i. 1, has collected from ancient authorities the names of forty persons connected with the conspiracy. Dion Cassius is very confused in his chronology. His account would lead us to suppose, that the first efforts of Catiline were confined in a great measure to the destruction of Cicero and those senators who supported the Tullian law against tribury, which he believed to be levied against himself individually, and that he did not form the project of a general revolution until after his second defeat, at the election in 63. But this is manifestly impossible; for in that case the whole of the extensive preparations for the plot must have been devised and completed within the space of a few days.) [W. R.]

L. CATILIUS SEVERUS. [SIVERNUS]

CATIVOLCUS, king of half of the country of the Eburones, a people between the Meuse and the Rhine, united with Ambiorix, the other king, in the insurrection against the Romans in B.C. 54; but when Caesar in the next year proceeded to devastate the territories of the Eburones, Cativolcus, who was advanced in age and unable to endure the labours of war and flight, poisoned himself, after imprecating curses upon Ambiorix. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, vi. 31.)

CATIUS, a Roman divinity, who was invoked under the name of divus Catius pater to grant prudence and thoughtfulness to children at the time when their consciousness was beginning to awaken. (Augustus. De Civit. Des. iv. 21.) [L. S.]

CATIUS. 1. Q. Catius, plebeian sedile in B.C. 210 with L. Porcius Licinius, celebrated the games and sacrifices of sententious moral precepts, one hundred and forty-four in number, each aphorism being enunciated in two dactylic hexameters. The collection is divided into four books; to the second, third, and fourth of these are attached short metrical prefaces, and the whole is wound up by a couplet containing a sort of apology for the form in which the materials are presented to the reader. It is amusing to take a survey of the extraordinary number of conflicting opinions which have been entertained by scholars of eminence with regard to the real author of this work, the period when it was composed, its intrinsic merits, and indeed every circumstance in any way connected with it directly or indirectly. It has been assigned with perfect confidence to Seneca, to Ausonius, to Serenus Sammonicus, to Boethius, to an Octavius, to a Probus, and to a variety of unknown personages. The language has been pronounced worthy of the purest em of Latin composition, and declared to be a specimen of the worst epoch of barbarism. The adages themselves have been extolled by some as the dignified exposition of high philosophy; by others they have been contemptuously characterised as, with few exceptions, a farrago of vapid trash. One critic, at least, has discovered that the writer was undoubtedly a Christian, and has traced nearly the whole of the distichs to the Bible; while others find the clearest proofs of a mind thoroughly imbued with Pagan creeds and rites. In so far as the literary merits of the production are concerned, if we distrust our own judgment, we can feel little hesitation in believing that what such men, as Erasmus, Joseph Scaliger, Laurentius Valla, and Pithon concurred in admiring warmly and praising loudly, cannot, although its merits may have been exaggerated, be altogether worthless; and any scholar, who examines the book with an impartial eye, will readily perceive that, making allowance for the numerous and palpable corruptions, the style is not unworthy of the Silver Age. As to the other matters under discussion, it will be sufficient to state what facts we can actually prove. The very circumstance that every one of the suppositions alluded to above has been ingeniously maintained and ingeniously refuted, would in itself lead us to conclude, that the evidence which admits of such opposite interpretations must be both scanty and indistinct.

The work is first mentioned in an epistle addressed by Vindelianus, Comes Archidunorum, to Valentinein, in which he states that a certain sick man used often to repeat the words of Catius—

"Corporis exiguis (leg. auxilium) medicis committite fideli."
Cato.

A line which is found in ii. d. 22; the next allusion is in Isidorus, who quotes Cato as an authority for the rare word officiërda (see iv. d. 42); and the third in order of time is in Alcuin, contemporary with Charlemagne, who cites one of the Distichs (ii. b. 51) as the words of the "philosopher Cato." In our own early literature it is frequently quoted by Chaucer. It is clear, therefore, that these saws were familiarly known in the middle of the fourth century, and recognized from that time forward as the composition of some Cato. So, in like manner, all the MSS. agree in presenting that name; while for the addition of Dionysius we are indebted to a single codex once in the possession of Simeon Bos, which was inspected by Scaliger and Vitet, and pronounced by them of great antiquity. We must remark, however, that the combination Dionysius Cato is exceedingly suspicious. Dionysius was a name frequently borne by slaves of Greek extraction; but when combined with a Roman name, according to the fashion among libertini, it was added as a cognomen to the gentle appellation of the patron. Thus, C. Julius Dionysius appears in an inscription as a freedman of Augustus; so we find P. Aelius Dionysius, and many others; but it does not occur prefixed to a Roman cognomen, as in the present case. Names purely Greek, such as Dionysius Tucates, Dionysius Philocalus, and the like, do not of course bear upon the question.

No one now imagines that either of the Catos celebrated in history has any connexion with this metrical system of ethics. Aulus Gellius (xii. 2), it is true, gives some fragments of a Carmen de Moribus in prose by the elder; and Pliny (H. N. xxix. 6) has preserved a passage from the precepts delivered by the same sage to his son; but these were both works of a totally different description, and no hint has been given by the ancients that anything such as we are now discussing ever proceeded from Cato of Utica.

In truth, we know nothing about this Cato or Dionysius Cato, if he is to be so called; and, as we have no means of discovering anything with regard to him, it may be as well to confess our ignorance once for all.

Perhaps we ought to notice the opinion entertained by several persons, that Cato is not intended to represent the name of the author, but is merely to be regarded as the significant title of the work, just as we have the Brutus, and the Iaeulis, and the Cato Major of Cicero, and the treatise mentioned by Aulus Gellius, called Cato, aut de Liberis ed causandis.

Lastly, it has been inferred, from the introduction to book second, in which mention is made of Virgil and Lucan, that we have here certain proof that the distichs belong to some period later than the reign of Nero; but even this is by no means clear, for all the prologues have the air of forgeries; and the one in question, above all, in addition to a false quantity in the first syllable of Macer, contains a most gross blunder, such as no one but an illiterate monk was likely to commit,—for the Punic wars are spoken of as the subject of Lucan's poem.

This Catechism of Morals, as it has been called, seems to have been held in great estimation in the middle ages, and to have been extensively employed as a school-book. This will account for the vast number of early editions, more than thirty belonging to the fifteenth century, which have proved a source of the greatest interest to bibliographers.

One of these, on vellum, of which only a single copy is known to exist, is in the Spenser collection, and is believed by Dibdin to be older than the Gutenberg Bible of 1456. The title in the earlier impressions is frequently Cato Moralissimus, Cato Carmen de Moribus, and so forth.

The best edition is that of Otto Arntzenius, 8vo. Amsterdam, 1754, which contains an ample collection of commentaries; the Greek paraphrases by Maximus Planudes and Joseph Scaliger; the dissertations of Boeckhorn, written with as much extravagant bitterness as if the author of the Distichs had been a personal enemy; the learned but rambling and almost interminable reply of Cammidge; and two essays by Withof. These, together with the preliminary notices, contain everything that is worth knowing.

One of the oldest specimens of English typographv is a translation of Cato by Caxton through the medium of an earlier French version: The Book Callyd Cathon, Translated out of Frenche into English by William Caxton in the yere of our lorde MCCCLXIII and the first yere of the regne of Kyng Rycharde the illegde xxiiij day of December. From the preface to this curious volume we learn, that the same task had previously been accomplished in verse. "Here beginneth the prologue or proemne of the book called Caton, which book hath been translated out of Latin into English, by Maister Benet Burgh, late Archdeacon of Colchester, and high cunning of St. Stephen at Westminster; which full craftily hath made it, in ballad royal for the erudition of my Lord Bousher, son and heir at that time to my lord the Earl of Essex." The Cato we have been discussing is frequently termed by the first English printers Cato Magnus, in contradistinction to Cato Parvus, which was a sort of supplement to the former, composed originally by Daniel Church (Ecclesiastis), a domestic in the court of Henry the Second, about 1180, and also translated by Burgh. The two works were very frequently bound up together. (See Ames, Typographical Antiquities, vol. i. pp. 195—202; Warton's History of English Poetry, vol. ii. section 27.) [W. R.]

1. M. Porcius Cato Censorius, was born at Tusculum, a municipal town of Latium, to which his ancestors had belonged for some generations. His father had earned the reputation of a brave soldier, and his great-grandfather had received an honorary compensation from the state for five horses killed under him in battle. The haughtiest patriot of Rome never exalted in the splendour of the purest nobility with a spirit more proud than Cato's when he remembered the warlike achievements and the municipal respectability of his family, to which he ascribed extreme antiquity. Yet the Tusculan Porcius had never obtained the honours of the Roman magistracy. Their illustrious descendant, at the commencement of his career in the great city, was regarded as a novus homo, and the feeling of his unmeet position, working along with the consciousness of inherent superiority, contributed to exasperate and stimulate his ambitious soul. Early in life, he so far eclipsed the previous gimmer of his race, that he is constantly spoken of, not only as the leader, but as the founder, of the Porcia Gens. His ancestors for three generations had been named M. Porcius, and it is said by Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 1), that at first he was known by the additional cognomen Prisons, but was afterwards called Cato—a word denoting that practical wisdom which is the result of natural sagacity, combined with experience of civil and political affairs. However, it may well be doubted whether Priscus, like Major, were not merely an epithet used to distinguish him from the later Cato of Utica, and we have no precise information as to the date when he first received the appellation of Cato, which may have been bestowed in childhood rather than as an omen of eminence, than as a tribute to past desert. The qualities implied in the word Cato were acknowledged by the plainer and less archaic title of Sapiens, by which he was so well known in his old age, that Cicero (Amic. 2) says, it became his quasi cognomen. From the number and eloquence of his speeches, he was styled orator (Justin, xxxiii. 2 ; Gell. xvii. 21), but Cato the Censor, or Cato Censorius, is now his most common, as well as his most characteristic appellation, since he filled the office of censor with extraordinary repute, and was the only Cato who ever filled it.

In order to ascertain the date of Cato's birth, we have to consider the testimony of ancient writers as to his age at the time of his death, which is known to have happened b. c. 149. How far we are to go back from this date is a question upon which the authorities are not unanimous. According to the consistent chronology of Cicero (Sest. 4), Cato was born b. c. 294, in the year preceding the first consuls of Q. Fabius Maximus, and died at the age of 85, in the consuls of L. Marcus and M. Manilius. Pliny (H. N. xxxix. 8) agrees with Cicero. Other authors exaggerate the age of Cato. According to Valerius Maximus (viii. 7. § 1) he survived his 86th year; according to Livy (xxxix. 40) and Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 15) he was 90 years old when he died. The exaggerated age, however, is inconsistent with a statement recorded by Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 1) on the asserted authority of Cato himself.

Cato is represented to have said, that he served his first campaign in his 17th year, when Hannibal was over-running Italy. Plutarch, who had the works of Cato before him, but was careless in dates, did not observe that the reckoning of Livy would take back Cato's 17th year to n. c. 222, when there was not a Carthaginian in Italy, whereas the reckoning of Cicero would make the truth of Cato's statement reconcileable with the date of Hannibal's first invasion.

When Cato was a very young man, the death of his father put him in possession of a small hereditary estate in the Sabine territory, at a distance from his native town. It was here that he passed the greater part of his boyhood, hardening his body by healthful exercise, superintending and sharing the operations of the farm, learning the manner in which business was transacted, and studying the rules of rural economy. Near his estate was an humble cottage which had been tenanted, after three triumphant, by its owner M. Curius Dentatus, whose warlike exploits and rigidly simple character were fresh in the memory of the old, and were often talked of with admiration in the neighbourhood. The ardour of the youthful Cato was kindled, he resolved to imitate the character, and hoped to rival the glory, of Dentatus. Opportunity was not wanting: in the school of Hannibal he took his first military lessons, namely in the campaign of n. c. 217. There is some discrepancy among historians as to the events of Cato's early military life. In n. c. 214 he served at Capua, and Drummam (Gesch. Roms, v. p. 99) imagines that already, at the age of 20, he was a military tribune. Fabius Maximus had now the command in Campania, during the year of his fourth consulship. The old general admitted the young soldier to the honour of intimate acquaintance. While Fabius communicated the valued results of military experience, he omitted not to instil his own personal and political partialities and dislikes into the ear of his attached follower. At the siege of Tarentum, n. c. 209, Cato was again at the side of Fabius. Two years later, Cato was one of the band who accompanied the consul Claudius Nero on his northern march from Lucania to check the progress of Hasdrubal. It is recorded that the services of Cato contributed not a little to the decisive victory of Sena on the Metaurus, where Hasdrubal was slain.

In the intervals of war, Cato returned to his Sabine farm, using the plainest dress, and working and fasting like his labourers. Young as he was, the neighbouring farmers liked his hardy mode of living, relished his quaint and sententious sayings, and recognized his abilities. His own active temperament made him willing and anxious to employ his powers in the service of his fellow-countrymen. He was engaged to act, sometimes as an arbiter of disputes, and sometimes as an advocate, in local causes, which were probably tried before recuperatores in the country. Thus was he enabled to strengthen by practice his oratorical faculties, to gain self-confidence, to observe the manners of men, to dive into the springs of human nature, to apply the rules of law, and practically to investigate the principles of justice.

In the vicinity of Cato's Sabine farm was the estate of L. Valerius Flaccus, a young nobleman of considerable influence, and high patrician family. Flaccus could not help remarking the energy of Cato's mind, the vigour of his body, the purity and simple life, and his old-fashioned principles. Flaccus himself was one of that old-fashioned party who professed their adherence to the severe virtues of the ancient Roman character. There was now in progress a transition from Samnite rusticity to Greek civilization and oriental voluptuousness. The chief magistrates of the state had become almost the patrons of a few distinguished families, whose wealth was correspondent with their illustrious birth. Popular by lavish expenditure, by acts of graceful but corrupting munificence, by winning manners, and by the charm of hereditary honours, they united with the influence of office the material power conferred by a numerous retinue of clients and adherents, and the intellectual ascendancy which the monopoly of philosophical education, of taste in the fine arts, and of acquaintance with elegant literature, could not fail to bestow. Nevertheless, the reaction was strong. The less fortunate nobles, jealous of this exclusive oligarchy, and keenly observant of the degeneracy and disorder which followed in the train of luxury, placed themselves at the head of a party which professed its determination to resort to purer modes of living, and rebelled against the conventional elegancies of the time, in which he and his equals were opposed,—if he confounded delicacy of sentiment with unmanly weakness, and refinement of manners with luxurious vice?

In n. c. 205, Cato was designated quaestor, and in the following year entered upon the duties of his office, and followed P. Scipio Africanus to Sicily. When Scipio, acting on the permission which, after much opposition, he had obtained from the senate, transported the army from the island into Africa, Cato and C. Laelius were appointed to convey the baggage-ships. There was not that cordiality of co-operation between Cato and Scipio which ought to subsist between a quaestor and an active proconsul. Fabius had opposed the permission given to Scipio to carry the attack into the enemy's home, and Cato, whose appointment was intended to operate as a check upon Scipio, adopted the views of his friend. It is reported by Plutarch, that the lax discipline of the troops under Scipio's command, and the extravagant expense incurred by the general, provoked the remonstrance of Cato; that Scipio thereupon retorted haughtily, saying he would give an account of victories, not of pelf; that Cato, returning to Rome, denounced the profligacy of his general to the senate; and that, at the joint instigation of Cato and Fabius, a commission of the Senate was sent to Sicily to investigate the conduct of Scipio, who was acquitted upon the view of his extensive and judicious preparations for the transport of the troops. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 3.) This account is scarcely consistent with the narrative of Livy, and would seem to attribute to Cato the irregularity of quitting his post before his time. If Livy be correct, the commission was sent upon the complaint of the inhabitants of Locri, who had been cruelly oppressed | the boldness to accost and implore the praetors and

When he had reduced the whole tract of land between the Iberus and the Pyrenees to a hollow, sulky, and temporary submission, he turned his attention to administrative reforms, and increased the revenues of the province by improvements in the working of the iron and silver mines. On account of his achievements in Spain, the senate decreed a thanksgiving of three days. In the course of the year, n. c. 194, he returned to Rome, and was rewarded with a triumph, at which he exhibited an extraordinary quantity of captured brass, silver, and gold, both coin and bullion. In the distribution of prize-money to his soldiers, he was more liberal than might have been expected from so strenuous a professor of parsimonious economy.
The return of Cato appears to have been accelerated by the enmity of P. Scipio Africanus, who was consul, b. c. 194, and is said to have coveted the command of the province in which Cato was reaping renown. There is some variance between Nepos (or the pseudo-Nepos), and Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 11), in their accounts of this transaction. The former asserts that Scipio was unsuccessful in his attempt to obtain the province, and, offended by the repulse, remained after the end of his consulship, in a private capacity at Rome. The latter relates that Scipio, who was disgusted by Cato's severity, was actually appointed to succeed him, but, not being able to procure from the senate a vote of censure upon the administration of his rival, passed the time of his command in utter inactivity. From the statement in Livy (xxxiv. 43), that b. c. 194, Sex. Digestus was appointed to the province of Citerior Spain, it is probable that Plutarch was mistaken in assigning that province to Scipio Africanus. The notion that Africanus was appointed successor to Cato in Spain may have arisen from a double confusion of name and place, for P. Scipio Nasica was appointed, b. c. 194, to the ulterior province. However this may be, Cato successfully vindicated himself by his eloquence, and by the production of detailed pecuniary accounts, against the attacks made upon his conduct while consul; and the existing fragments of the speeches, (or the same speech under different names,) make the further attest the vigour and boldness of his defence. Plutarch (Cat. Maj. 12) states that, after his consulship, Cato accompanied Tib. Sempronius Longus as legatus to Thrace, but here there seems to be some error, for though Scipio Africanus was of opinion that one of the consuls ought to have Macedoncnia, we soon find Sempronius in Cisalpine Gaul (Liv. xxxiv. 43, 46), and in b. c. 193, we find Cato at Rome dedicating to Victoria Virgo a small temple which he had vowed two years before. (Liv. xxxv. 9.)

The military career of Cato was not yet ended. In b. c. 191, he was appointed military tribune (or legatus? Liv. xxxvi. 17, 21), under the command of M. Aelius Gallus, who was despatched to Greece to oppose the invasion of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. In the decisive battle of Thermopylae, which led to the downfall of Antiochus, Cato behaved with his wonted valour, and enjoyed the good fortune which usually waits upon genius. By a daring and difficult advance, he surprised and dislodged a body of the enemy's Actolians who opposed his invasion of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. In an unfortunate situation, not sufficiently protected by Rome if they maintained their fidelity, and yet punished if they were induced to assist her enemies. We have seen Cato in the character of an eminent and able soldier: we have now to observe him in the character of an active and leading citizen. If Cato were in b. c. 190 with L. Scipio Asinticus (as Cicero seems to have imagined), and in b. c. 190 in Aetolia with Fulvius, ho must still have passed a portion of those years in Rome. We find that Cicero was in error more likely than that he referred to the time when Cato and L. Scipio served together under Glabrio, or that the words "cum Scipione," as some critics have thought, are an interpolation. In b. c. 190, M. Fulvius Nobilior, the consul, obtained Aetolia as his province, and Cato was sent thither after him, as we learn from an extract (preserved by Festus, s. v. Oratoria), from his speech "de sua Virtuti contra Themum." It seems that his legation was rather civil than warlike, and that he was sent to confer with Fulvius on the petition of the Aetolians, who were placed in an unfortunate situation, not sufficiently protected by Rome if they maintained their fidelity, and yet punished if they were induced to assist her enemies. From the statement in Livy (xxxiv. 43), that Thermus had been displaced by Cato in the command of Citerior Spain, it is probable that Plutarch was mistaken in assigning that province to Scipio Africanus, who had been legatus under Glabrio, was consul b. c. 190, and the province of Greece was awarded to him by the senate. An expression occurs in Cicero (pro Murens. 14), which might lead to the opinion that Cato returned to Greece, and fought under L. Scipio, but, as to such an event, history is silent. "Nunquam cum Scipione asseritur protectorum [M. Cato], sic cum mulieribus bellandum esse arbitror." That Cicero was in error seems more likely than that he referred to the time when Cato and L. Scipio served together under Glabrio, or that the words "cum Scipione," as some critics have thought, are an interpolation.

CATO.

Cato's opposition was successful; but the passage of Festus already referred to shows that, after his return from Aetolia in 189, he had to defend his own conduct against Thermus, who was tribune n. c. 189, and died in battle, n. c. 186.

In n. c. 189, Cato and his old friend L. Valerius Flaccus were among the candidates for the censorship, and, among their competitors, was their former general M. Acilius Glabrio. Glabrio, who did not possess the advantage of nobility, determined to try what the influence of money could effect. In order to counteract his endeavours, he was met by an accusation of having applied the treasures of Antiochus to his own use, and was ultimately obliged to retire from the contest. Cato was active in promoting the opposition to his old general, and declared that he had seen vessels of gold and silver among the royal booty in the camp, but had not seen them displayed in the parade of Glabrio's triumph. Neither Cato nor Flaccus was elected. The choice fell upon two of the opposite party, T. Flaminius and M. Marcellus.

Cato was not to be daunted by a failure. In n. c. 187, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned from Aetolia, and sought the honour of a triumph. Again, Cato was found at his post of opposition. Fulvius was indulgent to his soldiers. He was a man of literary taste, and patronized Ennius, who was his companion in hours not devoted to military duty. All this was repugnant to the old Roman principles of Cato, who, among other charges, found fault with Fulvius for keeping poets in his camp (Cic. Tusc. i, 2), and impairing military discipline, by giving crowns to his soldiers for such mighty services as digging a well with spirit, or valorously throwing up a mound. (Gell. v. 6.) Again, Cato was unsuccessful, and Fulvius obtained the triumph he sought for.

When P. Scipio Africanus was charged with having received sums of money from Antiochus, which had not been duly accounted for to the state, and with having allowed the unfortunate monarch to come off too leniently, Cato is said to have been the instigator of the accusation. (Liv. xxxviii. 54.) Every one has read how the proud conqueror of Africa was eviscerated in the Senate chamber which his brother Lucius was producing to the senate; and how, on the day of his own trial, he bade the people follow him from the rostra to the Capitol to return thanks to the immortal gods on the anniversary of the battle of Zama. Unused to submit to question, and conscious of his great benefits to the state, he deemed himself almost above the law. Though Cato devoted upon others the obloquy of accusing Africanius, he hesitated not openly to speak in favour of a proposition which was calculated to prepare the way for the successful prosecution of a similar charge against L. Scipio Asiaticus, who had been accused of improprieties in the business of the censors. (Cic. Senec. 10,) and impairing military discipline, by giving crowns to his soldiers for such mighty services as digging a well with spirit, or valorously throwing up a mound. (Liv. xxxviii. 54.)

Cato was now again a candidate for the censorship, with his old friend L. Valerius Flaccus and six others, among whom were the patricians P. and L. Scipio, and the plebeian L. Fulvius Nobilior. He was loud in his promises or threats of reform, and declared that, if invested with power, he would not belie the professions of his past life. The dread of his success alarmed all his personal enemies, all who were notorious for their luxury, and all who derived profit from the mismanagement of the public finances. Notwithstanding the combined opposition of the six other candidates, he obtained the censorship, n. c. 184, bringing in by his own influence L. Valerius Flaccus as his colleague.

This was a great epoch in Cato's life. He applied himself strenuously to the duties of his office, regardless of the enemies he was making. He repaired the watercourses, paved the reservoirs, cleansed the drains, destroyed the communications by which private individuals illegally drew off the public water to supply their dwellings and irrigate their gardens, raised the rents paid by the public for the farm of the taxes, and diminished the contract prices paid by the state to the undertakers of public works. It may be doubted whether he did not go too far in his reforms, from considering rather the cheapness of an offer than the security which was afforded by the character and circumstances of the applicant; but there can be no doubt that great abuses existed, with which nothing but the undaunted courage and extraordinary administrative faculties of Cato could have successfully grappled. He was disturbing a nest of hornets, and all his future life was troubled by their buzz and their attempts to sting. After his censorship, he was prosecuted by some of the tribunes, at the instigation of T. Flaminius, for misconduct in this department of his office, and condemned to pay a fine of two talents (Plut. Cat. Maj. 10), or in Roman money 12,000 asses. Though he was accused no fewer than forty-four times during the course of his life, this is the only recorded instance in which his enemies prevailed against him.

The provisions against luxury, contained in his censorship, were severe and stringent. He directed unauthorized statues erected to the honour of unworthy men to be removed from the public places, and declared against the uncenneremonious indelicacy and want of religious feeling with which the images of gods taken from the temples of conquered countries were used, like ordinary household furniture, to ornament the mansions of the nobles. In the lustral census, young slaves, purchased at 10,000 asses and upwards, were valued at ten times their cost, and then taxed, upon this fictitious value at the rate of three, instead of one, per 1000—a circuitous mode of imposing a rate of three per cent. The same course was pursued in rating the dress, furniture, and equipage of the women, when their real value amounted to 15,000 asses. (Liv. xxxix. 44.) Whether or not the rating were anciently or usually confined to res municipi, such was the clear intent of the censorial law, and the exercise of the tremendous power of the nota censor, he was equally uncompromising. He most justly decried from the senate L. Quintius Flaminius (the brother of Titus, his former successful opponent in the canvass for the censorship), for having committed (whatever version of the story we accept) an act of the most abominable cruelty, accompanied by circumstances of the most disgusting prodigality (Liv. xxxix. 42, 43; Plut. Cat. Maj. 17; Cic. Senec. 12); yet such was already the low
The remarkable censorship of Cato was rewarded by a public statue, with a commemorative and laudatory inscription.

Henceforward the public life of Cato was spent chiefly in forensic contests, senatorial debates, and speeches to the people. The fragments of his orations shew his unceasing activity, and the general consistency of his career. He pursued his political principles with relentless animosity, for with him, true Italian as he was, revenge was a virtue. In his own words, the most honourable obsequies which a son could pay to the memory of his father were the condemnation and tears of that father's foes. With greenish-gray eyes and sandy hair, an iron frame, and a stentorian voice, he gave utterance to such bitter invectives as to provoke the pungent jeers of the ancients. With all his antipathy, there is no ground to believe that he harboured a remission of the 500 talents which the Athenians had awarded to pay by way of a high arbitrary commutation, and then forced the provincial farmers to supply the Romans with corn at a greatly reduced price. When the Spanish deputies came to Rome, b. c. 171, to complain of such unjust exaction, Cato was chosen advocate of his former province, Citerior Spain, and conducted the prosecution with such spirit as to draw down upon himself powerful enmity, although the guilty governors, M. Matienus and P. Furius Philus, escaped condemnation by voluntary exile. (Liv. xili. 2.)

Again, when the Rhodians besought the senate not to punish the whole island for the unauthorized acts of a few factious individuals, on the charge of general disaffection towards the Roman arms in the wars with Antiochus and Perses, Cato pleaded the cause of Rhodes before the senate in an able and effective speech. The minute and artificial criticisms of Tiro, the freedman of Cicero, upon parts of this speech, are reported and refuted by Gallus (vii. 3). Cicero himself speaking by the mouth of Attius (Brutus, 85), was scarcely able sufficiently to appreciate the sturdy, rugged, sententious, passionate, racy, oratory of Cato. It was tinged with some affectations of striking expressions— with quaintnesses, vulgarisms, archaism, and neologisms, but it told—it worked—it came home to men's thoughts, and with the eloquence of the Athenian.

The strong national prejudices of Cato appear to have diminished in force as he grew older and wiser. He applied himself in old age to the study of Greek literature, with which in youth he had no acquaintance, although he was not ignorant of the Greek language. Himself an historian and orator, the excellences of Demosthenes and Thucydides made a deep impression upon his kindred mind. In many important cases, however, throughout his life, his conduct was guided by prejudices against classes and nations, whose influence he deemed to be hostile to the simplicity of the old Roman character. It is likely that he had no part in the senatusconsultum which, upon the appearance of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, at Brundisium, b. c. 166, forbade kings to enter Rome, for when Eumenes, upon his former visit, after the war with Antiochus, was received with honour by the senate, and splendidly entertained by the nobles, Cato was indignant at the respect paid to the monarch, refused to go near him, and declared that, "kings were naturally carnivorous animals." He had an antipathy to physicians, because they were mostly Greeks, and therefore unfit to be trusted with Roman lives, inasmuch as all Greeks looked upon physicians, and dispensed with their attendance. He was not a bad physician himself in recommending as peculiarly salutary diet, ducks, geese, pigeons, and hares, though hares, he tells us, are apt to produce dreams. With all his antipathy, there is no ground in ancient authors for the often-repeated statement that he carried a law for the expulsion of physicians from the city. When Athens sent Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus to Rome in order to negotiate a remission of the 500 talents which the Athenians had been awarded to pay by way of compensation to the Oropians, Carneades excited great attention by his philosophical conversation and lectures, in which he preached the pernicious doctrine of an expediency distinct from justice, and illustrated his doctrine by touching on a dangerous and delicate subject—the example of Rome herself. “If Rome were strict of all that she did not justly gain, the Romans might go back to their huts.” Cato, offended with these principles, and jealous of the attention paid to this Greek, gave advice which the senate followed:—“Let these deputes have an answer, and a polite dismissal as soon as possible.” Upon the conclusion of the new Persians, the leading men of the Achaian union, to the number of nearly 1,000, including the historian Polybius, were brought to Rome, B. c. 167, as hostages for the good behaviour of the Achaians, and, afterwards, without any proof of disaffection, were detained in exile from their country, and distributed among the colonies and municipia of Italy. When their numbers were reduced to about 300, by an exile of 16 years, the intercession of the younger Africanus, the friend of Polybius, prevailed with Cato to vote that they should be permitted to return to their country. The conduct of the old senator—he was now eighty-three—was kinder than his words. He did not interpose until the end of a long debate, and then assented to the proposal on the ground, that it was a matter of perfect indifference. “Have we nothing better to do than to sit here all day long debating whether a parcel of worn-out Greeks shall be carried to their graves here or in Achaia?”

When the exiles further besought the senate that they might be restored to their former status and honours in their own country, Cato intimated that they were fools for going home, and were much better off as they were. He said with a smile, that Polybius was like Ulysses returning to the cave of the Cyclops for his hat and sash. The active powers of Cato had been so much more educated than his affections, that he appears to have been nearer devoid of sympathy with fine and tender feelings, though some allowance may be made for a little assumed ungraciousness of demeanour, in order to keep up his Catonian character. Nowhere in his writings or his speeches do we find that Rome would never be safe, as long as Carthage was so powerful, so hostile, and so near. One day he drew a bunch of early ripe figs from beneath his robe, and throwing it upon the floor of the senate-house, said to the assembled fathers, who were astonished at the freshness and fineness of the fruit, “Those figs were gathered but three days ago at Carthage; so close is our enemy to our walls.” From that time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were “I vote that Carthage must be,” or, according to the more accepted version of Florus (i. 15) “Delenda est Carthago.” Seipio Nasica, on the other hand, thinking that Carthage in its weakened state was rather a useful check than a formidable rival to Rome, always voted to “let Carthage be.” (Livy. Bk. xlvii. xix.; Appian, b. B. P. 69.; Plin. H. N. x.v. 17.) This story must appear strange to those who know not that, during the republic, it was a Roman custom for senators, when called upon for their votes, to express—no matter what the question—any opinion which they deemed of great importance to the welfare of the state. (Tac. Ann. ii. 33.)

In the very last year of his life, Cato took a conspicuous part in the rightmous but unsuccessful prosecution of S. Sulpicius Galba. This peridious general, after the surrender of the Lusitanian army, in flagrant breach of faith, put to death some of the soldiers, and sold others as slaves in Gaul, while a few escaped by flight, among whom was Viniathus, the future avenger of his nation. Galba pretended to have discovered that, under cover of the surrender, the Lusitanians had concerted an attack; but he obtained his acquittal chiefly through the compassion excited by the theatrical parade of his young weeping sons and orphan ward. Cato made a powerful speech against Galba, and inserted it in the 7th book of his Origins, a few days or months before his death, B. c. 149, at the age of 85. (Cic. Brutu. 23.)

Cato was twice married; first to Licinia, a lady of small property but noble birth, who bore a son, M. Porcius Cato Licinius, the jurist, and lived to an advanced age. After her death he secretly cohabited with a female slave; for, though he was a faithful husband, and as a widower was anxious to preserve his reputation, the well-known “sententia, die Catonis” proves that he act but little value upon the virtue of chastity. When his amour was discovered by his son, he determined to marry again, and chose the young daughter of his scribe and client, M. Salonius. The way in which a patron could command his client, and a father against the claim of Masinissa to part of their dominions. Seipio Nasica thought that no causa belit had arisen, and it was arranged that an embassy should be sent to Africa to gain information as to the real state of affairs. When the ten deputies, of whom Cato was one, came to the disputed territory, they offered their arbitration, which was accepted by Masinissa, but rejected by the Carthaginians, who had no confidence in Roman justice. The deputies accurately observed the warlike preparations, and the defences of the frontier. They then entered the city, and saw the strong and permanent fortifications which had been acquired since its conquest by the elder Africans. Upon their return home, Cato was the foremost in asserting that Rome would never be safe, as long as Carthage was so powerful, so hostile, and so near. One day he drew a bunch of early ripe figs from beneath his robe, and throwing it upon the floor of the senate-house, said to the assembled fathers, who were astonished at the freshness and fineness of the fruit, “Those figs were gathered but three days ago at Carthage; so close is our enemy to our walls.” From that time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were “I vote that Carthage must be,” or, according to the more accepted version of Florus (i. 15) “Delenda est Carthago.” Seipio Nasica, on the other hand, thinking that Carthage in its weakened state was rather a useful check than a formidable rival to Rome, always voted to “let Carthage be.” (Livy. The work De Re Rustica, which we now possess under the name of Cato, is probably substantially his, though it is certainly not exactly in the form in which it proceeded from his pen. It consists of very miscellaneous materials, relating principally to domestic and rural economy. There we may find rules for libations and sacrifices; medical precepts, including the sympathetic cure and the verbal charm; a receipt for a cake; the form of a contract;
description of a tool; the mode of rearing garden flowers. The best editions of this work are those which are contained in the collected

Cato's instructions to his eldest son, published in the form of letters, treated of various subjects suited to the education of a Roman youth. They were divided into books, which, being quoted by various names, have been counted as separate treatises. The Apophthegmata, for example, may have formed one of the books of the general collection.
Of Cato's instructions to his sons, a few fragments remain, which may be found in H. Alb. Lion's Catoniarna, Göt. 1826, a work of small critical merit.
The fragments of the orations are best given in
H. Meyer's Ooratorum Romanarum Fragmenta, Turic, 1842.
The few passages in the Digest where Cato is cited are commented upon by Majansins (ad XXX Ctios); but it is probable that the citations in the Digest refer not to the Censor, but to his elder son, who confined himself more exclusively to jurisprudence than his father. Other judicial fragments of Cato are given by Dirksen in his "Bruchstücke Cato, when he was already advanced in life, commenced an historical work entitled "Origines," of which many fragments have been preserved. It was probably published in parts from time to time as the several books were completed. Livy (xxxiv.
5), in a speech which he puts into the mouth of the tribune Valerius during the consulship of Cato, makes Valerius quote the Origines in reply to their author; but this is generally thought to be an anachronism. The first book contained the history of the Roman kings; the second and third treated of the origin of the Italian towns, and from these books the whole work derived its title. There was a blank in the history from the death of the kings to the commencement of the first Punic war, which formed the subject of the fourth book.
The events of the second Punic war were related in the fifth book, and the sixth and seventh continued the narrative to the year of Cato's death.
(Nepos, Cato, 3.) It is said, by Nepos, Gellius, and Pliny (H. N. viii. 5), that he suppressed the names of the generals who carried on the wars which he relates; but the remaining fragments show that he made at least some exceptions to this practice. He is unanimously acknowledged by the ancients to have been an exceedingly industrious and learned antiquary; but Livy, in his early decades, makes no use of the Origines. According

By later writers he was regarded as a model of Roman virtue, and his story was collected from Livy, who portrays his character as a wise and virtuous man.

Many additional particulars of his history are to be gleaned from the ancient authorities, except a few which were preserved by Pomponius in paragraphs, devoting one to each succession of jurists, and the word Deinde commences that of the Catos, though the Censor had been mentioned in anticipation at the end of the preceding paragraph. From the Catos, father and son (ex quibus), the subsequent jurists traced their succession. Apollinaris Sulpicius, in that passage of Gellina (xiii. 18) which is the principal authority with respect to the genealogy of the Cato family, speaks of the son as having written "registros de juris disciplina libros." Festus (s. v. Mundus) cites the commentarius juris civilis of Cato, probably the son, and Paulinus (iv. 46, l. s. 84, § 1) cites Cato's 15th book. Cicero (de Orat. ii. 33) censures Cato and Brutus for introducing their published responsa the names of the persons who consulted them. Celsus (Dig. 50, lit. 16, s. 98, § 1) cites an opinion of Cato concerning the intercalary month, and the regula or sententia Catoniana is frequently mentioned in the Digest. The regula Catoniana was a celebrated rule of Roman law to the effect, that a legacy should never be valid unless it would have been valid if the testator had died immediately after he had made his will. This rule (which had several exceptions) was a particular case of a more general maxim: "Quod initio non valet, id tractu temporis non potest convalescere." The greater celebrity of the son as a jurist, and the language of the citations from Cato, render it likely that the son is the Cato of the Digest. From the manner in which Cato is mentioned in the Institutes (Inst. 1. tit. 11. § 12)—"Apt Catonem bene scripturum referant antiquitas,"—it may be inferred, that he was known only at second hand in the time of Justinian.

He died when praetor designate, about B. C. 152, a few years before his father, who bore his loss with resignation, and, on the ground of poverty, gave him a frugal funeral. (Liv. Epit. 48; comp. Cic. de Senect. 19.)

Heidelb. 1820; de Regula Catoniana. H.D. Hamier, de Regula Catoniana, Heidelberg, 1820; Drummanna's Rom. v. p. 149.)

M. Porcius Cato Licinius, a Roman jurist, the son of Cato the Censor by his first wife Cinna, and thence called Licinius to distinguish him from his half-brother, M. Porcius Cato, the son of Salonia. His father paid great attention to his education, physical as well as mental, and studied to preserve his young mind from every immoral taint. He was taught to ride, to swim, to wrestle, to fence, and, perhaps to the injury of the boy should acquire slavish notions or habits, but wrote lessons of history for him in large letters with his own hand, and afterwards composed a kind of Encyclopaedia for his use. Under such tuition, the young Cato became a wise and virtuous man. He first entered life as a soldier, and served, c. 173, in Liguria under the consul M. Popillius Laenas. The legion to which he belonged having been disbanded, he took the military oath a second time, but, on the advice of his father, in order to qualify himself legally to fight against the enemy. (Cie. de Off. i. 11.) In B. C. 168, he fought against Perseus at Pydna under the consul Aemilius Paulus, whose daughter, Aemilia Tertia, he afterwards married. He distinguished himself in the battle by his personal prowess in a combat in which he first lost and finally recovered his sword. The details of this combat are related with variations by several authors. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 20; Justin, xxxiii. 2; Val. Max. lii. 12; § 16; Frontin. Strat. iv. 5. § 17.) He returned to the troops on his own side covered with wounds, and was received with applause by the consul, who gave him his discharge in order that he might get cured. Here again his father seems to have cautioned him to take no further part in battle, as after his discharge he was no longer a soldier. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 39.)

Henceforward he appears to have devoted himself to the practice of the law, in which he attained considerable eminence. In the obscure and corrupt fragment of Pompomini de Origine Juris (Dig. 1. tit. 2. § 58), after mentioning Sexutus and Publius Aelius and Publius Atlius, the author proceeds to speak of the two Catos as follows: "Hos secatus ad aliquid est Cato. Deinde M. Cato, princeps Poplicae familiaris, cenus et littera extant; sed plurimi filii cenus; ex quibus certe nominantur." This passage is probably that of a Cato before the Censor, but Pompomini wrote in paragraphs, devoting one to each succession of jurists, and the word Deinde commences that of the Catos, though the Censor had been mentioned by anticipation at the end of the preceding paragraph. From the Catos, father and son (ex quibus), the subsequent jurists traced their succession. M. Porcius Cato Salonianus, the son of Cato the censor by his second wife Salonia, was born B. C. 154, when his father had completed his 30th year, and about two years before the death of his step-brother. He lost his father when he was five years old, and lived to attain the praetorship, in which office he died. (Gell. xiii. 19; Plut. Cat. Maj. 37.)

M. Porcius Cato, elder son of Cato Licinianus. (No. 2.) Like his grandfather, the Censor, he was a vehement orator, and left behind him many written speeches. In B. C. 115, he was consul with Q. Marcus Rex, and in the same year died in Africa, whither he had proceeded.

In order to escape condemnation on this charge, in b. c. 110, he went to Tarraco in Spain, and became a citizen of that town. (Cic. pro Balb. 11.) He has been sometimes confounded with his elder brother. (Vell. Pat. ii. 8 ; Eutrop. iv. 24; Cic. in Verr. iii. 90, iv. 10.)

6. M. Porcius Cato, son of No. 3, and father of Cato of Utica. He was a friend of Sulla, whose proscriptions he did not live to see. He was tribunus plebis, and died when a candidate for the praetorship. (Gell. xiii. 19; Plut. Cat. Min. 1–3.) Cicero, in discussing how far a vendor is bound to disclose to a purchaser the defects of the thing sold, mentions a decision of Cato on the trial of an actio arbitroria, in which Calpurnius was plaintiff and Claudius defendant. The plaintiff, having been ordered by the augurs to pull down his house on the Mons Caclia because it obstructed the auspices, sold it to the defendant without giving notice of the order. The defendant was obliged to obey a similar order, and brought an action to recover damages for the fraud. Upon these facts, Cato decided in favour of the purchaser. (De Off. iii. 16.)

7. L. Porcius Cato, the son of No. 3, and uncle of Cato of Utica, attached himself to the party of the senate. In the year b. c. 100, he was tribune of the plebs, and in that office opposed the attempts of L. Apuleius Saturninus, and assisted in rejecting a resolution on behalf of the exiled Metellus Numidicus. In the social war, b. c. 90, he defeated the Etruscans, and in the following year was consul with Pompeius Strabo. On one occasion a portion of his troops, consisting of town rabble, was instigated to disobedience and mutiny by the impudent prating of one C. Titius. He lost his life in an unlucky skirmish with the Marsians, near Lake Fucinus, at the end of a successful battle. It was thought by some that his death was not to be attributed to the enemy, but to the art of the younger Marius; for Cato had boasted that his own achievements were equal to the Cimbrian victory of Marius the father. (Liv. Epl. lixv.; Oros. v. 17.)

8. M. Porcius Cato, son of No. 4. After having been curule aedile and praetor, he obtained the government of Gallia Narbonensis, where he died in b. c. 93. (Cic. de fin. v. 3.)

9. M. Porcius Cato, son of No. 6 by Livia, great-grandson of Cato the Censor, and surnamed Uticensis from Utica, the place of his death, was born b. c. 95. In early childhood he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus, along with his sister Porcia and the children of his mother by her second husband, Q. Servilius Caepio. While yet of tender age, he gave token of a certain study independence. The Italian socii were now seeking the right of Roman citizenship, and Q. Pompeius Silo was endeavouring to enlist Drusus on their side. Silo playfully asked Cato and his half-brother Q. Caepio if they would not take his part with their uncle. Caepio at once smiled and said he would, but Cato frowned and persisted in saying that he would not, though Silo pretended that he was going to throw him out of the window for his refusal. This story has been doubted on the ground that, as Drusus lost his life b. c. 91, Cato could not have been more than four years old, and consequently was not of an age to form an opinion on public affairs at the time when it is stated to have occurred. This criticism will be appreciated at its due value by those who understand the spirit of the anecdote, and know the manner in which little boys are commonly addressed.

After the death of Drusus, Cato was placed under the charge of Sarpodon, who found him difficult to manage and more easily led by argument than authority. He had not that quick apprehension and instinctive tact which make learning to some happily-organized children a constant but unobtrusive growth. He did not trust, and observe, and feel, but he acquired his knowledge by asking questions and receiving explanations. That which he thus acquired slowly he retained tenaciously. His temper was like his intellect: it was not easily roused; but, being roused, it was not easily calmed. The child was father to the man.

Throughout his life, the same want of flexibility and gradation was one of his obvious defects. He had none of that almost unconscious intuition by which great men modify the erroneous results of abstract reasoning, and take hints from passing events. There was in him no accommodation to circumstances, no insight into the windings of character, no power of gaining influence by apt and easy insinuation. The influence he gained was due to his name for high and stubborn virtue.

As a boy he took little interest in the childish pursuits of his fellows. He rarely smiled, and he exhibited a firmness of purpose which was not to be cajoled by flattery nor damned by violence. Yet was there something in his unsocial individuality which attracted notice and inspired respect. Once, at the game of Trisbis, he rescued by force from a bigger boy a youth sentenced to prison who appealed to him for protection, and, burning with passion, led him home accompanied by his comrades. When Sulla gave to the noble youths of Rome the military game called Troja, and proposed as their leaders the son of his wife Metella and Sex. Pompeius, the boys with one accord cried out for Cato in place of Sexus. Sarpodon took him occasionally, when he was in his fourteenth year, to pay his respects to Sulla, his late father's friend. The tortures and executions which sometimes were conducted in Sulla's house made it resemble (in the words of Pintarch) "the place of the damned." On one of his visits, seeing the crowds of several illustrious citizens carried forth, and hearing with indignation the suppressed groans of those who were present, he turned to his preceptor with the question "Why does no one kill that tyrant?" "Because," answered Surpedon, "men fear him more strongly than they hate him."

"Why then," subjoined Cato, "would you not let me have a sword, that I might put him to death, and restore my country to freedom?" This outbreak induced his tutor to watch him, lest he should attempt something desperate.

He received 120 talents as his share of his father's fortunes, and, being now his own master, still further contracted his expenditure, hitherto extremely moderate. He addicted himself to political studies, and practised in solitude oratorical declamation. As he hated luxury and was accustomed to self-denial, the precepts of the Porch found favour in his sight; and, under the guidance of Antipater of Tyre, he pursued with all the ardour of a devotee the ethical philosophy of the Stoics. The virtue he chiefly worshipped was a rigid justice, not only unmoved by favour, but rejecting the corrective of equity and mercy.

Diffusing widely in disposition and natural gifts from his great ancestor the Censor, he yet looked up to him as a model, adopted his principles, andimitated his conduct. His constitution was naturally vigorous, and he endeavoured to harden it still more by excessive toil. He travelled bare-headed in the heat of summer, and amid the winter snow. When his friends were making long journeys on horseback, he accompanied them on foot. In illness and fever, he passed his hours alone, not hearing any witness of his physical infirmities. He was singular in his dress, preferring, by way of sober contrast, a dark purple to the rich variety which was graceful while it was cutting, and elevated in tone without any of the tawdry finery that blighted affection. Lepida had been betrothed to the daughter of Serranus, but was obliged to divorce her for adultery after she had borne him two children.

He served his first campaign as a volunteer, B.C. 72, under the consul Gellius Publicola, in the servile war of Spartacus. He joined the army rather from a desire to be near Caepio, who was tribune militum, than out of any love for a military life. In this new career he had no opportunity of distinguishing himself; but his observation of discipline was perfect, and in courage he was never found wanting. The general offered him military rewards, which he refused on the ground that he had done nothing to deserve them. For this he was reckoned perverse and cross-grained, but his own estimate of his services was not perhaps much below the mark. He had many of the qualities which make a good soldier, but of that peculiar genius which constitutes a great general he had not a spark.

About the year B.C. 67, he became a candidate for the post of tribunus militum, and obeyed the law by canvassing without nomenclatures. He was elected, and joined the army of the propraetor M. Rubrius in Macedonia. Here he was appointed to command a legion, and he won the esteem and attachment of the soldiery by the force of reason, by sharing all their labours, and by a strict attention to his duty. He treated them as rational beings, not as mere machines, and he preserved order without harsh punishments or lavish bounties. But the life of the camp was ill suited to his temperament. Hearing that the famous Stoic philosopher Athenodorus, surnamed Cordylium, was at Pergamus, he obtained a free legation, which gave him leave of absence for two months, travelled to Asia in search of the philosopher, and succeeded in persuading Athenodorus to return with him to Macedonia. This was deemed by Cato a greater triumph than the capture of a rich city, for the Stoic had refused repeated offers of friendship and society from kings and emperors.

Cato was now doomed to suffer a severe misfortune, and to put to the test all the lessons of his military career. The first occasion of his appearance in public life was connected with the name of his ancestor. The elder Cato in his censorship had erected and dedicated a building called the Porcia Basilica. In this the tribunes of the people were accustomed to transact business. There was a column in the place. This proposition called forth the younger Cato, who successfully resisted the measure in a line of speech which was graceful while it was cutting, and was elevated in tone without any of the tawdry finery which make a good soldier, but of that peculiar genius which constitutes a great general he had not a spark.

five talents a book which contained the pecuniary accounts of the quaestorship from the time of Sulla, and this he attentively perused. Further, he made himself acquainted with all the laws relating to the public treasury. Armed with this knowledge, he was elected to the quaestorship. The scribes and subordinate clerks of the treasury, accustomed to the routine of official business and official documents, relied upon their own experience and the ignorance of ordinary quaestors, and thus were able to teach their teachers and to rule their rulers. Cato broke in upon this official monopoly, which had been made a cover for much fraud and abuse, and, in spite of the resistance which might have been expected from such an interested swarm, he routed and exposed their misdeeds. The debts that were due from the state to individuals he promptly paid, and he rigidly demanded prompt payment of the debts that were due to the state. He took effectual measures to prevent the falsification of the decrees of the senate and other public documents which were entrusted to the custody of the quaestors. He obliged the informers who had received blood-money from Sulla out of the public treasure to refund their ill-gotten gains. His colleagues, who were at first offended at his strictness, finding that he continued to act with impartiality and upon consistent principles, sought to avoid his reproach and began to admire his conduct. By his honest and determined administration he replenished the treasury, and quitted office at the end of the year amid the general applause of his fellow-citizens.

It is probable that after the termination of his quaestorship he went a second time to Asia, upon the invitation of king Deiotarus, his father's friend, for, as Drumnann has observed (Geschichte Rom, v. p. 157), the narrative of Plutarch, who states that still richer presents were sent on with a letter from the king, being Pessinus, Cato found that still richer presents were missed without regret.

The visitor, who seemed to be an adherent upon his free speech to Greece, exalted Cato's dignity and importance elsewhere. The wealth of Crassus and the character and anachronisms in his travels in the east, he neglected that external splendour to which the Orientals were accustomed, and sometimes was treated with slight on account of the meanness of his equipage and apparel. By Pompey, Cato was received with the utmost civility and respect, and this external show of honour from the great man upon whom all eyes were turned, considerably exalted Cato's dignity and importance elsewhere. But there was no cordiality in Pompey's welcome. The visitor, who seemed to be a damper upon his free command, was not invited to stay, and was dismissed without regret.

Deinocrates, upon the arrival of Cato, offered him all kinds of presents, and pressed their acceptance with an earnestness which offended his guest, who departed early on the following day. Upon reaching Pessinus, Cato found that still richer presents had been sent on with a letter from the king, beseeching him, if he would not take them himself, to let his attendants take them; but, much to the dissatisfaction of some of his attendants, he rejected this specious bribery too.

Upon Cato's return to Rome, b. c. 63, he found Lucullus, who had married one of his half-sisters, Servilia, before the gates soliciting a triumph for his success against Mithridates. In obtaining this object, he succeeded by the assistance of Cato and the nobility, notwithstanding the opposition of Memmius and other creatures of Pompey.

Cato was now looked upon by many as a suitable candidate for the tribuneship, but he declined to stand for that office, and determined to pass some time at his country seat in Lucania in the company of his books and his philosophers. On his way he met a long train of baggage, and was informed that it belonged to Metellus Nepos, who was hastening from Pompey's army to seek the tribuneship. His resolution was at once taken. He determined to oppose this emissary of Pompey, and, after spending a day or two in the country, reappeared in Rome. He compared the sudden arrival of Metellus to a thunderbolt falling upon the state, but his own arrival equally surprised his friends. The nobles, who were jealous of Pompey's power and designs, flocked in crowds to vote for him, and he succeeded in gaining his own election, but not in ousting Metellus. One of his first acts after his election was the prosecution of L. Licinius Murena for bribery at the consulary comitia; but Murena, who was defended by Cicero, Hortensius, and Crassus, was acquitted by the jury. This (b. c. 63) was the famous year of Cicero's consulship, and of the suppression of Catiline's conspiracy. Cato supported the counsel in proposing that the conspirators should suffer death, and was the first who gave to Cicero the name of pater patriae. It was Cato's speech of the 5th of December which determined the senate, previously wavering from the force of Caesar's oratory. The severer sentence was carried, and Cato's part in this transaction occasioned a rupture between him and Caesar, whom he charged with being a secret accomplice of Catiline. Plutarch (Cato Major, 29) speaks of Cato's speech as extant, and says that it was taken down by one-hand writers from the actual speeches of the orators. Cicero published the speeches of the orators, just as he did the speeches of Demosthenes, for which purpose by Cicero. Sallust gives two well-known orations as the speeches of Caesar and Cato, but there is reason to believe that not only is the language of his speeches different considerably in several particulars from those which were actually delivered.

The crushing of Catiline's conspiracy was an important step, but, in order to accomplish the political theories of Cato, much remained to be done. Induced by the example of Sulla, several ambitious men were now aspiring to supreme power, and those who, like Catiline, endeavoured to grasp it in the disorder occasioned by popular tumult and anarchy, were not the most formidable. The wealth of Crassus and the character and position of Pompey were directed to the same end. Caesar, who had watched the conspiracy of Catiline, and, if it had succeeded, would most likely have been the person to profit by its success, saw their object, and had the address to baffle their schemes. Pompey, his more formidable rival, wished to obtain supreme power by constitutional means, and waited in hope of a voluntary surrender; but he had not the unscrupulous courage which would have been required to seize it, or to keep it when gained. Caesar, of a more daring, vigorous, and statesman-like spirit, was not more formidable. He contrived by entering into a combination with Pompey and Crassus to detach both from the senatorial party, from which they were already estranged by their own unambiguous ambition. Cato wished to defeat this combination, but the measures he resorted to were clumsy and injudicious. His opposition to Pompey was conducted in a manner which pro-noted the views of Caesar, who turned every combination of events to the purposes of his own aggrandizement, and availed himself at once of the influence of Pompey and the wealth of Crassus. The state of political parties at Rome was now such, that neither energy nor foresight could long have retarded the downfall of the republic. The party of the senate professed to adhere to the ancient doctrines of the constitution, clinging in practice to oligarchical principles, but it possessed in its ranks no man of great popularity or commanding political genius. Lucullus had often led his troops to victory, and had considerable influence over the army, but he preferred the quiet enjoyment of the vast wealth he had acquired in Asia to the leadership of the party of the nobles. Had he not lacked ambition, he might have given the senate effectual support. Cato attached himself to the senate, and may be numbered among its leaders; but neither he nor his chief condottiers in the same cause, Catulus and Cicero, could boast of that practical ability and ready command of resources which were wanting at the present crisis. He was far better suited for contemplation than for action, and would have been more at home, more happy, and not less useful, in the calm pursuits of literature and philosophy, than amidst the turmoil of public life. A man more pure and disinterested could not be found. His opinion as a judex and his testimony as a witness were regarded as almost decisive. Such was the reverence for his character, that when he went into the theatre during the games of Flora, given by Messius, the dancing-women were not required to exhibit their performances in their accustomed manner. The simple sight of him that his presence damped the enjoyment of the people, he retired amidst applause. The conduct of his political friends was analogous. They rather praised than imitated his virtues, and those who praised him liked him best when he was at such a distance as not to impose restraint upon their actions. Irregularity and corruption were so general, that an honest man, in order to do good, must have been master of remarkable discretion, whereas the straightforward and uncompromising strictness of Cato generally appeared ill-timed, and was deemed better suited to the imaginary republic of Plato than to the actual condition of the Roman people.

In the year of his tribunate he opposed the proposition of Metellus Nepos to recall Pompey from Asia, and to give him the command of the legions against Catiline. Cato exerted himself in the midst of a riot to prevent the voting of the proposition, and exposed himself to considerable personal danger without much prudence or much dignity. In b. c. 60, he opposed the rotation of the tribune L. Flavius to reward Pompey's veterans with allotments of land. Caesar, when he was returning from Spain, sought the honour of a triumph, and desired in the meantime to be allowed, though absent, to be a candidate for the consulship. In order to prevent a resolution to this effect from being carried on the day when it was proposed, Cato spoke against time until sunset; but Caesar renounced his triumph and gained the consulship. By a course of conduct which to the eyes of the statesmen of that day appeared to be a series of half-measures and vacillating policy, Cato desired to prove that, while some were for Caesar and some for Pompey, he, Cato, was for the commonwealth.
engaged in popular tumults and personal conflict. At length, n. c. 54, he was made praetor, and this was the highest office to which he attained. His exertions during his praetorship to put down the notorious bribery of the consular comitia disgusted both the buyers and the sellers of votes. Again he was attacked by a hooting and pelting mob, who put his attendants to flight; but he persisted in mounting the tribunal, and succeeded in appeasing the violence of the mob.

After the death of Crassus, when the senate had to make choice between Pompey and Caesar, it naturally wished to place itself under the protection of the former. In n. c. 52, Pompey was anxious to obtain the dictatorship; but as the nobles had not given him their full confidence, and yet at the same time were anxious to gratify him, Bibulus proposed that he should be created sole consul, and in this proposition was supported by Cato. In the following year, Cato himself, mistrusting Pompey, was a candidate for the consulship; but he would not budge, and his competitors, S. Sulpicius and M. Claudius Marcellus, who had the support of the people, were elected. On the day of his defeat, Cato amused himself with playing at ball, and denounced for ever all aspiration after an office which the people had not thought proper to confer upon him.

On the commencement of the civil war, n. c. 49, Cato supported those illegal proceedings [Caesar, p. 550] which gave some colour of right to the hostile preparations of Caesar. On the approach of Caesar to the city, Cato took flight with the consuls to Campania, and yielded himself up to unavailing grief. From that day forth he allowed his hair to grow; he never after wore a garland, but seeing that Roman blood must be shed, whichever party might prevail, he determined to mourn until his death the unhappy lot of his country. It was a time for decisive and strong measures. Caesar was not now to be bought by laws or resolutions, and the time for negotiation was past. Cato recommended a temporizing policy. Thoughts of patriotic philanthropy were uppermost in his mind. He made Pompey promise to palliate no Roman town, and, except in battle, to put to death no Roman citizen.

The senate entrusted Cato, as protector, with the defence of Sicily; but, on the landing of Curio with three of Caesar's legions, Cato, thinking resistance useless, instead of defending the island, took flight, and proceeded to join Pompey at Dyrrachium. Little confidence was placed in his military skill, or in the course that he would pursue if his party succeeded; for, though it was now his object to crush the rebellion of Caesar, it was felt that his efforts might soon be directed to limit the power of Pompey. After Pompey's victory at Dyrrachium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and was thus saved from being present at the disastrous battle of Pharsalia. (n. c. 48.) After this battle, he set sail for Corcyra with the troops and the fleet left in his charge; but he offered to resign his command to Cicero, who was now anxious for a reconciliation with Caesar. Cicero, who was equally discontented and declined the offer. Cato now proceeded to Africa, where he hoped to find Pompey; but on his route he received intelligence from Cornelius of Pompey's assassination. After a circuitous voyage he effected a landing, and was admitted by the inhabitants of Cyrene, who had refused to open their gates to Labienus.

In the spring of the year n. c. 47 Cato marched his troops across the desert, for six days supporting hunger and thirst, and every privation, with remarkable fortitude, in order to form a junction with Scipio Metellus, Attilus Varus, and the Numidian Juba. Here arose a question of military precedence. The army wished to be led by Cato; but, as a strict disciplinarian, he thought it necessary to yield to the consular Scipio. Most probably he was glad to rid himself of a position in which immediate action appeared inevitable, and felt himself oppressed by the weight of a responsibility to which his shoulders were unequal. Here the mildness of his disposition was again manifest. He resisted the counsel of Scipio to put Utica to the sword, and, though now nothing could be hoped but a putting-off of the evil day, wisely advised him not to risk a decisive engagement; but Scipio disregarded his advice, and was utterly routed at Thapsus. (April 6th, n. c. 46.) All Africa now, with the exception of Utica, submitted to the victorious Caesar. Cato wanted to inspire the Romans in Utica with courage to stand a siege; but they quariled at the approach of Caesar, and were inclined to submit. Plutarch relates in detail the events which now occurred at Utica, and his narrative exhibits a lamentable picture of a good man standing at bay with fortune. Careless for his own safety, or rather determined not to live under the slavery of Caesar's despotism, Cato yet was anxious to provide for the safety of his friends, advised them to flee, accompanied them to the port, besought them to make terms with the conqueror, composed the speech in which L. Caesar interceded for them, but would not allow his own name to appear. Bewildered and oppressed, driven into a corner where his irresolution could not lurk, and from which he had not strength to break forth, he deeply felt that the only way to preserve his high personal character and unblemished moral dignity, and to leave to posterity a lofty Roman name, was —to die. For the particulars of his death, which our limits prevent us from giving, we must refer our readers to the graphic account of Plutarch. After spending the greater part of the night in perusing Plato's Phaedo several times, he stubbed himself below the breast, and in falling overturned an abacus. His friends, hearing the noise, ran up, found him bathed in blood, and, while he was fainting, dressed his wound. When however he recovered feelings, he tore open the bandages, let out his entrails, and expired, n. c. 46, at the age of forty-nine.

There was deep grief in Utica on account of his death. The inhabitants buried him on the coast, and celebrated his funeral with much pomp. A statue, with sword in hand, was erected to his memory on the spot, and was still standing when Plutarch wrote.

Caesar had hastened his march in order to catch Cato; but arriving too late, he exclaimed, "Cato, I grudge thee thy death, since thou hast grudge me the glory of sparing thy life."

The only existing fragment of Cato (not to count the speech in Sallust) is a letter written in n. c. 50. It is a civil refusal in answer to an elaborate letter of Cicero, requesting that Cato would use his influence to procure him a triumph. (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 4—6.)
Cato soon became the subject of biography and panegyric. Shortly after his death appeared Cicero's "Cato," which provoked Caesar's "Anticato," also called "Anticatones," as it consisted of two books; but the accusations of Caesar appear to have been wholly unfounded, and were not believed by his contemporaries. Works like Cicero's "Cato" were published by Fabius Gallus, and M. Brutus. In Lucan the character of Cato is a personification of godlike virtue. In modern times, the closing events of Cato's life have been often dramatized. Of the French plays on this subject that of Deschamps (1715) is the best; and few dramas have gained more celebrity than the Cato of Addison. (Plut. Cato Minor; Sall. Catil. 54; Tacit. Hist. iv. 8; Cic. ad Att. i. 18, ii. 9; Sec. Ep. 95; Val. Max. vi. 2 § 5; Lucan, i. 128, ii. 380; Hor. Carm. i. 1. 38, ii. 1. 24; Virg. Aen. vi. 941, viii. 670; Juvi. xii. 10; Druman's Gesch. Roms, v. p. 153.)

10. N. PORCIUS. [Porcia.] 12. M. Porcius Cato, a son of Cato of Utica [No. 9] by Atilla. He accompanied his father upon his flight from Italy, and was with him at Utica on the night of his death. Caesar pardoned him, and allowed him to possess his father's property. (Bell. Afr. 59.) After Caesar's death, he attached himself to M. Brutus, his sister's husband, and followed him from Macedonia to Asia. He was a man of warm and sensual temperament, much addicted to illicit gallantry. His long stay in Clappodicia on a visit to Marphadates, who had a very beautiful wife named Psyche, gave occasion to the jest that the young Cato and his host had but one soul (Psyche) between them. (Plut. Cato Minor, 73.) At the battle of Philippi (b. c. 42) he behaved bravely, and sold his life dearly.

13. Porcius Cato, son of Cato of Utica [No. 9] by Marcia, and therefore half-brother of No. 12. Nothing more is known of him than that, at the commencement of the civil war, he was sent by his father to Munatius Rufus at Bruttium. (Plut. Cato Min. 52.)

14. Porcia. [Porcia.] 15. A son or daughter of Cato of Utica [No. 9], or a sister or brother of Nos. 13 and 14, as we know that Cato of Utica had three children by Marcia. (Lucan, 1891.)

16. C. Porcius Cato, of uncertain pedigree, perhaps descended from No. 5. He appears in the early part of his life as an opponent of Pompey. In n. c. 59, he wanted to accuse A. Gabinius of ambitus, but the praetors gave him no opportunity of preferring the accusation against Pompey's favourite. This so vexed him, that he called Pompey prieatum dictatorem, and his boldness nearly cost him his life. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. i. 2 § 9.) In n. c. 50, he was tribune of the plebs, and prevented the Romans from assisting Ptolemy Auletes with troops, by getting certain priests to read to the people some Sibylline verses which threatened Rome with danger if such aid were given to a king of Egypt. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 15.) He took the side of Clodius, and Milo in revenge raised a laugh against him in the following manner:—Cato used to go about attended by a gang of gladiators, whom he was too poor to support. Milo, learning this, employed a stranger to buy them of him, and then got Raciillus the tribune to make a public announcement, "se familiar Cato niam venditurum." (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6.) Afterwards he made himself useful to the triumviri by delaying the comitia in order to promote the election of Pompey and Crassus, when they were candidates for the consulship in n. c. 55. In his manoeuvre on this occasion he was assisted by Nonius Sufenas, one of his colleagues in the tribunate. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 27, 28.) In the following year he and Sufenas were accused of violating the Lex Junia et Licinia and the Lex Fulia, by proposing laws without due notice and on improper days. (Ascon. in Cic. pro Scauro.) Cato was defended by C. Licinius Calvus and M. Scaurus, and obtained an acquittal, which, however, was chiefly owing to the interest of Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 5, 6.) [J. T. G.]

On the coins of the Porcia gens, we find only the names of C. Cato and M. Cato. Who the former was, is quite uncertain; the latter is M. Cato of Utica. In the two coins annexed the obverse of the former represents the head of Pallas, the reverse Victory in a biga; the obverse of the latter a female head, the reverse Victory sitting.

CATO, VALE'RIUS, a distinguished grammarian and poet, who flourished at Rome during the last years of the republic. Some persons asserted, that he was of Gaulish extraction, the freedman of a certain Bursenus; but he himself, in a little work entitled Indigantia, maintained, that he was pure from all servile stain, that he had lost his father while still under age, and had been stripped of his patrimony during the troubles which attended the usurpation of Sulla. Having studied under Philomus with Lucilius for a text-book, he afterwards acted as preceptor to many persons of high station, and was considered particularly successful in training such as had a turn for poetry. In this manner he seems to have accumulated considerable wealth; for we find that at one period he was the possessor of a magnificent abode at Tusculum; but, having fallen into difficulties, he was obliged to yield up this villa to his creditors, and retired to a poor hovel, where the remainder of his life, which was prolonged to extreme old age, was passed in the greatest penury. In addition to various works upon grammatical subjects, he was the author of poems also, of which the Lydis and the Dasus were the most celebrated. The fame thus acquired by him as an author and a teacher is commemorated in the following complimentary distich, probably from the pen of some admiring contemporary:—

"Cato Grammaticus, Latina Siren, Qui solus legit, ac facil poetas."

Suetonius (de Illustr. Gram. 2—9), to whom exclusively we are indebted for all these particulars.
CATO.

has preserved, in addition to the above lines, short testimonies from Tictida and Cinna to the merits of the Lydia and the Diana, together with two epigrams by Furius Bibaculus [Bibaculus], which contrast, in no very feeling terms, the splendour of Cato in the full flush of his fame and prosperity—"unicum magistrum, summum grammaticum, optimum poetae"—with his subsequent distress and poverty. From the circumstance already noticed, that Cato does not seem to have taken any interest in the productions of Lucullus, he is probably the Cato named in the proemium to the tenth satire of Horace (lib. I.), and may be the same with the Cato addressed by Catullus (lvi.), and with the Cato classed by Ovid (Trist. ii. 435) along with Tictida, Memninus, Cinna, Anser, and Cornificius.

In all the collections of the minor Latin poets will be found 183 hexameter verses, which, ever since the time of Joseph Scaliger, have been known under the title "Valerii Catonis Dirae." We gather from the context, that the lands of the author had been confiscated during civil strife, and assigned to veteran soldiers as a reward for their services. We are informed, that in the first line it is observed, that account of this cruel injustice and oppression, the rightful owner solemnly devotes to destruction the fields he had loved so well. Then in gentler mood he dwells upon the beauty of the scenes he was about to quit for ever; scarcely tiring himself away from an eminence whence he was gazing on his flocks, he bids a last farewell to them and his adored Lydia, to whom he vows eternal constancy. Such is the argument as far as the end of the 103d line. In the portion which follows, the bard dwells with envy on the felicity of the rural retreats haunted by his beautiful mistress, and complains of his relentless destiny, which had separated him from the object of his passion. It must also be observed, that in the first line we find an invocation of some person, place, or thing, designated by the appellation of Battarus—"Battare cycneas carmine voces"—and that this word occurs again and again, as far as line 97, forming a sort of burden to the song. These matters being connected and arranged under the different parts of the "Dirae." 2. The real author. 3. What we are to understand by Battarus.

1. To all who read the lines in question with care it will at once become evident, that they in reality constitute two pieces, and not one. The first, containing the imprecatio, and addressed to Battarus, concludes with l. 103, and is completely distinct in subject, tone, spirit, and phraseology, from the second, which ought always to be printed as a separate strain. This opinion was first advanced by F. Jacobs (Bibliothek der alien Literatur und Kunst, p. ix. p. 56, Götting, 1792), and has been fully adopted by Putsch, the most recent editor. The confusion probably arose from the practice common among the ancient scribes of copying two or more compositions of the same author continuously, without interposing any space or mark to point out that they had passed from one to another. The error, once introduced, was, in this case perpetuated, from the circumstances, that both poems speak of the charms of certain rural scenes, and of the beauty of Lydia, although in the one these objects are regarded with feelings very different from those expressed in the other.

2. In all MSS. these lines are found among the minor poems attributed to Virgil, and in several are specifically ascribed to him. Moreover, in the catalogues of Virgil's works drawn up by Donatus and by Servius, "Dirae" are included. Joseph Scaliger, however, considering that in language and versification the Dirae bore no resemblance whatever to the acknowledged compositions of Virgil, and that the sentiments expressed were completely at variance with the gentle and submissive spirit in which Virgil displayed under like circumstances, was convinced that he could not be the author; but, recollecting, on the other hand, that the incidents described and the name of Lydia corresponded in some degree with the details transmitted to us with regard to Valerius Cato, determined, that they must be from the pen of that grammarian; and almost all subsequent editors have acquiesced in the decision. It is manifest, however, that the conclusion has been very rashly adopted. Granting that we are entitled to neglect the authority of the MSS., which in this case is perhaps not very important, and to remove these pieces from the works of Virgil, still the arguments on which they have been so confidently transferred to Cato are singularly weak. We can build nothing upon the fictitious name of Lydia; and even if we grant that the estate of Cato was actually distributed among the veterans of Sulla, although of this we have not the slightest evidence, we know well that hundreds of others suffered under a like calamity. Nor is there anything in the context by which we can fix the epoch of the forfeiture in question. All the circumstances are just as applicable to the times of Octavianus as to those of Sulla.

3. The discordant opinions which have been entertained with regard to Battarus are spoken of under Battarus.

The Dirae were first printed at the end of the edillo princps of Virgil, at Rome, by Swayneheim and Pannartz in 1469, and are always included among the early impressions of the Catalecta. They appeared in an independent form at Leyden (12mo. 1652), under the inspection of Christopher Arnold, who adopted the corrected text of Scaliger. Since that period, they have been edited by Eichstätt (Jena, 4to. 1826), and with very complete prolegomena by Putsch (Jena, 8vo. 1828), whose work was reprinted at Oxford by Dr. Giles in 1838. They are to be found also in the "Anthologia" of Burmann (vol. ii. p. 647), and in the "Poetae Latini Minores" of Wernadorff (vol. iii. p. xlv. &c.), who prefixed a very learned dissertation on various topics connected with the work. An essay by Næke, who had prepared a new edition of Valerius Cato for the press, appeared in the "Rheinisches Museum" for 1828. [W. R.]

CATO, VETTIIUS. [Scato.]

CATONNIUS JUSTUS, a centurion in one of the Pannonian legions which revolted on the accession of Tiberius, A. d. 14. When the insurrection was quelled by Drusus, Catonius and some others were sent to Tiberius to sue for pardon. (Tac. Ann. i. 29; Dion Cass. ix. 18.)

CATTUMBRUS, a chief of the German tribe of the Batavians from whom the mother of Italicus, the Cheruscan chief, was descended. (Tac. Ann. xi. 16.) He is probably the same as the one whom Strabo (vii. p. 292) calls Ucromenus. [L. S.]

CATUALDA, a noble youth of the German tribe of the Gotones. Dreading the violence of Marobodius, he took to flight; but when the power... of Maroboduus was in its decline, Catuulda resolved upon taking vengeance. He assembled a large force, and invaded the country of the Marcionni. Maroboduus fled across the Danube, and solicited the protection of the emperor Tiberius. But Catuulda in his turn was conquered soon after by the Hermunduri under the command of Vibilius. He was made prisoner, and sent to Forum Julium in Gallia Narbonensis. (Tac. Ann. ii. 62, 63.) [L. S.]

force, and invaded the country of the Marcomanni. Of Maroboduus was in its decline, Catuulda resolved which arose. Afterwards Catugnatus and his army were surrounded by C. Pomptinus near Solonitum, who made them all prisoners with the exception of Catugnatus himself. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 47, 48; comp. Liv. Epit. 103; Cit. de Prov. Cons. 13.)

CATULLUS, VALE'RIUS, whose praenomen is altogether omitted in many MSS., while several, with Apuleius (Apolog.), designate him as Claudius, and a few of the best with Pliny (H. N. xxxvii. 6) as Quistus, was a native of Verona or its immediate vicinity, as we learn from the testimony of many ancient writers (e.g. Ov. Am. iii. 15, 17; Plin. l.c.; Martial, i. 62, x. 103, xiv. 195; Auson. Drep. &c.). According to Hieronymus in the Eusebian Chronicle, he was born in the consulship of Cinna and Octavius, B.C. 67, and died in his thirtieth year, B.C. 57. The second date is undoubtedly erroneous, for we have positive evidence from his own works that he survived it only the second consulship of Pompey, B.C. 55, and the expedition of Caesar into Britain, but that he was alive in the consulship of Vatinius, B.C. 47. (Carm. lii. and exiriit.) We have no reason, however, to conclude that the allusion to Mammurra, contained in a letter written by Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 52) in B.C. 45, refers to the lampoon of Catullus; we can attach no weight to the argument, deduced by Joseph Scaliger from an epigram of Martial (iv. 14), that he was in literary correspondence with Virgil after the reputation of the latter was fully established; and still less can we admit that there is the slightest ground for the assertion, that the hymn to Diana was written for the secular games celebrated by Augustus in B.C. 43. In the Eutresis, Catullus himself. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 47, 48; comp. Liv. Epit. 103; Cit. de Prov. Cons. 13.)

to Bithynia in the train of the praetor Memmius, but it is clear from the bitter complaints which he pours forth against the exclusive cupidity of his chief, that the speculation was attended with little success.

The death of his brother in the Troad—a loss which he repeatedly deplores with every mark of heartfelt grief, more especially in the affecting elegy to Hortaulus—is generally supposed to have happened during this expedition. But any evidence we possess leads to a different inference. When railing against the evil fortune which attended the journey to the East, he makes no allusion to any such misfortune as this; we find no notice of the event in the pieces written immediately before quitting Asia and immediately after his return to Italy, nor does the language of those passages in which he gives vent to his sorrow in any way confirm the conjecture.

That Catullus plunged into all the debauchery of his times is evident from the tone which pervades so many of his lighter productions, and that he enjoyed the friendship of the most celebrated literary characters, seems clear from the individuals to whom many of his pieces are addressed, among whom we find Cicero, Alphenus Varus, Licinius Calvus, the orator and poet, Cinna, author of the Smyrna, and several others. The lady-love who is the theme of the greater number of his amatory effusions is styled Lesbia, but her real name we are told by Apuleius was Clodia. This bare fact by no means entitles us to jump to the conclusion at which many have arrived, that she was the sister of the celebrated Clodius slain by Milo. Indeed the presumption is strong against such an inference. The tribute of high-flown praise paid to Cicero would have been but a bad recommendation to the favour of one whom the orator makes the subject of scurrilous jests, and who is said to have cherished against him all the vindictive animosity of a woman first slighted and then openly insulted. Catullus was warm in his resentments as well as in his attachments. No prudential considerations interfered with the free expression of his wrath when provoked, for he attacks with the most bitter vehemence not only his rivals in love and poetry, but scruples not on two occasions to cast the most scathing shafts of his fulminations on Julius Caesar. This petulance was probably the result of some temporary sense of irritation, for elsewhere he seems fully disposed to treat this great personage with respect (ex. 10), and his harshness was productive of no unpleasant consequences to himself or to his family, for not only did Caesar continue upon terms of intimacy with the father of Catullus, but at once accepted the apology tendered by the son, and admitted him on the same day as a guest at his table. (Suet. Jul. 73.)

The works of Catullus which have come down to us consist of a series of 116 poems, thrown together apparently at random, with scarcely an attempt at arrangement. The first of these is an epistle dedicatory to a certain Cornelius, the author of some historical compendium. The grammarians decided that this must be Cornelius Nepos, and consequently entitled the collection Valerii Catulli ad Cornelium Nepotem Liber. The pieces are of different lengths, but most of them are very short. They refer to such a variety of topics, and are composed in so many different styles and different

The epithet doctus applied to our poet by Tibullus, Ovid, Martial, and others, has given rise to considerable discussion. It was bestowed, in all probability, in consequence of the intimate acquaintance with Greek literature and mythology displayed in the Atya, the Peleus, and many other pieces, which bear the strongest internal marks of being formed upon Greek models. Catullus also, it must be remembered, was the first who naturalized many of the more beautiful species of Greek verse, and Horace can only claim the merit of having extended the number. At the same time, most of the shorter poems bear deep impress of original invention, are strikingly national, and have a strong flavour of the old republican roughness. Nay more, as a German critic has well remarked, even when he employs foreign materials he works them up in such a manner as to give them a Roman air and character, and thus approaches much more nearly to Lucretius and the ancients than to the highly polished and artificial school of Virgil and the Augustans. Hence arose the great popularity he enjoyed among his countrymen, as proved by the long catalogue of testimonies from the pens of poets, historians, philosophers, men of science, and grammarians. Horace alone speaks in a somewhat contemptuous strain, but this is in a passage where he is professedly deprecating the older bards, towards whom he so often displays jealousy.

The poems of Catullus were first discovered about the beginning of the 14th century, at Verona, by a poet named Benvenuto Campesani. None of the MSS. at present known ascend higher than the 16th century, and all of them appear to have been derived from the same archetype. Hence, as might be expected, the text is very corrupt, and has been repeatedly interpolated.

The Edition Princeps bears the date 1472, without the name of place or printer; a second appeared at Parma in 1472, and two at Venice in 1475 and 1485 respectively. In the sixteenth century Muretus and Achilles Stattius, and in the seventeenth Passeratius and Isaac Vossius, published elaborate and valuable commentaries, but their attempts to improve the text were attended with little success. The most complete of the more recent editions is that of Volpi (Patav. 1710), the most useful for ordinary purposes is that of F. W. Deering, (Ed. sec. Altona, 1834.) Laehmann (Berol. 1829) has exhibited the genuine text, so far as it can be ascertained, cleared in great measure of conjectural emendations.

An English metrical translation of the whole works of Catullus, accompanied by the Latin text and short notes, was published by Doctor Nott, Lond. 1795, 2 vols. 8vo.; but by far the best which has appeared in our language is that of the Hon. George Lamb, Lond. 1821, 2 vols. 12mo. There are also numerous translations into French, Italian, and German of the collected poems and of detached pieces. [W. R.]

CATULLUS, a name of a family of the plebeian Latitutia or Luctatia gens, etymologically connected with the words Cato, Catus, and indicating shrewdness, sagacity, caution, or the like.

I. C. LUTIATUS C. F. C. N. CATULLUS, consul n. c. 242 with A. Postumius Albinius. The first Punic war had now continued for upwards of twenty-two years. Both parties were exhausted by the long struggle, but neither of them showed any inclination to abandon the contest. Ever since the battle of Panormus (250) the Romans had been in possession of all Sicily with the exception of Lilybaeum, Drepanum, and the fortified camp upon Mount Eryx; but these strongholds had hitherto defied every effort upon the part of the besiegers, who, having abandoned in despair all active measures, were blockading them by land, while Hamilcar Barca was gradually forming an army with which he hoped that he might soon venture to meet his adversaries in the open field. The Carthaginians were undisputed masters of the sea, for the Romans, disappointed by the loss of four large fleets within a very short period (255—249), amounting in all to upwards of 600 ships, had, after the great victory of Adherbal over P. Claudius Pulcher (249), completely abandoned their navy. In this juncture the senate, feeling convinced that only one path to success lay open, determined to make a desperate effort. A fleet of 200 ships of war was built and manned with astonishing rapidity, chiefly through the patriotic liberality of individuals who came forward to support the state with voluntary loans, and both consuls were ordered to take the command. Although being flanked by Mars, was prohibited by the chief pontiff from quitting the city, and his place was supplied by Q. Valerius Falto, then praetor. Catulus before setting out, filled with anxiety in regard to the result of an enterprise so important, had determined to consult the oracle at Paeoneste; but this was forbidden, on the ground that it was unbecoming in a Roman general to intermeddle with any deities saving those of Rome. These measures were so prompt, that the new fleet appeared upon the Sicilian coast early in summer, while the navy of the enemy was still in winter-quarters at Carthage. The harbour of Drepanum was instantly occupied, and the siege vigorously pressed both by land and sea. But while the struggle was most fierce, Catulus received a serious wound which compelled him to suspend operations for a time. Meanwhile he trained his sailors with unceasing activity, and by constant practice rendered them expert in all ordinary nautical evolutions. News had now reached Africa of the events in Sicily. A powerful armament was launched in haste and put to sea, deeply laden with provisions and warlike stores for the relief of Drepanum, navigated, however, by raw, ill-trained, and awkward crews. The great object of Hanno, the admiral,was, as we are told by Polybius, to run over to Eryx without attracting the notice of the Romans, to lighten his vessels by landing their cargo, and to take on board a number of the brave and well-disciplined troops of Hamilcar. His movements, however, were known by Catulus, who resolved at every hazard to force an engagement, and being himself still unfit for active exertion, entrusted the execution of his plans in a great measure to Falto. The fleet accordingly passed over to the island of Aegusa, opposite to Lilybaeum, and from thence, at day-break on the morning of the 10th of March 241, they descried the hostile squadron bearing down under a press of canvas right before the wind, having galleys from the west and had raised a heavy sea. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, the Romans formed their line of battle with their prows to windward. The Carthaginians, perceiving that they were cut off, prepared for action by hauling down their sails, thus altogether sacrificing the advantage of the weather gage. The result of the contest seems never to have been for a moment doubtful. The deep-laden ships of Hanno could neither manoeuvre nor fight; seventy were captured, fifty were sunk; the rest taking advantage of a lucky shift of the wind which veered round to the East, were saved and escaped. This blow, which at an earlier period would scarcely have been felt, was decisive. The Carthaginians, upon receiving intelligence of the disaster, feeling that they had neither officers, men, nor money, left for prosecuting the war, despatched a messenger with all speed to Hamilcar, investing him with full authority to accept the best terms he could obtain. Catulus was eager to meet these overtures, that he might have the honour of concluding a glorious peace before the period of his command, which was fast drawing to a close, should expire. With these dispositions preliminaries were quickly arranged, and the following conditions were agreed upon: 1. That the Carthaginians should evacuate all Sicily, and should not make war upon Hiero, the Syracusans, or the allies of the Syracusans. 2. That they should restore all the Roman prisoners without ransom. 3. That they should pay to the Romans 2200 Euboic talents by instalments, extending over a space of twenty years. These stipulations, when submitted to the Roman people, did not meet with their approbation, and ten commissioners were despatched to examine into the state of affairs, who, when they arrived, insisted upon certain changes to the disadvantage of the Carthaginians, and Hamilcar thought fit to submit. These were, that the compensation money should be augmented by the sum of one thousand talents, and that the period allowed for payment should be diminished by ten years; moreover, that the Carthaginians should evacuate all the islands between Italy and Sicily.

Catulus on his return home claimed and was allowed his well-won triumph, which he celebrated on the 4th of October, 241, not, however, without a vexatious opposition on the part of Falto, who pretended, contrary to those principles of military law by which the Romans were invariably guided, that he was entitled to all the glory because the commander-in-chief had been disabled by his wound from taking an active share in the final engagement. (Polyb. i. 50—64; Liv. Epit. 19; Eutrop. ii. 27; Oros. iv. 16; Val. Max. ii. 8; 22; Zonar. viii. p. 303, &c.; Fast. Capit.)

2. C. LUTATIUS CATALOGUS, perhaps the son of No. 1, consul b. c. 220, with L. Veturius Philo. (Zonar. viii. p. 405.)

3. Q. LUTATIUS Q. F. CATULUS, consul b. c. 102 with C. Marius IV., having been previously defeated in three successive attempts, first by C. Attilius Serranus, who was consul in 106, secondly by Cn. Manlius (or Mallius, or Manilius), who was consul in b. c. 105, and thirdly by C. Flavius Fimbria, who was consul in b. c. 104. He either was not a candidate for the consulsiphip of 103, or if unsuccessful, his disappointment is not alluded to by Cicero in the passage where the rest of his speeches are accommodated. (Pro Planc. 5.) At the time when Catulus entered upon office, the utmost constellation reigned at Rome. The Cimbri, who in their great migration westward had been joined by the Teutoni, the Ambroches, the Tigurini, and... various other tribes, after sweeping the upper valley of the Danube and spreading over Southern Gaul and Northern Spain, after defeating four Roman consul, Carbo (113), Silianus (109), Cassius (107), Manlius (105), together with the proconsul Caepio (105), and destroying five Roman armies, were now preparing to pour down on Italy. The invading host was divided into two vast columns. The Teutoni were marching through Provence with the intention of turning the Alps at Nice, and following the coast road along the shores of the Ligurian gulf, while the Cimbri were preparing to cross the passes from the Tyrol which lead down by Botzen and Trent to the plains of the Po. It was determined that Marius should oppose the Teutoni, and that Catulus with Sulla for his lieutenant should be ready to attack the Cimbri while their cumbrous array was entangled in the mountain defiles. How well the former executed his task by the great battle fought on the Rhone near Aix (Aquae Sextiae) is detailed elsewhere. [MARIUS]. Meanwhile the campaign of his colleague had been less glorious. Catulus, fearing to weaken his force by attempting to guard the passes, took up a position on the Adige (Athesia) where it begins to emerge from the rocky gorges which confine its waters near their source, and having thrown a bridge across the stream and erected forts on both sides, resolved to wait for the enemy. The Cimbri, pouring down from the higher ground along the left bank, attacked the Roman works with such fury, that the soldiers, dispirited probably by the timid defensive tactics of their general, were seized with a panic, abandoned their camp, and fled in confusion. Had it not been for the gallantry of the detachment who defended a redoubt which served as a tête du pont, the bridge would have at once been won, and the whole Roman army might have been destroyed. Catulus on this occasion, according to the construction which Plutarch thinks fit to put upon his conduct, like an able and excellent general, preferred the glory of his fellow-citizens to his own. For when he found himself unable to prevail upon his men to keep their ground, choosing that the division should fall upon his own head, he ordered a retreat, and placing himself in front of the fugitives, fell back behind the Po, thus abandoning the whole of Transpadane Gaul to the ravages of the enemy. As soon as the news of this disaster, which happened in the spring of 101, reached Rome, Marius, who had recently returned to the city, instantly set forth to the assistance of his late colleague. The united armies of the consul and proconsul crossed the Po, and hastened in search of the Cimbri, whom they found to the westward of Milan, near Vercelli (Vercellae), searching, it would appear, for the Teutoni, of whose destruction they had not yet received intelligence. The account of the engagement, which was fought on the 30th of July, transmitted to us by Plutarch, savours not a little of the marvellous. The Roman forces amounted to about fifty thousand men, of whom twenty thousand under Catulus occupied the centre, while the remainder, commanded by Marius, were posted on the wings. When the battle was joined, a prodigious dust arose which hid the combatants from each other. Marius missed the enemy, and having passed beyond, wandered about seeking them in vain, while the chief brunt of the conflict fell upon Catulus, and to him therefore belonged the honour of the decisive victory which was gained. It must be remarked that this version of the story is confessedly derived from the commentaries of Sulla, and probably also from the historical work of Catulus himself, and since both of these authorities were not only inclined to make the most of their own exploits, but were also stimulated by violent hatred towards Marius, we cannot receive their testimony with any confidence. It is certain that great jealousy existed between the two armies; it is certain also that at Rome the whole merit of having saved his country was given to Marius, and, that the same feeling existed to a certain degree nearly two centuries afterwards is proved by the well-known line of Juvenal (viii. 253).

"Nobilis orantur lauro collega secunda."

Catulus was one of those who took an active share in the death of Sertorius; he served with distinction in the Social war, and having eagerly espoused the cause of Sulla in the civil strife which followed, his name was included among the list of victims in the great proscription of 87. As escape was impossible, he shot himself up in a newly-plastered chamber, kindled a (charcoal) fire, and was quickly suffocated by the vapours.

Catulus was a highly educated and generally accomplished man, deeply versed in Greek literature, and especially famed for the extreme grace and purity with which he spoke and wrote his own language. (Glia. de Orat. iii. 8, Brut. 55.) He was the author of several orations, of an historical work on his own Consulship and the Cimbrian war, composed in the style of Xenophon, and of poems; but the whole of these have perished with the exception of a couple of epigrams, not remarkable for any peculiar ease or felicity of expression, one of which is given by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 28), and the other by A. Gellius (xix. 9).

Two edifices in Rome are spoken of by ancient writers as "Monumenta Catuli"—the temple of "Fortuna hujusce diei," vowed at the battle of Vercelli, and the "Porticus Catuli" on the Palatine built with the proceeds of the Cimbrian spoils. A portion of the latter edifice was destroyed by Clodius when he razed the house of Cicero. (The passages of Cicero referring to Catulus are given in Orelli, Omon. Tull. ii. p. 366, &c.; Plut. Mar. Sull.; Appian, B. C. i. 74; Vell. Pat. ii. 21; Flor. iii. 21; Val. Max. vi. 3, ix. 12; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19. Catulus is introduced in the De Oratore, and is represented as accompanying his half-brother, C. Julius Caesar Strabo, to the Tusculanum of Crassus. The mother of Catulus was Popillia, whose second husband was L. Julius Caesar, father of the above-named Caesar.) [Comp. Caesar, Nos. 8, 16.] 4. Q. Lutatius Q. F. Q. N. Catulus, son of No. 3, narrowly escaped his father's fate, having been included in the same proscription. Throughout life he was distinguished as one of the prominent leaders of the aristocracy, but rose far superior to the great body of his class in purity and singleness of purpose, and received from the whole community marks of esteem and confidence seldom bestowed with unanimity in periods of excitement upon an active political leader. Being consul along with M. Aemilius Lepidus in B. C. 78, the year in which Sulla died, he steadily resisted the efforts of his colleague to bring about a counter revolution by abrogating the acts of the dictator, and when, the following spring, Lepidus marched against the city at the head of the remnants of the Marian faction. He was defeated by Catulus in the battle of the Milvian bridge, and forced to take refuge in Sardinia, where he soon after perished in an attempt to organize an insurrection. [LEPIDUS.] Catulus, although true to his party and his principles, denounced the corrupt practices which disgraced the senate while they possessed the exclusive right to act as judges on criminal trials; his opinion upon this subject was most unequivocally expressed when Pompeius brought forward his measure (b. c. 70) for restoring the privileges of the tribunes, and his presence as a judex upon the impeachment of Verres was probably one of the circumstances which deprived the culprit of all hope. He came forward as an opponent of the Gabinian and Manilian laws (b. c. 67 and 66), and Cicero records the tribute paid by the populace, on the latter occasion, to his character and talents; for when, in the course of an argument against the extravagant powers which the contemplated enactment proposed to bestow upon a single individual, Catulus asked the multitude to whom they would look should any misfortune befall their favourite, the crowd, almost with one voice, shouted back the reply, that they would look to himself. When censor along with Crassus in 65, he withstand the measures of his colleague, who desired to make Egypt tributary to Rome, and so firm was each in maintaining his position, that at length both resigned without effecting anything. During the progress of the Catilinarian plot (b. c. 63), he strenuously supported Cicero, and either he or Cato was the first to hail him as "pares patriae." If we are to believe Sallust, Catulus used every effort to prevail upon Cicero to insert the name of Caesar among the conspirators, stimulated, it is said, by a recent grudge; for, when candidate for the office of chief pontiff, he had been defeated by Caesar. That a bad feeling existed between them is clear, for the first act of Caesar when he became praetor, on the first of January, 62, was an attempt to deprive his former rival of the office of consul, on the ground that the latter had been out of the city at the time of the Gabinian law. CAYSTRIUS (Καύστρυς), a son of Achilles and the Amazon Penthesileia, from whom the river Caystrius was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. xiv. p. 650; Serv. Odaxius, Bologna, 1497.) In this edition, as in nearly all the subsequent ones, it is printed together with the "Instituciones et alia Opuscula" of C. Lascaris. This was followed by a great number of other translations, among which we need notice only those of H. Wolf (Basel, 1550, 8vo.), the Leiden edition (1640, 4to.), with an Arabic translation by Eichmann of J. Cronovius (Amsterdam, 1689, 8vo.), J. Schultze (Hamburg, 1694, 12mo.), T. CEBALIUSNUS (Κεβαλίωνος), a brother of Nico- machus, who lived on licentious terms with Dimnus, the author of the plot against the life of Alexander the Great, in n. c. 390. Nicomachus acquainted his brother with the plot, and the latter revealed it to Philetas that he might lay it before the king; but as Philetas neglected to do so for two days, Cebalinos mentioned it to Metron, one of the royal pages, who immediately informed Alexander. Cebalinos was forthwith brought before the king, and orders were given to arrest Dimnus. (Curt. vi. 7; Diod. xvii. 79.)

CEES (Κές), of Thebes, was a disciple of Phileus, the Pythagorean, and of Socrates, with whom he was connected by intimate friendship. (Sen. Mem. i. 2. § 24, ii. 11. § 17; Plat. Crat. p. 45, b.) He is described as one of the interlocutors in the Phaedo, as having been present at the death of Socrates. (Phaedo. p. 59, e.) He is said on the advice of Socrates to have purchased Phaedo, who had been a slave, and to have instructed him in philosophy. (Gell. ii. 13; Macrobi. Sat. i. 11; Lactant. iii. 24.) Diogenes Laertius (ii. 125) and Suidas ascribe to him three works, viz. Ειδήμα, Εύδημα, and Φιλουμένα, all of which Eudocia (p. 272) erroneously attributes to Callippus of Athens. The last two of these works are lost, and we do not know what they treated of, but the Ειδήμα is still extant, and is referred to by several ancient writers. (Lucian, Apoll. 42, Rhet. Præcept. 6; Pollux, iii. 95; Tertullian, Deæ Ver. 38; Aristaeus. i. 2.)

This Ειδήμα is a philosophical explanation of a table on which the whole of human life with its dangers and temptations was symbolically represented, and which is said to have been dedicated by some one in the temple of Cronus at Athens or Thebes. The author introduces some youths contemplating the table, and an old man who steps among them and undertakes to explain its meaning. The whole drift of the little book is to shew, that only the proper development of our mind and the possession of real virtues can make us truly happy. Suidas calls this Ειδήμα a διήμα τῶν εἰς Αθήναν, an explanation which is not applicable to the work now extant, and some have therefore thought, that the Ειδήμα to which Suidas refers was a different work from the one we possess. This and other circumstances have led some critics to doubt whether our Ειδήμα is the work of the Theban Cebes, and to ascribe it to a later Cebes of Cyprus, a Stoic philosopher of the time of Marcus Aurelius. (Athen. iv. p. 156.) But the Ειδήμα which is now extant is manifestly written in a Socratic spirit and on Socratic principles, so that at any rate its author is much more likely to have been a Socratic than a Stoic philosopher. There are, it is true, a few passages (e. g. c. 13) where persons are mentioned belonging to a later age than that of the Theban CECUBES, but there is little doubt that this and a few similar passages are interpolations by a later hand, which cannot surprise us in the case of a work of such popularity as the Ειδήμα of Cebes. For, owing to its ethical character, it was formerly extremely popular, and the editions and translations of it are very numerous. It has been translated into all the languages of Europe, and even into Russian, modern Greek, and Arabic. The first edition of it was in a Latin translation by L. Odaxius, Bologna, 1497. In this edition, as in nearly all the subsequent ones, it is printed together with the "Institutiones et alia Opuscula" of C. Lascaris. This was followed by a great number of other translations, among which we need notice only those of H. Wolf (Basel, 1550, 8vo.), the Leiden edition (1640, 4to.), with an Arabic translation by Eichmann of J. Cronovius (Amsterdam, 1689, 8vo.), J. Schultze (Hamburg, 1694, 12mo.), T. Hemsterhuis (Amsterdam, 1709, 12mo., together with some dialogues of Lucian), M. Meibom, and Adr. Relan (Utrecht, 1711, 4to.), and Th. Johnson. (London, 1720, 8vo.) The best modern editions are those of Schweighaeuser in his edition of Epictetus, and also he published an English translation (Strasburg, 1829, 16mo., and a new edition by A. Corvois in his edition of Epictetus, (Paris, 1826, 8vo.).

CEBREN (Κέβρης), a river-god in Trons, the father of Asterope or Hesperie and Oenome. (Apoll. viii. 318, xi. 521, xvi. 736.)

CEBRENES (Κέβρηνα), a river-god in Trons, the father of Asterope or Hesperie and Oenome. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5, &c.; Ov. Met. xi. 769.)

CEBRINES (Κέβρινα), a son of Priam, and charioteer of Hector, slain by Patroclus. (Horn. Lyr. Dirid. der Ilcllcn.)

CECIDESES (Κέκιδεσ), of Hermione, a very ancient Greek dithyrambic poet, whom Aristophanes (Nub. 981) reckons among those who belonged to the good old times, but had become obsolete in his own days. The Scholiast on that passage remarks, that Ceceides was also mentioned by the comic poet Continus in his "Panopte." (Comp. Suidas, s. v. Κέκιδεσ; Bode, Gesch. der Lyr. Dichter der Helen, ii. p. 303, note 1.) [L. S.]

CECROPS (Κέκροπος), according to Apollodorus (iii. 14. § 1, &c.) the first king of Aticus, which derived from him its name Cecropia, having previously borne the name of Acte. He is described as an antechthon, and is accordingly called a γαρνον, the upper part of whose body was human, while the lower was that of a dragon. Hence he is called διποτος γαρνον. (Hygin. Fbub. 48; Anton. Lib. 3; Diod. i. 28; Aristoph. Vesp. 438; Ov. Met. ii. 553.) Some ancients referred the epithet διποτος to marriage, of which tradition made him the founder. He was married to Agarua, the daughter of Actaeus, by whom he had a son, Eryxesthon, and three daughters, Agaraulos, Herse, and Pandrosus. (Apollod. i. c.; Paus. i. 2. § 5.) In his reign Poseidon called forth with his trident a well on the acropolis, which was known in later times by the name of the Erechthean well, from its being enclosed in the temple of Erechtheus. (Paus. i. 26. § 6; Herod. viii. 55.) The marine god now wished to take possession of the country; but Athene, 2 who entertained the same desire, planted an olive-tree on the hill of the acropolis, which continued and as she had taken Cecrops as her witness while she planted it, he decided in her favour when the possession of Attica was disputed between her and Poseidon, who had no witness to attest that he had created it. Cecrops is called in the Ancient legends as the author of the first elements of civilized life, such as marriage, the political division of Attica into twelve communities, and also as the introducer of a new mode of worship, inasmuch as he abolished the bloody sacrifices which had until then been offered to Zeus, and substituted cakes in their stead. (Paus. viii. 2. § 1; Strab. ix. p. 397; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1156.) The name of Cecrops occurs also in other parts of Greece, especially where there existed a town of the name of Athens, such as in Bocotia, where he is said to have founded the ancient towns of Atehoe and Elaeus on the river Trioton, and where he had a heron as a herald. Tradition there called him a son of Pandion. (Paus. ix. 33, § 1; Strab.
xix. p. 407.) In Euboea, which had likewise a town Athens, Cecrops was called a son of Erech-theus and Praxithea, and a grandson of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 1, 5; Paus. i. 5. § 3.) From these traditions it appears, that Cecrops must be regarded as a hero of the Pelasgian race; and Müller justly remarks, that the different mythical personages of this name connected with the towns in Bocotia and Euboea are only multiplications of the one original hero, whose name and story were transplanted from Attica to other places. The later Greek writers describe Cecrops as having imigrated into Greece with a band of colonists from Sais in Egypt (Diod. i. 29; SchoL Plut. Aen. iii. 211), a daughter of Ergeus (Hygin. Fab. 157), a daughter of Hyamus (Paus. x. 6. § 2; Diod. xii. p. 579; Apollod. ii. 1. § 3; Ov. ad Apollon. xix. 132.) [L. S.]

CEDRENUS, GEO'RGITUS (Τεταγος και Κε-δρινος), a Greek monk, of whose life nothing is known, lived in the eleventh century, and is the author, or rather compiler, of an historical work (Σελήνη Τηρίαλω) which begins with the creation of the world and goes down to the year 1057.
This extensive work is written in the form of annals, and must be perused with great caution, as its author was not only very deficient in historical knowledge, but shews a great want of judgment and a degree of credulity which may suit a writer of legends, but which becomes absurd and ridiculous in historians. The latter part of the Synopsis, which treats of events of which Cedrenus was a contemporary, is not quite so bad, but it still shews that the author was utterly unable to form a judgment respecting the times in which he lived. However, as the work is extensive and contains an abundance of facts, it may frequently be used in conjunction with other authors; but a careful writer will seldom make him his sole authority, except where he has copied good sources.
A great number of passages, may long episodes, of the Synopsis are also found in the Annals of Joannes Skylitzes Curapalates, the contemporary of Cedrenus, and the work has been often discussed, whether Curapalates copied Cedrenus or Cedrenus Curapalates. The work of Curapalates goes down to the year 1081, but the latter writer was a man of much more intellect and judgment than Cedrenus, and there is no doubt that Ce-renus was the plagiarist, although, of course, he have used only the first part of the annals of Curapalates. The style of Cedrenus is very harbarous. Oudin (Comment. de Script. Eccles.
vol. ii. p. 1130) thinks, but without sufficient evidence, that Cedrenus lived in the twelfth century.
The general Latin title of the Synopsis is "Compendium Historiarum ab Orbe Condita ad Orbus Commennum (1057)." The first edition, published by Xylander, Basel, 1596, fol., with a Latin translation and a preface, is very deficient, as Xylander perused an incomplete MS. A good edition was published by Goar and Fabrot, together with the Annals of Curapalates, Paris, 1647, 2 vols. fol., with a new translation, a glossary of barbarisms, and a preface of Fabrot. This edition is complete, or very nearly so, the editors having collated good MSS., and paid particular attention to the numerous passages taken from Curapalates; it belongs to the Paris collection of the Byzantine historians, and is reprinted in the Venice collection. The last edition is by Man-nuel Bekker, Bonn, 1838-39, 2 vols. in 8vo.; it is the revised French edition, and contains likewise the Annals of Curapalates. (The Prefaces of Giiis.)

Valerian. (Vopisc. Aurelian. 8.)

2. CEIONIUS BASUS, a friend of the emperor Aurelian, to whom the latter wrote a letter, preserved by Vopiscus (Aurelian. 31), respecting the destruction of Palmyra. His full name was Ceio-nius Virius Basus, and he was consul in A. D. 271.

4. CEONIUS JULIANUS, a friend of the historian
Vopiscus. (Vopisc. Firm. 2.)

CELAE'NO (ΚΑΛΑΕΝΟ), a Plain, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and by Poseidon the mother of Lycus and Euryppus, or, according to others, of Lycus and Chimærus by Prometheus. (Apollod.
iii. 10. § 1; Ov. Her. xix. 133; Scyl. ad Apollon.
Rhod. iv. 1561; Tzet. ad Lyogep. 132.)

There are several other mythological beings of this name: namely, a Harpy (Virg. Aen. iii. 211), a daughter of Ergeus (Hygin. Fab. 167), a daughter of Hyamus (Paus. vi. 6. § 2), a Damned (Strab. xii.
p. 579; Apollod. ii. 1. § 5), and an Amazon. (Diod.
iv. 16. 1.)

CELEDONES (Κελδονες), the soothing goddesses, were frequently represented by the ancients in works of art, and were believed to be endowed, like the Sirens, with a magic power of song. For this reason, they are compared to the Iynxes.
Hephaestus was said to have made their glorious images on the ceiling of the temple at Delphi.
CELEUS.

CELER. 1. A freedman of Atticus, in all probability. (Cic. ad Att. x. 1, xi. 4, xii. 8.)

2. A Roman knight, poisoned Junius Silanus at the instigation of Agrippina, in the first year of Nero's reign, a. d. 55. (Tac. Ann. xiii. i, 33.)

3. A Roman knight in the time of Domitian, was scourged to death in the comitium for having committed incest with Cornelia, a Vestal virgin, the instigation of Agrippina, in the first year of Nero's reign, a. d. 55. (Tac. Ann. xiii. i, 33.)

4. A freedman, to return to Syria, and was himself provided, and the hands of Galliena, a cousin it is said of the lawful monarch, invested the new prince with a robe snatched from the statue of a goddess. The downfall of Celsus was not less rapid than his elevation; he was slain on the seventh day, his body was devoured by dogs, and the loyal inhabitants of Sicca testified their devotion to the reign of Celsus by devising an insult to the memory of his rival unheard-of before that time. The effigy of the traitor was raised high upon a cross, round which the rabble danced in triumph. The names T. Cornelius rest upon the authority of medals published by Golzeus now universally recognised as spurious. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyrann.) [W. R.]

CELSUS (T. Cornelius), one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio. [Comp. Aurelius.] In the twelfth year of Gallicanus, a. d. 265, when usurpers were springing up in every quarter of the Roman world, a certain Celsus, who had never risen higher in the service of the state than the rank of a little tribune, living quietly at Cosa in Africa, in no way remarkable except as a man of upright life and commanding person, was suddenly proclaimed emperor by Vibiust Passianus, proconsul of the province, and Fabius Pomponianus, general of the Libycon frontier. So sudden was the movement, that the appropriate trappings of dignity had not been provided, and the hands of Galliena, a cousin it is said of the lawful monarch, invested the new prince with a robe snatched from the statue of a goddess. CELER, a Greek rhetorician, a pupil of Libanius. (Liban. Ep. 527, 1531, Orat. xxvi. vol. ii. p. 606.)

CELER, an Epicurean, who lived in the time of the Antonines, and was a friend of Lucian. There was another Celsus, a freedman of Atticus, in all probability. (Tac. Ann. xiii. i, 33.)

CELSUS, an Epicurean, Lucian dedicated his life of the magician Alexander, and in the course of it (§ 21) praises a work written by him against the belief in magic. But in the book against Christianity, Celsus stated with apparent approbation the opinion of the Platonists, that enchanters had power over all who have not raised themselves above the influence of sensuous nature (§ 98), but he was far too elevated to communion with the Deity ; the whole of which sentiment is inconsistent with the doctrine of Epicurus. Again, he talked of the soul's relation to God, of the spirit of man as immortal and derived from the Divinity, of evil spirits springing from the Saty and opposing the designs of God. All these are plainly the sentiments, not of an Epicurean, but of a Platonist. Indeed, the only reason for supposing the author of this work to be the Epicurean Celsus, is the positive assertion of Origen, who, however, is obliged to have recourse to some curious hypotheses to account for the prevalence of the Platonic element. One is, that the author chose to conceal his real views, because there was at the time a strong prejudice against Epicureans as deniers of all religion, and therefore unfit to be judges of the merits of Christianity. But this seems improbable, and on the whole it is better to suppose Celsus the Epicurean and Celsus the author of this book to be different persons. With regard to the work itself, it is a mixture of self-sufficiency, ignorance, and inconsistency. In one place the author reproached the Christians as slaves of a blind belief, in another with their numerous sects and ever-changing opinions. Sometimes he spoke of them as the slaves of their senses (ἡ δέον καὶ φιλοσοφόν τίνος), on another occasion as persons who rejected all external worship whatever. He was indignant that the Christian promises are offered to sinners, and said in reference to our Lord's coming to save them, τί ἦν τοῦ δοκίμου, τί ἡ ἀπεισοδία; he also argued a priori against the doctrines of a special Providence, the Fall, and the Redemption, asserting that God made his work perfect once for all, and had no need to improve it afterwards. (Origenes, adv. Cels.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. Per. ii., i. 2, 8; Neander, Geschiichte der Christl. Kirche, vol. i. sect. 2.) [G. E. L. C.]

CELSUS ALBINOVANUS, the secretary of Tib. Claudius Nero, and a friend of Horace, to whom the latter addressed one of his Epistles (i. 8). He is thought to be the same as the post-Celsus mentioned in another of Horace's Epistles (i. 3), in which he is said to have compiled his poems from other persons' writings. He must not be confounded with the post-Pedro Albinovanus, the friend of Ovid. [ALBINOVANUS.]

CELSUS, APPULEIUS, a physician of Centuria in Sicily, who was the tutor of Valens and Scribonius Largus (Scrib. Larg. De Compos. Medicam. cap. 94, 171), and who must therefore have lived about the beginning of the Christian era. He has been supposed to be the author of the work entitled Herbarum, seu de Medicamentibus Herbarum, which goes under the name of Appuleius Barbarus [APPULEIUS], but this is probably not the case. He may, however, perhaps be the person who is quoted several times in the Geoponica, Cantab. 8vo. 1704. [W. A. G.]

CELSUS, ARBUNTIUS, an ancient commentator on Terence, who probably lived in the second half of the fourth century of the Christian era. (Schopen, De Tertuo et Donato, Bonn, 1821.)

CELSUS, A. CORNELIUS, a very celebrated Latin writer on medicine, of whose age, origin, or even actual profession, we know but little. There are some incidental expressions which lead to the conjecture, that he lived at the beginning of the Christian era, under the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius; and particularly the mode in which he refers to Themison (Prum. lib. i. pp. 5, 9, iii. 4, p. 43) would indicate that they were either contemporaries, or that Themison preceded him by a short period only. With respect to the country of Celsus (though he has been claimed as a native of Verona), we have nothing on which to ground our opinion, except the purity of his style, which at most would prove no more than that he had been educated or had passed a considerable part of his life at Rome. With regard to his profession, there is some reason to doubt whether he was a practitioner of medicine or whether he only studied it as a branch of general science, after the manner of some of the ancient Greek philosophers. This doubt has arisen principally from the mode in which he is referred to by Columella (De Re Rust. i. 1. 14) and by Quintilian (xii. 11), and by his not being enumerated by Pliny among the physicians of Rome in his sketch of the history of medicine. (H. N. xix. 1, &c.) But, on the other hand, his work appears to bear very strong evidence that he was an actual practitioner, that he was familiar with the phenomena of disease and the operation of remedies, and that he described and recommended what fell under his own observation, and was sanctioned by his own experience; so that it seems upon the whole most probable that he was a physician by profession, but that he devoted some of his time and attention to the cultivation of literature and general science. Quintilian speaks rather slightly of him, calls him (xii. 11) "mediocri vir ingenio," and says he not only wrote on all sorts of literary matters, but even on agriculture and military tactics.

Of these numerous works only one remains entire, his celebrated treatise on Medicine; but a few fragments of a work on Rhetoric were published under his name in 1569, 8vo., Colon., with the title "Aurelii Corneli Celsi, Rhetor..."

The treatise of Celsus "De Medicina," De Medecine, is divided into eight books. It commences with a judicious sketch of the history of medicine, terminating by a comparison of the two rival sects, the Dogmatici and the Empirici, which has been given in the Dict. of Ant. pp. 350, 379. The first two books are principally occupied by the consideration of diet, and the general principles of therapeutics and pathology; the remaining books are devoted to the consideration of particular diseases and their treatment; the third and fourth to internal diseases; the fifth and sixth to external diseases, and to pharmaceutical preparations; and the last two to those diseases which more particularly belong to surgery. In the treatment of disease, Celsus, for the most part, pursues the method of Asclepiades of Bithynia; he is not, however, seriously attached to him, and never hesitates to adopt any practice or opinion, however contrary to his, which he conceives to be sanctioned by direct experience. He adopted to a certain extent the Hippocratic method of observing and watching over the operations of Nature, and of regulating rather than opposing them,—a method which, with respect to acute diseases, may frequently appear inert. But there are occasions on which he displays considerable decision and boldness, and particular in the use of the lance, which he employed with more freedom than any of his predecessors. His regulations for the employment of blood-letting and of purgatives are laid down with minuteness and precision (ii. 10, &c., p. 30, &c.); and, although he was in some measure led astray by his hypothesis of the crudity and concoction of the humours, the rules which he prescribed were not very different from those which were generally adopted in the commencement of the present century. His description of the symptoms of fever, and of the different varieties which it assumes, either from the nature of the epidemic, or from the circumstances under which it took place (iii. 3, &c., p. 43, &c.), are correct and judicious; his practice was founded upon the principle already referred to, of watching the operations of Nature, conceiving that fever consisted essentially in an effort of the constitution to throw off some morbid cause, and that, if not unduly interfered with, the process would terminate in a state of health. We here see the germ of the doctrine of the "vis medicatrix Naturae," which has had so much influence over the practice of the most enlightened physicians of modern times, and which, although erroneous, has perhaps led to a less hazardous practice than the hypotheses which have been substituted in its room.

But perhaps the most curious and interesting parts of the work of Celsus are those which treat of surgery and surgical operations, of which some account is given in the Dict. of Ant. art. Chirurgia. It is very remarkable that he is almost the first writer who professedly treats on these topics, and yet his descriptions of the diseases and of their treatment prove that the art had attained to a very considerable degree of perfection. Many of what are termed the "capital" operations seem to have been well understood and frequently practised, and it may be safely asserted, that the state of surgery at the time when Celsus wrote, was comparatively much more advanced than that of medicine. The Pharmacy of Celsus forms another curious and interesting part of his work, and, like his surgery, marks a state of considerable improvement in this branch of the art. Many of his formulae are well arranged and efficacious, and, on the whole, they may be said to be more correct and even more scientific than the multifarious compounds which were afterwards introduced into practice, and which were not completely discarded until our own times. The style of Celsus has been much admired, and it is in fact equal in purity and elegance to that of the best writers of the Augustan period, unless Celsus the father attained to an unusual degree of perfection. This is probably one of the chief reasons of his work having been chosen as a text-book in modern times; but it would be great injustice to suppose that this is its only merit, or that it contains nothing but a judicious and well-arranged abstract of what had been said by his predecessors. Some instances of his lax and inaccurate use of certain anatomical terms are mentioned in the Dict. of Ant. art. Physiologia; but his anatomical and physiological knowledge does not appear to have been at all inferior to that of his contemporaries. In many passages of his work he follows Hippocrates, especially when treating of the general symptoms and phenomena of diseases; and occasionally we meet with sentences literally translated from the Greek. He does not, however, by any means blindly embrace his doctrines, and differs from him occasionally both in theory and practice.

The work of Celsus, entitled De Medicina Libri Octo, has been published very often; Choulant mentions four editions in the fifteenth century, fifteen in the sixteenth, five in the seventeenth, thirteen in the eighteenth, and twelve in the first thirty-five years of the nineteenth. The first edition was published at Florence, 1478, small fol., edited by Barthol. Pontius; it is said to be very scarce, and is described by Dibden in his Biblioth. Spec. i. 303. Perhaps the other editions that best deserve to be noticed are those by Van der Linden, Lugd. Bat. 1657, 12mo.; and by T. Pellet, Paris, 1662, 4to. (which was several times reprinted); Targa, Patav. 1769, 4to. (whose text has been the basis of most subsequent editions); Lugd. Bat. 1785, 4to.; Argent. 1806, 8vo. 2 vols.; and Milligan, Edinb. 1826, 8vo. The latest edition mentioned by Choulant is that by F. Ritter and H. Albers, Colon. ad Rhem. 1835, 12mo. The work has been translated into English, French, Italian, and German. The English translations appear to have been chiefly made for the use of medical students in London who are preparing for their examination at Apothecaries' Hall, and are not very good. A great number of works have been published on Celsus and his writings, which are enumerated by Choulant, but which cannot be mentioned here. Further particulars respecting his medical opinions may be found in Le Clerc's Hist. de la Méd.; Hailer's Biblioth. Méd. Prat. vol. i.; and Spengel's Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii.

CELSUS, JULIUS, a scholar at Constantinople in the seventh century after Christ, who made a recension of the text of Caesar's Commentaries, whence we find subjoined to many MSS. of Caesar, Julius Cæs. Vitr. Clarissimns et Comes recons., or Julius Cæs. Constantius Y. C. legi. Many modern writers, indeed, have maintained that Celsus was the author of these commentaries, and still more have attributed to him the works on the Spanish and African wars; but the former supposition is ridiculous, and the latter destitute of proof. Julius Cæs. has been usually regarded as the author of the life of Caesar, which has been frequently printed with the editions of Caesar's Commentaries under the title of Iulii Cæsi Commentarior. de Vita Caesar.; but this work has been proved by C. E. C. Schneider (Petrarchae, Historia Julli Caesaris, Lips. 1827) to be a work of Petrarch's. There is a dissertation on Julius Cæs. by Dodwell, appended to his Annales Quincentiliani et Statiani, Oxon. 1798.

CELSUS, JUVENTIUS, a Roman jurist, who flourished, as Majancius and Heineccius have clearly shewn, in the second half of the first century of the Christian era. He succeeded Pegasus, the follower of Proculus, and was himself succeeded by Celsus, the son, and Neratius Priscus. (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 47.) He belonged (at least on one occasion) to the consilium of the consul Dcennius Verus, who was probably a consul suffectus, and is nowhere named except in Dig. 31. s. 29. The numerous attempts of learned men to identify Dcennus with recorded consuls are without ground, and most of their conjectures refer to too late a period, unless Celsus the father attained to an unusual age. Thus Wieling (Jurisprudentia Restitua, p. 351) and Guil. Grotius (De Vitis Jurispr. e. 2. § 2) make Dcennus the same as L. Cejovius Commodus Verus, who was consul a. d. 106. Others are for L. Annus Verus, consul a. d. 121. Ant. Augustins (De Nominalium Propriis Pseudo., s. 1. 11.) considers Dcennus to be a certain person to whom he might have been the Juvenius Verus, who was consul for the third time a. d. 134. Heineccius (Hist. Jur. Civ. § 241, n.) is for Decennius Gemi-Celsus, the son of a Roman jurist, was both a jurist and an author. He was a member of the upper class and enjoyed the favor of].[1] His works, including his "De Coniectura," are of great importance in the history of Roman law. He was a great admirer of Greek philosophy and was influenced by the Stoics.

Celsus' works were widely read and were considered to be authoritative. His views on law and philosophy were respected by many of his contemporaries and were later used by others as a basis for their own work. Celsus was known for his logical and systematic approach to law, and his works were often used as a basis for legal education in later centuries.

Celsus was also known for his clever and witty sayings. He was said to have been a master of language and was able to express himself in a concise and elegant manner. His works have been widely translated and have influenced the development of legal thought in many different cultures.

In conclusion, Celsus was a significant figure in the history of Roman law and philosophy. He was a great jurist and a distinguished author whose works continue to be studied and admired today.
written was thereby disqualified from being one of the attest ing witnesses. "Juventius Celsus Labeoni sae spulerem. Aut non intelligo de quo me consulseris, aut valde stulta est consulter tuis; plus enim quam ridiculum est dubitare, an aliquis juris testis adhibitus sit, quominum idem et tabulas testamenti scripsisset." (Dig. 26, tit. 1, s. 27.) This question and this answer obtained such celebrity among civilians, that silly questions were called Quaestiones Domitiana, and blunt answers Respnsiones Celsinae.

He wrote—1. Digestorum Libri XXXIX, after the order of the praetor's edict. Seven books of this work, viz. xxx—xxxvi, were occupied by a commentary on the Lex Julia et Papia Poppaea. This is the only one of the works of Celsus of which pure fragments are preserved in the compilations of Justinian, and perhaps the only one they esteem. It belongs, according to Blume's theory, to the Classis Edictalis of the Digest. 2. Epistulae, of which Ulpius (Dig. 4, tit. 4, s. 3, § 1) cites the 11th book. 3. A treatise on evidence, according to a citation of Ulpian (Dig. 34, tit. 2, s. 19, § 3), consisted of at least 19 books. 4. Commentarii, of which the 7th book is cited by Ulpian. (Dig. 34, tit. 2, s. 19, § 6.) 5. Institutiones, in 7 books, according to the testimony of the old scholiast on Juvenal (vi. 243). Gravina (Orig. Jur. Civ. Ist, i. § 49, p. 68) says, that Celsus left a work Den usuripilionibus, in which he refers to his father; but this statement is given without authority, and appears to be an error partly copied from Pancreoli (de Claris Leg. Interp. p. 44), who cites a passage in the Digest (Dig. 41, tit. 2, s. 47) referring not to Celsus, but to Nero filius. (Heinenc. de Iuvintio Celsu, Op. ii. pp. 518—532; Schott. de Quaestiones Domitiana, Lips. 1771; Hub. Greg. van Vrithoff, Obscr. Jur. Civ. c. 35; Neuber, Die juristische Klassiker, pp. 133—145; Klümerer, Beiträge zur Gesch. u. Theorie des Röm. Rechts, i. No. 3, pp. 208—226.) [J. T. G.]

CELSUS, P. MA'RIUS, consul in a. d. 62 (Pasta), was the commander of the fifteenth legion in Pannonia, with which he was sent to join Corbulo in his expedition against the Parthians in 64. On the death of Nero in 68, Celsus joined Galba's party, at which time he is spoken of as consul designate, but whether he had been nominated to the consulate by Nero or by Galba is uncertain. He was one of the ablest and most faithful of Galba's supporters; and when the troops rebelled against the new emperor, Celsus was sent to endeavour to propitiate the detachment of the Illyrian army which had encamped in the Vipsanian portion. It was probably thought that Celsus would have more influence with this army than any one else, on account of his former connexion with it; but he was unable to quell the insurrection. The death of Galba soon followed, and Otho obtained the sovereignty. The life of Celsus was now in great danger; the partizans of Otho loudly demanded his execution; but Otho, who appreciated his fidelity to his late master, not only spared his life, but admitted him to the circle of his most intimate friends. Celsus served Otho with the same fidelity as he had the late emperor. He was sent, together with Suetonius Paulinus and Annius Gallus, in command of the army to oppose the generals of Vitellius, who were advancing into Italy. At first he and his colleagues were completely successful; in the campaign on the Po, in the neighbourhood of Placentia and Cremona, they defeated all the plans of Cæcina, the general of Vitellius [Cæcina, No. 9]; and it was not till the latter had been joined by Fabius Valens, and Otho had resolved, against the advice of Celsus as well as Suetonius Paulinus, to risk a battle, that the aspect of affairs was changed. The battle of Bedriacum, in which Otho's army was defeated, gave Vitellius the empire; but Celsus, who had remained faithful to Otho to the last, again did not suffer for his fidelity. Vitellius allowed him to enter on the consulship on the calends of July (A. d. 69), as had been arranged from the first. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 25, Hist. i. 14, 31, 39, 45, 71, 77, 87, 90, ii. 23, 43, 60.)

CELSUS, PA'PIUS. Celsus appears as a surname of the Papia gens on several coins of the republican period, but does not occur in any ancient writer. Two of the most remarkable of these coins are given below. On the obverse the former contains a youthful head with a trophy behind it, and the latter the head of Juno Sospita. The reverse of both represents the same subject, namely, a wolf with a piece of wood in its mouth, and an eagle standing before a burning heap of wood. This subject appears to refer to a legend related by Dionysius (l. 59) in connexion with the foundation of Lavinium by the Trojans. He tells us, that in the forest in which the city was afterwards built took fire of its own accord, and that a wolf was seen bringing dry wood to feed the flame, which was fanned by an eagle with its wings; but that a fox at the same time tried to extinguish the fire by its tail, which had been dipped in water; and that it was not till after several efforts that the wolf and eagle were able to get rid of him. Now we know that the Papia gens came originally from Lanuvium, which was also one of the chief seats of the worship of Juno Sospita. Hence it has been conjectured, that Dionysius has made a mistake in referring this legend to Lavinium: but it is not improbable that the same story may have been told, in later times, of the foundation of each city.

CELSUS, L. PUBLICIUS, consul under Trajan in a. d. 115 (Pasta), was so much esteemed by this emperor, that he had a statue erected to his honour. He was, however, a personal enemy of Hadrian's, and accordingly the latter caused him to be put to death at Baine immediately after his accession, a. d. 117. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 16, lxxx. 2; Spartian. Hadr. 4, 7.)

CENAEUS (Κεναεος), a surname of Zeus, derived from cape Cenaeum in Euboea, on which the Censorinus, a name of a plebeian family of the Marcia gens. The name of this family was originally Rutilus, and the first member of it who acquired the name of Censorinus, was C. Marcus Rutilus [No. 1, below], who is said in the Capitoline Fasti to have received this surname in his second censorship, b. c. 265. Niebuhr, however, remarks (Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 556), that this statement is doubtful, as he might have derived it from the circumstance of his father having first gained for the plebs a share in this dignity.

1. C. MARCIUS C. F. L. N. RUTILUS CENSORINUS, was the son of C. Marcus Rutilus, the first plebeian dictator (b. c. 356) and censor (a. d. 351). He was consul in b. c. 310 with Q. Fabius Maximus, and while his colleague was engaged in his brilliant campaign in Etruria, Rutilus conducted the war in Samnium and took the town of Allifae. He afterwards fought a battle with the Samnites, in which he was probably defeated; for the statement of Livy, that the battle was a drawn one, is almost outweighed by his confession, that the consuls himself was wounded and a legate and several tribunes of the soldiers killed. (Livy ix. 33, 38; Dion. xx. 27.)

On the admission of the plebs to the priestly colleges by the Oghulan law in b. c. 300, by which also the number of the senators was increased, Rutilus was elected one of the pontiffs. (Livy x. 9.) He was censor with P. Cornelius Arvina in 294 (Livy x. 47), and a second time with Cn. Cornelius Blasio in 265, the only instance in which a person held the office of censor twice. It is mentioned above that he is said to have received the surname of Censorinus in this honour. After his election Rutilus rebuked the people for having conferred this dignity upon him again, and brought forward a law enacting that no one in future should be eligible to this office a second time. (Livy Epit. 16; Eutrop. ii. 19; Val. Max. iv. 1. § 3; Plut. Coriol. 1.)

2. L. MARCIUS C. F. C. N. CENSORINUS, consul with M. Manilius in b. c. 49, the first year of the third Punic war. Both consuls were ordered to proceed to Carthage; the command of the army was entrusted to Manilius, and that of the fleet to Censorinus. In the negotiations between the consuls and Carthaginians which preceded actual hostilities, and of which Appian has given us a detailed account, Censorinus acted as spokesman because he was the better orator. After the Carthaginians had refused compliance with the commands of the Romans, who required them to abandon Carthage and build another town not more than ten miles from the sea, the consuls formally laid siege to the city; but Censorinus was compelled shortly afterwards to return to Rome in order to hold the comitia, leaving the conduct of the siege in the hands of his colleague. (Appian, P. H. 91—90, 97—99; Liv. Epit. 49; Flor. ii. 15; Eutrop. iv. 10; Oros. iv. 22; Vell. Pat. i. 13; Zonar. ix. p. 463; Cic. Brut. 15, 27, ad Att. xii. 5.) Censorinus was censor in b. c. 147, with

It was to this Censorinus that the philosopher Cleitomenes dedicated one of his works. (Cic. Acad. ii. 32.)

3. C. MARCIUS CENSORINUS, one of the leading men of the Marian party, is first mentioned as the accuser of Sulla on his return from Asia in b. c. 91. (Plut. Sull. 5.) He entered Rome together with Marius and Cinna in b. c. 37, and took a leading part in the massacres which then ensued. It was Censorinus who killed the consul Octavius, the first victim of the persecution; he cut off his head and carried it to Cinna, who commanded it to be hung up on the rostra. Censorinus shared in the vicissitudes of the Marian party, and took an active part in the great campaign of b. c. 92, which established the supremacy of Sulla. He had the command of one of the Marian armies, and is first mentioned as suffering a defeat from Pompey near Sena. He was afterwards sent with eight legions by the consul Carbo to relieve the younger Marius, who was kept besieged at Praeneste; but on his march thither, he was attacked from an ambush by Pompey, and was compelled after considerable loss to take refuge on a neighbouring hill. His men, believing him to be the cause of their defeat, deserted him in a body, with the exception of seven cohorts, with which miserable remnant he was compelled to return to Carbo. When Carbo shortly afterwards abandoned Italy in despair, Censorinus united his forces with those of Brutus Damasippus and Carrinas, and these three generals, after an ineffectual attempt to force the passes of Praeneste with the object of relieving the town, abandoned their army and marched thither, hoping to take it after a siege; it was destitute of men and provisions. Sulla, however, hastened after them, and a dreadful battle was fought near the Colline gate, which ended in the total defeat of the Marian army. Censorinus and Carrinas took to flight, but were overtaken and brought back to Sulla, who commanded them to be put to death, and their heads to be cut off and carried round the walls of Praeneste to inform Marius of the fate of his friends. (Appian, B. C. i. 71, 88, 90, 92, 93.) Censorinus is spoken of by Cicero as one of the orators of his time, and as tolerably well versed in Greek literature. (Brut. 67, 90.)

4. (MARIUS) CENSORINUS, one of the friends of Q. Cicero in Asia, b. c. 59 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 4), may possibly be the same as the following.

5. L. MARCIUS L. F. C. N. CENSORINUS, a violent partizan of M. Antony, and one of the praetors in n. c. 43. (Cic. Phil. vi. 5, 14, xii. 2, duo praetores, xii. 8; comp. Gurton. ad xii. 8.) When Antony passed over into Asia after arranging the affairs of Greece in n. c. 41, he left Censorinus governor of the province. (Plut. Auton. 24.)

His adherence to Antony procured him the consulsip in 39 (Dion Cass. xlvii. 34), and we learn from the Triumphal Fasti, that he obtained a triumph for some successes he had gained in Macedonia, which must consequently have been his province. (C. MARCIUS L. F. L. CENSORINUS, son of No. 5, was consul in b. c. 8 (Dion Cass. iv. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxii. 10, s. 47; Censorin. 29; Sueton. Vit. Horat. ; Lapis Ancyrenus), and seems to have obtained subsequently the government of Syria, from the way in which he is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xvi. 5. § 2) in the decade of Augustus;
CENSORINUS.

There are several interesting coins of the Marcia gens, bearing upon them the names of C. Censorinus and L. Censorinus; but it is impossible to determine to which of the preceding Censorini they belong. Five specimens of these coins are given below. The first three contain on the obverse the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius, the second and fourth kings of Rome, because the Carrie, in his Numismata (Mediol. 1683), quotes a Greek coin supposed to be the third year of the reign of Censorinus; but, since no account is given of the place where it was preserved, it was in all probability a forgery, especially as we have no reason to believe that the pretender maintained his authority beyond the space of a few days. Tillemont supposes, that the Victorinus mentioned by the younger Victor as having assumed the purple under Claudius is the same person with our Censorinus. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. CENSORINUS, the compiler of a treatise entitled De Die Natalis, which treats of the generation of man, of his natal hour, of the influence of the stars and genii upon his career, and discusses the various methods employed for the division and calculation of time, together with sundry topics connected with astronomy, mathematics, geography, and music. It affords much valuable information with regard to the various systems of ancient chronology, and is constantly referred to by those who have investigated these topics.

Censorinus, having devoted his youth and manhood to a military career, attained to the highest dignities. He was twice consul, twice praefect of the praetorium, thrice praefect of the city, four times proconsul, and discharged at various periods the duties of numerous inferior appointments. Full of years, and disabled by an honourable wound received in the Persian war, under Valerian, he had retired to pass the evening of his days on his estate, when he was suddenly proclaimed emperor by a body of mutinous troops, and invested with the purple at Bologna, in A. D. 270. Having, however, displayed a determination to enforce strict discipline, he was forthwith put to death by the same soldiers who had raised him to a throne. If any genuine medals of this prince exist, which is very doubtful, they have never been described with sufficient accuracy to render them of any historical value, or even to determine whether the names Appius Claudius formed part of his designation.

Birago, in his Numismata (Mediol. 1683), quotes a Greek coin supposed to be the third year of the reign of Censorinus; but, since no account is given of the place where it was preserved, it was in all probability a forgery, especially as we have no reason to believe that the pretender maintained his authority beyond the space of a few days. Tillemont supposes, that the Victorinus mentioned by the younger Victor as having assumed the purple under Claudius is the same person with our Censorinus. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. The book is dedicated to a certain Q. Cerialius, whom the writer addresses as his patron and benefactor (c. 1), and was composed in the year A. D. 238, in the consulship of Ulpius and Pontianus (c. 21). Censorinus terms Rome the "communis patria" of himself and Cerialius (c. 16); and this fact, along with those detailed above, comprise the whole knowledge we possess with regard to the work and its author. A fragment de Metris and lost tracts de Accentibus and de Geometriae are ascribed, but upon no sure evidence, to this same Censorinus. Carrio, in his...
as regards the origin of the notion respecting the centaurs, we must remember, in the first place, that bull-hunting on horseback was a national custom in Thessaly (Schol. ad Pind. p. 319 ed. Boeckh), and, secondly, that the Thessalians in early times spent the greater part of their lives on horseback. It is therefore not improbable that the Thessalian mountaineers may at some early period have made upon their neighbouring tribes the same impression as the Spaniards did upon the Mexicans, namely, that horse and man were one being. The centaurs were frequently represented in ancient works of art, and it is here that the idea of them is most fully developed. There are several genera, of which the Hippocentaurs is the best represented in works of art. In the first they appear as men down to their legs and feet, but the hind part consists of the body, tail, and hind legs of a horse (Paus. v. 19. § 2); the second form, which was probably not used before the time of Phidias and Alcamenes, represents the centaurs as men from the head to the loins, and the remainder is the body of a horse with its four feet and tail. (Paus. v. 10. § 2; Plin. H.N. xxxvi. 4.) It is probably owing to the resemblance between the nature of the centaurs and that of the satyrs, that the former were in later times drawn into the sphere of Dionysiac beings; but here they appear merely as savage monsters, but as tamed by the power of the god. They either draw the chariot of the god, and play the horn or lyre, or they appear in the train of Dionysus, among the Satyrs, Fauns, Nymphs, Erotes, and Bacchantes. It is remarkable that there were also female centaurs, who are said to have been of great beauty. (Philos. Ion. ii. 3; comp. Voss. Mythol. Briefe, ii. p. 265, &c.; Böttiger, Vasenjem. iii. p. 75, &c.)

C. CENTENIUS, propraetor in n.c. 217, was sent by the consuls Cn. Servilius Geminus from the neighbourhood of Ariminum with 4000 cavalry to the assistance of his colleague C. Flaminius in Etruria, whom he intended to join with all his troops. Centenius took possession of a narrow pass in Umbria near the lake Plistina, so called from a town, Plistia, in its neighbourhood; and here, after Hannibal's victory at the Tuminean lake, he was attacked by Maharbal, one of Hannibal's officers, and defeated; those of his troops that were not killed took refuge on a hill, but were compelled to surrender next day. Appian, who is the only writer that gives us the exact place of this defeat, confounds C. Centenius with the M. Centenius mentioned below. (Polyb. ill. 86; Liv. xxii. 8; Appian, Anab. 9—11, 17; Zonar. viii. 25; C. Nepos. Fab. 12—13.)

C. CENTENIUS PENULA, first centurion of the triarii (prima pilum), who had obtained his discharge after serving his full military time, and was distinguished for his bravery, obtained from the senate in n. c. 212 the command of 8000 men, half of whom were Roman citizens and half allies, by his assurance that his knowledge of the enemy and the country would enable him to gain some great advantage in a short time. The number of men granted him by the senate was nearly doubled by volunteers; and with these he marched into Lucania, offered battle to Hannibal, and was, as a matter of course, defeated. (Liv. xxv. 19; Oros. iv. 17.)

CENTHO, a surname of C. Claudius, consul n. c. 240. [CLAUDIUS.] CENTALUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Fulvia gens.
1. CN. FULVIUS CN. F. CN. N. MAXIMUS CENTALUS, legate of the dictator M. Valerius Corvinus in the Etruscan war, b. c. 301, and consul in 298 with L. Cornelius Selpio, when he gained a brilliant victory over the Samnites near Boianum, and afterwards took this town and Aufidna. It would also appear that he subsequently obtained some successes in Etruria, as the Capitoline Fasti speak of his triumph in this year as celebrated over the Samnites and Etruscans. In 295 he served as propraetor in the great campaign of Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Decius Mus, and gained a victory over the Etruscans. (Liv. x. 4, 11, 22, 26, 27, 30.)

The Fasti Capitolini mention a dictator of this name in 356, who is either the same as the preceding, or his son.
2. CN. FULVIUS CN. F. CN. N. CENTALUS, consul b. c. 229 with L. Postumius Albinus, conducted the war with his colleague in Illyria. They met with no effectual resistance; and after the troops of the Illyrian queen, Teuta, had been completely dispersed, and she herself had retired with was represented. (Paus. i. 3. § 1, iii. 18. § 7.)

Fulvia gens. Hist. Grace, and afterwards took this town and Aufidna. It is unknown, but he is called by Dionysius Troica (a brilliant victory over the Samnites near Bovianum, after the taking of Troy, called 298 with L. Cornelius Scipio, when he gained a victory over the Etruscans. He wrote an account of the fortunes of Aeneas and consul in named 589.)

He would also appear that he subsequently obtained some successes in Etruria, as the Capitoline Fasti speak of his triumph in the year 245, which went under his name, in reality the work of Hegesianax of Alexandria. (Vossius, de Hist. Gracc. p. 412, ed. Westermann.)

CEPHALUS (Kéφaluos). 1. A son of Hermes and Herse, was carried off by Eos, who became by him the mother of Tithonus in Syria. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 3.) Hyginus (Fab. 160, 270) makes him a son of Hermes by Crousa, or of Pandion, and Hesiod (Theog. 986) makes Phaidon the son of Cephalus instead of Tithonus. On the pediment of the winged Stoa in the Cercamones at Athens, and on the temple of Apollo at Amyclae, the carrying off of Cephalus by Hemera (not Eos) was represented. (Paus. i. 3. § 1, 11. 18. 7.)

2. A son of Deion, the ruler of Phocis, and Dione, was married to Procris or Proeno, by whom he became the father of Archius, the father of Laerxes. He is described as likewise beloved by Eos (Apollod. i. 8. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 125; Schol. ad Catull. x. 8, 216, 290, &c.) but he was also called Procris were sincerely attached, and promised to remain faithful to each other. Once when the handsome Cephalus was amusing himself with the chase, Eos approached him with loving entreaties, which, however, he rejected. The goddess then bore him not break his vow until Procris had broken hers, but advised him to try her fidelity. She then metamorphosed him into a stranger, and gave him rich presents with which he was to tempt Procris. The goddessa made a present to break the vow she had made to Cephalus and when she recognized her husband, she fled to Crete and discovered herself to Artemis. The goddess made her a present of a dog and a spear, which were never to miss their object, and then sent her back to Cephalus. This she returned home in the disguise of a youth, and went out with Cephalus to chase. When he perceived the excellence of her dog and spear, he proposed to buy them of her; but she refused to part with them for any price except for love. When he accordingly promised to love her, she made herself known to him, and he became reconciled to her. As, however, she still feared the love of Eos, she always jealously watched him when he went out hunting, but on one occasion he killed her by accident with the never-erring spear. (Hygin. Fab. 193.) Some what different versions of the same story are given by Apollod. (i. 15. § 1) and Ovid. (Met. viii. 394, &c.; comp. Anton. Lihn. 41; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1643.)

Subsequently Amphitrion of Thebes came to Cephalus, and persuaded him to give up his dog to hunt the fox which was ravaging the Cadmean territory. After doing this he went out with Amphitrion against the Teleboans, upon the conquest of whom he was rewarded by Amphitrion with the island which he called after his own name Cephalallia. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 7; Strab. x. p. 456; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 307, &c.) Cephalus is also called the father of Iphicles by Clymen.
CEPHALUS.

He is said to have put an end to his life by leaping into the sea from Cape Lycus, on which he had built a temple of Apollo, in order to atone for having killed his wife Procris. (Strab. x. p. 452; comp. Paus. i. 37. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 40.)

CEPHALUS (Κέφαλος), a Molossian chief, who, together with another chief, Antinous, was driven by the calumnies of Charops to take the side of Perseus, in self-defence, against the Romans. [ANTINOUS.] Some have inferred from the language of Polybius that, after the outbreak of the war, Cephalus slew himself to avoid falling into the hands of the conquerors; but Livy tells us, that he was killed at the capture of the Molossian town of Teemon, which he had obstinately defended against L. Anicius, the Roman commander, a. c. 167. Polybius speaks of him as "a man of wisdom and consistency," φρονίμος καὶ στάτωμα διέφθερος. (Polyb. xxvii. 15, xxx. 7; Liv. xiii. 18, 22, xiv. 26.)

CEPHALUS (Κέφαλος), 1. The mother of Lykianus, grandfather of Cephalus, and father of the orator Lysias, was a Syracusan by birth, but went to Athens at the invitation of Pericles, where he lived thirty years, till his death, taking a part in public affairs, enjoying considerable wealth, and having so high a reputation that he never had an action brought against him. He is one of the speakers in Plato's Republic.* (Lys. c. Eratosth. p. 120, 26, ed. Stephe.; Plat. Repub. p. 328, b., c., comp. Cic. ad Att. iv. 16; Taylor's Life of Lykianus, in Reiske's Orators Graece.) He died at a very advanced age before B. c. 443, so that he must have settled at Athens before B. c. 443. (Clint. Fast. Hell. s. ann. 443.) He left three sons—Polemarchus, Lysias, and Butchus.

2. An eminent Athenian orator and demagogue of the Cleittemian family, who flourished at and after the time of the Thirty Tyrants, in effecting whose overthrow he appears to have borne a leading part. He is placed by Clinton at B. c. 402, on the authority of Deinarchus (c. Demosth. p. 100. 4, ed. Stephe.; comp. p. 95. 7-8.) This date is confirmed by DeMOSTHENES, who mentions him in connexion with Callistratus, Aristophanes, and Thucydides. (De Coron. p. 201.) He is summoned by Andocides to plead for him at the end of the oration De Mysteriis. (b. c. 400.) He flourished at least thirty years longer. Aeschines (who calls him ἄρωτος κατοηχόν καὶ διαχέον διηπιστήνον περι- νένα) relates, that, on one occasion, when he was opposed to Aristophanes, the latter boasted that he had been acquitted seventy-five times of accusations against his public conduct, but Cephalus replied, that during his long public life he had never been accused. (c. Oesiph. p. 81. 39, ed. Stephe.; see the answer of Dem. de Coron. p. 310-11.) He had a daughter named Oea, who was married to Cereora. (Suid. s. v.; Harpocrat. s. v. Olipther.)

Tzetzes (Cist. vi. Hist. 34) confounds this Cephalus with the father of Lysias. In spite of the coincidence on the point of never having been accused, they must have been different persons, at least if the date given above for the death of Lysias's father be correct.

* The Cephalus, who is one of the speakers in the Parmonides of Plato, was a different person, a native of Clazomenae. (Plat. Parm. p. 126.)

CEPHISODORUS.

The Scholiast on Aristophanes asserts, that the Cephalus whom the poet mentions (Ecdes. 248) as a scurrilous and low-born demagogue, but powerful in the Ecclesia, was not the same person as the orator mentioned by Demosthenes. This is perhaps a mistake, into which the Scholiast was led by the high respect with which Cephalus is referred to by Demosthenes, as well as by Aeschines and Deinarchus.

The attacks of an Athenian comic poet are no certain evidence of a public man's worthlessness.

According to Suidas (s. v.), Cephalus was the first orator who composed προσφωνα καὶ εἰπόνων. A small fragment from him is preserved in the Bythologium Magnum (s. v. ΕΤΡΥΜΙΑ). Athenaeus (xiii. p. 592, c.) states, that he wrote an εἰπόνων on the celebrated courtezan Logis (or Laïs), the mistress of Lysias. Ruhnken (Hist. Crit. Orat. Græc. § 5) supposes, that the writer mentioned by Athenaeus was a different person from the orator, but his only reason for this opinion is, that such an εἰπόνων is unworthy of a distinguished orator.

[30x1159]668

CEPHISODORUS (Κήφισοδόρος). 1. A son of Babel and husband of Cassiepsis, was king of Ethiopia and father of Andromeda. (Apollod. ii. i. § 4, 4. § 3; Herod. vii. 61; Tac. Hist. v. 2.)

2. A son of Auleos and Neenera or Cleobule, and an Argonaut from Tegea in Arcadia, of which he was king. He had twenty sons and two daughters, and nearly all of his sons perished in an expedition which they had undertaken with Hercules. The town of Cephyle was believed to have derived its name from him. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16, ii. 7. § 3, iii. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. i. 161; Hygin. Fab. 111; Paus. viii. 8. § 23, 5. §.)

3. One of the Calydonian hunters. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2.)

CEPHISODORUS (Κήφισοδόρος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, gained a prize in B. c. 402. (Lysias, Δεομ ν. 162. 2, ed. Stephe.; Suidas, s. v.; Euthyd. xvi. 2.) This date is confirmed by the title of one of his comedies, ἀργιλικαί, which evidently refers to the celebrated courtezan Laïs; and also by his being mentioned in connexion with Cratinus, Aristophanes, Callias, Diocles, Eupolis, and Hermippos. The following are the known titles of his plays: ἀργιλικαί, ἀραμοορηδοί, Τρόικον, Τρισταμηνία. A few fragments of them are preserved by Photius and Suidas (s. v. Oxy furc.) by Pollux (vi. 172, vii. 40, 87), and by Athenaeus. (iii. p. 118, d., viii. p. 346, f., xi. p. 459, a., xii. p. 585, a., xiv. p. 629, d., xv. p. 667, d., xvi. p. 689, f., xvi. p. 701, b.)

2. An Athenian orator, a most eminent disciple of Isocrates, wrote an apology for Isocrates against Aristotle. The work against Aristotle was in four books, under the title of αὐτίκα ἀριστοτε- λίαν αὐτουργολ. (Dionys. Ep. ad Amm. p. 120. 52, Syriph.; Iose. p. 37. 31, Iose. p. 117. 37, Dem. p. 120. 31; Athen. ii. p. 60, e., iii. p. 122, b., viii. p. 559, c.) He also attacked Plato. (Dionys. Ep. ad Pomp. p. 277. 3, Syriph.)

A writer of the same name is mentioned by the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Ecdes. i. 14. 38) as the author of a history of the Sacred War. As the disciples of Isocrates paid much attention to historical composition, Ruhnken conjectures that the orator and the historian were the same person. (Hist. Crit. Orat. Græc. § 38.) There is a Cephisodorus, a Theban, mentioned by Athenaeus (xii. p. 548, c.)
Cephisodotus. 1. A celebrated Athenian sculptor, whose sister was the first wife of Phocion. (Plin. Hist. Nat. 19.) He is assigned by Pliny (xxxvi. 3. s. 19. § 1) to the 102nd Olympiad (a. C. 372), an epoch chosen probably by his authorities because the general peace recommended by the Persian king was then adopted by all the Greek states except Thebes, which began to aspire to the first station in Greece. (Heyne, Antiq. A. J. p. 203.) Cephisodotus belonged to that younger school of the artists, who had abandoned the stern and majestic beauty of Phidias and adopted a more animated and graceful style. It is difficult to distinguish him from a younger Cephisodotus, whom Silius (p. 144), without the slightest reason, considers to have been more celebrated. But some works are expressly ascribed to the elder, others are probably his, and all prove him to have been a worthy contemporary of Praxiteles. Most of his works which are known to us were occasioned by public events, or at least dedicated in temples. This was the case with a group which, in company with Xenophon of Athens, he executed in Pentëlian marble for the temple of Zeus Soter at Megalopolis, consisting of a sitting statue of Zeus Soter, with Artemis Soteira on one side and the town of Megalopolis on the other. (Paus. viii. 30. § 5.) Now, as it is evident that the inhabitants of that town would erect a temple to the preserver of their new-built city immediately after its foundation, Cephisodotus most likely finished his work not long after Ol. 102. 2. (a. C. 371.) It seems that at the same time, after the congress of Sparta, n. c. 371, he executed for the Athenians a statue of Peace, holding Plutus the god of riches in her arms. (Paus. i. 8. § 2. ix. 16. § 2.) We ascribe this work to the elder Cephisodotus, although a statue of Enyo is mentioned as a work of Praxiteles' sons, because after Ol. 120 we know of no peace which the Athenians might boast of, and because in the latter passage Pausanius speaks of the plan of Cephisodotus as equally good with the work of his contemporary and companion Xenophon, which in the younger Cephisodotus would have been only an imitation. The most numerous group of his workmanship were the nine Muses on mount Helicon, and three of another group there, completed by Strongylion and Olympiosthenes. (Paus. ix. 30. § 1.) They were probably the works of the elder artist, because Strongylion seems to have been a contemporary of Praxiteles, not of his sons. (Comp. Silius, p. 432.)

Pliny mentions two other statues of Cephisodotus (xxxvi. 3. a. 10. § 27), one a Mercury nursing the infant Bacchus, that is to say, holding him in his arms in order to entrust him to the care of the Nymphs, a subject also known by Praxiteles' statue (Paus. ix. 39. § 5), and by some baso-reliefes, and an unknown onoror lifting his hand, which attitude of Hermes Logeos was adopted by his successors, for instance in the celebrated statue of Cleomenes in the Louvre, and in a colossal at Vienna. (Meyer's Note to Winckelmann, vii. 2. 26.) It is probable that the admirable statue of Athena and the altar of Zeus Soter in the Peiræus (Plin. xxxvi. 3. a. 19. § 14)—perhaps the same which Demosthenes decorated after his return from exile, a. C. 320 (Plut. Dem. a. C. 57. Plut. X. C. 846. c.)—was likewise his work, because they must have been erected soon after the restoration of the Peiræus by Conon, a. C. 393.
of all these idle people together. In fact the two ladies whom Cephasodotus is there stated to have represented, are very well known to us as poetesses,—Myro or Moero of Byzantium, mother of the tragic poet Homer (who flourished n. c. 284; see Suidas, s. v. "Oynpos"); and Antye. [ANTE]

All the works of Cephasodotus are lost. One, only, but one of the noblest, the Symplegma, praised by Pliny (xxvii. 4. § 6) and visible at his time at Pergamus, is considered by many antiquarians as still in existence in an imitation only; but a very good one, the celebrated group of two wrestling youths at Florence. (Gall. di Firenze Statue, ii. tavv. 121, 122.) Winckelmann seems to have changed his mind about its meaning, for in one place (Gesch. d. Kunst, ii. 2. 28) he refers it to the group of Niobe with which it was found, and in another (ix. 3. § 19) he takes it to be a work either of Cephasodotus or of Heliodorus; and to the former artist it is ascribed by Maffei.

(Collection, Statuar. Antig., tab. 29, p. 31; Meyer, in his Note to Winckelmann, Gesch. der bildenden Kunste, vol. i. pp. 138, 304; Muller, Archäol. Denkiiidler dcr alien Kunst, Heft, iii. 149.) Now this opinion is certainly more probable than the strange idea of Hirt (Gesch. d. bildend. Kunst b. d. Alter, p. 187), that we see in the Florentine work an imitation of the wrestlers of Daedalus (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 15), which were no group at all, but two isolated athletes. But still it is very far from being true.

There is no doubt that the Florentine statues do not belong to the Niobids, although Wagner, in his able article respecting these master-works (Kunstblatt, 1830, No. 55), has tried to revive that old error of Winckelmann, and Krause (Gymnastik der Hellenen, vol. i. pp. 414, 540) admits it at all possible. (Comp. Weicker, Rhein Museum, 1836, p. 264.) But they have nothing to do with the work of Cephasodotus, because Pliny's words point to a very different representation. He speaks of "digitis verius corpori, quam marmori impressi," and in the group of Florence there is no impression of fingers at all. This reason is advanced also by Zammori (Gall. di Firenze, iii. p. 108, &c.), who, although he denies that Cephasodotus invented the group, persists in considering it as a combat between two athletes. The "alterum in terris symplegma nobile" (Plin. xxxvi. 4. § 10) by Heliodorus showed "Pana et Olympum lactantes." Now as there were but two famous symplegmatas, one of which was certainly of an amorous description, that of Cephasodotus could not be a different one, but represented an amorous strife of two individuals. To this kind there belongs a group which is shewn by its frequent repetitions to have been one of the most celebrated of ancient art, namely, the beautiful though indecent contest of an old Satyr and a Hermaphrodite, of which two fine copies are in the Dresden museum, the print and description of which is contained in Böttiger's Archäologie und Kunst (p. 165, &c.). This seems to be the work of our artist, where the position of the hands in particular agrees perfectly with Pliny's description. [L. U.]

Cephissophion (Кеписофий), a friend of Euripides, said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them. (Aristoph. Ran. 942, 1404, 1448, with the Scholia.) Traditionary scandal accuses him of an intrigue

2. The younger Cephasodotus, likewise of Athens, a son of the great Praxiteles, is mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 8. § 19) with five other sculptors in bronze under the 120th Olympiad (n. c. 300), probably because the battle of Ipsus, n. c. 301, gave to the chronicographers a convenient pause to enumerate the artists of distinction then alive; it is, therefore, not to be wondered at if we find Cephasodotus engaged before and probably after that time. Heir to the art of his father (Plin. xxxiv. 8. § 19), of that time therefore always a sculptor in bronze and marble, never, as Sillig (p. 144) states, a painter, he was at first employed, together with his brother Timarchus, at Athens and Thebes in some works of importance. First, they executed wooden statues of the orator and statesman Lycurgus (who died n. c. 323), and of his three sons, Abron, Lycurgus, and Lyceophron, which were probably ordered by the family of the Butnæae, and dedicated in the temple of Erechtheus on the Acropolis, as well as the pictures on the walls placed there by Abron. (Paus. i. 26. § 6; Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 943.) Sillig correctly remarks that these figures must correspond in some way with the statues of Praxiteles' sons (σωλίς and εἰσδότος ἕραμα). The marble basement of one of these statues has been discovered lately on the Acropolis, together with another pedestal dedicated by Cephasodotus and Timarchus to their uncle Theoxenides. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 12.) It is very likely that the artists performed their task so well, that the people, when they ordered a bronze statue to be erected to their benefactor, n. c. 307 (Psaphism. ap. Plut. l. c. p. 852; Paus. i. 3. § 2), committed it to them. The vicinity at least of the temple of Mars, where the sons of Praxiteles had wrought a statue of Enyo (Paus. i. c. § 5), supports this supposition. Another work which they executed in common was the altar of the Cudmean Dionysus at Thebes (Paus. ix. 12. § 3; Βασίλεια is the genuine reading, not the vulgar κάστρομοι), probably erected soon after the restoration of Thebes by Cassander, n. c. 315, in which the Athenians heartily concurred. This is the last work in which both artists are named.

The latter part of the life of Cephasodotus is quite unknown. Whether he remained at Athens or left the town after n. c. 303 in its disasters, for the brilliant courts of the successors of Alexander, or whether, for instance, as might be inferred from Pliny (xxxvi. 4. § 6), he was employed at Pergamus, cannot be decided. It would seem, on account of Myro's portrait, which he had been at Alexandria at any rate. Of his statues of divinities four—Latona, Diana, Aesopus, and Mars, where the sons of Praxiteles had wrought a statue of Enyo (Paus. i. c. § 5), supports this supposition. Another work which they executed in common was the altar of the Cudmean Dionysus at Thebes (Paus. ix. 12. § 3; Βασίλεια is the genuine reading, not the vulgar κάστρομοι), probably erected soon after the restoration of Thebes by Cassander, n. c. 315, in which the Athenians heartily concurred. This is the last work in which both artists are named.

Cephissophion (Кеписофий), a friend of Euripides, said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them. (Aristoph. Ran. 942, 1404, 1448, with the Scholia.) Traditionary scandal accuses him of an intrigue with one of the wives of Euripides, whose eminacy to the sex has sometimes been ascribed to this cause. But the story is more than suspicious from the absence of any mention of it in Aristophanes, unless, indeed, as some have thought, it be alluded to in the Fros (1044). We can hardly suppose, however, that the comic poet would have denied himself the pleasure of a more distinct notice of the tale, had it been really true, especially in the Thesmophoriazuse and the Fros. (Comp. Har- tung, Eurip. restitutus, i. p. 164, &c., and the passages there referred to.)

CEPHISSUS (Κεφίσσος), the divinity of the river Cephissus, is described as a son of Pontus and Thalassa, and the father of Nyxias and Narcissus, who is therefore called Cephissus. (Hygin. Fab. Paez. ; Apollod. iii. 5. § 1 ; Ov. Met. iii. 343, &c.) He had an altar in common with Pan, the nymphs, and Achelous, in the temple of Amphimias near Oropus. (Paus. i. 34. § 2.)

CEPHREN (Κέφρινος) is the name, according to Diodorus, of the Egyptian king whom Herodotus calls Chephren. He was the brother and successor of Cheops, whose example of tyranny he followed, and built the second pyramid, smaller than that of Cheops, by the compulsory labour of his subjects. His reign is said to have lasted 56 years. The pyramids, as Diodorus tells us, were meant for the tombs of the royal builders; but the people, groaning under their yoke, threatened to tear up the bodies, and therefore both the kings successively desired their friends to bury them elsewhere in an unmarked grave. In Herodotus it is said that the Egyptians so hated the memory of these brothers, that they called the pyramids, not by their names, but by that of Philtion, a shepherd who at that time fed his flocks near the place. We are told by Diodorus that, according to some accounts, Chembes (the Cheops of Herodotus) was succeeded by his son Chabryis, which name is perhaps only another form of Cephren. In the letter in which Synesius, bishop of the African Ptolemais, announces to his brother bishops his sentence of excommunication against Andronicus, the president succeeds by his son Chabryis, which name is perhaps only another form of Cephren. (Herod. ii. 127, 128; Diod. i. 64; Synes. Epist. 58.)

CER (Κήρ), the personified necessity of death (Κήρ or Κήρες Σάυδρων). The passages in the Homeric poems in which the Kēr or Kēres appear as real personifications, are not very numerous (II. ii. 502, iii. 454, xviii. 535), and in most cases the word may be taken as a common noun. The plural form seems to allude to the various modes of dying which Homer (II. xii. 224) describes his heroes to meet, a natural, sudden, or violent death. (Od. xi. 171, &c., 398, &c.) The Kēres are described as formidable, dark, and hateful, because they carry off men to the joyless house of Hades. (II. ii. 859, iii. 454; Od. iii. 410, xiv. 207.) The Kēres, although no living being can escape them, have yet no absolute power over the life of men; they are under Zeus and the gods, who can stop them in their course or hurry them on. (II. xii. 402, xviii. 115, iv. 11; Od. xi. 397.) Even mortals themselves may for a time prevent their attaining their object, or delay it by flight and flight. (Ili. iii. 95, xvi. 59, xix. 52; Od. xii. 142; xvi. 483.)

The Kēres wander about with Eris and Cy- domos in bloody garments, quarrelling about the wounded and the dead, and dragging them away by the feet. (II. xviii. 535, &c.) According to Her- odod, with whom the Kēres assume a more definite form, they are the daughters of Nyx and sisters of the Moer, and punish men for their crimes. (Theog. 211, 217; Paus. v. 19, § 1.) Their fearful appearance in battle is described by Herodod. (Sect. Her. 249, &c.) They are mentioned by later writers together with the Erinyes as the goddesses who avenge the crimes of men. (Aesch. Sept. 1655; comp. Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1655, &c.) Epidemic diseases are sometimes personified as Kēres. (Orph. Hymn. xiii. 12, lvii. vii. 6; Eustath. ad Hom. Od. 643.)

CEPHRENS (Κέφρινος), archbishop of Tarraunenim in Sicily during the reign of Roger (A. D. 1129-1152), was a native of this town or of a place in its immediate vicinity. He wrote in Greek a great number of homilies, which are said to be superior to the majority of similar productions of his age. Sixty-two of these homilies were published by Francisius Scorsus at Paris, 1644, fol., with a Latin version and notes. There are still more extant in manuscript. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iii. p. 208, &c.)

CERBERUS (Κήρες Ποικοεικος), the many-headed dog that guarded the entrance of Hades, is mentioned as early as the Homeric poems, but "monstrous dog," and without the name of Cerberus. (H. viii. 368, Od. xi. 623.) Herodod, who is the first that gives his name and origin, calls him (Theog. 311) fifty-headed and a son of Typhon and Echidna. Later writers describe him as a monster with only three heads, with the tail of a serpent and a mane consisting of the heads of various snakes. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 12; Eurip. Herc. fur. 24, 611; Virg. Aen. vi. 417; Ov. Met. iv. 449.) Some poets again call him many-headed or hundred-headed. (Horat. Carm. ii. 13. 34; Tzetzes ad Lyograp. 678; Seneca. Herc. fur. 784.) The place where Cerberus kept watch was watched according to some at the mouth of the Acheron, and according to others at the gates of Hades, into which he admitted the shades, but never let them out again. (L. S.)

CECIDIAS (Κεκίδιας). 1. A poet, philosopher, and legislator for his native city, Megalopolis. He was a disciple of Diogenes, whose death he recorded in some Melamblie lines. (Diog. Liurt. vi. 76.) He is mentioned and cited by Athenaeus (vii. p. 347, e., xii. 554, d.) and Stobaeus (iv. 43, ivi. 10). At his death he ordered the first and second books of the Iliad to be buried with him. (Ptol. Hecap. ap. Phot. Cod. 199, p. 151, a., ed. Bekker.) Ascidian (V. H. xxii. 20) relates that Cecidias died expressing his horror of being with the dead. There is a passage in the Historia of the historians, Olympus of the musicians, and Homer of the poets, which clearly implies that he himself cultivated these four sciences. He appears to be the same person as Cercidas the Arcadian, who is mentioned by Demosthenes among those Greeks, who, by their cowardice and corruption, enslaved their states to Philip. (De Coron. p. 324; see the reply of Polybuis to this accusation, viii. 14.)

2. A Megalopolitan, who was employed by Aratus in an embassy to Antigonus Doson to treat of an alliance, b. c. 224. He returned home after four years, in the beginning of the war between Philip and Antigonus, he commanded a thousand Megalopolitans in the army which Antigonus led into Laconia, b. c. 222. (Polyb.
CERCOPES.

CERCO, the name of a family of the plebeian Latins gens.

1. Q. LUTATIUS C. F. C. N. CERCO, consul with A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus, b. c. 241, in which year the first Punic war was brought to a close by the victory of C. Lutatius Catulus at the Aegates. Cerco is called by Zonaras (vii. 17) the brother of Catulus, which statement is confirmed by the Capitoline Fasti, in which both are described as C. F. C. n. Zonaras also says, that Cerco was sent into Sicily to regulate the affairs of the island in conjunction with his brother Catulus. After peace had been concluded with Carthage, the Falisci or people of Falerii, for some reason which is unknown, rose against the Romans: both consuls were sent against them, and the war was finished by the conquest of the infatuated people within six days. Half of their domain land was taken from them and their town destroyed. For this success, Cerco as well as his colleague obtained a triumph. (Liv. xxxiv. 44, Epit. 19; Butotrop. ii. 28; Oros. iv. 11; Polyb. i. 65; Zonn. viii. 18.)

2. C. LUTATIUS CERCO, one of the five ambassadors sent to Alexandria, b. c. 173. (Liv. vii. 6.) The annexed coin of the Lutatia gens contains the obverse of Amphietys, and on the reverse Q. LUTATIUS CERCO, with a ship enclosed within a wreath made of oak-leaves. The reverse probably refers to the victory of C. Lutatius Catulus, which would of course be regarded by the Cercopes as well as the Catuli as conferring honour upon their gens. (Eckhel, v. p. 240.)

CERCOPES (Kepkroes), droll and thievish gnomes who play a part in the story of Heracles.

Their number is commonly stated to have been two, but their names are not the same in all accounts,—either Olus and Eurybatus, Sillus and Triballus, Passalus and Ademron, Andulus and Atlantus, or Candulus and Atlantis. (Suidas, s. v.; Schol. ad Lucian. Alex. 4; Teetz. Child. v. 75.)

Diodorus (iv. 31), however, speaks of a greater number of Cercopes. They are called sons of Theia, the daughter of Oceamus: they annoyed and robbed Heracles in his sleep, but they were taken prisoners by him, and either given to Omphale, or killed, or set free again. (Teetz. ad Lycoth. 91.)

In the place in which they seem to have made their first appearance, was Thermopylae (Herod. viii. 216), but the comic poem Kepkroes, which bore the name of Homer, probably placed them at Ocealia in Euboea, whereas others transferred them to Lydia (Suid. s. v. Ekefaros), or the islands called Pithecusae, which derived their name from the Cercopes who were changed into monkeys by Zeus for having cunningly deceived him. (Orig. Mut. iv. 30, &c.; Pomp. Mela. ii. 7; compare Muller, De Cyclopaet. et Cercop. 30.)

CERCO (Kepkois). 1. One of the oldest Orphic poets, called a Pythagorean by Clemens of Alexandria (Str. i. p. 233, ed. Paris, 1629) and Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 38), was said by Epigenes of Alexandria to have been the author of an Orphic epic poem entitled "the Descent to Hades (εις τον ναων καταβας), which seems to have been extant in the Alexandrine period. (Clem. Alex. f. c.) Others attribute this work to Prodeus of Samos, or Herodamus of Perinthus, or Orpheus of Camarina. (Snid. s. c. Orp.)

Epigenes also assigns to Cercopes (Clem. Alex. C. C. n.) the Orphic Boos Agaimus which was ascribed by some to Theognetus of Thessaly, and was a poem in twenty-four books. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. pp. 161, &c., 172; Bode, Gesch. der Episch. Dichtkunst der Hellenen, p. 125, &c.)

2. Of Mileius, the contemporary and rival of Hesiod, is said by some to have been the author of an epic poem called "Aegimius," which is also ascribed to Hesiod. (Diog. Laert. ii. 46; Athen. xi. p. 503; Apollod. ii. 1 & 3; comp. Aegimius, P. 26, &.)

CERCONYON (Kerpov), a son of Poseidon by a daughter of Amphietys, and accordingly a half-brother of Triptolemus. (Paus. i. 14. § 1.) Others call him a son of Hephaestus. (Hygin. Fab. 38.) He came from Arcadia, and dwelt at Eleusis in Attica. (Plut. Thea. 11; Orv. Met. vii. 439.)

CEREA'LI.S, a Roman general, commanded the fifth legion in the Jewish war, under Titus. (A. D. 70.) He slew a number of Samaritans on mount Gerizim; overran Idumaees, and took Hebron; made an unsuccessful night attack on the camp of Titus at the council of war held by Titus immediately before the taking of Jerusalem. (Joseph. B. J. iii. 7. § 32, iv. 5. § 9, vi. 2. §§ 5, 6; 4. § 3.)

CEREA'LI.S or CEREA'LI.S, ANCYCIUS, was consul designatus in a. d. 65, and proposed in the senate, after the detection of Piso's conspiracy, that a temple should be built to Nero as quickly as possible at the public expense. (Tac. Anm. xv. 74.)

In the following year, he, in common with several other noble Romans, fell under Nero's suspicion, was condemned, and anticipated his fate by putting himself to death. He was but little pitied, for it was remembered that he had opposed the candidacy of Lucius and Lutatius. (A. D. 69.)

The alleged ground of his condemnation was a mention of him as an enemy to the emperor in a paper left by Mells, who had been condemned a little before; but the paper was generally believed to be a forgery. (Tac. Anm. xvi. 17.)

CEREA'LI.S, CIVICA, a Roman senator who, while proconsul of Asia, was put to death by Domitian, shortly before A. D. 90. (Suet. Dom. 10; Tac. Agric. 42.)

CEREA'LI.S, JUL'LIUS, a Roman poet, contemporary with Pliny the Younger and Martin, by both of whom he is addressed as an intimate friend. He wrote a poem on the war of the giants. (Plin. Epist. ii. 19; Martial, Epig. xi. 53.)
CESEALIS or CERITLIS, PETILLUS, a Roman general, and a near relative of the emperor Vespasian, is first mentioned as legate of the 9th legion, under Vettius Bolanus, in Britain, when he was defeated by the British insurgents under Bosdaecum, a.d. 81. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 32.) When Vespasian set up his claim to the empire (a. d. 69), Petillus Cerialis escaped from Rome, and joined his army in Italy under Antonius, and was made one of his generals. He commanded an advanced party of cavalry, and is charged, in common with the other generals, with not advancing upon Rome quickly enough. He suffered a defeat in a skirmish beneath the walls of Rome. In the following year, he was sent to the Rhine, to suppress the revolt of Civilis, in which he was completely successful. (CIVILIS.) While holding this command, he was solicited by Domitian to give up to him his army. Domitian's object was partly to gain reputation by finishing the victory which Cerialis had secured, but chiefly to seize the empire. Cerialis, however, laughed off the request, as being the foolish fancy of a boy. (Tac. Hist. iii. 59, 78, 79, iv. 86.) In the following year (a. d. 71), he was sent as consular legate to the government of Britain, in which he was active and successful. He conquered a great part of the Brigantes, and called out the talents of Agricultor. (Tac. Agr. 8, 17.) As a commander he was energetic, but rash. (See especially Tac. Hist. iv. 71.)

CERIALIS (K€p€d-aos), a poet of the Greek Anthology, whose time and country are unknown. Three epigrams are ascribed to him by Brunck (Anat. ii. p. 315), but of these the third is of very doubtful authorship. Of the other two the first is a jocose allusion to the poetic contests at the Greek games, the second is in ridicule of those grammarians who thought to pass for pure Attic writers on the strength of a few Attic words and, in general, of the use of obsolete words. [P. S.]

CERES. [DEMETETER.]

CERINTHUS (K€p€noso), probably belonged to the first century of the Christian era, though he has been assigned to the second by Basnage and others. The fathers by whom he is mentioned make him contemporary with the Apostle John, and there is no ground for rejecting their testimony. He has been universally placed in the list of heretics, and may be reckoned the first who taught principles afterwards developed and embodied in the Gnostic system. According to Epiphanius, he was a Jew by birth; and Theodoret (Haeret. Phob. lib. ii.) asserts, that he studied philosophy at Alexandria. It is probable, however, that during his residence in Egypt he had not imbued all the sentiments which he subsequently held; they rather seem to have been adopted while he abode in Asia Minor, where he spent the greater part of his life. This is accordant with the statement of Epiphanius that he propagated his doctrines in Asia. Whether he often encountered the apostles themselves at Jerusalem, Caesarea, and Antioch, as the same writer and others maintain, is questionable. Tradition states that he lived at Ephesus while John was in that city. Nothing is known of the time and manner of his death. It is not difficult to reconcile the varying accounts of his system given by Irenaeus, Epiphanius, Cains, and Dionysius of Alexandria. Irenaeus reckons him a thorough Gnostic; while Cains and Dionysius ascribe to him a gross and sensual Chiliastic or Millenarianism, abhorrent to the nature of Gnosticism. If it be true that the origin of the Gnostic is to be sought in the Judaising sects, as Neander believes, the former uniting Jewish Theosophy with Christianity, Cerinthus's system represents the transition-state, and the Jewish elements were subsequently refined and modified so as to exhibit less grossness. Irenaeus himself believed in Chiliastic, and therefore he did not mention it as a peculiar feature in the doctrines of Cerinthus; while Cains, a strenuous opponent of Millenarianism, would naturally describe it in the worst colours. Thus the accounts of both may be harmonised. His system, as collected from the notices of Irenaeus, Cains, Dionysius, and Epiphanius, consisted of the following particulars: He taught that the world was created by angels, over whom presided one from among themselves. This presiding spirit or power was so far inferior to the Supreme Being as to be ignorant of his character. He was also the sovereign and lawgiver of the Jews. Different orders of angels existed in the pleroma, among whom those occupied with the affairs of this world held the lowest rank. The man Jesus was a Jew, the son of Joseph and Mary by ordinary generation, but distinguished for his wisdom and piety. Hence he was selected to be the Messiah. When he was baptized by John in the Jordan, the Christ, or Logos, or Holy Spirit, descended from heaven in form of a dove and entered into his soul. Then did he first become conscious of his future destination, and receive all necessary qualifications to enable him to discharge its functions. Henceforward he became perfectly acquainted with the supernatural kingdom of God, which he, as was exalted above all the angels who managed the affairs of the world, and wrought miracles by virtue of the spiritual energy that now dwelt in him. When Jesus was apprehended at the instigation of the God of the Jews, the logos departed from him and returned to the Father, so that the man Jesus alone suffered. After he had been put to death and consigned to the grave he rose again. Epiphanius says, that Cerinthus adhered in part to Judaism. He appears to have held that the Jewish law was binding upon Christians in a certain sense, probably that sense in which it was explained by the logos when united to Jesus. He maintained that there would be a resurrection of the body, and that the righteous should enjoy an paradise of delights in Palestine, where the man Jesus appearing again as the Messiah by virtue of the logos associated with him, and having conquered all his enemies, should reign a thousand years. It is not likely that he connected with the millennial reign of Christ such carnal pleasures as Cains and Dionysius allege. It is clear that he received the books of the Old Testament; and the evidence which has been adduced to prove his rejection of the gospels, or any part of them, is unsatisfactory. Epiphanius affirms, that he rejected Paul on account of the apostle's remonstrance with Barnabas, and in conclusion of whether this method of Paul's writings is impossible to determine. Several of the Fathers relate, that John on one occasion went into the bath at Ephesus, but on seeing Cerinthus came out in haste, saying, "Let us flee home, lest the bath should fail while Cerinthus is within." It is also an ancient opinion that John wrote his Gospel to refute Cerinthus. (Walch, Entwurf der 2 x) in consequence of the refusal of Amidaeus to allow Philip a passage through his territory. But after the passing of the decree above-mentioned, Philip became the enemy of Cersobleptes, and in b. c. 352 made a successful expedition into Thrace, gained a firm ascendancy in the country, and brought away a son of Cersobleptes as a hostage. (Dem. Olynth. i. p. 12 ad fin.; Isocr. Phil. p. 86; c.; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 38.) At the time of the peace between Athens and Philip in b. c. 346, we find Cersobleptes again involved in hostilities with the Macedonian king, who in fact was absent in Thrace when the second Athenian embassy arrived at Pella, and did not return to give them audience till he had completely conquered Cersobleptes. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. pp. 390, 391, de Cor. p. 233; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 29, 40, &c.) In the course of the next three years, Cersobleptes seems to have recovered strength sufficient to throw off the yoke, and, according to Diodorus, persisted in his attacks on the Greek cities on the Hellespont. Accordingly, in b. c. 343, Philip again marched against him, defeated him in several battles, and reduced him to the condition of a tributary. (Diod. xvi. 71; Ep. Phil. ad Ath. ap. Dem. pp. 160, 161; Dem. de Chel. p. 105.) [L. E.]

CERSOLEPTES (Kepo-oAeirlTr).—[Cersobleptes.] 2. CERSOLEPTES PROCULUS. [Proculus.] CERVI'DIUS SAC'E'VOLA. [Scavola.']

CERYX (Kepog), an Attic hero, a son of Hermes and Aglauros, from whom the priestly family of the Ceryces at Athens derived their origin. (Paus. i. 88, § 3.)

CES'ELLUS BASSUS. [Bassus, p. 472, b.]

CESTIUS, a surname which occurs on several coins of the Plaetoria gens, but is not mentioned in any ancient writer. (PLAETORIUS.)

CESTIUS. 1. Cicero mentions three persons of this name, who perhaps are all the same: one in the oration for Flaccus, b. c. 59 (c. 19), another (C. Cestius) in a letter to Atticus, b. c. 51 (ad Att. v. 18), and a third (C. Cestius) as praetor in b. c. 44, who, he says, refused a province from Antony. (Phil. iii. 10.) As the last belonged to the aristocratic party, it is probable that he is the same Cestius who perished in the proscription, b. c. 43. (Appian, B. C. iv. 26.)

2. Cestius, surnamed MACEDONIUS, on account of his having formerly served in Macedonia, was a native of Perusia. When this town was taken by Augustus in b. c. 41, he set fire to his house, which occasioned the devastation of the whole city, and then stabbed himself and leaped into the flames. (Appian, B. C. v. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 74.)

3. CESTIUS GALIUS. [Galius.] 4. CESTIUS PROCULUS, accused of repetundae, but acquitted, a. d. 56. (Tuc. An. xii. 30.)

5. CESTIUS SEVERUS, an infamous informer under Nero. (Tac. Hist. iv. 41.)

The name Cestius is chiefly remarkable on account of its connexion with two monuments at Rome, the Pons Cestius and the Pyramid of Cestius, both of which are still remaining. This bridge, which connects the island of the Tiber with the Tjniculum, is supposed by some writers to have been built by the consul C. Cestius Gallus, in the reign of Tiberius; but as it seems improbable that a private person would have been allowed to give his name to works under the empire, its erection is generally referred to the time of the republic. The Pyramid of Cestius, which was used as a burial-place, stands near the Porta Ostiensis, and part of it is within and part without the walls of Aurelian. From an inscription upon it we are told, that it was erected, in accordance with a testamentary provision, for C. Cestius, the son of Lucius, who had been Epulo, Praetor, Tribune of the plebs, and one of the seven Epulones; and from another inscription on it, in which the names of M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus and M. Agrippa occur, we learn, that it was built in the reign of Augustus. Whether this C. Cestius is to be identified with one of the persons of this name mentioned by Cicero [see above, No. 1], as some modern writers have supposed, cannot be determined.

The name of L. Cestius occurs on two coins, together with that of C. Norbanus; but who these two persons were is quite uncertain. A specimen of one of these coins is given below: the obverse represents a female head covered with an elephant's skin, the reverse a sela curulis with a helmet on the top of it. (Eckhel, v. p. 168.)

L. CE'STIUS PIUS, a native of Smyrna, taught rhetoric at Rome a few years before the commencement of the Christian era. He was chiefly celebrated on account of the declamations which he was wont to deliver in places of public resort in reply to the orations of Cicero; but neither Seneca nor Quintilian speaks of him with any respect. No fragment of his works has been preserved. (Hieronym. ap. Chron. Euseb. ad Ol. excip.; Seneck. Contra. iii. p. 53; Quintil. x. § 20; Meyer, Orator, Roman. Fragm.) [W. R.]

CETHEGUS, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelii gens. The family was of old date. They seem to have kept up an old fashion of wearing their arms bare, to which Horace alludes in his poem "remitte manus vesana Celhecgi." The name of L. Cestius occurs on two coins, [see No. 8] thus, exsertique manus vesana Celhecgi.

1. M. CORNELIUS M. F. M. N. CETHEGUS, was curule aedile in b. c. 215, and pontifex maximus in the same year upon the death of L. Lentulus; praetor in 211 when he had the charge of Apulia; censor in 209 with P. Sempronius Tuditanus; and consul with the same colleague in 204. In the next year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where with the praetor Quintilius Varus he defeated Mago, the brother of Hannibal, and compelled him to quit Italy. He died in b. c. 186 (Liv. xxv. 2, 41, xxvii. 11, xxix. 11, xxx. 18.) His eloquence was rated very high, so that Ennius gave him the name of Saevae medulla (sp. Cic. Cat. Maj. 14; comp. Brut. 15), and Horace twice refers to him as an ancient authority for the usage of Latin words. (Epist. ii. 2, 116, Ars Poet. 50, and Schol. ad loc.)

2. C. CORNELIUS L. F. M. N. CETHGUS, commanded in Spain as proconsul in b. c. 200, before he had been aedile. Elected aedile in his absence he exhibited the games with great magnificence. (b. c. 199.) As consul (b. c. 197), he defeated the Insubrians and Cenomanians in Cisalpine Gaul, and triumphed. He was censor in 194; and towards the close of the next year, after holding the lustrum, he went as joint commissioner with Scipio Africanus and Maimius Rufus to mediate between Masinissa and Carthage. (Liv. xxxi. 49, 50, xxxii. 7, 27—30, xxxiii. 29, xxxiv. 44, 62.)

3. P. CORNELIUS L. F. P. N. CETHGUS, curule aedile in b. c. 187, praetor in 185, and consul in 181. The grave of Numa was discovered in his consulship. He triumphed with his colleague Baebius Tampilbus over the Ligurians, though no battle had been fought,—an honour that had not been granted to any one before. In 178 he was one of the ten commissioners for dividing the Ligurian and Gallic lands. (Liv. xxxix. 7, 23, xl. 18; Val. Max. i. § 12; Plin. H. N. xiii. 13. s. 27; Plut. Numa. 22; Liv. xl. 36, xlii. 4.)

4. P. CORNELIUS CETHGUS, praetor in 184 b. c. (Liv. xxxix. 32, 39, 39.)

5. M. CORNELIUS C. F. C. N. CETHGUS, was sent out b. c. 171 in one of a commission into Cisalpine Gaul, to inquire why the consul C. Cassius Longinus had left his province. In 169 he was triumvir coloniae deducendae, in order to plant an additional body of citizens at Aquileia. As consul in 160 he drained a part of the Pontine Marshes. (Liv. xiii. 1, 17, Epit. 46.)

6. L. CORNELIUS CETHGUS, one of the chief supporters of a bill brought in (b. c. 149) by L. Scribonius Libo, tribune of the plebs, to impeach Serv. Sulpicius Galba for breach of his word, in putting some of the Lusitanians to death, and selling others as slaves. (Liv. Epit. 49; Cic. de Orig. i. 52, Brut. 25, ad Att. xiii.)

7. M. CORNELIUS CETHGUS, one of the friends of Marius, who being proscribed by Sulla (b. c. 88) fled with the younger Marius into Numidia, but returned next year to Rome with the heads of his party. In 83, however, he went over to Sulla, and was pardoned. (Appian, B. C. i. 60 62, 80.) Notwithstanding his notorious bad life and utter want of faith, he retained great power and influence even after Sulla's death; and he was who joined the consul M. Cotta in procuring the unlimited command of the Mediterranean for a man like himself, M. Antonius Creticus [Antonius, No. 9]; nor did Lucullus disdain to sue Cethegus' concubine to use her interest in Iris favour, when he was seeking to obtain the command against Mithridates. (Cic. Parad. v. 3; Plut. Lucullus 5, 6; comp. Cic. pro Cluent. 31.)
CHA'BRIAS (Xagpi'as), lord of Trachis, was connected by friendship with Heracles. He was the father of Hippasus, who fell in battle fighting as the ally of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6, &c.) According to others, Ceyx was a nephew of Heracles, who built for him the town of Trachis. Müller (Dor. ii. 11. § 3, comp. i. 3. § 5) supposes that the marriage of Ceyx and his connexion with Heracles were subjects of ancient poems. [L. S.]

CHA'BRIAS (Xagpi'as), the Athenian general, makes his first appearance in history as the successor of Iphicles in the command of the Athenian force at Corinth in b. c. 393, according to Diodorus (xiv. 92), who places it, however, at least a year too soon, since it was in 392 that Iphicles, yet in command, defeated the Spartan Marathus (Cic. De B. I. 2. § 7, ad fin.); and in b. c. 390 he was joined with Iphicrates and Callistatus in the command of the forces which were despatched to the aid of Thebes against Agias, and it was in the course of this campaign that he adopted for the first time that manoeuvre for which he became so celebrated,—ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. The attitude was a formidable one, and the Spartans did not venture to charge. A statute was afterwards erected at Athens to Chabrias in the posture above described. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 10, &c.; comp. iv. 8. § 24; Polycyn. iii. 10; Dem. c. Lept. p. 479, ad fin.)

In b. c. 388 he was joined with Timotheus and Callistatus in the command of the forces which were sent to the aid of Thébes against Agias, and it was in the course of this campaign that he adopted for the first time that manoeuvre for which he became so celebrated,—ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. The attitude was a formidable one, and the Spartans did not venture to charge. A statue was afterwards erected at Athens to Chabrias in the posture above described. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 84, &c.; Diod. xv. 32, 33; Polycyn. ii. 1; Dem. c. Lept. l. c.; Arist. Rhel. iii. 10. § 7.) It was perhaps in the next year that he accepted the offer of Acoris, king of Egypt, to act as general of the mercenaries in his service against the Persians: the Athenians, however, recalled him on the remonstrance of Pharnabazus. (Diod. xv. 39. 1.) The consequence of his success was, that the Athenians were delivered for a time from the annoyance to which they had been subjected from Aegina by the Spartans and Aeginetans. (Xen. Hell. v. 6. §§ 19, 29.) But other distinction awaited him, of a less equivocal nature, and in the service of his own country. The Lacedaemonians had sent out Pollis with a fleet of 60 ships to cut off from Athens her supplies of corn. Chabrias, being appointed to act against him with more than 80 triremes, proceeded to besiege Naxos, and the Lacedaemonians coming up to relieve it, a battle ensued (Sept. 9, b. c. 376), in which the Athenians gained a decisive and important victory,—the first they had won with their own ships since the Peloponnesian war. About this time Chabrias also gained a victory over the Lacedaemonian fleet might have been easily destroyed, and which had not Chabrias been warned by the recollection of Arginusae to look before everything to the saving of his own men from the wrecks. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 89, 61; Diod. xv. 34, 35; Polycyn. iii. 11; Dem. c. Aristoc. p. 685; Plut. Pheoc. 6, Camill. 19, de Glor. Ath. 7.)

In b. c. 375, Chabrias was joined with Iphicles and Callistatus in the command of the forces destined for Corcyra [see p. 517, b. j.; and early in 368 he led the Athenian troops which went to aid Sparta in resisting at the Isthmus the second invasion of the Peloponnesus by Epaminondas, and repulsed the latter in an attack which he made on Corinth. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 19—19; Diod. xv. 60, 69; Paus. ix. 15.) Two years after this, b. c. 366, he was involved with Callistatus in the acquisition of having caused the loss of Oropus to Athens [Callistatus, No. 3] (comp. Dem. c. Meid. p. 535); and Clinton suggests, that this may have been the occasion on which he was defended by Plato, according to the anecdote in Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 24)—a suggestion which does not preclude us from supposing, that it was also the occasion referred to by Aristotle. (Rhet. iii. 10. § 7; see Clint. Fast. ii. p. 396, note w, and sub anno 395; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. oopropor.)

On the authority of Theopompos, we hear that Chabrias was sent by Nectanabis to act as his foreign service, not only because it gave him more opportunity to gratify his luxurious propensities, but also from the jealousy and annoyance to which men of note and wealth were exposed at Athens. Accordingly we find him, early in b. c. 361, taking the command of the naval force of Tachos, king of Egypt, who was in rebellion against Persia. The king's army of mercenaries was entrusted to Agesilaus, who however deserted his cause for that of Nectanabis, while Chabrias remained faithful to his first engagement. On the course and results of the war there is a strange discrepancy between Xenophon and Plutarch on the one side, and Diodorus on the other. (Theopom. ap. Athen. xii. p. 532, b.; Nep. Chab. 3; Xen. Ages.; Plut. Ages. 37; Diod. xv. 92, 93; Wesseling, ad loc.) About b. c. 358 Chabrias was sent to succeed Athenodorus as commander in Thrace; but he arrived with only one ship, and the consequence was that Charidemus renounced the treaty he had made with Athenodorus, and drove Chabrias to consent to another most unfavourable to the interests of Athens. [CHARIDEMUS.] On the breaking out of the social war in 357, Chares was appointed to command the Athenian army, and Chabrias was joined with him as admiral of the fleet; though, according to C. Nepos, the latter accompanied the expedition merely in a private capacity. At the siege of Chios, which was the first operation of the war, he advanced with gallant rashness into the harbour, before the rest of the fleet, and, when his ship was disabled, he refused to save his life by abandoning it, and fell fighting. (Diod. xvi. 7; Nep. Chab. 4; Dem. c. Lept. p. 481.) Plutarch tells us, that Chabrias was slow in devising and somewhat rash in executing, and that both defects were often in some measure corrected and supplied by his young friend Phocion. Yet his death seems to have been a real loss to Athens. His private qualities, notwithstanding the tendency to profligate self-indulgence which has been mentioned above on the authority of Theopompos, were at least such as to attract and permanently retain the friendship of Phocion. His public services were rewarded with the privilege of exemption from liturgies; and the continuation of the privilege to his son Ctesippus, from whom the law of Lepides would have taken it, was successfully advocated by Demosthenes in B.C. 355. (Plut. Phoc. 6, 7; Dem. c. Lept. pp. 479—483.) Pausanias (i. 29) speaks of the tomb of Chabrias as lying between those of Pericles and Phidias on the way from the city to the Academy. [E. E.]

CHÆREA, C. CA'SSIUS, the slayer of the emperor Caligula, was tribune of the praetorian cohort. He is said to have been incited to conspiracy against the emperor partly by his noble spirit and love of liberty, partly by his disgust at the cruelties which he was employed to execute, partly by his suspicion that the confidence and favour of Caligula was the forerunner of his destruction, and most of all by the insults of the emperor, who used himself to ridicule him as if he were an effeminate person, and to hold him up to ridicule to his fellow-soldiers, by giving through him such watchwords as Venus and Priapus. Having formed a conspiracy with Cornelius Sabinus and other noble Romans, he fixed on the Palatine games in honour of Augustus for the time of action. On the fourth day of the games, as the emperor was leaving the theatre to his palace, the conspirators attacked him in a narrow passage, and killed him with many wounds, Chaerea striking the first blow. (Jan. 24, a.D. 41.) In the confusion which ensued, some of the conspirators were killed by the German guards of Caligula; but others, among whom was Chaerea, escaped into the palace. Chaeren next sent and put to death Caligula's wife Caesonia and her daughter. He warmly supported the scheme, which the senators at first adopted, of restoring the republic, and received from the consuls the watchword for the night—Liberty. But the next day Claudius was made emperor by the soldiers, and his first act was to put Chaerea and the other conspirators to death. Chaerea met his fate with the greatest fortitude, the executioner using, at Chaerea's own desire, the sword with which he had wounded Caligula. A few days afterwards, many of the people made offerings to his manes. (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xix. 1-4; Sueton. Calig. 56-58; Claud. 11; Dion Cass. liv. 29; Zonaras, xi. 7; Seneca, de Const. 18; Aurel. Vic. Cais. 3.) [P. S.]

CHÆREAS. 1. An Athenian, son of Aristeles, was sent by the people of Samos and the Athenian assembly there stationed (who were ignorant of the overthrow of the democracy at Athens by the Four Hundred) to report the defeat of a late attempt at an oligarchical revolution in the island, in B.C. 411. The crew of the ship were arrested, on their arrival at Athens, by the new government; but Chaereas, having escaped, returned to Samos, and, by his exaggerated accounts of the tyranny of the oligarchs, led to the strong measures which ensued in favour of democracy under Thrasylalus and Thrasyllus. (Thuc. viii. 74, 86.)

2. A historian, so miscalled, of whom Polybius, speaking of his account of the proceedings at Rome when the news arrived of the capture of Saguntum in B.C. 219, says that his writings contained, not history, but gossip fit for barbers' shops, κωμωδίαι καὶ παραξενίαι λαλίας. (Polyb. ii. 20.) We find no record either of the place of his birth or of the exact period at which he flourished. A writer of this name to have been of Greek extraction, and was perhaps a freedman of some C. Fannius. He had a slave whom he entrusted to Roscius the actor for instruction in his art, and it was agreed that any profits the man might acquire should be shared between them. The slave was murdered by one Q. Flavius, against whom accordingly an action was brought by Chaereas and Roscius for damages. Roscius obtained a farm for himself from the defendant by way of composition, and was sued by Chaereas, who insisted that he had received it for both the plaintiffs. The matter was at first referred to arbitration, but further disputes arose, and the transaction ultimately gave occasion to the action of Chaereas against Roscius, in which the latter was defended by Cicero in a speech (pro Q. Roscio). Chaerea, who insisted that he had received it for the defendant by way of composition, and was sued by Chaereas, who insisted that he had received it for both the plaintiffs. The matter was at first referred to arbitration, but further disputes arose, and the transaction ultimately gave occasion to the action of Chaereas against Roscius, in which the latter was defended by Cicero in a speech (pro Q. Roscio). Chaerea and the other conspirators were tried by the jury, it being alleged on the part of Chaerea that his acts were an effeminate person, and to hold him up to ridicule to his fellow-soldiers, by giving through him such watchwords as Venus and Priapus. Having formed a conspiracy with Cornelius Sabinus and other noble Romans, he fixed on the Palatine games in honour of Augustus for the time of action. On the fourth day of the games, as the emperor was leaving the theatre to his palace, the conspirators attacked him in a narrow passage, and killed him with many wounds, Chaerea striking the first blow. He warmly supported the scheme, which the senators at first adopted, of restoring the republic, and received from the consuls the watchword for the night—Liberty. But the next day Claudius was made emperor by the soldiers, and his first act was to put Chaerea and the other conspirators to death. Chaerea met his fate with the greatest fortitude, the executioner using, at Chaerea's own desire, the sword with which he had wounded Caligula. Vic. Cais. 3.) [P. S.]

CHÆREAS (Χαέρεας), a disciple of Socrates, is honourably recorded (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 48) as one of those who attended his instructions with the sincere desire of deriving moral advantage from them, and who did not disgrace by their practice the lessons they had received. An inveterate quarrel between himself and his elder brother Chaerephon serves in Xenophon as the occasion of a good lecture on the subject of brotherly love from Socrates, who appears to have succeeded in reconciling them. (Xen. Mem. ii. 3.) [E. E.]

CHÆRECRATÈ (Χαιρεκράτης), a disciple of Socrates, is honourably recorded (Xen. Mem. i. 2. § 48) as one of those who attended his instructions with the sincere desire of deriving moral advantage from them, and who did not disgrace by their practice the lessons they had received. An inveterate quarrel between himself and his elder brother Chaerephon serves in Xenophon as the occasion of a good lecture on the subject of brotherly love from Socrates, who appears to have succeeded in reconciling them. (Xen. Mem. ii. 3.) [E. E.]

CHÆRÉMON (Χαέρεμων). 1. An Athenian tragic poet of considerable eminence. We have no precise information about the time at which he lived, but he must certainly be placed later than Aristophanes, since, though his style was remarkably calculated to expose him to the ridicule of a comicalued to expose him to the ridicule of a comic poet, he is nowhere mentioned by that poet, not even in the Frogs. On the other hand, he was attacked by the comic poets, Babulus (Athen. ii. p. 482, c) and Epiphnus, of whom the latter, at least, seems to speak of him as of a contemporary. (Athen. xi. p. 482, b.) Aristophanes frequently mentions him in a manner which, in the opinion of some critics, implies that Chaereas was alive. (Rhet. ii. 23, 24, lii. 12; Problem. lii. 16; Pont. i. 9, xxiv. 6.) The writers also who call him a comic poet (see below) assign him to the middle comedy. For these and other reasons, the time when Chæremon flourished may be fixed about b.C. 380. Nothing is known of his life. It may be assumed that he lived at Athens, and the fragments of his poetry which remain afford abundant proofs, that he was trained in the loose morality which marked Athenian society at that period, and that his taste was formed after the model of that debased and florid poetry which Euripides first introduced by his innovations on the drama of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and which was carried to its height by the comic poet Aristophanes. About the year 385, the fragments and even some of the titles of Chæremon's plays show, that he seldom aimed at the heroic and moral grandeur of the old tragedy. He excelled in description, not merely of objects and scenes, but of qualities. He especially luxuriates in the description of flowers and of female beauty. His descriptions belong to the class which Aristotle characterizes as ὑπεράρχουσα and as μετὰ θηλής μετὰ διανοητική. The approach to comedy, by the introduction of scenes from common life, and that even in a burlesque manner, of which we have a striking example in the Ἀλκετίς of Euripides, seems to have been carried still further by Chaeremon; and it is probably for this reason that he is mentioned as a κοινή poet by Suidas, Eudocia, and the Scholiast on Arist. Ῥhet. iii. p. 69, b. (For a further discussion of this point, see Meineke and Barths, as quoted below.) The question has been raised, whether Chaeremon's tragedies were intended for the stage. They certainly appear to have been far more descriptive and lyric than dramatic; and Aristotle mentions Chaeremon among the poets whom he calls ἀναγραφικοὶ. (Rhet. iii. 12. § 2.) But there appears to be no reason for believing that at this period dramas were written without the intention of bringing them on the stage, though it often happened, in fact, that they were not represented; nor does the passage of Aristotle refer to anything more than the ὀποιαδήποτε fitness of some dramas for acting and of others for reading. It is by no means improbable that the plays of Chaeremon were never actually represented. There is no mention of his name in the διάσκεψεις. The following are the plays of Chaeremon of which fragments are preserved: Ἀλφορίας, Ἀλεξάνδρας Ἐπερατοκόσιος ὦ Θερίστης (a title which seems to imply a satyric drama, if not one approaching still nearer to a comedy), Δήνων, Θεσπόντ, Ἁγ', Μυρία, Ὀσφυρος Τραγῳδίας, Οἰνίς, καὶ Κάλλως. It is very doubtful whether the last was a tragedy at all, and indeed what sort of poem it was. Aristotle (Poet. i. 12, or 9, ed. Ritter) calls it μετάρρυθμο ἐκ ἑκάτων τῶν μέτρων (comp. xxiv. 11, or 6), and Athenæus (xiii. p. 608, e) says of it ὡς δρᾶμα πολύευθυνόν κςτ. The fragments of Chaeremon have been collected, with a dissertation on the poetry, by H. Bartsch, 4to. Mogunt. 1843. There are no notices of Chaeremon in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Annt. ii. 55; Jacobs, ii. 56), two of which refer to the contest of the Spartans and Argives for Thyrea. (Herod. i. 82.) The mention of Chaeremon in the Corona of Melanipol also shows that he was an ancient poet. There seems, therefore, no reason to doubt that he was the same as the tragic poet. The third epigram refers to an unknown orator Eubulus, the son of Athenagoras. (Weidker, Die Griech. Trag. ἔκ. iii. pp. 1062—1073; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 517—521; Ritter, Annt. in Arist. Poet. p. 67; Hearn, De Chaeremoniae Tragi. Vit. Græc. i. Jacobs, Additionsa Antiqua. in Athen. p. 325, &c.; Bartsch, De Chaeremoniae Poeta Tragic.] 2. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher and grammarian, and an historical writer, was the chief librarian of the Alexandrian library, or at least of that part of it which was kept in the temple of Serapis. He is called ἰερογραμματεύς, that is, keeper and expounder of the sacred books. (Tzetza in Hom. II. p. 123. 11, 28, p. 146. 10; Euseb. Praep. Evang. v. 10.) He was the teacher of Dionysius of Alexandria, who succeeded him, and who flourished from the time of Nero to that of Trajan. (Suid. s. v. Διονύσιος Ἀλεξανδρεύς.) This fixes his date to the first half of the first century after Christ; and this is confirmed by the mention of him in connexion with Cornutus. (Suid. s. v. Ἀργεύς; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 19.) He accompanied Aelius Gallus in his expedition up Egypt (Gallus), and made great professions of his astronomical knowledge, but incurred much ridicule on account of his ignorance (Strab. xvii. p. 806): but the suspicion of Fabricius, that this account refers to a different person, is perhaps not altogether groundless. (Bild. Graec. iii. p. 546.) He was afterwards called to Rome, and became the preceptor of Nero, in conjunction with Alexander of Agina. (Suid. s. v. Αλεξάνδρος Ἀλεξανδρεύς.) 1. His chief work was a history of Egypt, which embraced both its sacred and profane history. An interesting fragment respecting the Egyptian priests is preserved by Porphyry (de Abstin. iv. 6) and Jerome (c. Jovian.iii., ii). He also wrote, 2. On Hieroglyphics (ἰερογλυφικά, Suid. s. v. Ιερογλυφικά καὶ Χαρακτίρια). 3. On Comets (ῥηξ κομητῶν, Origin. c. Κόλων. v. 59: perhaps in Seneca, Quaest. Nat. vii. 5, we should read Chaeremon for Charimander; but this is not certain, for Charimander is mentioned by Pappus, lib. vii. p. 247). 4. A grammatical work, μετάρρυθμα (as quoted by Bickler, Annot. in Arist. Poet. ii. 28, p. 515, 15). As an historian, Chaeremon is charged by Josephus with wilful falsehood (c. Apion. cc.22, 33). This charge seems to be not unfounded, for, besides the proofs of it alleged by Josephus, we are informed by Tactes (Hist. Phil. v. 6), that Chaeremon stated that the phoenix lived 7000 years! Of his philosophical views we only know that he was a Stoic, and that he was the leader of that party which explained the Egyptian religious system as a mere allegory of the worship of nature, as displayed in the visible world (ἄνθρωπον καὶ κόσμον) in opposition to the views of Iamblichus. His works were studied by Origen. (Suid. s. v. Σηράγας; Euseb. Hist. Ecc. vi. 19.) Martial (xi. 56) wrote an epigram upon him. (Tolnay, de Serap. Haec. Hist. Phil. iii. pp. 543, 543; Brucker, Hist. Philos. Ant. vi. 407; Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pp. 209, 210, ed. Westermann.) (P. S.) CHA'RMADAS, the philosopher. [CHARMIDES, No. 2.] CHÆ'REP'HANES, artist. [NICOPHANES.] CHÆ'REP'HON (Χαρεφῶν), of the Athenian demus of Spheitus, a disciple and friend of Socrates, is said by Xenophon to have attended his instructions for the sake of the moral advantage to be derived from them, and to have exemplified in his practice his master's precepts. From the several notices of him in Xenophon and Plato, he appears to have been a man of very warm feelings, peculiarly susceptible of excitement, with a spirit of high and generous emulation, and of great energy in everything that he undertook. He was that inquired of the Delphic oracle who was the wisest of men, and received the famous answer: Ζηλοὶς Ψυχολήπτης σοφότεραι καὶ Ἔρμηστος ἄνθρωποι δὲ πάντων Καρακτίρια εἰσηγομένοι. The frequent notices of him in Aristophanes show that he was highly distinguished in the school of Socrates; while from the nicknames, such as vrasphes and vraswv, by which he was known, and the Aristophanie allusions to his weakness and his sallow complexion (Τειρ. 1413, γυματαλνεις Σοφαβι; comp. Nub. 496), it appears that he injured his health by intense application to study. He attached himself to the popular party in politics, was driven into banishment by the Thirty tyrants, and returned to Athens on the restoration of democracy in b. c. 403. (Plat. Apol. p. 21, a.) From the passage just referred to it appears, that he was dead when the trial of Socrates took place in b. c. 399. ( Xen. Men. i. 2 § 48, ii. 48.) Plat. Charm. p. 153, Gorg. pp. 447, 448; Stellb. ad Plat. Apol. p. 21, a.; Athen. v. p. 318; Aristoph. Nub. 105, 151, 157, 191, 1445, Av. 1296, 1564; Schol. ad d. [E. E.]

CHAERIPPUS, a Greek, a friend of Cleon and his brother Quintus, frequently mentioned in the letters of the former. (Ad Q. Fr. i. 1 § 4, ad Fam. xii. 22, 30, ad Att. iv. 7, v. 4.)

CHAERIS (XaiQiras). 1. A flute-player and harper at Athens, who seems to have been more fond of hearing himself play than other people were of hearing him. He is ridiculed by Aristophanes. (Ach. 16, 631, Pax, 916, Av. 853.) From the Scholiast on the two passages last referred to we learn, that he was attacked also by Pherecrates in the Ἀγρον (Plat. Protag. p. 327) and, for there seems no reason to suppose this a different person, by Cratinus in the Ναυμαχια.

3. Agrammarian (father of Apollonius, No. 10), who is quoted several times in the Scholia on Homer, Pindar, and Aristophanes. He was probably contemporary with Diodorus of Tarsus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. p. 509, ii. pp. 34, 396, iv. pp. 275, 399, vi. p. 361.)

CHAERON (XaiQopr), a son of Apollo and Thea, the daughter of Phydus, is the mythical founder of Chaeroneia in Bocotia. (Paus. ix. 40. § 3; Steph. Byz. s. v. Χαιρενας; Plut. Sulla, 17.) [L. E.]

CHAERON (XaiQopr), or, according to another reading, CHAIRON, a Lacedaemonian, who appears to have belonged to the party of Nabis; for we find him at Rome in n. c. 183 as one of the active of those who had been banished or condemned to death by the Achaeans when they took Sparta in n. c. 188, and restored the exiled enemies of the tyrant. On this occasion the object of Chaceron's mission was obtained. (Polyb. xxiv. 4; Liv. xxxix. 48; comp. Plut. Platip. 17.) He was again one of the ambassadors sent to Rome in n. c. 181, to inform the senate of the recent admission of Lacedaemon for the second time into the Achaean league and of the terms of the union. (See p. 659, n.; Polyb. xxv. 2; Liv. ii. 20, 20.) Polybius represents him as a clever young man, but a profligate demagogue; and accordingly we find him in the ensuing year wielding a sort of brief tyranny at Sparta, squandering the public money, and dividing lands, unjustly seized, among the lowest of the people. Apollonides and other commissioners were appointed to check these proceedings and examine the public accounts; but Chaceron had Apollonides assassinated, for which he was brought to trial by the Achaeans and cast into prison. (Polyb. xxv. 8.) [E. E.]

CHAERON (XaiQopr), a man of Megalopolis, who, shortly before the birth of Alexander the Great, b. c. 356, was sent by Philip to consult the Delphic oracle about the snake which he had seen with Olympias in her chamber. (Plut. Alex. 3.) It was perhaps this same Chaceron who, in the speech (σεπί ταύ τηράδε Αλέξ. p. 214) attributed by some to Demostenes, is mentioned as having been made tyrant of Pellene by Alexander (comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. b. ii. ch. 26), and of whom we read in Athenaeus (xi. p. 509) as having been a pupil both of Plato and Xenocrates. He is said to have conducted himself very tyrannically at Pellene, banishing the chief men of the state, and giving their property and wives to their slaves. Athenæus, in a cool and off-hand way of his own, speaks of his cruelty and oppression as the natural effect of Plato's principles in the "Republic" and the "Laws." [E. E.]

CHALCIDEUS (Χαλκιδέως), the Spartan commander, with whom, in the spring and summer of n. c. 412, the year after the defeat at Syracuse, Alcibiades threw the Ionian subject allies of Athens into revolt. He had been appointed commander (evidently not high-admiral) during the previous winter in the place of Melantheidas, the high-admiral on occasion of the ill omen of an earthquake; and on the news of the blockade of their ships at Peiraeus, the Spartans, but for the persuasions of Alcibiades, would have kept him at home together. Crossing the Aegean with only five ships, they effected the revolt first of Chios, Erythrae, and Clazomenae; then, with the Chian fleet, of Teos; and finally, of Miletus, upon which ensued the first treaty with Tissaphernes. From this time Chalcideus seems to have remained at Miletus, watched by an Athenian force at Lade. Meanwhile, the Athenians were beginning to exert themselves actively, and from the small number of Chalcideus' ships, they were able to confine him to Miletus, and cut off his communication with the disaffected towns; and before he could be joined by the high-admiral Astyochus (who was engaged at Chios and Lesbos on his first arrival in Ionia), Chalcideus was killed in a skirmish with the Athenian troops at Lade in the summer of the same year (412 n. c.) in which he had left Athens. (Thuc. viii. 6, 7; Polyb. ii. 2; Arist. H. C. 2.)

CHALCIDIUS, styled in MSS. Πιχρισισμοι, a designation altogether indefinite, but very frequently applied to grammarians, was a Platonie philosopher, who lived probably during the sixth century of the Christian era, although many place him as early as the fourth. He wrote an "Interpretatio Latina partis prioris Timaei Platonici," to which is appended a voluminous and learned commentary inscribed to a certain Osias or Hosius, whom Barth and others have asserted, upon no sure grounds, to be Osias bishop of Cordova, who took a prominent part in the proceedings of the great council of Nicaea, held in a. d. 325. The writer of these annotations refers occasionally with respect to the Mosaic dispensation, and speaks, as a believer might, of the star which heralded the nativity of our Lord, but expresses himself throughout with so much ambiguity or so much caution, that he has been claimed by men of all creeds. Some have not scrupled to maintain, that he was a deacon or archdeacon of the church at Carthage; Fulgentius Planeiades dedicates his treat "Aelegoria librorum Virgilii" and "De prisco Sermone" to a Chalcidius, who may be the person whom we are now discussing, and calls him "Levitarum Sanctissimus;" but in reality it is impossible to discover from internal evidence whether the author of the translation from Plato was Christian, Jew, or Heathen, or, as Mosheim has very plausibly conjectured, a sort of nondescript combination of all three. He certainly gives no hint that the individual to whom the book is addressed was a dignified ecclesiastic or even a member of the church. This translation was first printed under the inspection of Augustinus Justinius, bishop of Nebio in Corsica, by Badini Ascensius, Paris, fol. 1520, illustrated by numerous mathematical diagrams very unskilfully executed; a second edition, containing also the fragments of Cicero's version of the same dialogue, appeared at Paris, 4to. 1563; a third at Leyden, 4to. 1617, with the notes and corrections of Jo. Meursius; the most recent and best is that of J. A. Fabricius, Hamburg, fol. 1718, placed at the end of the second volume of the works of Saint Hippolytus. The text was improved by the collation of a Bodleian MS., and the notes of Meursius are given entire. (Cave, Histor. Liter. Eccles. Script. vol. i. p. 199, ed. Basili.; Barthius, Adv. xxii. 16, xviii. 8; Funckius, De huito ac decrepita Linguae Latinae Sinoceutae, c. ix. § 5; Brucker, Histor. Crit. Philos. vol. iii. p. 543, iv. p. 1522.) [W. L.]

CHALCIOCUS (Χαλκιόκους), "the goddess of the brazen house," a surname of Athena at Sparta, derived from the brazen temple which the goddess had in that city, and which also contained her statue in brass. This temple, which continued to exist in the time of Pausanias, was believed to have been commenced by Tyndareus, but was not completed till many years later by the Spartan artist Gitias. (Paus. iii. 17, § 3, x. 5, § 5; C. Nep. Paus. 5; Polyb. iv. 22) Respecting the festival of the Chalciocelea celebrated at Sparta, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Χαλκίωτος. [L. S.]

CHALCOPOE (Χαλκοπόη), 1. A daughter of Ilxenor, or according to others of Chalcedon, was the second wife of Aegeus. (Apollod. ii. 15, § 6; Athan. xiii. p. 505.)

2. A daughter of King Eurypos in the island of Cos, and mother of Thessalus. (Horn. Il. ii. 679; Apollod. ii. 7, § 8.) There is a third mythical personage of this name. (Apollod. ii. 6, § 5.)

CHALCIS (Χάλκης), one of the daughters of Asopus and Metope, from whom the town of Chalcis in Euboea was said to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 278.) According to others, Chalcis was the mother of the Curetes and Corybantes, the former of whom were among the earliest inhabitants of Chalcis. (Schoel. vict. ad Hom. Il. xiv. 291; Strab. x. p. 447.) [L. S.]

CHALCOONDYLES, or, by contraction, CHALCOONDYLES, LAONICUS or NICOLAIUS (Λαώνικος or Νικόλαος Χαλκονίκλαῖος or Χαλκονίκλαῖος), a Byzantine historian of the fifteenth century of the Christian aera, of whose life little is known, except that he was sent by the emperor John VII. Palaeologus, as ambassador to the camp of Sultan Murad II. during the siege of Constantinople in a.d. 1446. Hamberger (Gedruckte Nachrichten von bürgerlichen Männern, &c. vol. iv. p. 764) shows, that he was still living in 1462, but it is scarcely credible that he should have alive in 1490, and even later, as Vossius thinks (De Historia Graecae, ii. 30). Chalcoondyles, who was a native of Athens, has written a history of the Turks and of the later period of the Byzantine empire, which begins with the year 1265, and goes down to the conquest of Corinth and the invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Turks in 1463, thus including the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. Chalcoondyles, a statesman of great experience and of extensive learning, is a trustworthy historian, whose style is interesting and attractive, and whose work is one of the most important sources for the history of the decline and fall of the Greek empire. His work, however, which is divided into ten books, is not very well arranged, presenting in several instances the aspect of a book composed of different essays, notes, and other materials, written occasionally, and afterwards put together with too little care for their logical and chronological order. Another defect of the author is his display of matters which very often have nothing to do with the chief subject, and which he apparently inserted in order to shew the variety of his knowledge. But if they are extraneous to his historical object, they are valuable to us, as they give us an idea of the knowledge of the Greeks of his time, especially with regard to history, geography, and ethnography. Among these episodes there is a most interesting description of the greater part of Europe, which had been disclosed to the eyes of the Greeks by the political travels of several of their emperors in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. (ii. pp. 54, 56, ed. Paris.) He says that Germany stretches from Vienna to the ocean, and from Prague to the river Tartessus (!) in the Pyrenees (!); but he observes with great justice, that if the Germans were united under one head, they would be the most powerful nation; that there are more than two hundred free towns flourishing by trade and industry; that the mechanical arts are cultivated by them with great success; that they have invented gun-powder, and that they are fond of dwelling. The passage treating of Germany is given with a Latin translation and notes in Freiherr "Corpus Script. Rer. Germ." As to England, he says that it lies opposite to Flanders—a country but too well known to the Greeks—and is composed of three islands united under one government; he mentions the fertility of the soil, the mildness of the climate, the manufacture of woollen cloth, and the flourishing trade of the great metropolis, London (Lonodr). His description of her bold and active inhabitants is correct, and he was informed of their being the first bowmen in the world; but when he says that their language has no affinity with that of any other nation, he perhaps confounded the English language with the Irish. He states that their manners and habits were exactly like those of the French, which was an error as to the nation at large, but tolerably correct if applied to the nobles; the great power and turbulence of the aristocracy were well known to him. At that time strangers and visitors were welcomed by the ladies in England with a kiss, a custom which one hundred years later moved the sympathizing heart of the learned Erasmus Roterdamensis, and caused him to express his delight in his charming epistle to Faustus Andrelinus: the Greek, brought up among depraved men, and accustomed to witness but probably to abhor disgraceful usages, draws scandalous and revolting conclusions from that token of kindness. The principal MSS. of Chalcoondyles are those in the Bodleian, in the libraries of the Escorial, and of Naples, in the Bibl. Laurentiana at Florence, several in the royal library at Munich and in the royal library at Paris, and that of the former Coislin library now united with the royal library at Paris. The history of Chalcocundyles was first published in Latin translations, the first of which is that of the second volume of the Biblioteca of Zürich, Basel, 1556, fol.; the same corrected and compared with an unedited translation of Philippus Glandinus appended to the edition of Nicephorus Gregorius, ibid. 1562, fol.; the same together with Latin translations of Zonaras, Nicetas, and Nicephorus Gregorius, Frankfort on-the-Main, 1568, fol. The Greek text was first published, with the translation and notes of Chlaerus, and the works of Nicephorus Gregoras, Frankfort on-the-Main, 1568, fol. which is our only authority for his date. Suidas quotes an epigram, beginning

Εἰτίλ Χάρες ἵπποις γεμάτης ἅρπα Περγαμου ἀρχης, which gives his country and profession. He is frequently referred to by Stephanus Byzantinus.

He is mentioned by Eucritus (Hist. Eccl. v. cxxxv.), among those historians who mixed fable with history, and this is confirmed by the anonymous writer of the "De Rebus Incredilibus" (cc. 15, 16). (Comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 414, ed. Westermann.)

CHARAXUS (Χάραξ) of Mytilene, son of Sicanandromynus and brother of the famous Sappho, fell desperately in love with Rhodopis the hetaera at Naucratis in Egypt, ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money, and, according to Suidas (s. v. Ιδαγού), married her. For this, Herodotus tells us, he was vehemently satirized by his sister on his return to Mytilene, though indeed the passage is capable of another interpretation, and may mean, that the woman who had infatuated him was the object of Sappho's attack. Athenaeus, contradicting Herodotus, calls the hetaera in question Doris; and Suidas tells us (s. v. Πασιμβλος ἀδῆσας), that Doricha was the name which Sappho called her in her poem. (Herod. ii. 135; Suid. s. v. Ιδαγού; Athen. xii. p. 696, b.; Strab. xvii. p. 808; Muller, L. of Greece, ch. xii. § 6; Ov. Her. xvi. 117.)

CHARES (Χάρης), an Athenian general, who for a long series of years contrived by profuse corruption to maintain his influence with the people, in spite of his very disreputable character. We first hear of him in b. c. 367, as being sent to the aid of the Philians, who were hard pressed by the Arcadians and Argives, assisted by the Theban commander at Sicyon. His operations were successful in relieving them, and it was in this campaign under him that Aeschines, the orator, first distinguished himself. (Xen. Hell. vii. 2. §§ 16–23; Diod. vii. 75; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 50.) From this scene of action he was recalled to take the command against Oropus (Callistromus, No. 3); and the recovery of their harbour by the Sicilians from the Spartan garrison, immediately on his departure, shows how important his presence had been for the support of the Lacedaemonian cause in the north of the Peloponnesus. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 1, comp. vii. 3. § 2; Ephrhion, Pasimelus.) In 361 he was appointed to succeed Leonosthenes, after the defeat of the latter by Alexander of Pheræ [p. 125 a], and, sailing to Corcyra, he gave his aid, strange to say, to an oligarchical conspiracy there, whereby the democracy was overthrown with much bloodshed,—a step by which he of course excited a hostile disposition towards Athens on the part of the egested, while he failed at the same time to consolidate the oligarchs. (Diod. xvi. 93.) The necessary consequence was the loss of the island to the Athenians when the Social war broke out. In 358 Chares was sent to Thrace as general with full power, and obliged Charidemus to ratify the treaty which he had made with Athenodorus. (Charidemus.) In the ensuing year he was appointed to the conduct of the Social war, in the second campaign of which, after the death of Chabrias, Iphicrates and Timothenes were joined with him in the command, b. c. 356. According to Diodorus, his colleagues having refused, in consequence of a storm, to risk an engagement for which he was eager, he accused them to the people, and they were recalled and subsequently brought to trial. As C. Nepos tells it, Chares actually attacked the enemy in spite of the weather, was worsted, and, in order to screen himself, charged his colleagues with not supporting him. In the prosecution he was aided by Aristophon, the Athenian. (Diod. xvi. 7, 21; Nep. Tim. 3; Arist. Rhet. ii. 23. § 7, iii. 10. § 7; Isocr. nep. Appar. § 137; Deisarch. c. Phyl. § 17.) Being now left in the sole command, and being in want of money, which he was afraid to apply for from home, he relieved his immediate necessities by entering, compelled perhaps by his mercenaries, into the service of Artabazus, the revolted satrap of Western Asia. The Athenians at first approved of this proceeding; but afterwards ordered him to drop his connexion with Artabazus on the complaint of Artaxerxes III. (Ochus); and it is probable that the threat of the latter to support the confederates against Athens hastened at least the termination of the war, in accordance with the wishes of Eubulus and Isocrates, and in opposition to those of Chares and his party. (Diod. xvi. 22; Dem. Philipp. i. p. 49; Isoc. de Pac.; Arist. Rhet. iii. 17. § 16.) In b. c. 355 Chares was sent against Sestus, which, as well as Cardia, seems to have refused submission notwithstanding the cession of the Chersonese to Athens in 357. (Cersebileptes.) He took the town, massacred the men, and sold the women and children for slaves. (Diod. xvi. 34.) In the Olynthian war, b. c. 349, he was appointed general of the mercenaries sent from Athens to the aid of Olynthus; but he seems to have effected little or nothing. The command was then entrusted to Charidemus, who in the ensuing year, 348, was again superseded by Chares. In this campaign he gained some slight success on one occasion over Philip's mercenaries, and celebrated it by a feast given to the Athenians with a portion of the money which had been sacrilegiously taken from Delphi, and some of which had found its way into his hands. (Diod. xvi. 33–55; Philochor. ap. Diony. p. 735; Theopomp. and Hemicdele. Ap. Athen. xii. p. 532.) On his death he was impeached by Cephsidotus, who complained, that "he was endeavouring to give his account after having got the people tight by the throat." (Arist. Rhet. iii. 10. § 7), an allusion perhaps merely to the great embarrassment of Athens at the time. (See a very unsatisfactory explanation in Mitford, ch. 39, sec. 2.) In b. c. 346 we find him commanding again in Thrace; and, when Philip was preparing to march against Cersebileptes, complaints arrived at Athens from the Chersonese that Chares had withdrawn from his station, and was nowhere to be found; and the people were obliged to send a special embassy to him in order to make amends for the message, that "the Athenians were surprised that, while Philip was marching against the Chersonese, they did not know where their general and their forces were." That he had been engaged in some private expedition of plunder is probable enough. In the same year, and before the departure of the second embassy from Athens to Macedonia on the subject of the peace, a despatch arrived from Chares stating the hopeless condition of the affairs of Cersebileptes. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. pp. 390, 391, 447; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 29, 37, 40.) After this we lose sight of Chares for several years, during which he probably resided at Sigeum, which, according to Theopompus (ap. Athen. xii. p. 532), was with him a favourite residence, as supplying more opportunity for the indulgence of his progigant propensities than he could find at Athens. But in a speech of Demosthenes delivered in n. c. 341 (de Chares, p. 97) he is spoken of as possessing much influence at that time in the Athenian coun-cells; and we may consider him therefore to have been one of those who authorized and defended the proceedings of Dipoethes against Philip in Thrace. In n. c. 340 he was appointed to the command of the force which was sent to aid Byzyantium against Philip; but his character excited the suspicions of the Byzantians, and they refused to receive him. Against the enemy he effected nothing; his only exploits were against the allies of Athens, and these he plundered unscrupulously. He was accordingly superseded by Phocion, whose success was [31x73] (Diod. xvi. 74, &c.; &c. Ilp. Ep. ad Aih. ap. Dem. p. 163; Plat. Phoc. 14.) In 335 he was sent to the aid of Amphissa against Philip, who defeated him together with the Theban general, Proxenus. Of this defeat, which is mentioned by Aeschines, Demosthenes in his reply says nothing, but speaks of two battles in which the Athenians were victorious. (Polyb. ii. 64; Ath.

E. C. l. c. p. 74; Dem. de Cor. p. 300; see Mitford, ch. 42, sec. 4; Clinton, Fast. ii. pp. 293, 294.) In the same year Chares was one of the commanders of the Athenian forces at the battle of Chaeronein, for the disastrous result of which he escaped censure, or at least prosecution, though Lynceus, one of his colleagues, was tried and condemned to death. (Diod. xvi. 85, 86; Wess. ad loc.) He is mentioned by Arrian among the Athenian orators and generals whom Alexander required to be surrendered to him in n. c. 335, though he was afterwards prevailed on by Demades not to press the demand against any but Charidemus. Plutarch, however, omits the name of Chares in the list which he gives us. (Arr. Anab. i. 10; Plat. Dem. 23.) When Alexander invaded Asia in n. c. 334, Chares was living at Sigeum, and he is mentioned again by Arrian (Arrab. i. 12) as one of those who came to meet the king and pay their respects to him on his way to Ilium. Yet we afterwards find him commanding for Dareius at Mytilene, which had been gained in n. c. 333 by Pharnabazus and Autophradates, but which Chares was compelled to surrender in the ensuing year. (Arr. Anab. ii. 1, iii. 2.) From this period we bear no more of him, but it is probable that he ended his days at Sigeum.

As a general, Chares has been charged with rashness, especially in the needless exposure of his own forces (Plut. Dem. ii. 2); and he seems indeed to have been possessed of no very superior talent, though perhaps he was, during the greater portion of the career, the best commander that Athens was able to find. In politics we see him connected throughout with Demosthenes (see Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 447),—a striking example of the strange associations which political interests are often thought to necessitate. Morally he must have been an incubas on any party to which he attached himself, notwithstanding the apparent assistance he might sometimes render it through the orators whom he is said to have kept constantly in pay. His progigancy, which was measureless, he unblushingly avowed in his reply to Phocion,—he might have ashamed any other man,—the austere virtue of Phocion. His bad faith passed into a proverb; and his rapacity was extraordinary, even amidst the miserable system then prevailing, when the citizens of Athens would neither fight their own battles nor pay the men who fought them, and her commanders had to support their mercenaries as best they could. In fact, his character presents no one single point on which the mind can rest with pleasure. He lived, as we know, during the period of his country's decline, and may serve, indeed, as a specimen of a class of men whose infuence in a nation is no less a cause than a sym-
tom of its fall. (Plut. Phoc. 5; Theopomp. op. Athen. l. c.; Inscr. de Pace; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 37; Eubul. op. Arist. Rhet. i. 15; Suid. s. v. Χάρης Παραβληθέντος.) [E. E.

CHARES (Χάρης) of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, whose duty it was to introduce strangers to the king (εἰσαγγελέας), wrote a history or rather a collection of anecdotes concerning the campaigns and the private life of Alexander (ἐπίλαξ Αλέξανδρος λαογραφίων) in ten books, fragments of which are preserved by Athenaeus (i. p. 27, c.; ii. p. 33, c., p. 124, c. iv. p. 171, b., vii. p. 271, m. x. p. 494, d., xi. p. 519, b., 514, b., xii. p. 538, b., x. p. 434, d., x. p. 436, f., xii. p. 513, f., xii. p. 515, f., xii. p. 517, f.). It was twelve years in erecting the colossus of Rhodes, which was measureless, he unblushingly obtained by the sale of the engines of war which were afterwards prevailed on by Demades not to press the demand against any but Charidemus. Plutarch, however, omits the name of Chares in the list which he gives us. (Arr. Anab. i. 10; Plat. Dem. 23.) aries as best they could. In fact, his character presents no one single point on which the mind can rest with pleasure. He lived, as we know, during the period of his country's decline, and may serve, indeed, as a specimen of a class of men whose infuence in a nation is no less a cause than a sym-
tom of its fall. (Plut. Phoc. 5; Theopomp. op. Athen. l. c.; Inscr. de Pace; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 37; Eubul. op. Arist. Rhet. i. 15; Suid. s. v. Χάρης Παραβληθέντος.) [E. E.

CHARES (Χάρης) of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, whose duty it was to introduce strangers to the king (εἰσαγγελέας), wrote a history or rather a collection of anecdotes concerning the campaigns and the private life of Alexander (ἐπίλαξ Αλέξανδρος λαογραφίων) in ten books, fragments of which are preserved by Athenaeus (i. p. 27, c.; ii. p. 33, c., p. 124, c. iv. p. 171, b., vii. p. 271, m. x. p. 494, d., xi. p. 519, b., 514, b., xii. p. 538, b., x. p. 434, d., x. p. 436, f., xii. p. 513, f., xii. p. 515, f., xii. p. 517, f.). at the entrance of the harbour of Rhodes. There is no authority for the statement that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbour. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake 56 years after its erection. (Xen. c. 224, Euseb. Chron., and Chron. Pasch. sub Ol. 139.) 1. Polyb. v. 88, who places the earthquake a little later, in n. c. 218.) Strabo (xiv. p. 652), says, that an oracle forbade the Rhodians to restore it. (See also Philo Byzant. de VII Orbit Miraculis, and Philo.)

There are two epigrams on the colossus in the Lex. of Ekkehl. D.W. 14, &c.) [App. ii. 199—201.) [I.E. S.]

The fragments of the colossus remained on the ground 923 years, till they were sold by Moavlych, the general of the caliph Othman IV., to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on 900 camels. (A. n. 672.) Hence Scaliger calculated the weight of the bronze at 700,000 pounds. Considering the mechanical difficulties both of modelling and of casting so large a statue, the nicety required to fit together the separate pieces in which it must necessarily have been cast, and the skill needed to adjust its proportions, according to the laws of optics, and to adapt the whole style of the composition to its enormous size, we must assign to Chares a high place as an inventor in his art.

There are extant Rhodian coins, bearing the head of the Sun surrounded with rays, probably copied from the statue of Chares or from some of the other colossal statues of the sun at Rhodes. (Eckkhl. Doc. Num. ii. pp. 602—3; Rasche. Lex. Univ. Ritu Nuia, s. v. Rhodos, A., b., 11, &c.) There are two epigrams on the colossus in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck. Anm. i. p. 143, ii. pp. 198—9; Jacobs, i. 74, iv. 166. Respecting these epigrams, and the question whether Laches completed the work which Chares commenced, see Jacobs, Comment. i. 1. pp. 257—8; ii. 2. p. 8, and Bittiger, Auszüge zu 24 Vortrügen über die Archäologie, pp. 199——201.)

CHARILOUS (XapinKuTu). 1. Of Euboea, son of a woman of Oreus by an obscure father, if we may believe the account of Demosthenes in a speech filled with invective against him. (Dem. c. Aistorcr. p. 691.) On the same authority, we learn that he began his military career as a slinger among the light-armed, that he then became commander of a pirate vessel, and finally the captain of a mercenary band of "free companions." (Dem. c. Aistorcr. pp. 668, 669.) In this capacity he first entered the Athenian service under Iphicrates, who had been sent against Amphipolis, about n. c. 367. At the end of somewhat more than three years, Amphipolis agreed to surrender to the Athenians, and delivered hostages to Iphicrates for the performance of the promise: these, on being superseded by Timotheus, he entrusted to Charidemus, who restored them to the Amphipoliotes in spite of the decree of the Athenian people requiring them to be sent to Athens, and then passed over to Cotys, king of Thrace, who was hostile to the Athenians at the time. In n. c. 366, when Timotheus was meditating his attack on Amphipolis, Charidemus was engaged to enter the service of the Olynthians, who were preparing to defend them; but, on his passage from Cardia in the Chersonese, he was captured by the Athenians, and consented to aid them against Olynthus. After the failure of Timotheus at Amphipolis in the same year, Charidemus crossed over to Asia and entered the service of Memnon and Mentor, brothers-in-law of Artabazus, who had been imprisoned by Autophrades, but whose cause they still maintained. [Artabazus, No. 4.] He deceived his employers, however, and seized the towns of Scepsis, Celenus, and Illium; but, being closely pressed by Artabazus after his release from prison, he applied to the Athenians to interpose in his behalf, promising to help them in recovering the Chersonese. Artabazus, however, allowed him to depart uninjured, by the advice of Memnon and Mentor.
before the arrival of the Athenian squadron destined for the Hellespont under Cephisodotus; and Charidemus, on his return to Europe, in spite of his promise, lent his services to Cotys, whose daughter he married, and laid siege to Cithore and Emeus. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 669—674.) On the murder of Cotys, b. c. 358, he adhered to the cause of Cersobleptes, on whose behalf he conducted diplomacy, for the possession of the Chersonesus. He compelled Cephisodotus to submit, with respect to it, to a compromise most unfavourable to his country; and though Athenodorus (uniting with Amales and Beriasdes, and taking advantage of the national indignation excited by the murder of Miltocythes, which Charidemus had procured from the Carian Colossean) obliged Cersobleptes to consent to a compromise most unfavourable to Athens than that of Cephisodotus. But this was repudiated by the Athenians; and, at length, after much fruitless negotiation, Chares was sent to the Hellespont with a sufficient force and with the authority of commander-in-chief, Charidemus consented to ratify the treaty of Athenodorus, still, however, contending to retain the town of Cardia; and his partizans among the partisans at Athens having persuaded the people that they owed to him the cession of the Chersonesus (a strange delusion, if the narrative of events in Demosthenes may be depended on), they rewarded his supposed services with the franchise of the city and a golden crown. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 636, 674—683; Arist. Rhet. ii. 23, § 17; comp. Isocr. de Pace p. 169, c.) This appears to have been in b. c. 357. In b. c. 352, hoping perhaps to recover Amphipolis through his aid, they passed a decree in spite of the opposition of Demosthenes and his party (c. Aristoc. passim), pronouncing the person in whose behalf he refused to recede from his demand on the mediation of Demades. Charidemus, being thus obliged to leave his country, fled to Asia, and took refuge with Dareius, by whose orders he was summarily put to death in b. c. 333, shortly before the battle of Issus, having exasperated the king by some advice, too freely giving, tending to abate his confidence in his power and in the courage of his native troops. (Arr. Anab. i. 19; Plat. Dem. 23, Phoc. 17; Diod. xvii. 15, 30; Deimach. c. Dem. p. 94.) Diodorus (xivii. 39) speaks of Charidemus as having been high in favour with Philip of Macedon; but the inconclusiveness of this with several of the authorities above referred to is pointed out by Wesseling. (Ad Diod. l.c.)

CHARIDEMUS (Χαρίδημος), a Greek physician, who was one of the followers of Erasistratus and probably lived in the third century b. c. He is mentioned by Caecilius Aurelianus (De Morb. Aevit. iii. 15, p. 227), and was probably the father of the physician Hermogenes. [W. G.]

CHARILAS (Χαρίλαος). 1. Brother of Macandrius, tyrant of Samos. When the Persians invaded the island, towards the commencement of the reign of Dareius Hystaspis, for the purpose of establishing Sylosos, the brother of Polycrates, in the tyranny, Macandrius submitted to them, and agreed to abdicate; but Charilas, who was somewhat easy, obtained leave from his brother to fall with a body of soldiers on a party of the most distinguished Persians, who were sitting in front of the acropolis, and waiting for the ratification of the treaty. The consequence of this treacherous murder was a wholesale massacre of the Samians by order of the Persian general Otanes. (Herod. iii. 144—149.)

2. An Italian Greek, one of the chief men of Palaepolis, who, together with Nymphius, betrayed the town to Q. Publilius Philo, the Roman proconsul, in the second Samnite war (b. c. 329), and drove out the Samnite garrison. (Liv. viii. 144—149.)

CHARILLAUS (Χαρίλαος), a Locritian, and a dramatic poet. Whether he wrote tragedies or comedies is uncertain, nor is anything further known of him than that plays of his were represented at Athens in b. c. 328. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 428, ed. Harles.) [E. E.]

CHARILLAUS or CHARIILLUS (Χαρίλλιος, Χαριλλώς), a king of Sparta, son of Polydectes, and 7th of the Euryptontis, is said by Plutarch to have received his name from the general joy excited by the justice of his uncle Lycurgus when he placed him, yet a new-born infant, on the royal seat, and bade the Spartans acknowledge him for their king. (Plut. Lyc. 3; Pans. B. G. iv. just. iii. 2; Schol. ad Plut. Per. xv. p. 474.) According to Plutarch, the reforms projected by Lycurgus on his return from his voluntary exile at first

CHARIUS.
CHARIS.

The Homeric poems mention only one Charis, or an indefinite number in the plural, and from the passage in which Pasithaea is mentioned, it would almost seem as if the poet would intimate that he was thinking of a great number of Charites and of a division of them into classes. Hesiod distinctly mentions three Charites, whose names are Euphrosyne, Aegla, and Phalaina, and this number as well as these names subsequently became generally established, although certain places in Greece retained their ancient and established number. Thus the Spartans had only two Charites, Cleta and Phaena, and the Athenians the same number, Auko and Hegemon, who were worshipped there from the earliest times. Hermesianax added Peitho as a third. (Paus. ix. 35.) Sostratus (up. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1965) relates that Aphrodite and the three Charites, Pasithaea, Cale, and Euphrosyne, disputed about their beauty with one another, and when Teiresias awarded the prize to Cale he was changed by Aphrodite into an old woman, but Cale rewarded him with a beautiful head of hair and took him to Creta. The name Cale in this passage has led some critics to think that Homer also (I. xviii. 393) mentions the names of two Charites, Pasithaea and Cale, and that should accordingly be written by a capital initial.

The character and nature of the Charites are sufficiently expressed by the names they bear: they were conceived as the goddesses who gave festive joy and enhanced the enjoyments of life by refinement and gentleness. Gracefulness and beauty in social intercourse are therefore attributed to them. (Horat. Carm. iii. 21, 22; Pind. Od. xiv. 7, &c.) They are mostly described as being in the service or attendance of other deities, as real joy exists only in circles where the individual gives up his own self and makes it his main object to afford pleasure to others. The less beauty is ambitions to rule, the greater is its victory; and the less homage it demands, the more freely is it paid. These seem to be the ideas embodied in the Charites. They lend their grace and beauty to everything that delights and elevates gods and men. This notion was probably the cause of Charis being called the wife of Hephaestus, the artificer, and the Charites as the daughters of the greatest artists are their favourites. The gentleness and gracefulness which they impart to man's ordinary pleasures are expressed by their moderating the exciting influence of wine (Hor. Carm. iii. 19, 15; Pind. Od. xii. 18), and by their accompanying Aphrodite and Eros. (Hom. Od. xvii. 394, xviii. 104; Paus. vi. 24. § 5.) They also assist Hermes and Peitho to give grace to eloquence and persuasion (Hesiod. Op. 63), and wisdom itself receives its charms from them. Poetry, however, is the art which is especially favoured by them, whence they are called δραματικηαι or δραματικαι. For this reason they are the friends of the Muses, with whom they live together in Olympus. (Hes. Thet. 64; Buarip. Hec. ser. 678; Theoret. xvi. in fin.) Poets are inspired by the Muses, but the application of their songs to the embelishment of life and the festivals of the gods are the work of the Charites. Late Roman writers describe the Charites (Gratiae) as the symbols of gratitude and benevolence, to which they were led by the meaning of the word gratia.

CHARI-MANDER, the author of a work on Comets, quoted by Suenec. (Quaest. Nat. vii. 5.)

CHARIS (Χαρίς), the personification of Grace and Beauty, which the Roman poets translate by Gratia and we after them by Grace. Homer, without giving her any other name, describes a Charis as the wife of Hephaestus. (I. xviii. 382.) Hesiod (Theog. 945) calls the Charis who is the wife of Hephaestus, Aegla, and the youngest of the Charites. (Comp. Buxath. ad Hom. p. 1148.) A division of the Charites was made in the Greek mythology, so that Aphrodite was the wife of Hephaestus, from which we may infer, if not the identity of Aphrodite and Charis, at least a close connexion and resemblance in the notions entertained about the two divinities. The idea of personified grace and beauty was, as we have already seen, divided into a plurality of beings at a very early time, probably to indicate the various ways in which the beautiful is manifested in the world and adorns it. In the Iliad itself (xiv. 269) Pasithaea is called one of the younger Charites, who is destined to be the wife of Sleep, and the plural Charites occurs several times in the Homeric poems. (Od. xviii. 194.)

The parentage of the Charites is differently described; the most common account makes them the daughters of Zeus either by Hera, Eurynome, Eunomia, Eurydome, Harmonia, or Leto. (Hesiod. Theog. 907, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 1; Pind. Od. xv. 15; Phurrut. 15; Orph. Hymn. 59. 2; Stat. Theb. ii. 286; Buxath. ad Horn. p. 392.) According to others they were the daughters of Apollo by Aegle or Euanthe (Paus. ix. 35. § 1), or of Dionysus by Aphrodite or Coronis.
in their own language. (Senec. De Benef. i. 3; comp. Dioct. v. 73.)

The worship of the Charites was believed to have been first introduced into Boeotia by Eteocles, the son of Cephissus, in the valley of that river. (Paus. i. 35. § 1; Theocrit. xvi. 104; Pind. Ol. xiv.) At Orchomenos and in the island of Paros a festival, the χαριστια or χαριστια, was celebrated to the Charites. (Euceb. Now. p. 183; Apollod. iii. 15. § 7.) At Orchomenos they were worshipped from early times in the form of rude stones, which were believed to have fallen from heaven in the time of Eteocles. (Paus. i. 35. § 1; Strab. i. p. 414.) Statues of them are mentioned in various parts of Greece, as at Sparta, on the road from Sparta to Amyclae, in Crete, at Athens, Elis, Hermione, and others. (Paus. ii. 22. § 8, iii. 54. § 10, iii. 14. § 6, vi. § 5.5.) They were often represented as the companions of other gods, such as Hera, Hermes, Eros, Dionysus, Aphrodite, the Horae, and the Muses. In the ancient statues of Apollo at Delos and Delphi, the Charites were generally represented on his hand. In the early times the Charites were represented dressed, but afterwards their figures were always made naked, though even Pausanias (ix. 35. § 2) did not know who had introduced the custom of representing them naked. Specimens of both dressed and naked representations of the Charites are still extant. Their character is that of unconscious maidens in the full bloom of life, and they always embrace one another. Their attributes differ according to the divinities upon whom they attend; as the companions of Apollo they often carry musical instruments, and as the companions of Aphrodite they carry myrtles, roses, or dices, the favourite game of youth. (Hist. Mythol. Bildersam., ii. p. 215, &c.)

CHARIUS (Xapéanos), a son of Lyconos, to whom tradition ascribed the foundation of Charistiae in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 3. § 1; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

[LS.]

CHARIUS (Xapéanos), a Greek orator and a contemporary of Demosthenes, wrote orations for others, in which he imitated the style of Lycurus. He was in his turn imitated by Hegesines. (Cic. Brut. 53.) His orations, which were extant in the time of Quintilian and Rutilius Lupus, must have been of considerable merit, as we learn from the works of Lysias in which he imitated the style of Lysias. (Hirt, Mythol. Bildersam., ii. p. 215, &c.)

[LS.]

CHARIUS, a presbyter of the church of the Philadelphia in the fifth century. Shortly before the general council held at Ephesus, A. D. 431, Antonius and James, presbyters of Constantinople, and attached to the Nestorian party, came to Philadelphia with commendatory letters from Anastasius and Photius, and cunningly prevailed upon several of the clergy and laity who had just recognised the errors of the Quartiodecani (Neander, Kirchengesch. ii. 3, p. 645), to subscribe a protestation of faith tainted with the Nestorian errors. But Charius boldly withstood them, and therefore they proscribed him as a heretic from the communion of the pious. When the council assembled at Ephesus, Charius accused before the fathers that composed it Anastasius, Photius, and James, exhibiting against them a book of indictment, and the confession which they had imposed upon the deluded Philadelphians. He also presented a brief confession of his own faith, harmonizing with the Nicene creed, in order that he might clear himself from the suspicion of heresy. The time of his birth and death is unknown. He appears only in connexion with the Eusebian council, A. D. 431.

The book of indictment he presented to the synod, his confession of faith, a copy of the exposition of the creed as corrupted by Anastasius and Photius, the subscriptions of those who were misled, and the decree of the council after hearing the case, are given in Greek and Latin in the Sarcosancta Concilia, edited by Labbe and Cossart, vol. iii. p. 673, &c., Paris, 1671, folio. See also Cave's Historia Literaria, pp. 327, 328, ed. Lond. 1688, fol. [S. D.]

CHRISTIUS, AURELIUS ARCADIIUS, a Roman jurist, one of the latest in time of those whose works are cited in the Digest. Herecimus Modestinus, who was living in the reign of Constans II., was the last jurist of the classical period of Roman jurisprudence. "Hic oracula jurisconsultorum omittimus," says the celebrated Jac. Godofroi (Manuale Juris, i. 7), "sic ut ultimum J.ctorum Modestinum decre wurde quote fiscent." For an interval of 80 or 90 years after Modestinus, no jurist appears whose works are honoured with citation in the Digest, unless Julius Aquila or Furius Anthimus belongs to that interval. The only two who can be named with certainty as posterior to Modestinus are Charius and Hermogennianus. Of these two, the priority of date is probably, for several reasons, to be assigned to the former. It may be here mentioned that Hermogennianus occupied the last place in the Florentine Index. Charius cites Modestinus with applause (Dig. 50. tit. 4. s. 18. § 26), but his date is more closely to be collected from Dig. 1. tit. 11. s. un. § 1, where he states that appeal from the sentences of the praefecti practorio has been abolished. Now, this appeal was abolished by Constantine the Great, A. D. 331 (Cod. 7. tit. 62. s. 19), and, from the language of Charius in Dig. 1. tit. 11. 11. may be inferred that Constantine was alive at the time when that passage was written. Charius is sometimes (e. g. Dig. 25. tit. 5. s. 1. pr.) cited in the Digest by the name "Arcadius, qui et Charisius," and by Ioannes Lydus (de Magist. Pop. Rom. i. c. 14), he is cited by the name Aurelius simply. The name Charius was not uncommon in the decline of the empire, and, when it occurs on coins, it is usually spelled Carisius, as if it were etymologically connected with Carus rather than χαρπ. The jurist, according to Panzironi (de Clar. Jur. Interpp. pp. 13, 59), was the same with the Arcadius to whom Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus directed a rescript, A. D. 283. (Cod. 9. tit. 11. s. 4.) There is a constitution of Diocletianus and Maximianus, addressed, A. D. 300-2, to Arcadius Chresimus. (Cod. 2. tit. 3. s. 27.) Panzironi would here read Charius, rather than Carisius, our Charius with the Carisius (Vat. M. S.; vulg. de Clar. Jur. Interpp. p. 13, 59), was the same with the Arcadius to whom Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus directed a rescript, A. D. 283. (Cod. 9. tit. 11. s. 4.) These identifications, however, though not absolutely impossible, rest upon mere conjecture, and would require the jurist to have lived to a very advanced CHARISIUS.

The third, included in the "Grammaticae Latinae, Auctores Antiqui," of Putschius, Hanov. 4to. 1605, professes to be far more complete and accurate than the preceding, in consequence of the additional matter and various readings obtained from an excellent codex, the property of Janus Douza, of which, however, no detailed account is given, and of which no trace now remains. Niebuhr had paved the way for a new edition by collating and making extracts from the Neapolitan MS. originally employed by Cyminius, which affords means for greatly purifying and enlarging the text. These materials were promised by Niebuhr to Lindo- t, of which no copy, however, had been given to the editor. Lasso, however, in consequence of the death of his friend and the destruction of a portion of his papers by fire, succeeded in obtaining only a copy of Putschius with the various readings of the Neapolitan MS. marked on the margin. These are given in the edition of Charisius, which forms the first part of the fourth volume of the "Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum Veterum," Lips. 4to. 1840. (Funckeus, De inscrib. ac decrepita Lingue Latinae Sensueta, c. iv. § 11; Osnam, Beiträge zur Greich. und Röm. Litteraturgesch. vol. ii. p. 319; Lasch, Die Sprachphilosophie der Alten, vol. i. p. 163.)

CHARITON.[CHARISIUS.] CHARI'TON (Xapirnov) of Aphrodisias, a town of Caria, is the name by which one of the Greek erotic prose writers calls himself; but the name is probably feigned (from ëpòs and òfóberißen), as the time and position of the author certainly are. He represents himself as the secretary (παραγορεύομαι) of the orator Athenagoras, evidently referring to the Syracusan orator mentioned by Thucydides (vi. 35, 36) as the political opponent of Hermocrates. The daughter of Hermocrates is the heroine of Chariton's work, which is a romance, in eight books, on the Loves of Chaercas and Callirhoe, under the following title, Xapirovos òpobrdouos tás vàp òpobrdov kai Kaηlηpóqw éρoōvov òpobrdouov Áρη, των θεων. The work begins with the marriage of the heroine, which is presently followed by her burial. She comes to life again in the tomb, and is carried off by robbers. After various adventures, she is restored to Chaercas. The incidents are natural and pleasing, and the style simple; but the work as a whole is reckoned inferior to those of Achilles Tatius, Heliodorus, Longus, and Xenophon of Ephesus. Nothing is known respecting the real life or the time of the author. The critics place him variously between the fifth and ninth centuries after Christ. The general opinion is, that he was the latest of the erotic prose writers, except perhaps Xenophon of Ephesus. The work was transcribed from which it was printed by James Philip D'Orrville, with a Latin version and notes by Rolckes, in 3 vols. 4to. Amst. 1750. The commentary of D'Orrville is esteemed one of the best on any ancient author. It was reprinted, with additional notes by Beck, 1 vol. 8vo. Lips. 1783. A very beautiful edition of the text was printed at Venice, 1812, 4to.

The book has been translated into German by Heyne, Leipzig. 1753, and Schneider, Leipzig. 1807; into French by Larcher, Par. 1765 (reprinted in the "Bibliothèque des Romains Oeux, Par. 1797") and Pallet; 1775 and 1784; into Italian by M. A. Giacomelli, Rom. 1782, and others; into English by Becket and his friend, 1764.
CHARMIDES.

CHAR' RITON (Xaipruv), an ouist, who lived in or before the second century after Christ, as one of his medical formulae is quoted by Galen (De Antid. ii. 13, vol. xiv. p. 180), and also by Aetius (iv. 1, 18, p. 220). He is also mentioned in an ancient Latin inscription, which is explained at Antui. ii. 13. vol. xiv. p. 180), and also by Aetius Lips. 1826, 4to., fasc. iv. See also Kühn's Additam. ad Elench. Medec. Vol. a J. A. Fabricius, &c. exhibition, Lips. 1826, 4to., fasc. iv. [W. A. G.]

CHAR'XENA (Xapixetpa), a lyric poetess, mention of her occurs in the Hymn to Aphrodite. (Pind. v. 327.) Aristophanes alludes to her in a passage which the Scholiast and lexicographers explain as a proverbial expression implying that she was "silly and foolish." (Eccles. 943; Suidas, s. v.; Etymol. Mag. siaz. &c.; Senex's, s. v. &c.)

CHARMADAS, philosopher. [CHARMIDES].

CHAR'MIDES (Xapxouioi). 1. An Athenian, son of Glaucon, was cousin to Critias and uncle by the mother's side to Plato, who introduces him in the dialogue which bears his name as a very young man at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. (Comp. Heind. ad Plut. Char., 154, and the authorities there referred to.) In the same dialogue he is represented as a very amiable youth and of surpassing beauty, and he appears again in the "Protagoras" at the house of Callias, son of Hippocrates. [See p. 567, b.] We learn from Xenophon, that he was a great favourite with Socrates, and was possessed of more than ordinary ability, though his excessive diffidence deprived his country of the services which he might have rendered her as a statesman. In b.c. 404 he was one of the Ten who were appointed, over and above the thirty tyrants, to the special government of the Peiraeus, and he was slain at the battle of Thrasylalus the battle of Munychia in the same year. (Xen. Mem. iii. 6, 7, Hall. ii. 4. § 19; Schneid. ad loc.)

2. Called also Charmadas by Cicero, a disciple of Cleitonymus the Carthaginian, and a friend and companion (as he had been the fellow-pupil) of Philo of Larissa, in conjunction with whom he is said by some to have been the founder of a fourth Academy. He flourished, therefore, towards the end of the second and at the commencement of the first century b.c. Cicero, writing in b.c. 45, speaks of him as recently dead. (Tusc. Disp. i. 24.) On the other hand, he is still marked for his eloquence and for the great compass and retentiveness of his memory. His philosophical opinions were doubtless coincident with those of Philo. (Cic. Acad. Quaest. iv. 6, Ortat. 16, de Ortat. ii. 88; Plin. H. N. viii. 24; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iii. p. 167, and the authorities there referred to.) [E. B.]

CHARMYNUS (Xapxetipos), an Athenian general, who is first mentioned by Thucydeides as coming to Samos in b.c. 412. Samos was at this time the head-quarters of the Athenian fleet, and the force there amounted to upwards of 100 ships, of which 30 were detached to besiege Chios, while the rest (and with them Charmynus) remained to watch the Spartan fleet under the high-admiral Astyochus. Anyhow, a short time afterwards with twenty vessels to the coast of Lycia, to look out for the Spartan fleet conveying the deputies who were to examine the complaints made against Astyochus. On this service he fell in with Astyochus, who was himself on the look-out to convey his countrymen. Charmynus was defeated, and lost six ships, but escaped with the rest to Halicarnassus. We afterwards find him assisting the oligarchical party at Samos in the ineffectual attempt at a revolution. (Thuc. viii. 30, 41, 45, 73; Aristoph. Thesmoph. 804.) [A. H. C.]

CHARMIDES, a Laeacidian, was sent by Thibron, the Spartan harmonist in Asia, to the Cyrenae, perhaps as an emissary and in the service of Seuthes, to induce them to enter the Laeacidian service against Persia, b.c. 399. (Xen. Anab. vi. 6, § 1, &c., Hell. iii. 1, § 6; Diod. xiv. 37.) On this occasion he defended Xenophon from the imputation thrown out against him by some of the Cyrenaes, of treacherous collusion with Seuthes to deprive them of their pay, and he also aided them in obtaining what was due to them from the Thracian prince. A great portion of this consisted in cattle and slaves, and the sale of these and the distribution of the proceeds was undertaken, at Xenophon's request, by Charminus and his colleague, Polyclitus, who incurred much odium in the management of the transaction. (Xen. Anab. vii. 6. §§ 39, 7. §§ 13-19, 56.) [E. B.]

CHARMIS (Xapxetos), a physician of Marseilles, who came to Rome in the reign of Nero, a. d. 54—68, where he acquired great fame and wealth by reviving the practice of cold bathing. (Plin. H. N. xxix. 5.) He is said to have received from one patient two hundred thousand sesterces, or 1562½ l. (Plin. H. N. xxix. 8.) He was also the inventor of an antidote which was versified by Damocritus, and is preserved by Galen. (De Antid. ii. 1, 4, vol. xiv. pp. 114, 126.) [W. A. G.]

CHARO'IADES (Xapxoudjades), called Charides by Justin (iv. 3), was a man connected with Laocoon and is mentioned by Pliny under the name of Anaximus, an expedition sent from Athens to Sicily (b.c. 427), and was killed soon afterwards. (Thuc. iii. 86, 90, Diod. xii. 54.) [A. H. C.]

CHARON (Xapxous), a son of Erebos, the aged and dirty ferryman in the lower world, who conveyed in his boat the shades of the dead—though only of those whose bodies were buried—across the rivers of the lower world. (Virg. Aen. vi. 295, &c.; Senec. Herc. fur. 764.) For this service he was paid by each shade with an obolus or danae, which coin was placed in the mouth of every dead body previous to its burial. This notion of Charon seems to be of late origin, for it does not occur in many of the ancient authors. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 15; Vell. ii. 1; Juven. iii. 267; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1666.) Charon was represented in the Locae of Delphi by Polygonus. [I. S.] 2 v CHARONDAS.

CHARON (Χάρων), a distinguished Theban, who exposed himself to much danger by concealing Pelopidas and his fellow-conspirators in his house, when they returned to Thebes with the view of delivering it from the Spartans and the oligarchical government, b. c. 379. Charon himself took an active part in the enterprise, and, after its success, was made Beastarch together with Pelopidas and Mellen. (Xen. Hel. vi. § 8; Plut. Pelop. 7-18; de Gen. Soc. passim.)

CHARON (Χάρων), literary. 1. A historian of Lampascus, is mentioned by Tertullian (de Animi. 46) as prior to Herodotus, and is said by Suidas (s. e.) according to the common reading, to have flourished (παρακείμενος) in the time of Dareius Hystaspis, in the 79th Olympiad (n. c. 464); but, as Dareius died in n. c. 485, it has been proposed to read θεός for θεός in Suidas, thus placing the date of Charon in Ol. 69 or b. c. 504. He lived, however, as late as b. c. 464, for he is referred to by Plutarch (Them. 27) as mentioning the flight of Themistocles to Asia in n. c. 465. We find the following list of his works in Suidas: 1. Αθηνομικα. 2. Πέρσικα. 3. Πελοπικα. 4. Κρησιακα. 5. Πελοπικα. 6. Ορια Λαμπακιηνων, a work quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 47 b, e), where Schweighaeuser proposes to substitute δομο (comp. Diod. i. 26), thus making its subject to be the κανναλαται of Lampascus. 7. Παραθεσεις των Λακεδαιμονων, a chronological work. 8. Κειμενα πολεων. 9. Κρητικα. 10. Περιλαπα των Περαιακων ατομων, a lawgiver of Ca-

The fragments of Charon, together with those of Hecataeus and Xanthus, have been published by Creuzer, Heidelberg, 1806, and by Car. and Th. Muller, Fragmenta Historica Graeca, Paris, 1841. Besides the references above given, comp. Plat. de Mult. Vitr. s. v. Λαμψακα; Strab. xiii. p. 589; Pacs. x. 30; Athen. xii. p. 520, d.; Ael. V. H. i. 15; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 2, 472; Voss. de Hist. Graec. b. i. c. 1; Clint. Fast. sub annis 504, 464.

2. Of Catrhage, wrote an account of all the tyrants of Europe and Asia, and also the lives of illustrious men and women. (Suid. s. e.; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 415, ed. Westermann.)

3. Of Naucratis, was the author of a history of Carthage, preserved by Stobaeus, there is one probably authen-

CHAROPS (Χάροπς), bright-eyed or joyful-looking, a surname of Heracles, under which he had a statue near Mount Laphystion on the spot where he was believed to have brought forth Cerberus from the lower world. (Paus. ix. 34, § 4.) There are also two mythical beings of this name. (Hom. Od. xi. 427; Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 194; Hyg. Fab. 181.)

CHAROPS (Χάροπς), 1. A chief among the Epeirots, who sided with the Romans in their war with Philip V., and, by sending a shepherd to guide a portion of the Roman army over the heights above the position of the Macedonians, enabled Flamininus to dislodge Philip from the defile which he had occupied in Epeiros, b. c. 196. (Polyb. xvii. 3, xviii. 22; Liv. xxxii. 6, 7, 11; Plut. Philipp. 12, 132.) Conrooms sent by his countrymen on an embassy to Anti-

The king that the Epeirots were more exposed to the attacks of the Romans than any of the inhabitants of the rest of have seen, is not included among the Chalcidian cities, and the date of its foundation is n. c. 448. It is also demonstrated by Bentley (Plutarias, p. 367, &c.), that the laws which Diodorus gives as those drawn up by Charondas for the Thurians were in reality not his. For Aristotle (Polit. iv. 12) tells us, that his laws were adapted to an arie-phratry, whereas in Diodorus we constantly find him ordering appeals to the δικαιοσύνη, and the constitut-

tion of Thuri is expressly called δυναστευημένοι. Again, we learn from a happy correct-

Bentley in a corrupt passage of the Politics (ii. 12), that the only peculiarity in the laws of Charondas was that he first introduced the power of prosecuting false witnesses (περικαταστάτη). But it is quite certain that this was in force at Athens long before the existence of Thuri, and therefore that Charondas, as its author, also lived before the foundation of that city. Lastly, we are told by Diogenes Laërtius, that Protagoras was the lawgiver of Thuri. (See Wesseling's note on Dio-Diodorus, I. c., where Bentley's arguments are summed up with great clearness.) Diodorus ends the ac-of his pseudo-Charondas by the statement that he one day forgot to lay aside his sword before he appeared in the assembly, thereby violating one of his own laws. On being reminded of this by a citizen, he exclaimed, μη Δ' αλλα κόρον ποσφονίαν, and immediately stabbed himself. This anecdote is also told of Dioecles of Syracuse, and of Zaleucus, though Valerius Maximus (vi. § 5) agrees with Diodorus in attributing it to Charondas. The story that Charondas was a Pythagorean, is probably an instance of the practice which arose in later times of calling every distinguished lawgiver a disciple of Pythagoras, which title was even conferred on Numa Pompilius. (Comp. Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. c. 7.) Among several pretended laws of Charondas preserved by Stobaeus, there is one probably authentificate, since it is found in a fragment of Theophratus. (Stob. Serm. 48.) This enacts, that all buying and selling is to be transacted with ready money, and that the government is to provide no remedy for those who lose their money by giving credit. The same ordinance will be found in Plato's Laws. The laws of Charondas were probably in verse. (Athen. xiv. p. 619.) The fragments of the laws of Charondas are given in Heyne's Opusculum, vol. ii. p. 74, &c. [G. E. L. C.]

CHAROPS (Χάροπς), a lawgiver of Ca-

of Charondas, as given by Diodorus (xiv. 12): viz.

that after Thuri was founded by the people of the ruined city of Sybaris, the colonists chose Charonas the best of their fellow-citizens," to draw up a code of laws for their use. For Thuri, as we Greece, and begged him therefore to excuse them from siding with him unless he felt himself strong enough to protect them. (Polyb. xx. 3.) He continued to the end of his life to cultivate the friendship of the Romans, and sent his grandson to Rome for education. (Polyb. xxvii. 15.) [E. E.]

2. A grandson of the above. He received his education at Rome, and after his return to his own country adhered to the Roman cause; but here ends all resemblance between himself and his grandfather, who is called καλός καταβολής by Polybius. (xxvii. 13.) It was this younger Charops by whose calumnies Antinous and Cephalus were driven in self-defence to take the side of Perseus [ANTINOUSS]; and he was again one of those who flew from the several states of Greece to Aemilius Paulus at Amphipolis, in b. c. 167, to congratulate him on the decisive victory at Pydna in the preceding year, and who seized the opportunity to rid themselves of the most formidable of their political opponents by pointing them out as friends of Macedonia, and so causing them to be apprehended and sent to Rome. (Polyb. xxx. 10; Liv. xiv. 31; Diod. Exc. p. 578; see p. 569, b.)

The power thus obtained Charops in particular so barbarously abused, that Polybius has recorded his proceedings, however, were disavowed at Home, and when he went thither he was refused to receive him into their houses. Yet on his return to Epirus ho had the audacity to falsify the senator's sentence. The year 157 c. is commemorated by Polybius as one in which Greece never would be again a greater monster of cruelty."

Cheiron (χειρόν), and SYADRAS (ΣΥΑΔΡΑΣ), statuaries at Sparta, were the teachers of the Seven Sages, flourished towards the commencement of the 6th century B. C. Herodotus (i. 59) speaks of him as contemporary with Hippocrates, the father of Pheidistratus, and Diogenes Laërtius tells us, that he was an old man in the 52nd Olympiad (b. c. 579), and held the office of Eiphor in Ol. 56. (b. c. 556.) In the same author there is a passage which appears to ascribe to Cheiron the institution of the Ephory, but this contradicts the other well known and more authentic traditions. On the authority also of Alcidamas the rhetorician (ap. Arist. Rhet. ii. 23, §11) we learn, that he was a member of the Spartan senate. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games, and that his funeral was attended by all the Greeks assembled at the festival. Such a token of respect seems to have been due not more to his wisdom than to the purity of his life, which, according to Diodorus, was not inconsistent with his doctrine. (Comp. Cell. i. 3.) Diogenes Laërtius mentions him as a writer of Elegiac poems, and records many sayings of his which show that he was a wise man, and so causing them to be apprehended and sent to Rome. (Polyb. xxx. 10; Liv. xiv. 31; Diod. Exc. p. 578; see p. 569, b.)

"Charopus" by Livy. [E. E.]

Cheiron of Lacedaemon, is mentioned by Stobaeus (de Vit. Pyth. 86, ad fin.) as one of the most distinguished women of the school of Pythagoras.

1. Daughter of Leonidas II., king of Sparta, and wife to Cleombrotus II. When Leonidas, alarmed at the prosecution instituted against him by Lysander [Aigis IV.], took refuge in the temple of Athena Chalcoieos, Cheilon left her husband, who was made king on the deposition of Leonidas, and, preferring to comfort her father in his adversity, accompanied him in his flight to Tegae. Afterwards, when Leonidas was restored, and Cleombrotus in his turn was driven to take refuge in the temple of Poseidon, Cheilon joined him in his altered fortunes, saved his life by her entreaties from her father's vengeance, and, again refusing to share the splendour of a throne, went with him to Heaven. (Plut. Agis, 11, 12, 16—18.) [E. E.]

Cheirisophus, a Lacedaemonian, was sent by the Ephors with 700 heavy-armed men (800 according to Diodorus), to aid Cyrus in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, b. c. 401, and joined the princes on his march at Issus in Cilicia. (Diod. xiv 19, 21; Xen. Anab. i. 4. § 3.) After the battle of Cannaxa, Clearchus sent him with others to Arranes to make an offer, which however was declined, of placing him on the Persian throne [p. 263, b.]. After the arrest of Clearchus and the other generals, through the treachery of Tissaphernes, Cheirisophus took an active part in encouraging the troops and in otherwise providing for the emergency, and, on the motion of Xenophon, was appointed, as a Lacedaemonian, to lead the van of the retreating army. In this post we find him subsequently acting throughout the retreat, and cordially cooperating with Xenophon. In fact it was only once that any difference arose between them, and that was caused by Cheirisophus having struck, in a fit of angry suspicion, an Armenian who was guiding them, and who led them in consequence of the indignity. (Diod. xiv. 27; Xen. Anab. iii. 2. § 53, &c. i. 3. §§ 38—43, 5. §§ 1—6, iv. 1. §§ 6, 15—22. 2. § 25, &c. iii. §§ 8, 25, &c. i. 6.—3.) When the Greeks had arrived at Taposiris on the Buxine, Cheirisophus volunteered to go to his friend Anaxibius, the Spartan admiral at Byzantium, to obtain a sufficient number of ships to transport them to Europe; but he was not successful in his application for them. (Diod. xiv. 30, 31; Xen. Anab. v. 1. § 4, vi. 1. § 16.) On his return to the army, which he found at Sinope, he was chosen commander-in-chief, Xenophon having declined for himself the proferred honour on the express ground of the prior claim of a Lacedaemonian. (Asub. vi. 1. §§ 10—33.) Cheirisophus, however, was unable to enforce submission to his authority, or to restrain the Arcadian and Achaean soldiers from their profligate attempt to plunder the hospitable Heracleots; and, on the sixth or seventh day from his election, these troops, who formed more than half the army, separated themselves from the rest, and departed by sea under ten generals whom they had appointed. Xenophon then offered to continue the march with the remainder of the forces, under the command of Cheirisophus, but the latter declined the proposal by the advice of Neos, who hoped to find vessels at Calpe furnished by Cleander, the Spartan Harmost at Byzantium, and wished to reserve them exclusively for their own portion of the army. With the small division yet under his command, Cheirisophus arrived safely at Calpe, where he died from the effects of a medicine which he had taken for a fever. (Xen. Anab. vi. 2. § 4, 4. § 11.)

CHEIRISOPOS (Xeiáriopos), a statuary in wood and probably in stone. A gilt wooden statue of Cheirisophus is said to have stood at Tegae, and near it was a statue in stone of the artist himself, which was most probably also his own work. (Paus. viii. 53. § 3.) Pausanias knew nothing of his age or of his teacher; but from the way in which he mentions him in connexion with the Cretan school of Daedalus, and from his working both in wood and stone, he is probably to be placed with the latest of the Daedalian sculptors, such as Dipoenus and Scyllis (about b. c. 566). Böckh considers the erection by the artist of his own statue as an indication of a later date (Corp. Inscrip. i. p. 19); but his arguments are satisfactorily answered by Thiersch, who also shows that the reply of Hermann to Böckh, that Pausanias does not say that Cheirisophus made his own statue, is not satisfactory. (Epochen, pp. 187—139.) Thiersch has also observed, that the name of Cheirisophus, like many other names of the early artists, is significant of skill in art (χειρίσος, σχειρόσ). Other names of the same kind are, Daedalus (Δαιδάλος) the son of Eupalamus (Εὐπάλαμος), Eucheir (Εὐχείρ), Chersiphron (Χερσίφρων), and others. Now, granting that Daedalus is nothing more than a mythological personage, and that his name was merely symbolical, there can be no doubt that others of these artists really existed and bore these names, which were probably given to them in their infancy because they belonged to families in which art was hereditary. Thiersch quotes a parallel case in the names taken from navigation among the maritime people of Phaeacia. (Hom. Od. viii. 112, &c.)

Pausanias mentions also two shrines of Dionysus, an altar of Corn, and a temple of Apollo, but the way in which he speaks leaves it doubtful whether Cheirisophus erected these, as well as the statue of Apollo, or only the statue. [P. 8.]

CHEIRON (Χειρόν), the wisest and justest of all the centaurs. (Hom. i. vi. 681.) He was the instructor of Achilles, whose father Peleus was a friend and relative of Cheirin, and received at his wedding with Thetis the heavy lance which was subsequently used by Achilles. (II. xvi. 143, xix. 390.) According to Apollodorus (i. 2. § 4), Cheiron was the son of Cronus and Philyra. He lived on mount Pelion, from which he, like the other centaurs, was expelled by the Lapithae; but sacrifices were offered to him there by the Magnesians until a very late period, and the family of the Cheironidae in that neighbourhood, who were distinguished for their knowledge of medicine, were regarded as his descendants. (Plut. Sympos. iii. 1; Müller, Orchom. p. 249.) Cheiron himself had been instructed by Apollo and Artemis, and was renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and the art of prophecy. (Xen. Cyney. ii. 831.) He was the instructor of Achilles, whose father Peleus was a friend and relative of Cheirin, and received at his wedding with Thetis the heavy lance which was subsequently used by Achilles. (II. xvi. 143, xix. 390.) All the most distinguished heroes of Grecian story are, like Achilles, described as the pupils of Chelron in these arts. His friendship with Peleus, who was his grandson, is particularly celebrated. Cheiron saved him from the hands of the other centaurs, who were on the point of killing him, and he also restored to him the sword which Acastus had concealed. (Apoll. iii. 13, § 3, &c.) Cheiron further informed him in what manner he might gain possession of Thetis, who was doomed to marry a mortal. He is also connected with the story of the Argonauts, whom he received kindly when they came to his residence on their voyage, for many of the heroes were his friends and pupils. (Apoll. Rhod. i. 554; Orph. Argon. 575, &c.) Hecules too was connected with him by friendship; but one of the poisoned arrows of this hero was nevertheless the cause of his death, for during his struggle with the Erymanthian boar, Hecules became involved in a fight with the centaurs, who fled to Cheiron, in the neighbourhood of Mene. Hecules shot at them, and one of his arrows struck Cheiron, who, although immortal, would not live any longer, and gave his immortality to Prometheus. According to others, Cheiron, in looking at one of the arrows, dropped it on his foot, and wounded himself. (Ovid. Fast. v. 397; Hygin. Poet. Ast. ii. 38.) Zeus placed Cheiron among the stars. He had been married to Neph or Chin-
CHERSIPHON. 693

CHERSIPHON (Χέρσηφος), or, as the name is written in Vitruvius and one passage of Pliny, CTESIPHON, an architect of the Cretan islands, was confounded with his son Metagenes, built or commenced building the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus. The worship of Artemis was most probably established at Ephesus before the time of the Ionian colonization (Artemis, p. 376, a.); and it would seem, that there was already at that distant period some temple to the goddess. (Paus. viii. 22, § 2.)

[CHERSIPHON]
white marble, a quarry of which was discovered, at a distance of only eight miles from the temple, by a shepherd named Ptolemaeus. Thirty-six of the columns were sculptured (perhaps Caryatides within the cela), one of them by the great sculptor Scopas. (Plin. xxxvi. 14. a. 21: but many critics think the reading doubtful.) They were of the Ionian order of architecture, which was now first invented. (P. S.)

Of the block of marble which composed the architrave some were as much as 30 feet long. In order to convey these and the columns to their places, Chersiphron and Metagenes invented some ingenious mechanical contrivances. (Vitr. x. 6, 7, or x. 2, §§ 11, 12, ed. Schneider; Plin. xxxvi. 14. a. 21.) The temple was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, and is celebrated in several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, especially in two by Antipater of Sidon (ll. pp. 16, 20, Branch and Jacobs).

From this account it is manifest that Chersiphron and Metagenes were among the most distinguished of ancient architects, both as artists and mechanicians.

(C. c. ad Att. i. 9, 12, 16.)

CHILO or CILO. [Cilo.]

CHIMAERA (Χιμαιρα), a fire-breathing monster, which, according to the Homeric poems, was of divine origin. She was brought up by Amisos, a daughter of Typhoon (Theog. 319, &c), she was a daughter of Typhoon (Theog. 319, &c). According to Hesiod, she was killed by Bellerophon, and was violated by the centurion into whose hands she fell. She agreed, however, to pay him a sum for her ransom; and when he had delivered her up to a body of her countrymen who met them at an appointed place for the purpose, she caused him to be put to death, and carried back his head to her husband. (Polyb. xxii. 21, and op. Phot. de Mul. Vitr. p. 225, ed. Tauchn.; Val. Max. vi. 1. Extern. 2; comp. Liv. xxxviii. 12.) Polybius says (l.c.), that he had himself conversed with her at Sardis, and admired her high spirit and good sense. [B. E.]

CHION (Χιόν), the son of Matria, a noble citizen of Hermione, on the Pontus, was a disciple of Plato. With the aid of Leon (or Leondes), Euxenon, and other noble youths, he put to death Clearchus, the tyrant of Hermione. (v. c. 365.) Most of the conspirators were cut down by the tyrant's body-guards upon the spot, others were afterwards taken and put to death with cruel tortures, and the city fell again beneath the worse tyranny of Syntaros, the brother of Clearchus. (Memnon, op. Phot. Cod. 324, pp. 222, 223, ed. Bekker; Justin. xvi. 5.)

There are extant thirteen letters which are ascribed to Chion, and which are of considerable merit; but they are undoubtedly spurious. Probably they are the composition of one of the later Platonists. They were first printed in Greek in the Aldine collection of Greek Letters, Venet. 1499, 8vo.; again, in Greek and Latin, in the reprint of that collection, Aurl. Allob. 1616. The first edition in a separate form was by J. Caselius, printed by Steph. Myliander, Rostoch, 1583, 4to.; there was also a Latin translation published in the same volume with a Latin version of the fourth book of Xenophon's Cyropaedeia, by the same editor and printer, Rostoch, 1584, 4to. A more complete edition of the Greek text, founded on a new recession of some Medicean MSS., with notes and indices, was published by J. T. Colerus, Lips. a.d. Dredal. 1765, 8vo. The best edition, containing all that is valuable in the preceding ones, is that of J. Com. Oriell, in the same volume with his edition of Memnon, Lips. 1816, 8vo. It contains the Greek text, the Latin version of Caselius, the Prolegomena of A. G. Hoffmann, the Enuma Elish, the Greek and the Notes of Colerus, Hoffmann, and Oriell. There are several selections from the letters of Chion. (A. G. Hoffmann, Prolegomen, ad Chiones Epist. Gracc. futurum edit. conscripta; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 677.)

CHION, of Corinthis, a sculptor, who attained to no distinction, not on industry or skill, but of good fortune. (Vitr. iii. Praef.)

CHIONE (Χιονη). 1. A daughter of Boreas and Oreithyia, and sister of Cleopatra, Zetes, and Calais. She became by Poseidon the mother of Eumolpos, and in order to conceal the event, she threw the boy into the sea; but the child was saved by Apollo. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 2, 4; Paus. i. 38. § 3.)

2. A daughter of Daedalion, who was beloved by Apollo and Hermes on account of her beauty. She gave birth to twins, Autolyceus and Philommon, the former a son of Hermes and the latter of Apollo. She was killed by Artemis for having found fault with the beauty of that goddess, and her father in his grief threw himself from a rock of Parnassus, but in falling he was changed by Apollo into a hawk. Chione is also called Phileus. (Ov. Met. xi. 366, &c.; Hymn. Pub. 200; comp. Aut. Did. 13.) There is a third mythical personage of this name.

CHIONIDES (Χιόνιδης and Χιώνιδης), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, whom Suidas (s. v.) places at the head of the poets of the old comedy (πρωτογενώς της άρχαίας κωμωδίας), adding that he exhibited eight years before the Persian war, that is, in n. c. 487. (Clinton, sub ann.) On the other hand, according to a passage in the Poetic of Aristotle (c. 5), Chionides was long after Iphicharmus. (Iphicharmus.) On the strength of this passage Meineke thinks that Chionides cannot have been much earlier than n. c. 500; and in confirmation of this date he quotes from Athenaeus (xiv. p. 638, a.) a passage from a play of Chionides, the Πραξιοι, in which mention is made of Onesippos, a poet contemporary with Catinus. But we also learn from Athenaeus (iv. c. iv. p. 137, e.), that some of the ancient critics considered the Πραξιοι to be spurious, and with respect to the passage of Aristotle, Ritter has brought forward very strong arguments against its genuineness. (For the discussion of the question consider the passage to be spurious, and with reference to the genuine. (Comm. in Aristot. Poet. 3.) However this may be, the difference of some twenty years in the date of Chionides is of little consequence compared with the fact, attested by Suidas and implied by Aristotle, that Chionides was the most ancient poet of the Athenian old comedy,—not absolutely in order of time, for Suidas lists in the same line both him (Συσαρίον) and, if the passage of Aristotle be genuine, so were Eutoces, Euxenides, and Myllus; but the first who gave the Athenian comedy that form which it re¬

CHIONIUS (Χιόνιος), a Spartan, who obtained the victory at the Olympic games in four successive Olympiads (Ol. 28-31), four times in the stadium and twice in the daisus. (Paus. iii. 14, § 3, iv. 23, §§ 2, 5, vi. 13, § 1, viii. 39, § 2; Anchises is the same as this Chionis; see Krause, Olympia, pp. 243, 261.)

CHIONIUS (Χιόνιος), a statuary of Corinth, about n. c. 410, executed, in conjunction with Amycleans and Dysillus, the group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi. (Amycleans.) Chionis made in it the statues of Athene and Artemis. (Paus. x. 13, § 4.)

CHIOS (Χίος), the name of two mythical personages, each of whom is said to have given the name to the island of Chios. (Paus. vii. 4, § 6; Steph. Byz. s. v. Χίος.)

CHITONE (Χίτων), a surname of Artemis, who was represented as a huntress with her chiton girt up. Others derived the name from the Attic village of Chitone, or from the circumstance of the chiton, a garment worn by the Athenian children, being being worn here. (Callim. Hymn. in Dion. 223; Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Jon. 77.) Respecting the festival of the Chitonia celebrated to her at Chitone, see Did. of Aut. s. v. Χιτώνα. [L. S.]

CHIONIUS. [Amycleans.] CHITONEUS. [Aphrodite.] CHLAEFNEAS (Χλαέφνεας), an Aetolian, was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to the Lacedaemonians, n. c. 211, to extort them against Philip V. of Macedon. He is reported by Polybius as dwelling very cogently (δισανέπιθετος) on the oppressive encroachments of all the successive kings of Macedonia from Philip II. downwards, as well as on the sure defeat which awaited Philip from the confederacy then formed against him. CHLIDONIUS (Χλιδώνιος). 1. A daughter of the Theban Amphion and Niobe. According to an Argive tradition, her original name was Meliboea, and she and her brother Amyclas were the only children of Niobe that were not killed by Apollo and Artemia. But the terror of Chloris at the death of her brothers and sisters was so great, that she turned perfectly white, and was therefore called Chloris. She and her brother built the temple of Leto at Argos, which contained a statue of Chloris also. (Paus. ii. 21, § 10.) According to an Olympian legend, she once gained the prize in the foot¬ and being presented to Julian, was treated by him hundred and forty-three men, besides four officers six thousand dead on the field. Obliged to cross their gallant resistance, they were routed, leaving six thousand dead on the field. Obligated to cross the Rhine in confusion, they lost many thousands more who were drowned in the river. Ammianus Marcellinus says, that the Romans lost only two hundred and forty-three men, besides four officers of rank, but this account cannot be relied upon. Chnodomarius fell into the hands of the victors, and being presented to Julian, was treated by him with kindness, and afterwards sent to Rome, where he was kept a prisoner in the Castra Peregrina on Mount Caesius. There he died a natural death some time afterwards. Ammianus Marcellinus gives a detailed account of the battle of Strasbourg, which had the most beneficial effect upon the tranquillity of Gaul. (Amm. Marc. xvi. 12; Aurel. Vict. Epit. c. 42; Liber. Ord. 10, 12.)

CHOE RILUS (Χοῖρολος or Χοῖρολας). There were four Greek poets of this name who have been frequently confounded with one another. They are treated of, and properly distinguished, by A. F. Nīke, Choe rill Tuni j que superant, Lips. 1817, 8vo.

1. Choe rillus of Athens, a tragic poet, contemporary with Thespis, Phrynichus, Pratinus, Aeschylus, and even with Sophocles, unless, as Weleker supposes, he had the same son of a name, which was also a tragic poet. (We leker, Die Griech. Trag. p. 892.) His first appearance as a competitor for the tragic prize was in b. c. 523 (Suid. s. v.), in the reign of Hipparchus, when Athens was becoming the centre of Greek poetry by the residence there of Simonides, Anacreon, Laus, and others. This was twelve years after the first appearance of the tragic Chorus. The name of Choe rillus is mentioned in a very curious fragment of the comic poet Alexis, from his play Linus. (Athen. iv. p. 164, c.; Meineke, Frag. Cons. Gr. iii. p. 443.) Linus, who is instructing Hereules, puts into his hand some books, that he may choose one of them to read, saying, "Ορφέας ἐν κιτήριον ἴσον ἔργον ἔχει Ἀρτέμιδαν," Χοῖρολος, ὁ Ομηρός, ὁ Ἑπεχρόμενος, συγγράμματα παρα διδάξαν. Here we have a poet for each sort of poetry: Orpheus for the early mystic hymns, Hesiod for the didactic and moral epos, Homer for the heroic epos, Epicurinus for comedy; but what are τραγῳδία, Χοῖρολος? The usual answer of those critics who abstain from evading the difficulty by an alteration of the text is, Tragedy and the Satyric Drama: but the question is a very difficult one, and cannot be discussed here. (See Nīke, p. 5.) Possibly the passage may refer, after all, to the epic poet, Choe rillus of Samos, and there may be some hit at his ἄνορθωσα (see below) in the choice of Hereules, who selects a work on ἀφιτροπία. Of all the plays of Choe rillus we have no remnant except the statement by Pausanias (1. 14. § 2) of a mythological genealogy from his play called Λατέζτινα. The Latin grammarians mention a metre which they call Choe rilian. It was in fact, a dactylic hexameter stript of its final catalexis. It must not be supposed that this metre was invented by Choerilus, for the Greek metrical writers never mention it by that name. Perhaps it got its name from the fact of the above-mentioned line, in praise of Choerilus, being the most ancient verse extant in this metre. (See Nāke, pp. 257, 263; Gaisford's edition of Hesychasian, notes, pp. 353, 354.)

2. Choerilus, a slave of the comic poet Epiphanides, whom we was said to assist in the composition of his plays. (Hesych. s. v. Ἱππανήσία τοῦ Ἐφεσίου.) This explains the error of Eudocia (p. 457), that the epic poet Choerilus wrote tragedies. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 37, 38; Gaisford, ed. Heph. p. 96.)

3. Choerilus of Samos, the author of an epic poem on the wars of the Greeks with Xerxes and Dareius. Suidas (s. v.) says, that he was a contemporary of Panyasis and a young man (τεσσάρων) at the time of the Persian war, in the 75th Olympiad. But this is next to impossible, for Plutarch (Igs. 18) tells us that, when Lysander was at Samos (n. c. 404), Choerilus was residing there, and was highly honoured by Lysander, who hoped that the poet would celebrate his exploits. This was 75 years later than the 75th Olympiad; and therefore, if this date has anything to do with Choerilus, it must be the date of his (n. c. 479); and this agrees with another statement of Suidas, which implies that Choerilus was younger than Herodotus (ὁμοίως ἀνθῶν καὶ πανίδα γεγοβένες φάσαι). We have here perhaps the explanation of the error of Suidas, who, from the connexion of both Panyasis and Choerilus with Herodotus, and from the fact that both were epic poets, may have confounded them, and have said of Choerilus that which can very well be true of Panyasis. Perhaps Choerilus was even younger. Nāke places his birth about n. c. 470. Suidas also says, that Choerilus was a slave at Samos, and was distinguished for his beauty; that he ran away and resided with Herodotus, from whom he acquired a taste for literature; and that he turned his attention to poetry; afterwards he went to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, where he died. His death must therefore have been not later than n. c. 389, which was the last year of Archelaus. (See Jacobs, i. p. 345, c.) states, that Choerilus received from Archelaus four minae a-day, and spent it all upon good living (ὑπομολογεῖν). There are other statements of Suidas, which evidently refer to the later poet, who was contemporary with Alexander. (See below.) There is some doubt whether the accounts which made him a native either of Iasos or of Halicarnassus belong to this class. Either of them is perfectly consistent with the statement that he was a slave at Samos. (Compare Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰασώτης; Hesych. Miles, p. 49, ed. Meurs.; Phot. Lex. s. v. Σαμικόν τραχοῦ.)

His great work was on the Persian wars, but its exact title is not known: it may have been Ἀλαμας. It is remarkable as the earliest attempt to celebrate in epic poetry events which were nearly contemporary with the poet's life. Of its character we may form some conjecture from the connexion between the poet and Herodotus. There are also fragments preserved by Aristotle from the Prooemium (Ith. iii. 14, and Schol.); by Ephorus from the description of Dareius's bridge of boats, in which the Scythians are mentioned (Strab. vii. p. 303); by Josephus from the catalogue of the nations in the army of Xerxes, among whom were the Jews (c. Apion. i. 22, vol. ii. p. 454, ed. Havercamp, iii. p. 1185, ed. Oebert); compare Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 9); and other fragments, the place of which is uncertain. (See Nāke.) The chief action of the poem appears to have been the battle of Salamis. The high estimation in which Choerilus was held is proved by his reception into the epic canon (Suid. s. v.), from which, however, he was again expelled by the Alexandrian grammarians, and Antimachus was substituted in his place, on account of a statement, which was made on the authority of Heracleidcs Ponticus, that Plato very much preferred Antimachus to Choerilus. (Proc. Comm. in Plut. Tim. p. 28, see also an epigram of Crates in the Greek Anthology, ii. 3, ed. Brunck and Jac, with Jacob's note, Antimach. ii. 1, pp. 7—9.) The great inferiority of Choerilus to Homer in his similes is noticed by Aristotle. (Top. viii. 1. § 24.)

4. Choerilus, probably of Iasos, a worthless epic poet in the train of Alexander the Great. (Curtius, viii. 5. § 8.) Horace says of him (Ep. ii. 1. 232—234),

"Gratus Alexandro regi Magnum fuit ille
Choerilus, inutilis qui versibus et male natis Restituit acceptos, regale nomisma, Philippus;
"(Art. Post. 357, 358),

"Sic mihi, qui multum cessat, fit Choerilus ille, Quem his torque bonus cum risu miror.
"From the former passage it is evident that we must refer to this Choerilus the statement of Suidas respecting Choerilus of Samos, that he received a gold stater for every verse of his poem. However liberally Alexander may have paid Choerilus for his flattery, he did not conceal his contempt for his poetry, at least if we may believe Atenor, who remarks on the second of the above passages, that Alexander used to tell Choerilus that "he would rather be the Thersites of Homer than the Achilles of Choerilus." The same writer adds, that Choerilus bargained with Alexander for a piece of gold for every good verse, and a blow for every bad one; and the bad verses were so numerous, that he was beaten to death. This appears to be merely a joke.

Suidas assigns to Choerilus of Samos a poem entitled Ἀλαμας, and other poems. But in all probability that poem related to the L omin war, n. c. 323; and, if so, it must have been the composition of this later Choerilus. To him also Nāke assigns the epitaph on Sardanapalus, which is preserved by Strabo (xiv. p. 672), by Athenaeus (viii. p. 336, a., who says, that it was translated by Choerilus from the Chaldee, xii. p. 529, f.; compare Diod. ii. 23; Tzetz. Cid. iii. 450, and in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anc. i. p. 185; Jacobs, i. p. 117; see Jacobs, Animad. vol. i. pt. 1. p. 367.)

CHOEROBOSCUS, GEORGIIUS (Τέχνης Χωροβοσκού), a Greek grammarian, who lived probably between the sixth century of the Christian aera. He is the author of various grammatical and rhetorical works, of which only one has been printed, namely "de Figura poetica, ornitoriis, et theologiciis" (τέχνης τῶν κατὰ ναομονίαν καὶ θεολογικὴν χρήσιν), published with a Latin translation together with the dissertation of Proclus on divine and poetical instinct, by Morrellis, Paris, 1615, 12mo. His other works, the

MSS. of which are scattered in the principal libraries of this country (Bodleian) and the continent, treat on various grammatical matters; his treatise on the Greek accent, the MS. of which is in the Vatican Library, received particular attention. Several treatises on theological matters, which are extant in MS., are likewise attributed to him. But as Choeروبος is generally quoted by the earlier writers as Georgius Grammaticus, or Georgius Diaconus—he was a priest—he might sometimes have been confounded with some other grammarian or theologian of that name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vi. pp. 838—341; Leo Allatius, De Georgis, pp. 318—321.)

jects, but chiefly panegyrical. Photius makes πανευμονίαν τοῦ Καισαρίου τοῦ γένος. (Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 460; Jacobs, Χροματίου, p. i. p. 161.) He also wrote—2. ἐν αὐτῷ, a poem, in six books, on the taking of Isauria by Anastasius. 3. Three books of Epigrams, of which two epigrams remain. (Anthol. Graec. i. c.) 4. Four books of Letters. 5. Πάρηγα, epic poems on the history and antiquities of various places, among which were Constantinople, Thessalonica, Nacle near Heliopolis, Miletus, Tralles, Aphrodisias, and perhaps others. Suidas and Eudokia mention another person of the same name a native of Thessaly, who wrote Ἡρωικά δι' ἑτῶν καὶ θαλάμων τῶν ἁγίων ανθρώπων (where Küster proposes to read μαρτυρίων) Κοσμίδον καὶ Δαμιανοῦ. (Suidas, s. v. Χριστοδόρος καὶ Χρόματιος; Eudokia, p. 436; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 460; Jacobs, Χρόματιου, xxiii. p. 871.)

CHRISTOPHORUS, son of Constantine V. Copronymus. There is an edict against image-worship issued by him and his brother Nicephorus, A. D. 775, in the Imperial. Decret. de Cult. Imag. of Goldastus, Franc. 1608, 4to., No. 8, p. 75. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 740.) For what is known of the life of Christophorus, see NICEPHORUS.

CHRISTOPHORUS, PATRICIUS, a native of Mytilene, whose time is unknown, wrote in Iunius verse a Νανδρογονίον, or history of the saints, arranged according to the saints' days in each month. The MS. was formerly in the Palestine Library, but is now in the Vatican, Cod. 383, No. 7. There are also 383, of the whole or part of the work at Venice, Moscow, and Paris. It is cited more than once in the Glossarium of Meursius. (Cave, Hist. Lit. corr. ii. Diss. pp. 5, 6; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 594.)
Aquileia, flourished at the close of the fourth century and the commencement of the fifth. The circumstance of his baptizing Rufinus, about 370, shews, that he properly belongs to the former. The year and place of his birth are alike unknown. It is supposed, that he was a Roman; but nothing certain can be ascertained respecting his native place. Though he condemned the writings of Origen, his friendship for Rufinus continued unabated. Rufinus also dedicated to him some of his works, especially his Latin translation of Eusebius's ecclesiastical history. That Jerome had a high esteem for him may be inferred from the fact that Rufinus, and signified his decision to Chromatius, the Roman pontiff, condemned both Origen and Rufinus, than of great abilities. When Anastasius, the bishop of Aquileia was so far from coinciding with him, most learned and holy; but he seems to have been a man of judgment and determination rather than of great abilities. When Ammianus, the Roman pontiff, condemned both Origen and Rufinus, and signified his decision to Chromatius, the bishop of Aquileia was so far from coinciding with those who had formerly been friends. He was a strenuous defender of Chrysostom's cause in the West, for which he received the thanks of the latter. (Chrysostom, Epist. 155, vol. vi. p. Luig d. 1677. They had been previously published at Basel, 1528; at Louvain, 1646; and at Basel, 1551. The epistle to Jerome respecting Rufinus, and one addressed to the emperor Honorius in defence of Chrysostom, have been lost. Among Jerome's works there is an epistle concerning the nativity of the blessed Mary addressed to Jerome under the names of Chromatius and Heliodorus, and another bearing the same names directed to the same father. Both are spurious. Several epistles addressed to Chromatius by Jerome are extant among the voluminous works of the latter. (Cave, Historia Literaria; Lo Long. Bib. Sac. p. 675; Landreth's Works, vol. iv. Lond. 1827, pro.)

CHRYSANTAS (Χρυσάντας), a Persian peer (αντρώμας), is said by Xenophon to have been a man of superior powers of mind, but of diminutive bodily stature. (Xen. Cyrop. ii. 3. § 5.) He is represented throughout the Cyropaedia as deservedly high in the favour of Cyrus, to whom he proved himself most useful, not only by his gallantry and promptitude in the field, but also by his wisdom in the council, and the zeal with which he forwarded the political plans of the prince. In the distribution of provinces after the conquest of Babylon, his services were rewarded, according to Xenophon (comp. Herod. i. 153), with the satrapy of Lydia and Ionia. (Xen. Cyrop. ii. 2. § 17, &c., 3. § 5—7, 4. § 29, 22, 21. 1. §§ 1—6, 22, 21, 22, 21, 22, 21, 22, 1. § 3, 5. §§ 55, 56, 8. § 1. &c., 4. § 9, &c., 6. § 7.)

CHRYSANTHUS.

CHRYSAOR (Χρυσαορ). 1. A son of Poseidon and Medusa, and consequently a brother of Pegasus. When Perseus cut off the head of Medusa, Chrysaor and Pegasus sprang forth from it. Chrysaor became by Callirrhoe the father of the three-headed Geryones and Echidna. (Herod. i. 14. § 84), and copied into Cramer's Anecd. Græc. vol. iii. p. 423, where for Ἐρευνοι we should read Ἐρευνος. He is also mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxii. 32.)

CHRYSERUS (Χρυσέρος), an ancient physician, who lived probably at the end of the second or the beginning of the first century n. c., as he was one of the tutors of Heracleides of Erythrae (Gal. De Diqer. Pals. iv. 10, vol. viii. p. 743), perhaps also of Apollonius Mus, who was a fellow-pupil of Heracleides. (Strab. xiv. 1. p. 182, ed. Taucn.) His definition of the pulse has been preserved by Galen (loc. c. p. 741), as also one of his medical formulae (De Compos. Medicam. etc. Loc. ii. 2, vol. xiii. p. 243), and an anecdote of him is mentioned by Sextus Empiricus (Πρωτον. Hypotyp. i. 14. § 84), and copied into Cramer's Anecd. Græc. vol. iii. p. 423, where for Ερευνοι we should read Ἐρευνος. He is also mentioned by Pliny. (H. N. xxii. 32.)

CHRYSERUS (Χρυσέρος). 1. A son of Ardy and a priest of Apollo at Chryse. He was the father of Astynome (Chrysea), and when he came to the camp of the Greeks, offering a rich ransom for the liberation of his daughter, he was treated by Agamemnon with harsh words. Chryses then prayed to Apollo for vengeance, and the god sent a plague into the camp of the Greeks, which did not cease raging until Calchas explained the cause of it, and Odysseus took Chryseis back to her father. (Hom. Η. i. 10, &c.)

2. A son of Agamemnon or Apollo by Astynome. When Agamemnon restored Astynome to her father, she was with child, and, on giving birth to a boy, she declared him to be a son of Apollo, and called him Chryses. Subsequently, when Orestes and Iphigenia fled to Chryses on their escape from Tauris, and the latter recognized in the fugitives his brother and sister, he assisted them in killing King Thous. (Hygin. Fabric. 120, &c.)

3. A son of Mines and the nymph Parca. He lived in his home, and his son was called Chryses, and his island of Paros, and having murdered two of the companions of Heracles, they were all put to death by the latter. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9, iii. 1. § 2.)
CHRYSIPPUS.

4. A son of Poseidon and Chrysaogenia, and father of Minyas. (Paus. ix. 36. § 3.) [L. S.]

CHRYSÈS (Χρύσης), of Alexandria, a skilful mechanician, flourished about the middle of the sixth century after Christ. (Procop. de Aedif. Justin. iii. 3.)

CHRYSIPPUS (Χρύσιππος), a son of Pelops by the nymph Aristeo or by Danaia (Pind. Pyth. vii. 30. Paus. vii. 33), and accordingly a step-brother of Alcathous, Atreus, and Thyestes. While still a boy, he was carried off by king Laius of Thebes, who instructed him in driving a chariot. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5.) According to others, he was carried off by Theseus during the contests celebrated by Pelops (Hygin. Fab. 271); but Pelops recovered him by force of arms. His step-mother Hippodameia hated him, and induced her sons Atreus and Thyestes to kill him; whereas, according to another tradition, Chrysippus was killed by his father Pelops himself. (Paus. vi. 20. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 85; Schol. ad Thucyd. i. 8.) A second mythical Chrysippus is mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5.).

CHRYSIPPUS (Χρύσιππος). 1. Of Tyana, a learned writer on the art of cookery, or more properly speaking, on the art of making bread or sweetmeats, is called Athenaeus σωφός πειμαναγός, and seems to have been little known before the time of the latter author. One of his works treated specially of the art of bread-making, and was entitled Αρτοποιεία. (Athen. iii. p. 113, xiv. pp. 647, c. 648, a. c.)

2. The author of a work entitled Ταταξατα. (Plut. Fam. Min. c. 28.)

CHRYSIPPUS, a learned freedman of Cicero, who ordered him to attend upon his son in b. c. 53; but as he left young Marcus without the knowledge of his patron, Cicero determined to declare his manumission void. As, however, we find Chrysippus in the confidence of Cicero again in b. c. 48, he probably did not carry his threat into effect. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 4, 5, ad Att. vii. 2, 5, 11.)

CHRYSIPPUS, VETTIUS, a freedman of the architect Cyrus, and himself also an architect. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 14, ad Att. viii. 29, xiv. 9.)

CHRYSIPPUS (Χρύσιππος), a Stoic philosopher, son of Apollonius of Tarsus, but born himself at Soli in Cilicia. When young, he lost his paternal property, for some reason unknown to us, and went to Athens, where he became the disciple of Cleanthes, who was then at the head of the Stoical school. Some say that he even heard Zeno, a possible but not probable statement, as Zeno died b. c. 264, and Chrysippus was born b. c. 280. He does not appear to have embraced the doctrines of the Stoics without considerable hesitation, as we hear that he studied the Academic philosophy, and for some time openly dissented from Cleanthes. Disliking the Academic scepticism, he became one of the most strenuous supporters of the principle, that knowledge is attainable and may be established on certain foundations. Hence, though not the founder of the Stoic school, he was the first person who based it on a rational system of reasoning, so that it was said, "if Chrysippus had not existed, the Porch could not have been" (Diog. Laéröt. vii. 183), and among the later Stoics his opinions had more weight than those of either Zeno or Cleanthes, and he was considered an authority from which there was no appeal. He died b. c. 207, aged 73 (Laéröt. i. c.), though Valerius Maximus (viii. 7. § 10) says, that he lived till past 80. Various stories are handed down by tradition to account for his death—as that he died from a fit of laughter on seeing a donkey eat figs, or that he fell sick at a sacrificial feast, and died five days after. With regard to the worth of Chrysippus as a philosopher, it is the opinion of Ritter that, in spite of the common statement that he differed in some points from Zeno and Cleanthes (Cic. Acad. ii. 47), he was not in truth so much the author of any new doctrines as the successful opponent of those who dissented from the existing Stoic system, and the inventor of new arguments in its support. With the reasoning of his predecessors he appears to have been dissatisfied, from the story of his telling Cleanthes that he only wished to learn the principles of his school, and would himself provide arguments to defend them. Besides his struggles against the Academy, he felt very strongly the dangerous influence of the Epicurean system; and in order to counterbalance the seductive influence of their moral theory, he seems to have wished to a great degree to popularize the Stoic doctrine, and to give to the study of ethics a more prominent place than was consistent with his statement, that physics (under which he included the whole science of theology, or investigations into the nature of God) was the highest branch of philosophy. This is one of the contradictions for which he is reproached by Pintarch, whose work De Stoicorum Repugnantias is written chiefly against his inconsistencies, some of which are important, some merely verbal. The third of the ancient divisions of philosophy, logic (or the theory of the sources of human knowledge), was not considered by Chrysippus of the same importance as it had appeared to Plato and Aristotle; and he followed the Epicureans in calling it rather the organum of philosophy than a part of philosophy itself. He was also strongly opposed to another opinion of Aristotle, viz., that a life of contemplative solitude is best suited to the wise man—considering this a mere pretext for selfish enjoyment, and extolling a life of energy and activity. (Plut. de Stoic. Rep. ii.)

Chrysippus is pronounced by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 10) "homo sine dubio veratus, et callidus," and the same character of quickness and sagacity was generally attributed to him by the ancients. His industry was so great, that he is said to have seldom written less than 500 lines a-day, and to have left behind him 705 works. These however seem to have consisted very largely of quotations, and to have been undistinguished for elegance of style. Though none of them are extant, yet his fragments are much more numerous than those of his two predecessors. His erudition was profound, he is called by Cicero (Tusc. i. 45) "in omnia historia curiosus," and he appears to have overlooked no branch of study except mathematics and natural philosophy, which were neglected by the Stoics till the time of Posidonius. His taste for analysing and refuting fallacies and sophistical subtleties was derived from the Megarians (Plut. Stoic. Rep. x.): in the whole of this branch of philosophy he appears to have been successful, and has left numerous treatises on the subject. (Diog. Laëröt. vii. 192, 193.) He was the inventor of the kind of argument called Sorites. (Chrysippici acervus, Por. Sar. vi. 80.) In person he was so slight, that his CHRYSIPPUS, a native of Cappadocia, was a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, who lived during the middle of the fifth century of the Christian era. Chrysippus had two brothers, Cosmas and Gabriel, all of whom received a learned education in Syria, and were afterwards intrusted to the care of the abbot Euthymius at Jerusalem. There Chrysippus took orders, and became dean in the "Monasterium Laurae," president of the church of the Holy Resurrection, and custos of the church of the Holy Cross, an office which he held during ten years. He wrote many works on ecclesiastical matters, and his style is at once elegant and concise; but his productions are lost except a treatise entitled "Hommia de Sancta Dolpam," which is contained with a Latin translation in the second volume of "Auctorarius Doceanus," and some fragments of a small work entitled "Encomium Theodori Martyris," which are extant in Eastasills Constantinepolitanus "Liber de Statu Vitae Functorum." (Cave, Hist. Liter, vol. i. p. 357.)

CHRYSOBERGES, LUCAS (Λουκᾶς Χρυσοβεργής), an important writer on the Canaan law and other ecclesiastical and religious subjects, was chosen patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 1155, and died in 1167. His works are mostly lost, and only some fragments are printed. Thirteen "Decretal Synodall" are contained in Leunclavius, "Jus Graeco-Romanum." They treat on important subjects, as, for instance, No. 2. "De Clericia qui as immiscent aulaeconsuris Negotiis totis Germani et in Scyphi annis," No. 3. "De inexcor in seculiun servitio Rithun sanctorium noster," &c. A Greek poem in iambic verses, and another poem on fasting, both extant in MS. in the imperial library at Vienna, are attributed to Chrysoberges, and it is believed that he wrote his poem on fasting at the request of a lady, before he was appointed to the patriarchal see of Constantinople.

CHRYSOCEPHALUS, MACARIUS (Μακάριος Χρυσοκεφαλος), a Greek ecclesiastical writer of great reputation. The time at which he lived has been the subject of much investigation; Cave says that it is not correctly known; Oudin thinks that he lived about A.D. 1290; but Fabricius is of opinion that he lived in the fourteenth century, as would appear from the fact, that the condemnation of Barlaam and Gregorius Acindynus took place in the synod of Constantinople in 1351, in presence of a great number of prelates, among whom there was Macarius, archbishop of Philadelphia.

The original name of Chrysoccephalus was Macarius, and he was also archbishop of Philadelphia; he was called Chrysoccephalus because, having made numerous extracts from the works of the fathers, he arranged them under different heads, which he called χρυσοκέφαλοι, or "Golden Heads." Chrysoccephalus was a man of extensive learning; his works, which were very numerous, were entirely on religious subjects, and highly esteemed in his day; but only one, of comparatively small importance, the "Oratio in Exaltationem Sanctae Crucis," has been published, with a Latin translation, by Gretserus, in his great work "De Cruce." The most important work of Chrysocephalus is his Commentary on St. Matthew, in three volumes, each of which was divided into twenty books. Only the first volume, containing twenty books, is extant in the Bodleian. (Cod. Baroniensis; it is entitled "Ephesios eis to kata Mattaean Agnon Egegeivos, sullageuta kai suneidhsis kefaleasos parar Makarios Morpatoliton Philalethos tou Xrsokephalou, &c.) Fabricius gives the prooemium, "Cosmogenia," a Commentary on Genesis, divided into two parts, the first of which is entitled "Cosmogenia," and the second "Patriarchae." The MS. of the first part is extant in the island of Chios, "Magnum Alphabetum," a Commentary on Lucas, so called because it is divided into as many chapters as there are letters in the alphabet, viz. twenty-four; it is extant in the Bodleian, and is inscribed "Epistologenika" (Codex mss. from oblivion or destruction. None of the copies of this work which was formerly in the Bibliotheca at Heidelberg, whence it was sent to Rome by the Spaniards, and kept in the Vatican library till 1815, when it was sent back to Heidelberg with the rest of the Palatine library by order of pope Pius VII. It is doubtful if Georgius Chrysoceces is the same Chrysoceces who wrote a history of the Byzantine empire, of which a fragment on the murder of sultan Murad I. in A. D. 1339 is given by Fabricius. The complete astronomical works of Chrysoceces, as stated above, have not been published, but several of his Astronomical and Geographical tables have been inserted in various modern works on Astronomy and Geography. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xii. pp. 54-57.)

CHRYSOCECCH, GEOGRHUS (Georgios o Xrhoioskxteas), was a learned Greek physician, who lived in the middle of the fourteenth century of the Christian era, and wrote several valuable works on astronomy and mathematics. It would seem that Georgius Chrysoceces is identical with Chrysoceces the friend of Theodore Gaza, both of whom were employed for some time in the library of the Vatican, and saved several valuable Greek MSS. from oblivion or destruction. None of the works of Chrysoceces have been printed, although their publication would apparently be a valuable acquisition to the history of astronomy. His principal work extant in MS. are: "Ephesios eis tovs suneidhous tovs Peras ev kefaleasov mi," a piece of "Astronomios disyagmaoois, kei Geographouis pinoov," "Expositio in Constructionem Persarum per Capita 47, cum Astronomios Designationibus, et Geographias Tabulis," in the Bibliotheca Ambrosiana. It seems that this work is the same which we find in the Royal Library at Paris, under the title of "Horoscopium, aut Astrolabium." A codex in the Ambrosian Library, inscribed "Ephesios eis tov iououkovan xwntperov," is attributed to Georgius Chrysoceces, who has also left a MS. of Homer's Odyssey, written and accompanied with aaria by himself, in the year of the world 6844 (A. D. 1339), as it is said in the copy of this work which was formerly in the Bibliotheca at Heidelberg, whence it was sent to Rome by the Spaniards, and kept in the Vatican library till 1815, when it was sent back to Heidelberg with the rest of the Palatine library by order of pope Pius VII. It is doubtful if Georgius Chrysoceces is the same Chrysoceces who wrote a history of the Byzantine empire, of which a fragment on the murder of sultan Murad I. in A. D. 1339 is given by Fabricius. The complete astronomical works of Chrysoceces, as stated above, have not been published, but several of his Astronomical and Geographical tables have been inserted in various modern works on Astronomy and Geography. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. xii. pp. 54-57.) Chrysoloras.

Phemer, astronomer, and statesman. His uncommon talents procured him an introduction to John Cantacuzenus, formerly emperor (John VI.) and from 1355 a monk. Cantacuzenus recommended him to the emperor Manuel II. (1319-1425), by whom he was employed in various important offices. Manuel sent him on several occasions as ambassador to foreign courts. One hundred letters which Chrysoloras wrote to that emperor are extant in MS. in the Bodleian, and in the Royal Library at Paris. Besides these letters, Chrysoloras wrote several treatises on religious subjects, entitled Διάλεγμα, such as "Dialogus adversus Demetrium Cydonium, pro Nicolao Cabasilis de Procesione Spiritus Sancti"; "Dialogus contra Latinos"; "Ency- ni"um in S. Deumetrium Martreym; "Tractatus ex Libris Nili contra Latinos de Procesione Spiritis Sancti"; "Epistolae ad Barlanum de Procesione Spiritus Sancti," extant in a Latin translation, probably made by the same Barlam with his own refutation, in the Bibliotheca Patrum Colomniensis; "Homilis de Transfiguratione Christi;" "De Selvatura;" "De Resurrectorum;" "De Auncunciatione," &c., extant in MS. in different libraries in Italy and on the continent.

"Disputatio consort Manuele Imperatore inter Demetrium Chrysoloram et Antonium Ascalunam de Christi Verbis, Melius ei (Judae) esset si natus ei versus non fuerat." Ex versione Georgii Trombae, Florence, 1618; it seems that the Greek text of this work is lost. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 411, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 320.) [W. P.]

Chrysoloras, Manuel (Μανουηλ ὁ Χρυσόλαρος), one of the most learned Greeks of his time, contributed to the revival of Greek literature in western Europe. The most important work of the Greek empire was in the greatest danger of being overthrown by the boldness of the Latin church. Having become acquainted with several of the most learned Italians, he accepted their proposition to settle in Italy and to lecture on the Greek language and literature. This he did with great success in Venice, Florence, Milan (1397), Pavia, and Rome: his most distinguished pupils were Leonardo Aretino, Leonardo Bruni, Poggio Bracciolini, Filippo, Francesco Strozzi, and many more. His renown as a learned priest and eloquent orator were so great, that he was sent to the council of Constance, where he died a short time after his arrival, in the month of April, 1415. He was buried in the church of the Dominicans at Constance, and Aeneas Sylvius wrote his epitaph, which is given in the works cited below.

Manuel Chrysoloras was the author of several treatises on religious subjects, and a considerable number of letters on various topics, which are extant in different libraries in Italy, France, Germany, and Sweden. Only two of his works have been printed, viz., 1. "Epistolae III de Companione Veteris et Novae Rome," the Greek text with a Latin version by Petrus Lambeccius, appendix to "Codices de Antiqutatibus Constantinop." Paris, 1655, fol. These letters are elegantly written. The first is rather profuse, and is addressed to the emperor John Palaeologus; the second to John Chrysalomus; and the third to Demetrius Chryso- loras. This John Chrysalomus, the contemporary of Manuel and Demetrius Chrysalomus, wrote some treatises and letters of little importance, several of which are extant in MS. 2. "Επιστολὴ συνε θανατοφιλείας (that is, "Grammatices"), printed probably for the first time in 1468, and frequently reprinted at the latter end of that century and the beginning of the next. This is a grammar of the Greek language, and one of the first that circulated in Italy. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 409, &c.) [W. P.]

Chrysostomus, Joannes (Χρυσόστομος, golden-mouthed, so termed from the power of his eloquence), was born at Antioch, most probably A.D. 347, though the dates 344 and 354 have also been given. His father Secundus was a general in the imperial army, and his mother An- thusa was left a widow soon after his birth. From her he received his first religious impressions, so that she was to him what Monica was to Augustine. At the early age of nineteen he was made archdeacon, and his earliest childhood was continually advancing in seriousness and earnestness of mind, and underwent no violent inward struggle before he embraced Christianity. To this circumstance, Neander (Kirchengeesch. iii. p. 1440, &c.) attributes the peculiar form of his doctrine, his strong feeling that the choice of belief or unbelief rested with ourselves, and that God's grace is given in proportion to our own wish to receive it. Libanius taught him elo- quence, and said, that he should have desired to see him his successor in his school, if the Christians had not stolen him. Before his ordination, he re- tired first to a monastery near Antioch, and afterwards to a solitary cavern, where he committed the whole of the Bible to memory. In this cavern he so injured his health that he was obliged to return to Antioch, where he was ordained deacon by the bishop Meletius, A.D. 381, who had previously baptized him, and afterwards presbyter by Flavius, successor to Meletius, A.D. 396. At Antioch his success as a preacher was so great, that on the death of Nectarius, archbishop of Constantinople, he was chosen to succeed him by Eutropius, minis- ter to the emperor Arcadius, and the selection was readily ratified by the clergy and people of the imperial city. A.D. 397. The minister who appointed him was a eunuch of infamous profligacy, and Chrysostomus was so much feared by him the protection of the church. Tribigild, the imperial general, who hated and despised Eutropius, threatened Constantinople itself by his armies, and demanded as a condition of peace the head of Eu- tropius, who fled to the sanctuary of the cathedral. While he was glovelling in terror at the altar, Chrysostom ascended the pulpit, and by his eloquence saved his life for the time, though it was afterwards sacrificed to the hatred of his enemies.

The sermons of the archbishop soon gave great offence at Constantinople. The tone of his theology was always rather of a practical than a doctrinal kind, and his strong sense of the power of the human will increased the immanence of the capital. He was undoubtedly rash and violent in his proceedings, and the declamatory character of his preaching was exactly adapted to express the stern morality of his thoughts. He was also disliked for the simplicity of his mode of living, and the manner in which he diverted the revenues of his see from the luxuries in which his predecessors had consumed them, to humane and charitable objects. Many of the worldly-minded monks and clergy, as well as the ministers and ladies of the court, became his enemies, and at their head appenred the empress Eudoxia herself, who held her husband's weak mind in absolute subjection. His unpopularity was spread still more widely by his abuse of the act of a visitation which he held in Asia Minor, two years after his consecration, in which he accused several bishops of simony and other gross crimes, and deposed thirteen of them. (Comp. Hom. iii. in Act. Apost.) Meanwhile, a contest had arisen in Egypt between Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, and certain monks of Nitra, who followed the opinions of Origen. At their head were four of one family, known as the Tall Brothers (Δέκαδροι μακροί), against whom Theophilus seems to have been prejudiced by a strictly private quarrel. (Palaudins, op. Chrysost. ed. Montfau. vol. xiii.) He excommunicated them, and they fled to Constantinople, where they declared himself his warm friend and supporter. All this excited jealousy at Constantinople, and in the summer of A.D. 401 an order came for his removal to Pityus, on the eastern extremity of the East-Roman empire. But the fatigues of his journey, which was performed on foot under a burning sun, were too much for him, and he died at Commna in Pontus, in the 60th year of his age. His last words were those of Job,—δοξά τοῦ θεοῦ πάντων ἱστοριῶν, and formed a worthy conclusion of a life spent in God's service. His exile nearly caused a schism at Constantinople, where a party, named after him Johnnists, separated from the church, and refused to acknowledge his successors. They did not return to the general communion till A.D. 438, when the archbishop Proclus prevailed on the emperor Theodosius II. to bring back the bones of Chrysostom to Constantinople, where they were received with the highest honours, the emperor himself publicly imploring the forgiveness of heaven for the crime of his parents, Aeacidus and Eudoxia. Chrysostom, as we learn from his biographers, was short, with a large bald head, high forehead, hollow cheeks, and sunken eyes. The Greek church celebrates his festival Nov. 13, the Latin, Jan. 27.

The works of Chrysostom are most voluminous. They consist of: 1. Homilies on different parts of Scripture and points of doctrine and practice. 2. Commentaries, by which, as we learn from Suidas, he showed the whole of the Bible, though some of them afterwards perished in a fire at Constantinople. 3. Epistles addressed to a great number of different persons. 4. Treatises on various subjects, e. g. the Priesthood (six books), Providence (three books), &c. 5. Liturgies. Of the homilies, those on St. Paul are superior to anything in ancient theology, and Thomas Aquinas
The merits of Chrysostom as an expositor of Scripture are very great. Rejecting the allegorical interpretations which his predecessors had put upon it, he investigates the meaning of the text grammatically, and adds an ethical or doctrinal application to a perspicuous explanation of the sense. The first example of grammatical interpretation had indeed been set by Origen, many of whose critical remarks are of great merit; but Chrysostom is free from his mystical fancies, and quite as well acquainted with the language of the New Testament. The Greek expositors who followed him have done little more than copy his explanations. The commentary of Theodoret is a faithful reproduction of Chrysostom's homilies, and so also are the works of Theophylact and Oecumenius, so much so that to those who wish to gain a knowledge of the results of his critical labours, the study of the two latter may be recommended as perfectly correct compilers from their more prolix predecessor.

Of Chrysostom's powers as a preacher the best evidence is contained in the history of his life; there is no doubt that his eloquence produced the deepest impression on his hearers, and while we dissent from those who have ranked him with Demosthenes and Cicero, we cannot fail to admire the power of his language in expressing moral indignation, and to sympathize with the ardent love of all that is good and noble, the fervent piety, and absorbing faith in the Christian revelation, which pervade his writings. His faults are too great diffuseness and a love of metaphor and ornament. He often repelled with indignation the applause which his sermons were greeted, exclaiming, "The place where you are is no theatre, nor are you now sitting to gaze upon actors." (Hom. xvii. Matt. vii.) There are many respects in which he shews the superiority of his understanding to the general feelings of the age. We may cite as one example the fact, that although he had been a monk, he was far from exalting monachism above the other modes of life. See Hom. vii. in Heb. iv.; Hom. vi. in Ephes. iv. "How shall we conquer our enemies," he asks in one place, "if some do not busy themselves about goodness at all, while those who do withdraw from the battle?" (Hom. vi. in 1 Cor. iv.) Again, he was quite free from the view of inspiration which prevailed at Alexandria, and which considered the Bible in such a sense the word of God, as to overlook altogether the human element in its composition, and the difference of mind and character in its authors. Variations in style he speaks of as proofs of truth (Hom. i. in Matth.); so that he united the principal intellectual with the principal moral element necessary to the just interpretation of Scripture.

Chrysostomus. 705

The most elaborate among the ancient authorities for Chrysostom's life are the following:—1. Palladius, bishop of Helenopolis, whose work (a dialogue) was published in a Latin translation at Venice A. d. 1533, and in the original text at Paris in 1680. It is to be found in Montfaucon's edition of Chrysostom's works, vol. xiii. 2. The Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates (lib. vi.), Sozomenus (lib. viii.), Theodoret (v. 27). 3. The works of Suidas (Tædæus), and Isidore of Pelusium (ii. Epist. 42), besides several others, some published and some in MS., of which a list will be found in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 456-460). Among the more modern writers it will suffice to mention Erasmus (Ep. 1150. a. d. 1531, &c., ed. Leyd. Bat.), J. Frederic Meyer (Chrysostomus Luctheranus, Jenæ, 1660), with Hack's reply (S. J. Chrysostomus a Lutherianismo vindicatus, 1683), Cave (Script. Ecc. Hist. Litter. vol. 1), Lardner (Credibility of the Gospel Hist. part ii. vol. x. e. 118), Tillemon (Mémoires Ecclésiastiques, vol. xi. pp. 405, &c.), and Montfaucon, his principal editor. Gibbon's account (Decline and Fall, xxxii.) is compiled from Palladius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Tillemon, Ensmius, and Montfaucon. But the best of all will be found in Neander (Kirchen gesch. ii. p. 1440, &c.), who has also published a separate life of Chrysostom.

Chrysostomus's works were first published in Latin at Venice in 1503, Comment. impensa et studio Bernardi Scaligeri Tridinium ac Gregorii de Gregorii. Several editions followed at Basle, also in Latin, and in 1523 the Homilies on Genesis were translated there by Oecolampadius (Haushein). In 1536 his works were published at Paris, but the most famous edition which appeared in that city was cura Frontonis Ducaei, 1613, whose translation is much commended by Montfaucon. In Greek were first published at Verona, 1529, the Homilies on St. Paul's Epistles, edited by Gilbert Bishop of Verona, with a preface by Donatus, addressed to Pope Clement VII. In 1610, 16, the most complete collection of Chrysostom's works which had yet appeared was published at Eton by Norton, the king's printer, under the superintendence of Henry Savil, in 8 vols.; this edition contained notes by Casaubon and others. In 1609, at Paris, F. Morell began to publish the Greek text with the version of Ducaeus, a task which was completed by Charles Morell in 1633. Of this edition the text is compiled from that of Savil, and that of an edition of the Commentaries on the New Testament, published at Heidelberg by Commelin, 1591—1603. In 1716—28 appeared, also at Paris, the edition optics by Bernard de Montfaucon, in 10 vols. This edition has prefixed to most of them a short dissertation on the circumstances under which it was written, with an inquiry into its authenticity, and has added very much hitherto unpublished, together with the principal ancient lives of Chrysostom. Montfaucon was a Benedictine monk, and was assisted by others of his order. Of separate works of Chrysostom the editions and translations are almost innumerable. Erasmus translated some of the homilies and commentaries; and the edition of two homilies (those on 1 Cor. and 1 Thess. iv.) is interesting as the first book printed with Greek types in England. Some of the homilies are translated in the Library of the Fathers now publishing at Oxford, and those on St. Matthew have been recently edited by the Rev. F. Field, Fellow of Trin. Coll. Cambridge. The number of MSS. of Chrysostom is also immense: the principal of these are in the royal library at Paris, the imperial library at Vienna (to which collection two of great value were added by Maria Theresa), and that of St. Mark at Venice.

[Chrysostomus, Dion.]

CHRYSO'STOMUS, DION.

CHRY'SOTHEMIS (Χρυσόθεμη). There are four mythical females of this name (Hygin. Fab. 170, Post. Astr. ii. 25; Diod. v. 22; Hom. ll. ix. 237), and one male, a son of Carmanor, the priest of Apollo at Tarrha in Crete. He is said to have been a poet, and to have won the first victory in the Pythian games by a hymn on Apollo. (Paus. x. 7, § 2.)

CHRY'SOTHEMIS (Χρυσόθεμη) and EUPHY- LIDAS (Εὔφυλλαδα), statuaries of Argos, made in bronze the statues of Danntrua and his son Theod- lidas (Ειρήνειος), statuaries of Argos, made in bronze the statues of Danntrua and his son Theopompos, who were each twice victorious in the Olympic games. The victories of Danntrua were in the 65th and 66th Olympiads, and the artists of course lived at the same time (n. c. 520 and onwards). Pausanius describes one of the statues, and quotes the inscription, which contained the names of the artists, and which described them as τέχνην εἰδώτες καὶ προτέρων, which appears to mean that, like the early artists in general, they each belonged to a family in which art was hereditary. (x. 6, § 2.)

CHRY'SUS (Χρύσος), the fourteenth (or thirteenth) of the family of the Asclepiadae, was the youngest son of Nebrus, the brother of Gorgias, and the father of Chrysus, who lived in the sixth century B.C. in the island of Cos. During the Cissaean war, while the Amphyctyes were besieging the town of Crissa in Phocis, the plague broke out among their army. Having consulted the oracle of Delphi in consequence, they were directed to fetch from Cos "the young of a stag, together with gold," which was interpreted to mean Nebrus and Chrysus. They accordingly persuaded them both to join the camp, where Chrysus was the first person to mount the wall at the time of the general assault, but was at the same time mortally wounded, n. c. 591. He was buried in the hippodrome at Delphi, and worshiped by the inhabitants as a hero (Εἰρήνης). (Thess. Op. ii., Hippocr. Op. iii. p. 836, &c.)

[A. W. A. G.]

CHTHONIA (Χθονία), may mean the subter- raneous, or the goddess of the earth, that is, the protectress of the fields, whence it is used as a surname of inland divinities, such as Hecate (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 148; Orph. Hymn. 39, 9), Nyx (Orph. Hymn. 2, 8), and Melinoë (Orph. Hymn. 70, 1), but especially of Demeter. (Herod. ii. 123; Orph. Hymn. 39, 12; Artemid. ii. 35; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 867.) Although the name of the case of Demeter scarcely requires explanation, yet mythology relates two stories to account for it. According to one of them, Clymenus and Chthonia, the children of Phoroneus, founded at Hermione a sanctuary of Demeter, and called her Chthonia from the name of one of the founders. (Paus. ii. 35, § 8.) According to an Argive legend, Demeter on her wanderings came to Argolis, where she was ill-received by Colonel. Chthonia, his daughter, was dissatisfied with her father's conduct, and, when Colonata and his house were burnt by the goddess, Chthonia was carried off by her to Hermione, where she built a sanctuary to Demeter Chthonia, and instituted the festival of the Chtho- nia in her honour. (Paus. ii. 35, § 5; Dict. of Ant. e. v. 6.)

CHTHONIUS (Χθόνιος) has the same meaning as Chthonia, and is therefore applied to the gods of the lower world, or the shades (Horn. ll. ix. 457; Herod. Op. 455; Orph. Hymn. 17, 3, 69, 2, Ar- gon, 973), and to beings that are considered as earth-born. (Apollod. iii. 4, § 1; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1398.) It is also used in the sense of "gods of the land," or "native divinities." (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1392.) There are also several mythical personages of the name of Chthonius. (Apollon. ii. 1, § 5, iii. 4, §§ 1, 5; Or. Met. xii. 44; Diod. v. 53; Paus. ii. 6, § 1; Hygin. Fab. 178.)

CHUMNUS, MICHAEL, a Graeco-Roman jurist and canonist, who was nomophylax, and afterwards metropolitan of Thessalonia. He is said by Pohl (ad Sueur. Notit. Basl. p. 156, n. 2a) to have lived in the time of Nicephorus Blemmydas, patriarch of Con- stantinople, and to have been the author of various works. He is cited by Mat. Blastares (Leona. J. G. R. i. pp. 482, 487), and is known by a short treatise on the degrees of relation- ship (τέσσερις διαδήματος [καὶ διαδήματος] τῆς αγγελι- γελαίας), inserted in the collection of Leucen- tius (l. p. 519). By Suarez (who erroneously identifies Chumnus and Dumnus), Chumnum is mentioned among the scholiasts upon the Basillia (Notit. Basl. § 42), but this seems to be an error. (Böcking, Institutionen, Bom. 1843, p. 168, n. 49; Heimbach, de Basl. Orig. p. 67.)

CHUMNUS, NICOBPrhROS, renowned as a statesman, a philosopher, and a divine, lived in the latter part of the 13th and in the beginning of the 14th century. He was probably a native of Constantinople, and belonged undoubtedly to one of the first families in the Greek empire. Enjoying the confidence and friendship of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, he was successively appointed prefect of the Camillus, keeper of the imperial seal-ring, and magnus statopeand a great number of letters on various subjects, several of which seem to be of great interest for history, while others, as well as the works cited above, appear to be of considerable importance for the history of Greek civilization in the middle ages. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. pp. 675, 676; Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. ii. p. 494, ad an. 1320; Nicæphorus Gregorov, lib. vii. p. 168, ed. Paris; Cantanscensis, lib. i. p. 45, ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

C. CICERIEUS, the secretary (serrula) of the elder Scipio Africanus, was a candidate for the praetorship in B. C. 174 along with Scipio’s son, but when he saw that he was obtaining more votes than the latter, he resigned in his favour. (Val. Max. iv. 5. § 3, iii. 5. § 2.) Cicerieus was, however, elected praetor in the following year (B. C. 173), and he obtained the province of Sardinia, but was ordered by the senate to go to Corsica first, in order to conduct the war against the inhabitants of that island. After defeating the Corsicans in battle, he granted them peace on the payment of 200,000 pounds of wax, and then passed over to Sardinia. On his return to Rome next year (B. C. 172) he sued for a triumph on account of his victory in Corsica, and when this was refused by the senate, he celebrated on his own authority a triumph on the Alban mount, a practice which had now become not unfrequent. In the same year he was one of the three ambassadors sent to the Illyrian king, Gentius; and in B. C. 167 he was again despatched on the same mission. In the year before (B. C. 168) he dedicated on the Alban mount the temple to Juno Monuta, which he had vowed in his battle with the Corsicans five years before. (Liv. xili. 33, xili. 1, 7, 21, 28 xiv. 17, 15.)

CICERO, the name of a family, little distinguished in history, belonging to the plebeian Claudia gens, the only member of which mentioned is C. Claudius Cicero, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 454. (Liv. iii. 31.) The word seems to be connected with cicer, and may have been originally applied by way of distinction to some individual celebrated for his skill in raising that kind of pulse, by whom the epithet would be transmitted to his descendants. Thus the designation will be precisely analogous to Bulbus, Fabius, Lentulus, Piso, Tubero, and the like. [W. R.]

CICERO, the name of a family of the Tullii. The Tullii Cicerones had from time immemorial been settled at Arpinum, which received the full franchise in B. C. 168; but they never aspired to any political distinction until the stock was raised by the great orator from that obscurity into which it quickly relapsed after his death. His genealogy, so far as it can be traced, is represented in the following table.

Married Gratidia.

CHUMNUS, and his merits were so great, that as early as 1295 Andronicus asked the hand of his daughter Irene, for one of his sons, John Palæologus, to whom she was married in the same year.

During the unfortunate civil contest between Andronicus the elder and his grandson, Andronicus the younger, Chumnus remained faithful to his imperial patron, and for some time defended the town of Thessalonica, of which he was praefect, against the troops of Andronicus the younger, whom he compelled to raise the siege. It seems that Chumnus had more influence and did more for the support of Andronicus the elder, than any other of the ministers of this unfortunate emperor. Towards the end of his life Chumnus took orders and retired into a convent, where he lived under the name of Nathanael, and occupied himself with literary pursuits. The time of his death has not been ascertained, but we must presume that he died after 1330, during the reign of Andronicus the elder and his grandson, Andronicus the younger.

4. L. Tullius Cicero, Married Pomponia.
1. M. Tullius Cicero, grandfather of the orator, appears to have taken a lead in his own community, and vigorously opposed the projects of his fellow-townsmen and brother-in-law, M. Gratidius, who had raised a great commotion at Arpinum by agitating in favour of a law for voting by ballot. The matter was referred to the consuls M. Aemilius Scaurus (b.c. 115), who complimented Cicero on his conduct, declaring that he would gladly see a person of such spirit and integrity exercising his powers on the great field of the metropolis, instead of remaining in the seclusion of a country town. The old man was still alive at the birth of his eldest grandson (b.c. 106), whom he little resembled in his tastes, for he was no friend to foreign literature, and was wont to say, that his contemporaries were like Syrian slaves, the mere Greek they knew the greater scoundrels they were. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 1, iii. 16, de Orat. ii. 66.)

2. M. Tullius Cicero, son of the foregoing, and father of the orator. He was a member of the equestrian order, and lived upon his hereditary estate, in the neighbourhood of Arpinum, near the junction of the Fibrenus with the Liris, devoted to literary pursuits, till far advanced in life, when he removed to Rome for the purpose of educating his two boys, Marcus and Quintus, and became the proprietor of a house in the Campus. His reputation as a man of learning procured for him the society and friendship of the most distinguished characters of the day, especially the orators M. Antonius and L. Crassus, and the jurists Q. Scaevola and C. Aculeo, the latter of whom was his brother-in-law, being married to the sister of his wife Helvia. Although naturally of a delicate constitution, by care and moderation he attained to a good old age, and died in the year b.c. 64, while his son, whose rapid rise he had had the happiness of witnessing, was canvassing for the consulship with every prospect of success. (De Leg. ii. 1, de Orat. ii. 1, de Off. iii. 19, ad Att. i. 6.)

3. L. Tullius Cicero, brother of the foregoing. He accompanied M. Antonius the orator to Cicilia in b.c. 103 as a private friend, and remained with him in the province until his return the following year. He must have lived for a considerable time after this period, since he was in the habit of giving his nephew many particulars with regard to the pursuits of Antonius. (De Orat. ii. 1.)

4. L. Tullius Cicero, son of the foregoing. He was the constant companion and schoolfellow of the orator, travelled with him to Athens in b.c. 79, and subsequently acted as his assistant in collecting evidence against Verres. On this occasion the Syracusans paid him the compliment of voting him a public guest (hospes) of their city, and transmitted to him a copy of the decree to this effect engraved on a tablet of brass. Lucius died in b.c. 68, much regretted by his cousin, who was deeply attached to him. (De Fin. v. 1, c. Verr. iv. 11, 81, 64, 65, ad Att. i. 5.)

5. M. Tullius Cicero, the orator, eldest son of No. 2. In what follows we do not intend to enter deeply into the complicated political transactions of the era during which this great man flourished, except in so far as he was directly and personally interested and concerned in the events. The complete history of that momentous crisis must be obtained by comparing this article with the biographies of Antonius, Augustus, Brutus, Caesar, Catilina, Cato, Cicero, Crassus, Lepidus, Pompeius, and the other great characters of the day.

1. Biography of Cicero. M. Tullius Cicero was born on the 3rd of January, b.c. 106, according to the Roman calendar, at that epoch nearly three months in advance of the true time, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. No trustworthy anecdotes have been preserved with regard to his childhood, for little faith can be reposed in the gossiping stories collected by Plutarch of the crowds who were wont to flock to the school where he received the first rudiments of knowledge, for the purpose of seeing and hearing the young prodigy; but we cannot doubt that the aptitude for learning displayed by himself and his brother Quintus induced their father to remove to Rome, where he conducted their elementary education according to the advice of L. Crassus, who pointed out both the subjects to which their attention ought chiefly to be devoted, and also the teachers by whom the information sought might be best imparted. These instructors were, with the exception perhaps of Q. Aelius, the grammarian (Brut. 50), all Greeks, and among the number was the renowned Archias of Antioch, who had been living at Rome under the protection of Lucullus ever since b.c. 102, and seems to have communicated a temporary enthusiasm for his own pursuits to his pupil, most of whose poetical attempts belong to his early youth. In his sixteenth year (b.c. 91) Cicero received the manly gown, and entered the forum, where he listened with the greatest avidity to the speakers at the bar and from the rostra, dedicating however a large portion of his time to reading, writing, and oratorical exercises. At this period he was committed by his father to the care of the venerable Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, whose side he scarcely ever quitted, acquiring from his lips that acquaintance with the constitution of his country and the principles of jurisprudence, and those lessons of practical wisdom which proved of inestimable value in his future career. During b.c. 89, in accordance with the ancient practice not yet entirely obsolete which required every citizen to be a soldier, he served his first and only campaign under Cn. Pompeius Strabo (father of Pompeius Magnus), then engaged in prosecuting with vigour the Social war, and was present at the conference between his commander and P. Vettius Scato, general of the Marsi, by whom the Romans had been signally defeated, a few months before, and the consul P. Rutilius Lupus slain.

For upwards of six years from the date of his brief military career Cicero made no appearance as a public man. During the whole of the fierce struggle between Marius and Sulla he identified himself with neither party, but appears to have carefully kept aloof from the scenes of strife and bloodshed by which he was surrounded, and to have given himself up with indefatigable perseverance to those studies which were essential to his success as a lawyer and orator, that being the only path open to distinction in the absence of all taste or talent for martial achievements. Accordingly, during the above period he first imbibed a love for philosophy from the discourses of Phaedrus the Epicurean, whose lectures, however, he soon deserted for the more congenial doctrines instilled by Philo, the chief of the New Academy, who with several men of learning had fled from Athens when Greece was invaded by the troops of Mithridates. From Diolotus the Stoic, who lived and died in his house, he acquired a scientific knowledge of logic. The principles of rhetoric were deeply impressed upon his mind by Molo the Rhodian, whose reputation as a forensic speaker was not inferior to his skill as a teacher; while not a day passed in which he did not apply the precepts inculcated by these various masters in declaiming with his friends and companions, sometimes in Latin, sometimes in Greek, but more frequently in the latter language. Nor did he omit to practise composition, for he drew up the treatise commonly entitled De Inventione Rhetorica, wrote his poem Marius, and translated Aratus together with the Oeconomicus of Xenophon.

But when tranquillity was restored by the final discomfiture of the Marian party, and the business of the forum had resumed, in outward appearance at least, its wonted course, the season seemed to have arrived for displaying those abilities which had been cultivated with so much assiduity, and accordingly at the age of twenty-five Cicero came forward as a pleader. The first of his extant speeches, in a civil suit, is that for P. Quinctius (b. c. 81), in which, however, he refers to some previous efforts; the first delivered upon a criminal trial was that in defence of Sex. Roscius of Ameria, charged with pericide by Chrysogonus, a freedman of Sulla, supported, as it was understood, by the influence of his patron. No one being disposed to brave the wrath of the all-powerful dictator by openly advocating the cause of one to whom he was supposed to be hostile, Cicero, moved partly by compassion and partly by perceiving that this was a noble opportunity for commencing his career as a protector of the oppressed (see de Off. ii. 14), and establishing at considerable apparent but little real risk his character as a fearless champion of innocence, boldly came forward, pronounced a most animating and powerful address, in which he did not scruple to animadvert distinctly in the strongest terms upon the cruel and unjust measures of the victorious, and by implication on the tyranny of those by whom he was upheld, and succeeded in procuring the acquittal of his client. Soon after (b. c. 79) he again came indirectly into collision with Sulla for having undertaken to defend the interests of a woman of Arretium, a preliminary objection was taken against her title to appear in court, insomuch as she belonged to a town the inhabitants of which in the recent troubles had been deprived of the rights of citizenship. But Cicero denounced the act by which she and her fellow-citizens had been stripped of their privileges as utterly unconstitutional and therefore in itself null and void, and carried his point although opposed by the eloquence and experience of Cotta. It does not appear probable, notwithstanding the assertion of Plutarch to the contrary, that Cicero experienced or dreaded any evil consequences from the displeasure of Sulla, whose power was far too firmly fixed to be shaken by the fiery harangues of a young lawyer, although other circumstances compelled him for a while to abandon the field upon which he had entered so auspiciously. He had now attained the age of twenty-seven, but his constitution was far from being vigorous or his health robust. Thin almost to emaciation, with a long scraggy neck, his general appearance and habit of body were such as to excite serious alarm among his relations, especially since in addition to his close application to business, he was wont to exert his voice, when pleading, to the uttermost without respite, and employed incessantly the most violent action. Persuaded in some degree by the earnest representations of friends and physicians, but influenced still more strongly by the conviction that there was a great room for improvement in his style of composition and in his mode of delivery, both of which required to be softened and tempered, he determined to quit Italy for a season, and to visit the great fountains of arts and eloquence. Accordingly (b. c. 79) he repaired in the first instance to Athens, where he remained for six months, diligently revising and extending his acquaintance with philosophy by listening to the famous Antiochus of Ascalon, studying rhetoric under the distinguished and experienced Demetrius Syrus, attending occasionally the lectures of Zeno the Epicurean, and enjoying the society of his brother Quintus, of his cousin Lucius, and of Pomponius Atticus, with whom he now cemented that close friendship which proved one of the chief comforts of his life, and which having endured unshaken the fiercest trials, was dissolved only by death. After quitting Athens he made a complete tour of Asia Minor, holding fellowship during the whole of his journey with the most illustrious orators and rhetoricians of the East,—Menippus of Stratonicea, Dionysius of Magnesia, Aeschylus of Caldus, and Xenocrates of Adermytum,—carefully treasuring up the advice which they bestowed and profiting by the examples which they afforded. Not satisfied even with this discipline and these advantages, he passed over to Rhodes (b. c. 78), where he became acquainted with Posidonius, and once more placed himself under the care of Molo, who took great pains to restrain and confine within proper limits the tendency to diffuse and redundant copiousness which he remarked in his disciple.

At length, after an absence of two years, Cicero returned to Rome (b. c. 77), not only more deeply skilled in the theory of his art and improved by practice, but almost entirely changed. His general health was now firmly established, his lungs had acquired strength, the habit of straining his voice to the highest pitch had been conquered, his excessive and unwholesome vehemence had evaporated, the whole form and character of his oratory both in matter and delivery had assumed a steady, subduced, composed, and well-regulated tone. Trans scendental natural talents, developed by such elaborate and judicious training under the most celebrated masters, stimulated by burning zeal and sustained by indomitable perseverance, could scarcely fail to command success. His merits were soon discerned and appreciated; the prejudice at first entertained that he was a mere Grecian, an indolent man of letters, was quickly dissipated; shyness and reserve were speedily dispelled by the warmth of public applause; he forthwith took his station in the foremost rank of judicial orators, and ere long stood alone in acknowledged pre-emminence; his most formidable rivals, Hortensius, eight years his senior, and C. Aurelius Cotta, now (b. c. 76) conversing for the consulship, who had long been kings of the bar, having been forced, after a short but sharp contest for supremacy, to yield.

Cicero had now reached the age (of 30) at which the laws permitted him to become candidate for the lowest of the great offices of state, and although competitively speaking a stranger, and certainly unsupported by any powerful family interest, his reputation and popularity already stood so high, that he was elected (b. c. 76) quaestor by the votes of all the tribes. The lot decided that he should serve in Sicily under Sex. Pedumeneus, praetor of Lily baenum. During his tenure of office (b. c. 76) he executed with great skill the difficult and delicate task of procuring large additional supplies of corn for the relief of the metropolis, then suffering from a severe dearth, and at the same time displayed so much liberality towards the farmers of the revenue and such courtesy towards private traders, that he enjoyed (b. c. 76) quaestor the votes of all the tribes.

Cicero presents an entire blank. That he was acquainted with the events of all places of general resort, and of all places of general resort, and of admitted visitors and clients to his presence, under any circumstances, and at all hours, however inconvenient or unreasonable.

For upwards of four years after his return to Rome in the beginning of b. c. 74, the life of Cicero presents an entire blank. That he was actively engaged in the courts of law is certain, for he himself informs us, that he was employed in a multitude of causes (Brut. 92), and that he had now attained to the full vigour of maturity; but we know not even the name of one of these orations, except perhaps that, " Pro M. Tullo," an some important fragments of which have been recently brought to light. Meanwhile, Lucullus had been pressing the war in the East against Mithridates with great energy and the happiest results; the power of Pompey and of Crassus at home had been steadily increasing, although a bad feeling had sprung up between them in consequence of the events connected with the final suppression of the servile war of Spartacus. They, however, discharged harmoniously the duties of their joint consulship (b. c. 70), and seem to have felt that it was necessary for their interests to control the high aristocratical faction, for by their united exertions the plebeian tribunes recovered the vital privileges of which they had been deprived by Sulla, and the equites were once more admitted to serve as judges on criminal trials, sharing this distinction with the senate and the tribuni aerarii. In this year Cicero became candidate for the aedilship, and the issue of the contest was, if possible more triumphant than when he had formerly solicited the suffrage of the people, for he was chosen not only by a majority in every tribe, but carried a greater number of votes than any one of his competitors. A little while before this gratifying demonstration of public approbation, he undertook the management of the most important trial in which he had hitherto been engaged—the impeachment preferred against Verres, for misgovernment and complicated oppression, by the Sicilians, whom he had ruled as praetor of Syracuse for the space of three years.

(75—71.) Cicero, who always felt much more inclined to appear in the character of a defender than in the invidious position of an accuser, was prevailed upon to conduct this cause by the earnest entreaties of his provincial friends, who reposed
the most perfect confidence in his integrity and entreaties of his provincial friends, who reposed
the most perfect confidence in his integrity and good-will, and at the same time were fully alive to the advantage that would be secured to their suit from the local knowledge of their advocate. The most strenuous exertions were now made by Verres, bucked by all the interest of the Metelli and other powerful families, to wrest the case out of the hands of Cicero, who, however, defeated the attempt; and, having demanded and been allowed 110 days for the purpose of collecting evidence, instantly set out, accompanied by his cousin Lucius, for Sicily, where he exerted himself so vigorously, that he traversed the whole island in less than two months, and returned attended by all the necessary witnesses and loaded with documents. Another desperate effort was made by him Hortensius, now consul-elect, who was counsel for the defendant, to raise up obstacles which might effect of delaying the trial until the commencement of the following year, when he counted upon a more favourable judge, a more corrupt jury, and the protection of the chief magistrates; but here again he was defeated by the promptitude and decision of his opponent, who opened the case very briefly upon the fifth of August, proceeded at once to the examination of the witnesses, and the production of the depositions and other papers, which taken together constituted a mass of testimony so decisive, that Verres gave up the contest as hopeless, and retired at once into exile without attempting any defence. The full pleadings, however, which were to have been delivered had the trial been permitted to run its ordinary course were subsequently published by Cicero, and form, perhaps, the proudest monument of his oratorical powers, exhibiting that extraordinary combination of surpassing genius with almost inconceivable industry, of brilliant oratory with minute accuracy of memory and detail, which rendered him irresistible in a good cause and often victorious in a bad one.

The most important business of his new office (v. c. 69) were the preparations for the celebration of the Flora, of the Liberalis, and of the Ludi Romani in honour of the three divinities of the Capitol. It had become a common custom for the secedile to lavish enormous sums on these shows, in the hope of propitiating the favour of the multitude and securing their support. Cicero, whose fortune was very moderate, at once perceiving that, even if he were to ruin himself, it would be impossible for him to vie in splendour with many of those who were likely to be his rivals in his upward course, with very correct judgment resolved, while he did nothing which could give reasonable offence, to found his claims to future distinction solely on those talents which had already won for him his present elevation, and accordingly, although he avoided everything like meanness or parsimony in the games presented under his auspices, was equally careful to shun ostentation and profuse expenditure.

For nearly three years the history of Cicero is again a blank, that is, until the close of v. c. 67, when he was elected first praetor by the suffrages of all the centuries, and this on three several occasions, the comitia having twice broken off in consequence of the disturbances connected with the passing of the Cornelian law. This magistracy, in which he entered in January, v. c. 66, were two-fold. He was called upon to preside in the highest civil court, and was also required to act as commissioner (quaesitor) in trials for extortion, while in addition to his judicial functions he continued to practise at the bar, and carried through single-handed the defence of Cænilius, in the most singular and interesting causa edebitur bequeathed to us by antiquity. But the most important event of the year was his first appearance as a political speaker from the rostra, in which he appears to have dissected and condemned the friendship of Pompey, now certainly the most important individual in the commonwealth, was secured, and the success which attended the operations in the East smothered if it did not extinguish the indignation of the senatorial leaders. Perhaps we ought not here to omit adding one more to the almost innumerable examples of the incredible industry of Cicero. It is recorded, that, during his praetorship, notwithstanding his complicated engagements as judge, pleader, and politician, he found time to attend the rhetorical school of Antonius Gnipho, which was now rising to great eminence. (Suet. de Dra. Gramm. 7; Macrobr. Sat. iii. 12.)

During the eighteen months which followed (65—64), Cicero having declined to accept a province, kept his eye steadily fixed upon one great object, and employed himself unceasingly in watching every event which could in any way bear upon the consular elections. It appears from his letters, which now begin to open their treasures to us, that he had six competitors, of whom the most formidable were C. Antonius, a nephew of the great orator, who perished during the Marian proscription, and the notorious Catiline. The latter was threatened with a criminal prosecution; and it is amusing to observe the lawyer-like coolness with which Cicero speaks of his guilt being as clear as the noon-day sun, at the same time indicating a wish to defend him, should such a course be for his own interest, and expressing great pleasure at the perjury of the accuser who was ready to betray the cause, and the probable corruption of the judges, a majority of whom it was believed might be bought over. Catiline was, however, acquitted without the aid of his rival, and formed a coalition with Antonius, receiving strenuous assistance from Crassus and Caesar, both of whom now began to regard with an evil eye the partizan of Pompey, whose splendid exploits filled them with increasing jealousy and alarm. That Cicero viewed this union with the most lively apprehensions is evident from the fragments of his address, In Toga candida, in which he appears to have dissected and exposed the vices and crimes of his two opponents with the most merciless severity. But his fears proved groundless. His star was still in the ascendant; he was returned by all the centuries, while his colleague Antonius obtained a small majority only over Catiline. The attention of the new consul immediately after entering upon office (v. c. 63) was occupied with the agrarian law of Rullus.
with regard to which we shall speak more fully hereafter; in quelling the tumults excited by the enactment of Otho; in reconciling the descendants of those proscribed by Sulla to the civil disabilities under which they laboured; in defending C. Rabirius, charged with having been concerned in the death of Saturninus; in bringing forward a measure to render the punishment of bribery more stringent; in checking the abuses connected with the nominations to a legato libera; and in remedying various defects in the administration of justice. But his whole thoughts were soon absorbed by the precautions required to battle the treason of Catiline. The origin and progress of that famous plot, the consummate courage, prudence, caution, and decision manifested throughout by Cicero under circumstances the most delicate and embarrassing, are fully detailed elsewhere. [CATILINA.] For once the nation did not prove thankless to their benefactor. Honours were showered down upon him as no citizen of Rome had ever enjoyed. Men of all ranks and all parties hailed him as the saviour of his country; Catulus in the senate, and Cato in the forum, addressed him as "perens patris," father of his father-land; thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods, a distinction heretofore bestowed only on those who had achieved a victory in a field of battle; and all Italy joined in testifying enthusiastic admiration and gratitude. But in addition to the open and instant peril from which the consul had preserved the commonwealth, he had made a grand stroke of policy, which, had it been firmly and honestly followed out by those most deeply interested, might have happily retrieved the balance between the optimates and the popularcs or democratic faction, which had degenerated into a mere flimsy sophism, since it takes for granted the natural allies of the senate, from being deeply interested in the preservation of order and tranquillity, yet unfortunately the long-protracted struggle for the right of acting as judges in criminal trials had given rise to the most bitter animosity. But when all alike were threatened with immediate destruction this hostility was forgotten; Cicero persuaded the knights, who always placed confidence in him as one of themselves, to act heartily with the senate, and the senate were only too glad to obtain their cooperation in such an emergency. Could this fair fellowship have been maintained, it must have produced the happiest consequences; had it continued, the consuls for many years, and perhaps for ever, which called them forth; a dispute soon after arose with the farmers of the Asiatic revenues, who desired to be relieved from a disadvantageous contract; neither side showed any spirit of fair mutual concession; the whole body of the equites making common cause with their brethren became violent and unreasonable; the senate remained obstinate, the fraud bond was rudely snapped asunder, and Caesar, who had viewed this alliance with no small dissatisfaction, contrived to paralyse the hands of the only individual by whom the league could have been renewed.

Meanwhile, Cicero could boast of having accomplished an exploit for which no precedent could be found in the history of Rome. Of ignoble birth, of small fortune, without family or connections, without military renown, by the force of his intellectual powers alone, he had struggled upwards, had been chosen to fill in succession all the high offices of the state, as soon as the laws permitted him to become a candidate, without once sustaining a repulse; in the garb of peace he had gained a victory of which the greatest among his predecessors would have been proud, and had received tributes of applause of which few triumphant generals could boast. His fortune, after mounting steadily though swiftly, had now reached its culminating point of prosperity and glory; for a brief space it remained stationary, and then rapidly declined and sunk. The honours so lavishly heaped upon him, instead of invigorating and elevating, weakened and debased his mind, and the most splendid achievement of his life contained the germ of his humiliation and downfall. The punishment inflicted by order of the senate upon Lentulus, Cethegus, and their associates, although perhaps morally justified by the emergency, was a palpable violation of the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, which solemnly declared, that no citizen could be put to death until sentenced by the whole body of the people assembled in their comitia; and for this act Cicero, as the presiding magistrate, was held responsible and condemned. The conspirators by their guilt had forfeited all their privileges, while it is virtually an admission of their constitution from dangers more remediable than the existing one, that the conspirators had not been armed with dictatorial authority; for, although even a dictator was always liable to the people assembled in their comitia; and for this act Cicero, as the presiding magistrate, was held responsible and condemned. The conspirators by their guilt had forfeited all their privileges, while it is virtually an admission of their constitution from dangers more remediable than the existing one, that the conspirators had not been armed with dictatorial authority; for, although even a dictator was always liable to be called to account, there was in the present instance no semblance of an exertion of such power, but the senate, formally assuming to themselves judicial functions which they had no right to exercise, formally gave orders for the execution of a sentence which they had no right to pronounce.

The argument, pressed again and again by Cicero, that the conspirators by their guilt had forfeited all their privileges, while it is virtually an admission of the principle stated above, is in itself a mere slender sophism, since it takes for granted the guilt of the victims—the very fact which no tribunal except the comitia or commissioners nominated by the comitia could decide. Nor were his enemies, and those who secretly favoured the traitors, long in discovering and assailing this vulnerable point. On the last day of the year, when, according to established custom, he ascended the rostra to give an account to the people of the events of his consulsiphip, Metellus Celer, one of the new tribunes, forbade him to speak, exclaiming, that the man who had put Roman citizens to death without granting them a hearing was himself unworthy of being heard. But this attack was premature. The audience had not yet forgotten their obligations to the man who had shown not only courage, but the most splendid achievement of his life contained the germ of his humiliation and downfall. The punishment inflicted by order of the senate upon Lentulus, Cethegus, and their associates, although perhaps morally justified by the emergency, was a palpable violation of the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, which solemnly declared, that no citizen could be put to death until sentenced by the whole body of the people assembled in their comitia; and for this act Cicero, as the presiding magistrate, was held responsible and condemned. Nor were his enemies, and those who secretly favoured the traitors, long in discovering and assailing this vulnerable point. On the last day of the year, when, according to established custom, he ascended the rostra to give an account to the people of the events of his consulsiphip, Metellus Celer, one of the new tribunes, forbade him to speak, exclaiming, that the man who had put Roman citizens to death without granting them a hearing was himself unworthy of being heard. But this attack was premature. The audience had not yet forgotten their obligations to the man who had shown not only courage, but fully discovered that, although addressed with courtesy, and listened to with respect, he was in reality powerless when seeking to resist the encroachments of such men as Pompey, Crassus, and Caesar; and hence he viewed with the utmost alarm the disposition now manifested by these three chiefs to bury their former jealousies, and to make common cause against the aristocratic leaders, who, suspicious of their ulcerous projects, were using every art to baffle and outmanevr v them. Hence Cicero also, at this epoch perceiving how fatal such a coalition must prove to the cause of freedom, carelessly laboured to detach Pompey, with whom he kept up a close but somewhat cold intimacy, until he had made the project a reality, and then, with that unkindness and want of sound principle by which his political life was from this time forward disgraced, began to testify a strong inclination to join the triumvirs, and in a letter to Atticus (ii. 5), c. 59, actually names the price at which they could purchase his adherence—the seat in the college of augurs just vacant by the death of Metellus Celer.
Finding himself unable to conclude any satisfactory arrangement, like a spoiled child, he expresses his disgust with public life, and longs for an opportunity to retire from the world, and devote himself to study and philosophic contemplation. But while in the letters written during the stormy consulship of Caesar (c. 59) he takes a most desponding view of the state of the commonwealth, and seems to consider slavery as inevitable, he does not appear to have foreseen the storm impending over himself individually; and when at length, after the election of Clodius to the tribunateship, he began to entertain serious alarm, he was quieted by positive assurances of friendship and support from Pompey conveyed in the strongest terms. One of the first acts of his enemy, after entering upon office, notwithstanding the solemn pledge he was to have given to Pompey that he would not use his power to the injury of Cicero, was to pro-bouse a bill interdicting from fire and water any one who should be found to have put a Roman citizen to death untried. Here Cicero committed a fatal mistake. Filled with the hope of assuming the bias of conscious innocence, he at once took guilt upon himself, and, without awaiting the progress of events, changed his attire, and assuming the garb of the Bona Dea, from which male creatures were excluded, he went round the forum, soliciting the compassion of all whom he met. For a brief period public sympathy was awakened. A large number of the senate and the equites appeared also in mourning, and the better portion of the citizens seemed resolved to expiate his cause. But all demonstrations of such feelings were promptly repressed by the new consuls, Piso and Gabinius, who from the first displayed steady hostility, having been bought by the promises of Clodius, who undertook to procure for them what provinces they pleased. The rabble were infuriated by the incessant harangues of their tribune; nothing was to be hoped from Crassus; the good offices of Caesar had been already rejected; and Pompey, the last and only safeguard, contrary to all expectations, and in violation of the most solemn engagements, kept aloof, and from real or pretended fear of some outbreak refused to interpose. Upon this, Cicero, giving way to despair, resolved to yield to the storm, and quitting Rome at the beginning of April, (c. 58), reached Brundisium about the middle of the month. From thence he crossed over to CICERO.

CICERO.

When suddenly hurled from a commanding eminence he found himself a helpless and almost friendless outcast; and again, on the other hand, the boundless enthusiasm with which he was greeted on his return by the salfomoros populace who had excited so furiously in his disgrace. A little consideration will enable us, however, to fathom the mystery. From the moment that Cicero laid down his consulship he began to lose ground with all parties. The senate were disgusted by the arrogant assumption of superiority in an upstart stranger; the equites were displeased because he would not cordially assent to their most unreasonable and unjust demands; the people, whom he had never attempted to flatter or cajole, were by degrees lashed into fury against one who was unceasingly held up before their eyes as the violator of their most sacred privileges. Moreover, the triumvirs, who were the active though secret movers in the whole affair, considered it essential to their designs that he should be humbled and taught the risk and folly of playing an independent part, of seeking to mediate between the conflicting factions, and thus in his own person regulating and controlling all. They therefore gladly availed themselves of the energetic malignity of Clodius, and their common victim in a manner highly characteristic of the individual. Caesar, who at all times, even under the greatest provocation, entertained a warm regard and even respect for Cicero, with his natural goodness of heart endeavoured to withdraw him from the scene of danger, and at the same time to lay him under personal obligations; with this intent he pressed him to become one of his legates: this being declined, he then urged him to accept the post of commissioner for dividing the public lands in Campania; and it was not until he found all his proposals steadfastly rejected that he consented to leave him to his fate. Crassus gave him up at once, without compunction or regret: they had never been cordial friends, had repeatedly quarrelled openly, and their reconciliations had been utterly hollow. The conduct of Pompey, as might have been expected, was a tissue of selfish, cautious, calculating, cold-blooded dissimulation; in spite of the affection and unwavering confidence ever exhibited towards him by Cicero, in spite of the most unequivocal assurances both in public and private of protection and assistance, he quietly deserted him, without a pang, in the moment of greatest need, because it suited his own plans and his own convenience. But soon after the departure of Cicero matters assumed a very different aspect; his value began once more to be felt and his absence to be deplored. The senate could ill afford to lose the most able champion of the aristocracy, while the triumviri, trusting that the high tone of their common victim in a manner properly belonging to the order; the Knights were touched with remorse on account of their ingratitude towards one whom they identified with themselves, who had often served them well, and might again be often useful; the populace, when the first fervour of angry passion had passed away, begun to long for that oratory to which they had been wont to listen with such delight, and to remember the debt they owed to him who had saved their temples, dwellings, and property from destruction; while the triumvir, trusting that the high tone of their adversary would be brought low by this severe lesson, and that he would henceforth be passive, if not a subservient tool, were eager to check and overawe Clodius, who was now no longer disposed to be a mere instrument in their hands, but, breaking loose from all restraint, had already given symptoms of open rebellion. Their original purpose was fully accomplished. Although the return of Cicero was glorious, so glorious that he and others may for a moment have dreamed that he of Cicero was glorious, so glorious that he and his spirits were broken, and his self-respect destroyed. After a few feeble ineffectual struggles, he was forced quietly to yield to a power which he no longer dared to resist, and was unable to modify or guide. Nor were his masters content with simple acquiescence in their transactions; they demanded positive demonstrations on their behalf. To this degradation he was weak enough to submit, consenting to praise in his writings those proceedings which he had once openly and loudly condemned (ad Att. iv. 5), uttering sentiments in public totally inconsistent with his principles (ad Att. iv. 6), professing friendship for those whom he hated and despised (ad Fam. i. 9), and defending in the senate and at the bar men who had not only disgraced themselves as his bitter foes, but on whom he had previously lavished every term of abuse which an imagination fertile in invective could suggest. (Ad Fam. vii. 1, v. 8.)

Such was the course of his life for five years (b. c. 57-52), a period during which he kept up warm social intercourse with the members of the triumvirate, especially Pompey, who remained constantly at Rome, and received all overtures made of high consideration from Cicero, sparing no privation of his time to ensure the success of his plans. But being latterly in a great measure occupied in the business of his province until five years should have elapsed from the expiration of his office, and that in the mean¬time governors should be selected by lot from those who had left behind, and of disgust with the occupations in which he was engaged; every friend and acquaintance is solicited and importuned in turn to use every exertion to prevent the period of his absence from being extended beyond the regular and ordinary space of a single year. It must be confessed, in the Selinus, a strong hill fort of the Elcuthercilices, to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to the senate, in which these achievements were detailed with great pomp; every engine was set to first turn of fortune; above all, he was haunted by the foreboding that they might after all prove victorious, in which event his fate would have been desperate; and the cup of bitterness was filled by the unnatural treachery of his brother and nephew, who were seeking to recommend themselves to those in power by casting the foulest calumnies and vilest aspersions upon their relative, whom they represented as having seduced them from their duty. This load of misery was, however, lightened by a letter received on the 12th of August (b.c. 47) from Caesar, in which he promised to forget the past, and be the same as he had ever been—a promise which he amply redeemed, for on his arrival in Italy in September, he greeted Cicero with frank cordiality, and treated him ever after with the utmost respect and kindness.

Cicero was now at liberty to follow his own pursuits without interruption, and, accordingly, until the death of Caesar, devoted himself with exclusive assiduity to literary labours, finding consolation in study, but not contentment, for public display and popular applause had long been almost necessary to his existence; and now that the senate, the forum, and the courts of law were silent, or, at all events, no longer presented an arena for free and open discussion, the calm delights of speculative research, for which he was wont to sigh amid the din and hurry of incessant business, seemed monotonous and dull. Posterity, however, has good cause to rejoice that he was driven to seek this relief from distorting recollections; for, during the years b.c. 46, 45, and 44, nearly the whole of his most important works on rhetoric and philosophy, with the exception of the two political treatises named above, were arranged and published. In addition to the pain produced by wounded vanity, mixed with more honourable sorrow arising from the degradation of his country, he was harassed by a succession of domestic annoyances and griefs. Towards the close of b.c. 46, in consequence, it would appear, of some disputes connected with pecuniary transactions, he divorced his wife Terentia, to whom he had been united for upwards of thirty years, and soon after married a young and wealthy maiden, Publilia, his ward, but, as might have been anticipated, found little comfort in this new alliance, which was specially dissatisfactory. But his present and overwhelming affliction was the death of his beloved daughter, Tullia (early in b.c. 45), towards whom he cherished the fondest attachment. Now, as formerly, philosophy afforded no support in the hour of trial; grief for a time seems to have been so violent as almost to affect his intellects, and it was long before he recovered sufficient tranquillity to derive any enjoyment from society or engage with zest in his ordinary occupations. He withdrew to the small wooded island of Astura, on the coast near Antium, where, hiding himself in the thickest groves, he could give way to melancholy thoughts without restraint; gradually he so far recovered as to be able to draw up the first sketch of a work on rhetoric in imitation of a piece by Cicero on the same topic, and found relief in devising a variety of plans for a monument in honour of the deceased.

The tumults excited by Antony after the murder of Caesar (b.c. 44) having compelled the leading conspirators to disperse in different directions, Cicero, feeling that his own position was not free from danger, set out upon a journey to Greece with the intention of being absent until the new consuls should have entered upon office, from whose vigour and patriotism he anticipated a happy change. While in the neighbourhood of Rhegium (August 2, b.c. 44), whither he had been driven from the Sicilian coast by a contrary wind, he was persuaded to return in consequence of intelligence that matters were likely to be arranged amicably between Antony and the senate. How bitterly this anticipation was disappointed is sufficiently proved by the tone and contents of the first two Philippics; but the jealousy which had sprung up in Antony towards Octavianus soon induced the former to quit the city, while the latter, commencing that career of dissimulation which he maintained throughout a long and most prosperous life, affected the warmest attachment to the senate, and especially to the person of their leader, who was completely duped by these professions. From the beginning of the year b.c. 43 until the end of April, Cicero was in the height of his glory; within this space the last twelve Philippics were all delivered and listened to with rapturous applause; his activity was unceasing, at one moment encouraging the senate, at another stimulating the people, he hurried from place to place to place the admired of all, the very hero of the scene; and when at length he announced the result of the battles under the walls of Mutina, he was escorted by crowds to the Capitol, thence to the Rostra, and thence to his own house, with enthusiasm not less eager than was displayed when he had detected and crushed the associates of Catiline. But when the fatal news arrived of the union of Lepidus with Antony (29th May), quickly followed by the defection of Octavianus, and when the latter, marching upon Rome at the head of an armed force, compelled the comitia to elect him consul at the age of 19, it was but too evident that all was lost. The league between the three usurpers was finally concluded on the 27th of November, and the lists of the proscribed finally arranged, among whom Cicero and sixteen others were marked for immediate destruction, and agents forthwith despatched to perpetrate the murders before the victims should take alarm. Although much care had been taken to conceal these proceedings, Cicero was warned of his danger while he was lying at Antium, instantly set forth for the coast with the purpose of escaping by sea, and actually embarked at Antium, but was driven by stress of weather to Circeii, from whence he coasted along to Formiae, where he landed at his villa, diseased in body and sick at heart, resolving no longer to fly from his fate. The soldiers sent in quest of him were now known to be close at hand, upon which his attendants forced him to enter a litter, and hurried him through the woods towards the shore, distant about a mile from the house. As they were pressing onwards, they were overtaken by their pursuers, and were preparing to defend their master with their lives, but Cicero commanded them to desist, and stretching forward called upon his executioners to strike. They instantly cut off his head and hands, which were conveyed to Rome, and, by the orders of Antony, nailed to the Rostum.

A glance at the various events which form the subject of the above narrative will sufficiently demonstrate, that Cicero was totally destitute of the qualifications which alone could have fitted him to sustain the character of a great independent statesman amidst those scenes of turbulence and revolutionary violence in which his lot was cast. So long as he was contented in his struggle upwards to play a subordinate part, his progress was marked by extraordinary, well-merited, and most honourable success. But when he attempted to secure the highest place, he was rudely thrust down by bolder, more adventurous, and more commanding spirits; when he sought to act as a mediator, he became the tool of each of the rivals in turn; and when, after much and protracted hesitation, he had finally exposed the interests of one, he threw an air of gloom and distrust over the cause by timid cowardice; his numerous and glaring inconsistencies became the tool of each of the rivals in turn; and his want of firmness in the hour of trial amounted to cowardice; his numerous and glaring inconsistencies destroyed all confidence in his discretion and judgment; his irresolution not unfrequently assumed the aspect of awkward duplicity, and his restless craving vanity exposed him constantly to the snare of insidious flattery, while it covered him with ridicule and contempt. Even his boasted patriotism was of a very doubtful, we might say of a spurious, stamp; for his love of country was so mixed up with petty feelings of personal importance, and his hatred of tyranny so inseparably connected in his mind with his own loss of power and consideration, that we can hardly persuade ourselves that the former was the disinterested impulse of a noble heart so much as the prompting of selfishness and vain glory, or that the latter proceeded from a generous devotion to the rights and liberties of his fellow-citizens so much as from the bitter consciousness of being individually depressed and overshadowed by the superior weight and eminence of another. It is vain to undertake the defence of his conduct by ingenious and elaborate reasoning. The whole case is placed clearly before our eyes, and all the common sources of fallacy and unjust judgment in regard to public men are removed. Wo are not called upon to weigh and scrutinize the evidence of partial or hostile witticisms of the greatest intellectual strength linked without the part of the lady.

Our great authority for the life of Cicero is his own writings, and especially his letters and orations. The most important passages will be found collected in Meierotto, "Ciceronis Vita ex ipsius scriptis excerpta," Berlin, 1703, and in the "Onomasticon Tullianum," which forms an appendix to Orelli's Cicero, Zurich, 1826—1838. Much that is curious and valuable may be collected from the biographies of the orator and his contemporaries by Plutarch, whose statements, however, must always be received with caution. Something may be gleaned from Velleius Paterculus also, and from the books of Appian and of Dion Cassius which belong to this period. These and other ancient testimonies have been diligently arranged in chronological order in the "Historia M. Tullii Ciceroe," by F. Fabricius. Of modern works that of Middleton, Collet, etc. has attained great celebrity, although it must be regarded as a blind and extravagant panegyric; some good strictures on his occasional inaccuracies and constant partiality will be found in Tunstall's "Epistolae ad Middletonum," Cantab. 1741, and in Colley Cibber's "Character and Conduct of Cicero," 1755. Moreover, if the new alliance had been dictated by motives of a purely mercenary nature, more anxiety would have been manifested to retain the advantages which it procured, while on the contrary we find that it was dissolved very quickly in consequence of the bride having incuriously testified satisfaction at the death of Tullia, of whose influence she may have been jealous, and that Cicero steadily refused to listen to any overtures, although a reconciliation was earnestly desired on the part of the lady.
II. WRITINGS OF CICERO.

The works of Cicero are so numerous and diversified, that it is necessary for the sake of distinctness to separate them into classes, and accordingly they may be conveniently arranged under five heads:—1. Philosophical works. 2. Speeches. 3. Correspondence. 4. Poems. 5. Historical and Miscellaneous works. The last may appear too vague and comprehensive, but nothing of importance belonging to this section has been preserved.

I. PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS.

Several of the topics handled in this department are so intimately connected and shade into each other by such fine and almost imperceptible gradations, that the boundaries by which they are separated cannot in all cases be sharply defined, and consequently some of the subdivisions may appear arbitrary or inaccurate; for practical purposes, however, the following distribution will be found sufficiently precise.

In the table given below, those works to which an asterisk is prefixed have descended to us in a very imperfect and mutilated condition, enough, however, still remaining to convey a clear conception of the general plan, tone, and spirit; of those to which a double asterisk is prefixed, only a few fragments, or even a few words, survive; those printed in Italics are totally lost; those included within brackets are believed to be spurious:

A. Philosophy of Taste.

Rhetoricorum s. De Inventione Rhetoric libri II.
De Partitione Oratoria.
De Oratore libri III.
Brutus s. De Chris Oratoribus.
Orator s. De Optimo Genere dicendi.
De Optimó Genere Oratórum.
Communes Locii.

[In the table continued.]

B. Political Philosophy.

Epistola ad Cæsarem de Ordinandi Republicæ.

De Officiis libri III.
* De Virtutibus.
 De Jure Civili.

C. Philosophy of Morals.

Eodem Genere.

Laeulus s. De Amicitia.
* De Gloria libri II.
* De Consolatione s. De Lucè minuendo.

Academiciorum libri IV.

De Finibus libri V.

Tusculanarum Disputationum libri V.

D. Speculative Philosophy.

Paradoxa Stoicorum sex.
* Hortensius s. De Philosophia.
 Timæus ex Platone.
 Protagoras ex Platone.

The Edito Princeps of the collected philosophical works of Cicero was printed at Rome in 1471, by Swayneheym and Pannartz, 2 vols. folio, and is a work of excessive rarity. The first volume contains De Natura Doerum, De Divinatione, De Officiis, Paradoxa, Laelius, Cato Major, Versus duodecim Sapientium; the second volume, Questions Tusculanae, De Finibus, De Fato, Q. Cicero de Petitione Consulatui, Fragments of the Hortensius, Timæus, Academica Questions, De Legibus.

We have belonging to the same period, De Officiis, De Amicitia, De Senectute, Somnium Scipionis, Paradoxa, Tusculanae Questions, in 2 vols. folio, without place or date, but known to have been published at Paris about 1471, by Gering, Crantz, and Friburger.

Also, the De Natura Doerum, De Divinatione, De Fato, De Legibus, Hortensius, (Modestus,) De Disciplina Militari, appeared in 1 vol. 4to., 1471, at Venice, from the press of Vindelin de Spira.

An excellent edition, intended to embrace the whole philosophical works of Cicero, was commenced by J. A. Goerzenz, and carried to the extent of three volumes, 8vo., which contain the De Legibus, Academica, De Finibus, Leip. 1809—1813.

Before entering upon an examination of Cicero's philosophic writings in detail, we must consider very briefly the inducements which first prompted Cicero to devote his attention to the study of philosophy, the extent to which his original views were subsequently altered and enlarged, the circumstances under which his various treatises were composed, the end which they were intended to accomplish, the degree of importance to be attached to these works, the form in which they are presented to the reader, and the opinions really entertained by the author himself.

Cicero dedicated his attention to philosophy in the first instance not merely as a branch of general education, but as that particular branch which was likely to prove peculiarly serviceable to him in attaining the great object of his youthful aspirations—Oratorical fame. (See Para...). He must have discerned from a very early period that the subtle and astute, though often sophistical, arguments advanced by rival sects in supporting their own tenets and assailing the positions of their adversaries, and the habitual quickness of objection and readiness of reply which distinguished the oral controversies of the more skilful disputants could be turned to admirable account in the wordy combats of the courts; and hence the method pursued by the later Academy of probing the weak points and detecting the fallacies of all systems in succession, possessed the strongest attractions for one who to insure success must be able to regard each cause submitted to his judgment under many different aspects, and be prepared to anticipate and repel exceptions, of whatever nature, proceeding from whatever quarter. We have already seen, in the biographical portion of this article, that Cicero allowed no opportunity to escape of gaining an intimate acquaintance with the doctrines of the most popular sects, without resigning himself exclusively to one; and he was fully sensible that he owed much of the signal success which attended his efforts, after his return from Greece, to this... training in philosophy, which he emphatically de-nominates "the fountain-head of all perfect eloquence, the mother of all good deeds and good words." (Brut. 93.) During his residence at Athens and at Rhodes he appears to have imbied a deep and earnest attachment for the pursuit which he henceforward viewed as something better and nobler than a mere instrument for acquiring dialectic skill. Accordingly, every moment that could be snatched from his multifarious avocations was employed with exemplary zeal in accumulating stores of philosophic love, which were carefully preserved up in his memory. But the incessant demands of business long prevented him from arranging and displaying the wealth thus acquired; and had not the disorders of the times compelled him upon two occasions to retire for a brief space from public life, he would probably never have communicated to the world the fruits of his scientific researches. The first of the two periods alluded to above was when after his recall from exile he found himself virtually deprived of all poitical influence, and consequently, although busily engaged in arranging the data of a poster, rious learning to embody his De Oratore, De Republica, and De Legibus. The second period reached from his return to Italy after the battle of Pharsalia until the autumn after the death of Caesar, during the greater portion of which he lived in retirement and produced the rest of his philosophical works, some of them being published even subsequent to his re-appearance on the stage of public affairs.
But, although these were all finished and sent abroad between the end of c. 46 and the middle of c. 44, it would be absurd to suppose that the varied information required for such a task could have been brought together and distributed into a series of elaborate treatises in the course of sixteen or eighteen months. It seems much more proba-able, as indicated above, that the materials were gradually collected during a long course of reading and inquiry, and carefully digested by reflection and frequent discussion, so that when a convenient season had arrived, the design already traced out was completed in all its details. Thus we find in the dialogue upon Laws (i. 20) a reference to the debates which had taken place among the wise on the nature of the Supreme Good, the doubts and difficulties with which the question was still encumbered, and the importance of arriving at some correct decision; after which the speaker proceeds briefly to express the same sentiments which nine years afterwards were expanded and formally maintained in the De Finibus. (Comp. Acad. 3.)
In order to understand clearly the nature of these works and the end which they were intended to serve, we must bear in mind the important fact, that they were almost the first specimens of this kind of literature ever presented to the Romans in their own language. With the exception of the poems of Imeretios and some other publications on the doctrines of Epicurus by an Amphiadis and a Rabirius, so obscure that Cicero seems to have thought them not worth the trouble of perusal, there was absolutely nothing. Hence Cicero said in forming the scheme of drawing up a series of documentary treatises which should furnish his countrymen with an easy introduction to the knowledge of the tenets professed by the leading sects of Greece on the most important branches of politics, morals, metaphysics, and theology. We must, if we desire to form a fair judgment, never forget that the design proposed was to communicate in a correct and precise but familiar and attractive form the results at which others had arrived, not to expose new conceptions—to present a sharp and striking outline of the majestic structures reared by the labours of successive schools, not to claim distinction as the architect of a new edifice.
The execution of this project demanded extensive research, a skilful selection of the best portions of the best authors, the accurate adjustment and harmonious combination of these loose fragments, a choice of familiar examples and apt illustrations that would light on much that would necessarily appear dark and incomprehensible to the inexperienced, and, most difficult of all, the creation of terms and phraseology capable of expressing with clearness and exactitude a class of ideas altogether new. If then we find upon examination that this difficult undertaking, requiring the union of talents
the most opposite, of unwavering application, dedication, discrimination, refined taste, practical skill in composition, and an absolute command over a subaverse of knowledge, was executed with equal sucand consummate ability, we have no right to complain that many of the topics are handled somewhat superficially, that there is an absence of all originality of thought, and that no effort is made to enlarge the boundaries of the science. Nor have we any reason to regret the resolution thus formed and consistently carried out. We are put in po-session of a prodigious mass of most curious and interesting information bearing upon the history of philosophy, conveyed in the richest and most win-ing language. Antiquity produced no works which could rival these as manuals of instruction;
as such they were employed until the downfall of the Roman empire; they stood their ground and kept alive a taste for literature during the middle ages; they were still zealously studied for a long period after the revival of learning; they even now command respect from the purity of tho moral principles which they inculcate, and serve as models of perfect style and diction. We arrive at the conclusion, that Cicero is fully entitled to the praise of having accomplished with brilliant success all that he engaged to perform. In philosophy he must be regarded as the prince of popular compilers, but nothing more. It is certain that he could not have put forth his powers in a manner better calculated to promote the interests and extend the influence of his favourite pursuit.
The greater number of these essays, in imitation of the writings of many of the Greek philosophers, are thrown into dialogue—a form extremely well suited for the purposes of instruction, since it affords facility for familiar explanation and for the introduction of those elucidations and digressions so necessary to communicate clearness and animation to abstract propositions, which, if simply enunciated in a purely scientific shape, must unavoidably appear to the learner dull and spiritless. In a dialogue, also, the teacher is not compelled to disclose his own opinions, but may give full scope to his ingenuity and eloquence in expounding and contrasting the views of others.
The execution is, upon the whole, no less happy than the design. One cannot fail to be impressed with the dexterity exhibited in contriving the machinery of the different conversations, the text with which the most appropriate personages are selected, the scrupulous accuracy with which their respective characters are distinguished and preserved throughout, and the air of calm dignity which pervades each separate piece. At the same time it occurs to us that there is throughout a want of that life and reality which lends such a charm to the dialogues of Plato. We feel that most of the colloquies reported by the Athenian might actually have been held; but there is a stiffness and formality about the actors of Cicero, and a tendency to lecture rather than to converse, which materially injures the dramatic effect, and in fact in some degree neutralizes the benefit to be derived from this method of imparting knowledge. He has also rather abused the opportunities presented for excursions into the attractive regions which lie out of the direct path, and so much space is sometimes occupied by enthusiastic declamations, that the main subject is for a time thrown out of sight and forgotten.

The speculative opinions entertained by Cicero himself are of little importance, except as a mere matter of curiosity, and cannot be ascertained with certainty. In all controversies the chief arguments of the contending parties are drawn out with the strictest impartiality, marshalled in strong relief over against each other, and the decision then left to the reader. The habit of stating and comparing a multitude of conflicting theories, each of which could number a long array of great names among its supporters, would naturally confirm that disposition to deny the certainty of human knowledge which must have been imbibed in early life by the pupil of Philo of Larissa; while the multitude of beautiful and profound reflections scattered over the writings of the Greek sages would lead an unbiased mind, honest in its search after truth, to select what was best in each without binding himself exclusively to one.

A PHILOSOPHY OF TASTE, OR RHETORIC.

The rhetorical works of Cicero may be considered as a sort of triple compound formed by combining the information derived from the lectures and disquisitions of the teachers under whom he studied, and from the writings of the Greeks, especially Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Isocrates, with his own speculative researches into the nature and theory of the art, corrected in his later years by the results of extensive experience. Rhetoric, considered as a science depending upon abstract principles which might be investigated philosophically and developed in formal precepts, had hitherto attracted but little attention in Rome except among the select few who were capable of comprehending the instructions of foreign professors delivered in a foreign tongue; Cicero, having a natural taste for Latin, and hence his writings long regarded, and perhaps justly, as ignotum pro ignoto, who brought such disreput on the study by their presumptuous quackery, that so late as n. c. 92, L. Crassus, who was not likely to be an unjust or illiberal judge in such matters, when censor was desirous of expelling the whole crew from the city. Thus Cicero had the honour of opening up to the masses of his countrymen a new field of inquiry and mental exercise, and of importing for general national use one of the most attractive productions of Athenian genius and industry.

The Edito Principes of the collected rhetorical works of Cicero was printed at Venice by Alexander and Azalmanus, fol. 1485, containing the De Oratore, the Orator, the Topica, the Partitas Oratoriae, and the De Optimo Genere Oratorum, and was reprinted at Venice in 1488 and 1495, both in fol. The first complete edition, including, in addition to the above, the Brutus, the Rhetorica ad Herennium, and the De Inventione, was published at Venice by Aldus in 1514, 4to., edited in part by Naugerus. Of modern editions the most notable are the following: that by Schütz, which contains the whole, Lips. 1804, 3 vols. 8vo.; the "Opera Rhetorica Minor," by Wedderburn, 1814, 1807, containing all with the exceptions of the De Oratore, the Brutus, and the Orator; and the Brutus, Topica, De Optimo Genere Oratorum, with the notes of Beier and Orelli, Zurich, 1830, 8vo.

1. Rhetoricorum s. De Inventione Rhetoricae Libri II.

This appears to have been the earliest of the efforts of Cicero in prose composition. It was intended to exhibit in a compendious systematic form all that was most valuable and worthy of note in the works of the Greek rhetoricians. Aristotle had already performed this task in so far as his own predecessors were concerned, and hence his writings, together with those of his disciples and of the followers of Isocrates, would supply all the necessary materials for selection and combination. According to the original plan, this treatise was to have embraced the whole subject; but there is no reason to fix upon the exact number of four books as the extent contemplated, and it certainly never was completed. The author, after finishing the two which have descended to us, seems to have thrown them aside, and speaks of them at a later period perhaps too slightly (De Orat. I. 22) as a crude and imperfect performance. After a short preface regarding the origin, rise, progress, use and abuse of eloquence, we find an enumeration and classification of the different branches of the subject. The whole art must be considered under five distinct heads:—1. Its general character and the position which it occupies among the sciences (genus). 2. The duty which it is called upon to perform (officium). 3. The end which it seeks to attain (finis). 4. The subject matter of a speech (materia). 5. The constituent elements of which a speech is made up (partes rhetoricae). After marking cursorily, with regard to the genus, that the art of rhetoric is a branch of civil knowledge (civile scientia), that its officium is, to use all the methods most suitable for persuasion by oratory, and its fluid to achieve this persuasion, Cicero confines himself for the present to the materia and partes. Now the materia, subject-matter, or form of a speech, may belong to one of three classes, according to the nature of the audience. (Comp. Partit. Ort. 3.) 1. The genus demonstrativum (γένος δεικτικόν), addressed to mere listeners who study the oratory as an exhibition of art.

2. The genus deliberativum (γένος συμβουλευτικόν), addressed to those who judge of the future as in legislative and political assemblies. 3. The genus vocius (γένος τῆς εικοσίας), addressed to those whose judge of the past as in courts of law.

Again, the partes rhetoricae or constituent elements of a speech may be five. 1. The invention of arguments (inventio). 2. The arrangement of these arguments (dispositio).

3. The diction in which these arguments are expressed (eloquentia). 4. The clear and distinct perception in the mind of the things and words which compose the arguments and the power of producing them at the fitting season (memoria).

5. The delivery, comprehending the modulation of the voice, and the nature of the orator's (popen) voice. These points being premised, it is proposed to treat of inventio generally and independently, and then to apply the principles established to each of the three classes under which the materia may be ranged, according to the following method:

Every case which gives rise to debate or difference of opinion (controversia) involves a question, and this question is termed the constitution (constitutio) of the case. The constitution may be fourfold. 1. When the question is one of fact (controversia facti), it is a constitutio conjuncturalis.

2. When both parties are agreed as to the fact, but differ as to the name by which the fact ought to be distinguished (controversia nominis), it is a constitutio disjunctiva.

3. When the question relates to the quality of the fact (generis controversi), it is a constitutio generalis.

4. When the question concerns the fitness or propriety of the fact (quem aut quem, aut omnem, aut omnomodum, aut opud quos, aut quos jure, aut quo tempore agere opocional quodixer), it is a constitutio translutiva. Again, the constitutio generalis admits of being divided into — a. The constitutio juridicialis, in which right and wrong, reward and punishment, are viewed in the abstract; and b. The constitutio negotialis, where they are considered in reference to existing laws and usages; and finally, the constitutio juridicialis is subdivided into a. The constitutio absoluta, in which the question of right or wrong is viewed with reference to the fact itself; and b. The constitutio assumptiva, in which the question of right and wrong is viewed not with reference to the fact itself, but to the external circumstances under which the fact took place.

The constitutio assumptiva is itself fourfold — (1) concussio, when the accused confesses the deed with which he is charged, and does not justify it but seeks forgiveness, which may be done in two ways, (a) by paragdo, when the deed is admitted but moral guilt is denied in connection of being having done unwittingly (imprudentia), or by accident (casus), or unavoidably (necessitate), (b) by defrocatio, when the misdeed is admitted to have been done, and to have been done willfully, but notwithstanding forgiveness is sought — a very rare contingency; (2) remota crimini, when the accused defends himself by casting the blame on another; (3) relatio crimini, when the deed is justified by previous provocation; (4) comparatio, when the deed is justified by pleading a praiseworthy motive.

The constitution of the case being determined, we must next examine whether the case be simple (simpexus) or compound (conjectura), that is, whether it involves a single question or several, and whether the reasons do or do not depend upon some written document (in ratione, in scripto sit controversio). We must then consider the exact point upon which the dispute turns (quassatio), the plea in justification (ratio), the debate which will arise from the reply to the plea of justification (judicatio), and the additional arguments by which the defendant seeks to confirm his plea of justification after it had been attacked by his opponent (argumentum), which will convert the judicatio into a dieplatio (comp. Part. Ort. 30), and so lead more directly to a decision.

These matters being duly weighed, the orator must proceed to arrange the different divisions of his speech (partes orationis), which are six in number.

1. The Esorcizum or introduction, which is divided into a. the Princiius or opening, and b. the Insinuatio, of which the great object is to awaken the attention and secure the goodwill of the audience. 2. The Narratio or statement of the case. 3. The Partitio or explanation of the manner in which the speaker intends to handle the case, indicating at the same time those points on which both parties are agreed, and those on which they differ. 4. The Confirmatio or array of arguments by which the speaker supports his case. 5. The Reprehension or refutation of the arguments employed by the antagonist. 6. The Conclusion or peroration, consisting of (a) the Ensmeratio or brief impressive summary of the whole; b. the Indignatio, which seeks to enlist the passions of the audience, and c. the Com quo or appeal to their sympathies.

Each of these six divisions is discussed separately, and numerous rules and precepts are laid down for the guidance of the orator.

In the second book the fifth and sixth of the above divisions, the Confimatio and Reprehension are considered at large with direct reference to cases belonging to the Genus Judiciale, and to each of the four different cases for which the remaining two remaining classes, the Genus Deliberativum and the Genus Demonstrativum, are very briefly noticed, and the dissertation upon Rhetorical Invention closes somewhat abruptly.

We have no means of deciding with certainty the exact time at which these books were composed and published. The expressions employed in the De Oratore (i. 2), "quoniam quae poeris aut adolescentes nobis ex commentariolis nostris inchoata ac rudia exciderunt, vix hac aetate digna," point unanswerably to the early youth of Cicero, but without enabling us to fix upon any particular year. They formed, very probably, a portion of the fruits of that study which continued incessantly during the period of tranquillity which prevailed in the city while Sulla was engaged in prosecuting the Mithridatic war (b. c. 87—84), and bear the appearance of notes taken down from the lectures of some instructor, arranged, simplified, and expanded by reference to the original sources.

CICERO.
The work is repeatedly quoted by Quintilian, sometimes under the title Libri Rhetorici, sometimes as Libri Artis Rhetoricae, generally as Rhetorica (comp. Serv. ad Verg. Aen. viii. 321, ix. 481), and we might infer from a passage in Quintilian (ii. 14. § 5), that De Rhetorico was the appellation selected by the author; at all events, the addition De Inventione Rhetorica rests upon no ancient authority.

An account of the most important editions of the De Inventione is given below, after the remarks upon the Rhetorica ad Herennium.

2. De Partitione Oratoris Dialogus.

This has been correctly described as a catechism of Rhetoric, according to the method of the middle Academy, by way of question and answer, drawn up by Cicero for the instruction of his son Marcus, in which the whole art is comprised under three heads. 1. The Vis Oratoris, in which the subject is treated with reference to the speaker; 2. the Oratio, which treats of the speech; 3. the Questatio, which treats of the case.

The precepts with regard to the speaker are ranged under five heads: 1. Invenzione. 2. Colloquio. 3. Eloquio. 4. Actio. 5. Memoria.

The precepts with regard to the speech are also under five heads. 1. Espositio. 2. Narratio. 3. Confirmatio. 4. Reprehensio. 5. Peroratio.

The case may be a. Infinita, in which neither persons nor times are defined, and then it is called quaestio or consultatio, or it may be b. Finita, in which the persons are defined, and then it is called causa; this in reality is included in the former.

The precepts with regard to the quaestio infinita or consultatio are ranged under 1. Cognitio, by which the existence, the nature, and the quality of the case are determined; 2. Actio, which discusses the means and manner in which any object may be obtained.

The precepts with regard to the quaestio finita or causa are ranged under three heads, according as the case belongs to 1. the Genus Demonstrativum; 2. the Genus Deliberativum; 3. the Genus Judiciale.

The different constitutions are next passed under review, and the conversation concludes with an exhortation to the study of philosophy.

These partitions, a term which corresponds to the Greek διαφορος, may be considered as the most purely scientific of all the rhetorical works of Cicero, and form a useful companion to the treatise De Inventione; but from their strictly technical character the tract appears dry and uninteresting, and from the paucity of illustrations is not frequently somewhat obscure. From the circumstance that Cicero makes no mention of this work in his other writings, some critics have called in question its authenticity, but there seems to be no evidence either internal or external to justify such a suspicion, and it is repeatedly quoted by Quintillian without any expression of doubt. Another debate has arisen as to the period when it was composed. We are told at the commencement that it was drawn up during a period when the author was completely at leisure in consequence of having been at length enabled to quit Rome, and this expression has been generally believed to indicate the close of the year b.c. 46 or the beginning of b.c. 45, shortly before the death of Tullia and the departure of Marcus for Athens, when, as we know from his correspondence, he was devoting himself with the greatest diligence to literary pursuits. (Ad Fam. vii. 28, ix. 26.) Hanx has, however, endeavoured to prove (Brock and Gruber's Encyclopaedia, art. Ciceron) that we may with greater probability fix upon the year n. c. 49, when Cicero after his return from Cicilia suddenly withdrew from Rome about the middle of January (ad Att. vii. 10), and having spent a considerable time at Formiae, and visited various parts of Campania, proceeded to Arpinum at the end of March, invested his son with the manly gown, and afterwards made him the companion of his flights. But this critic seems to have forgotten that Cicero never entered the city from the spring of n. c. 51 until late in the autumn of n. c. 47, and therefore could certainly never have employed the phrase "quoniam aliquando Roma exundi potestas data est," and still less could he ever have talked of enjoying "sumnum otium" at an epoch perhaps the most painful and agitating in his whole life.

The earliest edition of the Partitones Oratoriae, in a separate form, which bears the above title, is that by Gabr. Fontana, printed in 1472, 4to., probably at Venice. There are, however, two other editions supposed by bibliographers to be older. Neither of them has place, date, nor printer's name, but one is known to be from the press of Moravus at Naples. The commentators of G. Valla and L. Strebach, with the argument of Latomius, are found in the edition of Seb. Gryphius, Leyden, 1541 and 1545, 8vo., often reprinted. We have also the editions of Camerarius, Lips. 1449; of Surmius, Strasburg, 1508; of Minos, Paris, 1582; of Malorarius and Marcellinus, Venice, 1587; of Hauptmann, Leipzig, 1741.

In illustration, the disquisition of Erhard Reuschius, "De Ciceronis Partitionibus Oratorius," Helmstedt, 1726, will be found useful.

3. De Oratore ad Quintum Fratrum Libri III.

Cicero having been urged by his brother Quintus to compose a systematic work on the art of Oratory, the dialogues which bear the above title were drawn up in compliance with this request. They were completed towards the end of b. c. 55 (ad Att. iv. 13), about two years after the return of their author from banishment, and had occupied much of his time during a period in which he had in a great measure withdrawn from public life, and had sought consolation for his political degradation by an earnest devotion to literary pursuits. All his thoughts and exertions were thus directed in one channel, and consequently, as might be expected, the production before us is one of his most brilliant efforts, and will be found to be so accurately finished in its most minute parts, that it may be regarded as a master-piece of skill in all that relates to the graces of style and composition. The object in view, as explained by himself, was to furnish a treatise which should comprehend all that was valuable in the theories of Aristotle, Isocrates, and other ancient rhetoricians, and at the same time present their precepts in an agreeable and attractive form, disencumbered of the formal stiffness and dry technicalities of the schools. (Ad Fam. i. 9, ad Att. iv. 16.)

The conversations, which form the medium through which instruction is conveyed, are supposed to have taken place in n. c. 31, immediately before the breaking out of the Social war, at the moment when the city was violently agitated by the proposal of the tribune M. Livius Drusus, to... grant to the senators the right of acting in common with the equites as judges on criminal trials. The measure was vehemently opposed by the consul Philippus, who was in consequence regarded as a traitor to his order, and supported by all the influence and talent of L. Licinius Crassus, the most celebrated orator of that epoch, who was chosen praetor for the subsequent election. This venerable statesman is represented as having retired to his villa at Tusculum during the celebration of the Roman games, in order that he might collect his thoughts and brace up his energies for the grand struggle which was soon to decide the contest. He was accompanied to his retirement by two youths of high promise, C. Amelius Cotta (consul n. c. 75) and P. Sulpicius Rufus, and there joined by his father-in-law and former colleague in the consulsip (n. c. 95), Q. Mucius Scaevola, renowned for his profound knowledge of civil law, and by his friend and political ally, M. Antonius (consul n. c. 99), whose fame as a public speaker was little if at all inferior to that of Crassus himself. The three consular sages having spent the first day in reflections upon politics and the aspect of public affairs, unbend themselves on the second by the introduction of literary topics. The whole party being stretched at ease under the shadow of a spreading plane, the elders, at the earnest solicitation of Cotta and Sulpicius, commence a discourse upon oratory, which is renewed the following morning and brought to a close in the afternoon. At the end of the first dialogue, Scaevola, in order that strict dramatic propriety may be observed (see ad Att. iv. 16), reverts, and his place, in the two remaining colloquies, is supplied by Q. Lutatius Catulus, and his half-brother, C. Julius Caesar Strabo, both distinguished as public speakers, the former celebrated for the extreme purity of his diction, the latter for the pungency of his wit.

An animated debate first arises on the qualifications essential for pre-eminence in oratory. Crassus, who throughout must be regarded as expressing the sentiments of Cicero, after enlarging upon the importance, the dignity, and the universal utility of eloquence, proceeds to describe the deep learning, the varied accomplishments, and the theoretical skill which must enter into the combination which shall form a perfect orator, while Antonius, although he allows that universal knowledge, if attainable, would most likely increase the power of those who possessed it, is contented to pitch the standard much lower, and seeks to prove that the orator is more likely to be embarrassed than benefited by aiming at what is beyond his reach, and that, by attempting to master the whole circle of the liberal arts, he will but waste the time that might be profitably employed, since the natural gifts of quick talents, a good voice, and a pleasing delivery, when improved by practice, self-training, and experience, are in themselves amply sufficient to produce the result sought. This preliminary controversy, in which, however, both parties agree in reality, as to what is desirable, although they differ as to what is practicable, being terminated, Antonius and Crassus enter jointly upon the συνένομενικα (ad Att. iv. 16) of the subject, and expound the principles and rules upon which success in the rhetorical art depends and by the observance of which it may be acquired. The second book, the invention and arrangement of arguments, and winds up with a dissertation on memory, the continuous flow of his discourse being broken and relieved by an essay, placed in the mouth of Caesar, upon the nature and use of humour, a digression, both amusing in itself, and interesting generally, as evincing the miserable bad taste of the Romans in this department. In the third book, Crassus describes himself as an orator, and the assets and the elements of the art, containing all the graces of diction, to which are added a few remarks upon delivery, that is, upon the voice, pronunciation, and action of the speaker.

The MSS. of the De Oratore known up to the early part of the 15th century, were all imperfect. There were blanks extending in Bk. i. from c. 28. §123 to c. 34. §157, and from c. 43. §193 to Bk. ii. c. 58. §19, although in the Erfurt MS. only as far as Bk. ii. c. 5. §13; in Bk. ii. from c. 12. §50 to c. 14. §60; and in Bk. iii. from c. 5. §17 to c. 28. §110. These gaps were first supplied by Gasparinus of Barziza, from a MS. found at Lodoli, and hence called Codex Latonensis, 1419, which in addition to the Rhetorica ad Herennium, the De Inventione, the Brutus and the Orator contained the three books De Oratore entire. This MS., which is now lost, was repeatedly copied, and its contents soon became known all over Italy; but it is uncertain whether the whole was transcribed, or merely those passages which were required to fill up existing deficiencies.

The Edito Princeps of the De Oratore was printed at the monastery of Salsisio, by Seyneyhem and Pannartz, in 4to, between 1465 and 1467. The most useful editions are those by Peene, Camb. 1716, 1732, and Lond. 1746, 1771, 1795, 8vo.; by J. F. Weitzel, Brunswick, 1794, 8vo.; by Harles, with the notes of Pearce and others, Leipzig, 1816, 8vo.; by O. M. Müller, Leipzig, 1819, 8vo.; by Heinrichsen, Copenhagen, 1830, 8vo.

4. Brutus s. de Claris Oratoribus.

This work is in the form of a dialogue, the speakers being Cicero himself, Atticus, and M. Brutus; the scene a grass plot, in front of a colonnade, attached to the house of Cicero at Rome, with a statue of Photon, who contains a complete critical history of Roman eloquence, from the earliest epochs, commencing with L. Junius Brutus, Appius Claudius, M. Curius, and sundry sages of the olden time, whose fame rested upon obscure tradition alone, passing on to those with regard to whose talents more certain information could be obtained, such as Cornelius Cetheges and Cato, the censor, advancing gradually till it reached such men as Catulus, Liciunis Crassus, and M. Antonius, whose glory was bright in the recollection of many yet alive, and ending with those whom Cicero himself had heard with admiration as a youth, and rivalled as a man, the greatest of whom was Hortensius, and with him the list closes, living... orators being excluded. Prefixed, are some short, but graphic sketches, of the most renowned Grecian models; the whole discourse being interspersed with clever observations on the speculative principles of the art, and many important historical details connected with the public life and services of the individuals enumerated. Great taste and discrimination are displayed in pointing out the characteristic merits, and exposing the defects, of the various styles of composition reviewed in turn, and the work is most valuable as a contribution to the history of literature. But, from the desire to render it absolutely complete, and, at the same time, to confine it within moderate limits, the author is compelled to hurry from one individual to another, without dwelling upon any for a sufficient period to leave a distinct impression on the mind of the reader; and, while we complain of the space occupied by a mere catalogue of uninteresting names, by which we are wearied, we regret that our curiosity should have been excited, without being gratified, in regard to many of the shining lights which should such a lustre over the last century of the commonwealth.

The Brutus was composed next in order, although at a long interval, after the De Republica, at a period when Caesar was already master of the state, it was written before the Cato, the Cato itself coming immediately before the Orator, a combination of circumstances which fixes it down to the year b. c. 46. (Brut. 1, 2, 5, 6, Orat. 7, de Divin. ii. 1.)

The Brutus was unknown until the discovery of the Codex Laudensis described above. Hence all MSS. being confessedly derived from this source do not admit of being divided into families, although the text might probably be improved if the transcriptions existing in various European libraries were more carefully examined and compared.

The Edito Princeps of the Brutus was that printed at Rome, by Sweynam and Pannartz, 1469, 4to., in the same volume with the De Oratore and the Orator. The best edition is that by Ellendt, with very copious and useful prolegomena, Königberg, 1826, 8vo., to which we may add an useful school edition by Billerbeck, Hannover, 1828.

5. Ad M. Brutum Orator.

Cicero having been frequently requested by M. Brutus to explain his views with regard to what constituted a faultless orator, this term being understood to denote a public speaker in the senate or in the forum, but to exclude the eloquence displayed by philosophers in their discourses, and by poets and historians in their writings, endeavours in the present essay to perform the task imposed on him. We must not, therefore, expect to find here a series of precepts, the result of observation and induction, capable of being readily applied in practice, or a description of anything actually existing in nature, but rather a fancy picture, in which the artist represents an object of ideal beauty, such as would spring from the union of all the prominent characteristic excellences of the most gifted individuals, fused together and concentrated into one harmonious whole.

He first points out that perfection must consist in absolute propriety of expression, and that this could be obtained only by occasional judicious transitions from one style to another, by assuming, according to the nature of the subject, at one time a plain, familiar, unpretending tone; by rising at another into lofty, impassioned, and highly ornamented declamation; and by observing in general a graceful medium between the two extremes; by ascending, as the Greeks expressed it, from τρυχλυτον to the δίπορον, and falling back from the δίπορον to the ακεραίων,—instead of adhering steadily, after the fashion of most great orators, to one particular form. He next points out the great error very prevalent among his countrymen, who, admitting that Athenian eloquence was the purest model for imitation, imagined that its essence consisted in avoiding with scrupulous care all copious, flowing, decorated periods, and in expressing every idea in highly polished, terse, grammatical sentences—a system which, however interesting as an effort of intellect, must necessarily produce results which will fall dull and cold upon the ear of an ordinary listener, and, if carried out to its full extent, degenerate into offensive mannerism. After dwelling upon these dangers and insisting upon the folly of neglecting the practice of Aeschinem and Demosthenes and setting up such a standard as Thucydides, Cicero proceeds to show that the orator must direct his chief attention to three points, which in fact comprehend the soul of the art, the volat, the where, and the how; the matter of his speech, the arrangement of that matter, the expression and enumeration of that matter each of which is in turn examined and discussed. The perfect orator being defined to be one who clearly demonstrates to his hearers the truth of the position he maintains, delights them by the beauty and fitness of his language, and wins them over to his cause ("is, qui in foro, causisque civilihus, itn aequitatem, et in alios deliberat, statam, et fallaciam, et in amicis, et in adversariis," we are told to consider the means by which these ends are reached. The groundwork and foundation of the whole is true wisdom, but true wisdom can be gained only by the union of all the highest natural endowments with a knowledge of philosophy and all the chief departments of literature and science; and thus Cicero brings us round to the conclusion, which is in fact the pervading idea of this and the two preceding works, that he who would be a perfect orator must be a perfect man. What follows (from c. 45 to the end) is devoted to a dissertation on the harmonious arrangement of words and the importance of rhythmical cadence in prose composition—a curious topic, which attracted much attention in ancient times, as may be seen from the elaborately minute dulness of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, but possesses comparatively little interest for the modern reader.

The Orator was composed about the beginning of b. c. 45, having been undertaken immediately after the completion of the Cato. Cicero declares, that he was willing to stake his reputation for knowledge and taste in his own art upon the merits of this work: "Mibi quidem sic persuedeo, me quidquid habuerim judicium dicendo in illum librum contulisse:" and every one must be charmed by the faultless purity of the diction, the dexterity manifested in the choice of appropriate phraseology, and the sonorous flow with which the periods roll gracefully onwards. There is now and then perhaps a little difficulty in tracing the connexion of the different divisions; and while some of the most weighty themes are touched upon very slightly, disproportionate space is assigned to the remarks upon the music of prose; but this probably arose from the subject having been entirely passed over in the two preceding treatises. For it must be borne in mind that the De Oratore, the Brutus, and the Orator were intended to constitute a connected and continuous series, forming a complete system of the rhetorical art. In the first are expounded the principles and rules of oratory, and the qualifications natural and acquired requisite for success; in the second the importance of these qualifications, and the use and application of the principles and rules are illustrated by a critical examination of the leading merits and defects of the greatest public speakers of this epoch, which third book, it is supposed, that the Paradoxa are here spoken of; but this opinion is scarcely borne out by the expression in the preface to which he refers.

All that we know regarding this work is comprised in a single sentence of Quintilian (ii. 1. § 11): "Communes loci, sive qui sunt in vitia directi, quales legimini a Cicerone compositos; seu quibus questiones generaliter tractantur, quales sunt editi a Quinto quoque Hortensio." Orelli supposes, that the Paradoxa are here spoken of; but this opinion is scarcely borne out by the expression in the preface to which he refers.

9. Rhetoricorum ad C. Herennium Libri IV.

A general view of the whole art of Rhetoric, including a number of precepts and rules for the guidance of the student. Passages from this treatise are quoted by St. Jerome (adv. Rufin. lib. i. p. 204, ed. Basil.), by Priscian, by Rufinus (de Comp. et Metr. Oral. pp. 315, 321 of the Rhetores Antiq. ed. Pit.); and by other ancient grammarians, who speak of it as the work of Cicero, and as such it was generally received by the most distinguished scholars of the fifteenth century, Leonardus Arretinus, Angelus Politianus, and Laurentius Valla. At a very early period, however, its authenticity was called in question by Raphael Rhegius and Angelus Decembrius, and the controversy has been renewed at intervals down to the present day. Almost all the best editors agree in pronouncing it spurious, but the utmost diversity of opinion has existed with regard to the real author. Regius propounded no less than three hypotheses, assigning it at one time to Q. Cornificius, who was quaestor n. c. 81, and an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship in n. c. 64; at another, to Virginius, a rhetorician contemporary with Nero; and lastly, to Timolaus, son of queen Zenobia, who had an elder brother Herennius. Paulus and Aldus Mantuinus, Sigonius, Muretus, Barthius, and many of less note, all adopted the first supposition of Regius. G. J. Vossius began by deciding in favour of the younger Q. Cornificius, the colleague of Cicero in the augurate (ad Pum. xii. 17—30), but afterwards changed his mind and fixed upon Tullius Tiro; Julius Caesar Scaliger upon M. Gallo; Nicerontios upon M. Aurelius Tullius; while more recently Schütz has laboured hard to bring home the paternity to M. Antonius Gnipho, and more recently Schütz has laboured hard to bring home the paternity to M. Antonius Gnipho, and rushes to his edition of the rhetorical works of Cicero, Leipzig, 1814; and in the disquisition of J. van Heusde, De Actio Seiitae, Utrecht, 1839; to which we may add, as one of the earliest authorities, Utresi Aes Rhetorico ad Herennianum Ciceronis, inscribatur, appended to the Problematum in Quintil. Inst. Orat. by Raphael Regius, published at Venice in 1492.

Cicero.

The Editio Princeps of the Rhetorica ad Herennium cannot have derived their matter from a common Greek original, for not only is it incredible that two persons translating independently of each other should have rendered so many phrases in words almost identical, or in illustrations from Roman writers common to both at once destroy such an explanation. Only two solutions of the enigma suggest themselves. Either we have in the Ad Herennium and the De Inventione the notes taken down by two pupils from the lectures of the same Latin rhetorician, which were drawn out at full length by the one, and thrown aside in an unfinished state by the other after some alterations and corrections had been introduced; or we have in the Ad Herennium the original lectures, published subsequently by the professor himself. This last idea is certainly at variance with the tone assumed in the preliminary remarks, but may receive some support from the claim put forth (i. 9) to originality in certain divisions of imaginaciones, which are adopted without observation in the De Inventione. Whatever conclusion we may adopt upon this head, it is clear that we possess no evidence to determine the real author. The case made out in favour of Cornificius (we cannot tell which Cornificius) is at first sight plausible. Quintilian (iii. 1. § 21, comp. ix. 3. § 89) frequently mentions a certain Cornificius as a writer upon rhetoric, and in one place especially (ix. vi. 30) enumerates his classification of figures, which corresponds exactly with the Ad Herennium (iv. 15, &c.); and a second point of agreement has been detected in a citation by Julius Rufinianus (De Fig. Sent. p. 29.) But, on the other hand, many things are ascribed by Quintilian to Cornificius which nowhere occur in the Ad Herennium; and, still more fatal, we perceive, upon examining the words referred to above (ix. 3. § 93), that the remarks of Cornificius on figures must have been taken from a separate and distinct tract confined to that subject. We can accord to Schütz the merit of having demonstrated that M. Antonius Gnipho, the compiler, and that there is no testimony, external or internal, to render this position untenable; but we cannot go further. There are several historical disquisitions upsoured up and down reaching from the consuls of L. Cassius Longinus, b. c. 107, to the death of Sulpicius in b. c. 88; and if Burmann and others are correct in believing that the second consulship of Sulla is distinctly indicated (iv. 54, 68), the fact will be established, that these books were not published before b. c. 80.

The materials for arriving at a correct judgment with regard to the merits of this controversy will be found in the preface of the younger Burmann, to his edition of the Rhetorica ad Herennium and De Inventione, printed at Leyden in 1761, 8vo., and republished with additional notes by Lindemann, Leipzig, 1828, 8vo.; in the proemium of Schütz to his edition of the rhetorical works of Cicero, Leipzig, 1804, 3 vols. 8vo., enlarged and corrected in his edition of the whole works of Cicero, Leipzig, 1814; and in the disquisition of J. van Heusde, De Actio Seiitae, Utrecht, 1839; to which we may add, as one of the earliest authorities, Utresi Aes Rhetorico ad Herennianum Ciceronis, inscribatur, appended to the Problematum in Quintil. Inst. Orat. by Raphael Regius, published at Venice in 1492.

CICERO. 727

CICERO.
nium was printed along with the De Inventione, under the title "Ciceronius Rhetorica Nova et Veneta," by Fr. Joseph Vinzenz, in Venice, 1470; and bibliographers have enumerated fourteen more belonging to the fifteenth century. The best edition in a separate form is that of Burmann, or the reprint of Lindemann, mentioned above.

B. POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

1. De Republica Libri VI.

This work on the best form of government and the duty of the citizen, was one of the earliest of Cicero's philosophical treatises, drawn up at a period when, from his intimacy with Pompey, Caesar and Crassus being both at a distance, he fancied, or at least wished to persuade others, that he was actually grasping the helm of the Roman commonwealth (de Div. ii. 1). Deeply impressed with the arduous nature of his task, he changed again and again not only various minute details but the whole general plan, and when at length completed, it was received with the greatest favour by his contemporaries, and is referred to by himself repeatedly with evident satisfaction and pride. It was commenced in the spring of b. c. 54 (ad Att. iv. 14, comp. 16), and occupied much of his attention during the summer months of that year, while he was residing in his villa in the vicinity of Cumae and of Pompeii. (Ad Q. Fr. ii. 14.) It was in the first instance divided into two books (ad Q. Fr. iii. 5), then expanded into nine (ad Q. Fr. i. c.), and finally reduced to six (de Leg. i. 6, ii. 10, de Div. ii. 1). The form selected was that of Dialogue, in imitation of Plato, whom he kept constantly in view. The epoch at which the several conferences, extending over a space of three days, were supposed to have been held, was the Latinae feriae, in the consulship of C. Sempronius Tuditanus and M. Aquilinus, b. c. 129; the dramatic personae consisted of the younger Africanus, in whose suburban gardens the scene is laid, and to whom the principal part is assigned; his bosom friend Caelius the Wise; L. Furius Philus, consul b. c. 136, celebrated in the annals of the Numantine war, and bearing the reputation of an eloquent and cultivated speaker (Brut. 29); M. Manlius, consul b. c. 149, under whom Scipio served as military tribune at the outbreak of the third Punic war, probably the same person as Manlius the famous jurisconsult; Sp. Mummius, the brother of him who sacked Corinth, a man of moderate acquirements, addicted to the discipline of the Porch; Q. Atius Tubero, son of Aemilia, sister of Africanus, a prominent opponent of the Gracchi, well skilled in law and logic, but no orator; P. Rutulus Rufus, consul b. c. 105, the most worthy citizen, according to Velleius, not merely of his own day, but of all time, who having been condemned in a criminal trial (a. c. 92), although innocent, by a conspiracy among the equites, retired to Smyrna, where he passed the remainder of his life in honourable exile; Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, consul b. c. 117, the first preceptor of Cicero in jurisprudence; and lastly, C. Fannius, the historian, who was absent, however, on the second day of the conference, as we learn from the remarks of his father-in-law Laelius, and of Scaevola, in the "De Amicitia," (4, 7).

In order to give an air of probability to the action of the piece, Rutulus is supposed to have been visited at Smyrna by Cicero during his Asiatic tour, and on that occasion to have spent some days in recounting the particulars of this memorable conversation, which he has given in part, to his young friend who afterwards dedicated the De Republica to the person who was his travelling companion on this occasion. It is hard to discover who this may have been, but historical considerations go far to prove that either Q. Cicero or Atticus was the individual in question. (De Rep. i. 8, Brut. 22; Mni. Praef. § iv.) The precise date at which the De Republica was given to the world is unknown; it could scarcely have been before the end of b. c. 54, for the work was still in an unfinished state at the end of September in that year (ad Att. iv. 16), and during the month of October scarcely a day passed in which the author was not called upon to plead for some client (ad Q. Fr. iii. 3); on the other hand, it appears from an expression in the correspondence of Caelius with Cicero, while the latter was in Cilicia (ad Pom. viii. 1), that the "politici libri" were in general circulation in the early part of b. c. 51, while the language used is such as would scarcely have been employed except with reference to a new publication.

The greater number of the above particulars are gleaned from incidental notices dispersed over the writings of Cicero. The dialogues themselves, although occasioned merely by events of the day, and taking place in the first instance, may possibly have been continued, if not for several years, at least for a longer period, extending into the tenth century, and perhaps considerably later, had ever since the revival of literature eluded the most earnest search, and were believed to have been irrecoverably lost with the exception of the episode of the Somnium Scipionis, extracted entire from the sixth book by Macrobius, and sundry fragments quoted by grammarians and ecclesiastics, especially by Laetantius and St. Augustin. But in the year 1822, Angelo Mai detected among the Palimpsests in the Vatican a portion of the long-sought-for treasure, which had been partially obliterated to make way for a commentary of St. Augustin on the Psalms. A full history of this volume, which seems to have been brought from the monastery of Bobbio during the pontificate of Paulus V., about the beginning of the 7th century, is contained in the first edition, printed at Rome in 1822, and will be found in most subsequent editions. Although what has been thus unexpectedly restored to light is in itself most valuable, yet, considered as a whole, the work presents a sadly deformed and mutilated aspect. These imperfections arise from various causes. In the first place, the commentary of Augustin reaches from the 119th to the 140th psalm, but the remainder, down to the 150th psalm, written, as may be fairly inferred, over sheets of the smaller Ms., has disappeared, and gaps occur in what is left to the extent of 64 pages, leaving exactly 302 pages entire in double columns, each consisting of fifteen lines. In the second place, it must be remembered that to prepare an ancient Ms. for the reception of a new writing, it must have been taken to pieces in order to wash or scrape every page separately, and that, no attention being paid to the arrangement of these disjecta membra, they would, when rebound, be shuffled together in utter disorder, and whole leaves would be frequently rejected altogether, either from being decayed or from some failure in the cleaning process. Accordingly, in the palimpsest of the Psalms, though the different parts of the original were in the utmost confusion, and great care was required not only in deciphering the faint characters, but in restoring the proper sequence of the sheets. Altogether, after a minute calculation, we may estimate that by the palimpsest we have regained about one-fourth of the whole, and if the fragments collected from other sources be added, they will increase the proportion to one-third. The MS. is written in very large well-formed capitals, and from the splendour of its appearance those best skilled in palæography have pronounced it to be the oldest MS. of a clasise in existence, some being disposed to carry it back as far as the second or third century, the superinduced MS.3, being probably earlier than the tenth century. In the first book, the first 33 pages are wanting, and there are fourteen smaller blanks scattered up and down, amounting to 38 pages more. A few words are wanting at the beginning of the second book, which runs on with occasional blanks, amounting in all to 30 pages, until we approach the close, which is very defective. The third book is a mere collection of disjointed speculations, and of the fourth the MS. contains but a few lines, the remainder is the case with the fifth, and the sixth is totally wanting.

The object of the work was to determine the best form of government, to define the duties of all the members of the body politic, and to investigate those principles of justice and morality which must form the basis of every system under which a nation can expect to enjoy permanent prosperity and happiness. We cannot doubt that Cicero was stimulated to this undertaking by perceiving the destruction which threatened the liberties of his country; and, in the vain hope of awakening those around him to some sense of their danger, he resolved to place before their eyes a lively representation of that constitution by which their forefathers had become masters of the world.

The materials of which this production was formed appear, for we can speak with little certainty of the last four books, to have been distributed in the following manner:—

The greater part of the prologue to the first book is lost, but we gather that it asserted the supremacy of an active over a purely contemplative character. After a digression on the uncertainty and worthlessness of physical pursuits, the real business of the book is opened, the word republica is defined; and the three chief forms of government, the monarchical, the aristocratical, and the democratical, are analyzed and compared. Scipio awarding the preference to the first, although, since all in their simple shape are open to corruption and degeneracy, and contain within themselves the seeds of dissolution, the ideal of a perfect constitution would be a compound of all these three elements mixed in due proportions—a combination to which the Roman constitution at one time closely approximated.

The subject being pursued in the second book leads to a history of the origin and progress of the Roman state; and, passing from the particular to the general, the remainder of the book is occupied by an examination of the great moral obligations which serve as the foundation of all political union.

The third book, as we glean from Lactantius and St. Augustine, contained a protracted discussion on the famous paradox of Carneades, that justice was a visionary delusion.

The fourth book entered upon the duties of citizens in public and private life, and enlarged upon general education and moral training.

In the prologue to the fifth book, of which we know less than of any of the preceding, Cicero indulged in lamentations on the general depravity of morals which were becoming rapidly more corrupt. The main topic in what followed was the administration of laws, including a review of the practice of the Roman courts, beginning with the paternal jurisdiction of the kings, who were the sole judges in the infancy of the city.

We can hardly hazard a conjecture on the contents of the sixth book, with the exception of the well-known Somnium Scipionis, in which Scipio relates that he saw in a dream, when, in early youth, he visited Masinissa, in Africa, the form of the first Africanus, which dimly revealed to him his future destiny, and urged him to press steadily forward in the path of virtue and of true renown, by announcing the reward prepared in a future state for those who have served their country in this life with good faith.

The authorities chiefly consulted by Cicero, in composing the De Republica, are concisely enumerated in the first chapter of the second book De Divinatione.

"Sex de Republica libris scriptumus— Magnus locus philosophicque proprius, a Patone, Aristotele, Theophrasto totque Peripateticorum familia tractus uberrime." To these we must add Polybius, from whom many of the most important opinions are directly derived (e.g. comp. Polyb. vi. 3, 6, 7).

The Edito Princeps of the recovered De Republica was printed, as we have seen above, at Rome, in 1822, with copious prolegomena and notes by Mai. This was followed by the edition of Creuzer and Mower, Frank. 1826, 8vo., which is the most complete that has hitherto appeared. The following also contains useful matter, "La Republique de Cicero, d'apres la texte inedit, recemment decouvert et commente par M. Mai, bibliothecaire de Vatican, avec une traduction francaise, un discours preliminaire et des dissertations historiques, par M. Villemain, de l'Academie francaise, 2 tomes, Paris, Michaud, 1823."

The fragments known before the discovery of Mai are included in all the chief editions of the collected works, and were published with a French translation by Bernardi, 2 tomes, Paris, 1807.

3. De Legibus Libri III.

Three dialogues, in a somewhat mutilated condition, on the nature, the origin, and the perfection of laws. These have given rise to a series of controversies respecting the real author of the work, the time at which it was written, its extent when entire, its proper title, the date of publication, the existence of a prologue, or preface, the sources from which the author derived his materials, and the design which he proposed to accomplish. On each of these points it is necessary to say a few words.

1. The opinion that Cicero was not the author, rests solely upon the fact that, contrary to his usual practice in such matters, he nowhere makes mention of these books; no notice of them is taken in the catalogue of his philosophical writings, inserted in the De Divinatione (H. 1.), nor in any part of his correspondence with Atticus, which generally contains some account of the literary labours in which he was from time to time engaged, nor in any of those passages where a reference might very naturally have been expected (e.g. Tusc. iv. 1, Brut. v. 19), while the expressions which have been advanced in this part of Cicero's letter in support of the charge upon examination to be so indistinct, or to have been so unfairly interpreted, that they throw no light whatever on the question. (e.g. de Orat. i. 42, ad Att. xiv. 17.) On the other hand, "M. Tullius ... in libro de legibus primo," and "Cicero in quinto de legibus," are the words with which Lactantius (De Opif. Del. i.) and Macrobius (vi. 4) introduce quotations, and all the best scholars agree in pronouncing that not only is there no internal evidence against the authenticity of the treatise, but that the diction, style, and matter, are in every respect worthy of Cicero, presenting no trace of a later or inferior hand, of interpolation, or of forgery. Even if we do not feel quite certain that the sentence in Quintilian (xii. 3), "M. Tullius non modo inter agendum munquam est destinatus scientia juris, sed etiam componere aliqua de eo cooperat," was intended to indicate the work before us, yet the word cooperat may be allowed at least to suggest a solution of the difficulty. Taking into account the actual state of these dialogues as they appear in the manuscripts, and the manner in which they have descended to us, remarking the circumstance, which becomes palpable upon close examination, that some portions are complete, full, and highly polished, while others are imperfect, meagre, and rough, we are led to the conclusion, that the plan was traced out and partially executed; that, while the undertaking was advancing, some serious interruption occurred, possibly the journey to Cilicia; that being thus thrown aside for a time, the natural disinclination always felt by Cicero to resume a train of thought once broken off (comp, de Leg. i. 3) combined with a conviction that the disorders of his country were now beyond the aid of philosophic remedies, prevented him from ever following out his original project, and giving the last touches to the unfinished sketch. This supposition will account in a great measure for the silence observed regarding it in the de Divinazioni, the Brutus, and elsewhere; and if it was in progress, as we shall see is very probable, towards the close of n. c. 52, we can be at no loss to explain why it makes no figure in the epistles to Atticus, for no letters between the friends are extant for that year, in consequence, perhaps, of both being together at Rome. Chapman, in his Chronological Dissertation, avoids the objection altogether by supposing, that the de Legibus was not written until after the de Divinazioni, but from what is said below, it will appear that this hypothesis is probably erroneous, and, according to the view we have given, it is certainly unnecessary.

2. Since we find in the work allusions to the elevation of Cicero to the augurate (ii. 12, iii. 19), an event which did not take place until the vacancy caused by the death of Crassus (n. c. 53) was known at Rome, and also to the death of Clodius (ii. 17, n. c. 52), and since Cato and Pompey are both named as alive (iii. 18, i. 3, iii. 9), it is manifest that the action of the drama belongs to some epoch between the beginning of the year, n. c. 52, and the battle of Pharsala, n. c. 48; but on the other hand this evidence will only enable us to decide that the drama was composed after the 18th of January, n. c. 52, the day when Clodius perished, without defining any second limit before which it must have been composed. When, however, we remark the evident bitterness of spirit displayed towards Clodius and his friends, together with the suppressed, but not concealed, dissatisfaction, with the event of the year 51 (Tusc. i. 47, ii. 21), we are led to suppose that those paragraphs were penned under the influence of feelings recently excited, such as might have been roused by the proceedings which distinguished the trial of Milo. We are inclined, therefore, to think that the date of the action of the drama, and the date of composition, are nearly identical, and that both may be assigned to the middle or end of n. c. 52.

3. With regard to the number of books at one time in existence, we are certain that there were more than three, for Macrobius (i. c.) quotes the fifth; but how many there may have been is purely a matter of conjecture. Fabricius, Hulsemann, and Wagner, decide that there were just five; Goezeuz argues very ingeniously that there must have been six; Davis fixes that there were eight.

4. The title De Legibus rests on the authority of nearly all the MSS. One alone exhibits De Jure Civiti et Legibus, which doubtless arose from a desire to include the supposed contents of the later books. (See de Leg. iii. 5 fn.; Gell. i. 22.)

5. If we are correct in our position, that Cicero never finished his work, it follows that it was not published during his life, and, therefore, remained unknown to his contemporaries.

6. As to the existence of a prologue, we should naturally have imagined that this was a question of fact, affording no scope for reasoning. Nevertheless the point also has been keenly debated. Turnebus, in one commentary, considers that the first few chapters constitute a regular introduction, but he afterwards changed his mind, and, startled by the abruptness with which the conversation opens, maintained that the exordium had been lost. Goereuz and Moser, the most judicious editors, adopt the first conclusion of Turnebus.

7. As regards the external form and decorations, Plato is evidently the model, and the imitation throughout is most close and accurate. But the resemblance extends no farther than the surface: the definitions, the propositions, the arguments, and the whole substance, except what is immediately connected with Roman law, can be traced to the labours of the Stoics, especially to the ψηφωτα τεθερες, the πεπλω καλοη, το πεπλω διπολοστηρο, and above all the πεπλω θυμου of Chrysippus; for the few fragments which have been preserved of these tracts are still sufficient to show that not only did Cicero draw his materials from their stores, but in some instances did little more than translate their words. Even in the passages on magistrates the ideas of Plato, Aristotle, and Theophrastus are presented with the modifications introduced by Dion (Diogenes?) and Panaceius. (De Leg. iii. 6.)

8. The general plan of the work is distinctly traced in one of the opening chapters (i. 5, 17). It was intended to comprehend an exposition of the nature of justice and its connexion with the nature of man, an examination of the laws by which states ought to be governed, and a review of the different systems of legislation which had been adopted by different nations.

Accordingly, in the first book we have an investigation into the sources of justice and virtue. It is laid down (1), That the Gods are the ultimate source of justice; (2) That men, being bound together by a community of faculties, feelings, and desires, are led to cultivate social union—and hence justice, without which social union could not exist. Thus human nature is a second source of justice. But since human nature is intimately connected with God by reason and virtue, it follows that God and the moral freedom of man are the joint sources of justice, law being the practical exposition of its principles. Much more stress is, however, laid upon the second of these two sources than upon the first, which is quickly dismissed and kept out of sight.

In the second book the author explains his views of a Model Code, illustrated by constant references to the ancient institutions of Rome. Attention is first called to the laws which relate to religion and sacred observances, which are considered under the different heads of divine worship in general, including the solemnities to be observed in the performance of ordinances, and the classification of the gods according to the degrees of homage to which they are severally entitled; the celebration of festivals; the duties of the various orders of priests; the exhibition of public games; the maintenance of ancient rites; the punishment of perjury and impurity; the consecration of holy places and things; and the respect to be paid to the spirits of the departed.

The third book treated of Magistrates, commencing with a short exposition of the nature and importance of their functions as interpreters and enforcers of the laws. This is followed by a dissertation on the expediency of having one magistrate in a state to whom all the rest shall be subordinate, which leads to certain reflections on the authority of the consuls, as controlled by the tribunes. Here, however, there is a great blank, the part which is lost having contained, it would appear, an inquiry into the functions of all the chief officers of the Roman republic. What remains consists of three discussions, one on the power exercised by tribunes of the plebeians, a second on the propriety of supplying the vacancies in the Senate from the number of those who had held certain appointments, and, thirdly, on the advantages and drawbacks of voting by ballot.

The scene of these dialogues is laid in the villa of Cicero, in the neighborhood of his native Arpinum, near the point where the Flaminian joins the Liris. The Edition Princeps forms part of the edition of the philosophical works printed at Rome in 2 vols. fol. by Sweeney and Panartz, 1471; see above, p. 719, b. The editions of Davis, Camb. 1727-8, containing the notes of the old commentators, and an improved text, were long held in high estimation by students of the sister tongue, but is now superseded by those of Goerz, Leip. 1809, 8vo., forming the first volume of the collected philosophical works; of Moser and Creuzer, Frankf. 1824, 8vo., containing everything that the scholar can desire; and of Bake, Leyden, 1842, 8vo., which is the most recent.

3. De Jure Civili in Artem reddendo.

A. Gellius quotes a sentence from a work of Cicero which he says bore the above title. The subject of civil law was also discussed in one of the last books of De Legibus, but the words of Gellius can apply only to an independent treatise on civil law by Cicero. The text is in Cic. de Leg. i. 22; Quintil. xii. 3, § 10; Macrobi. vi. 4; Cic. de Leg. iii. 20.

4. Epistola ad Cassarem de Republica ordinanda.

Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, (xii. 40,) written in June, B.C. 45, tells his friend, that he had made several attempts to compose an address to Caesar, in imitation of those of Aristotle and Theopompus to Alexander, but had hitherto failed (Συγβουλευτης εις ευπροςνικόν μικρήν рεπερίστα·). A few days later, however, it appears to have been finished (ad Att. xiii. 26), and was soon after sent to Atticus (ad Att. xiii. 49), but never forwarded to the dictator; for, having been previously submitted to his friends for their approbation, they made so many objections, and suggested so many alterations, that Cicero threw it aside in disgust. (ad Att. xiii. 51, xiii. 1, 27, 28, 31.)

C. PHILOSOPHY OF MORAIS.

1. De Officiis Libri III.

A treatise on moral obligations, viewed not so much with reference to a metaphysical investigation of the basis on which they rest, as to the practical business of the world and the intercourse of social and political life. It was composed and published late in the year B.C. 44, certainly after the end of August (iii. sub fin.), and is addressed to young Marcus, at that time residing at Athens under the care of Cratinus the Peripatetic. This being a work professedly intended for the purposes of instruction, Cicero does not dwell upon the conflicting doctrines of rival sects, but endeavours rather to inculcate directly those views which he regarded as the most correct; and, rejecting the form of dialogue, enunciates the different precepts with the authority of a teacher addressing his pupil. The discipline of the Stoics is principally followed. In the first two books, the περὶ καθηγορίας of Panaitius served as a guide, and not a little was borrowed from Diogenes of Babylon, Antipater of Tarsus, Hecato, Posidonius, Antipater of Tyre, and others enumerated in the commentary of Beier and the tract of Lynden on Panaetius. Notwithstanding the express declaration of Cicero to the contrary, we cannot, from external evidence, avoid the conclusion, that the Greek authors have in not a few passages been translated verbatim, and translated not so happily, for the unyielding character of the Latin language rendered it impossible to express accurately those nice gradations of thought and delicate distinctions which can be conveyed with so much clearness and precision by the copious vocabulary and graceful flexibility of the sister tongue. (See the essay of Garve named at the end of the article.) The third book, which is occupied with questions in casuistry, although it lays claim to greater originality than those which precede it, was certainly formed upon the model of the περὶ καθηγορίας of the Stoic Hecato. But while the skeleton of the whole work is unquestionably of foreign origin, the examples and illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature, and are for the most part selected with great judgment and clothed in the most fictitious dictation.

In the first book, after a few preliminary remarks, we find a threefold division of the subject. When called upon to perform any action we must inquire. 1. Whether it is honestum, that is, good in itself, although it lays claim to greater originality than those which precede it, was certainly formed upon the model of the περὶ καθηγορίας of the Stoic Hecato. But while the skeleton of the whole work is unquestionably of foreign origin, the examples and illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature, and are for the most part selected with great judgment and clothed in the most fictitious dictation.

we must pursue when the honestum and the utile are at variance. Moreover, the honestum and the utile each admit of degrees which also fail to be examined in order that we may make choice of the highest. The general plan being thus sketched, it is followed out by a discussion of the four constituent elements into which the honestum may be resolved: a. Sapientia, the power of discerning truth; b. Justitia et Beneficentia, which consist in studying the welfare of those around us, in rendering to every one his own, and in preserving contracts inviolate; c. Fortitudo, greatness and strength of mind; d. Temperantia, the faculty of doing and saying everything in a becoming manner, in the proper place, and to the proper extent. Each of these is explained at length, and the book closes with a debate on the degrees of the honestum, that is, the method of deciding, when each of two lines of conduct is honestum, which is to be preferred as superior (honestissimus) to the other.

The second book is devoted to the utile, and considers how we may best conciliate the favour of opportunity and chance, apply it to the promotion of virtue, and thus arrive at health and public distinction, enlarging peculiarly on the most pure and judicious mode of displaying liberality, whether by pecuniary gifts or by aid of any other description. This is succeeded by a short notice of two utilitates passed over by Panatius—the care of the health and the care of the purse, after which a few words are added on the comparison of things expedient with things necessary, which had been briefly enunciated at the beginning of book second, but is here fully developed and largely illustrated. A number of difficult cases are then stated, which serve as exercises in the application of the rules laid down, among which a prominent place is assigned to the story of Regulius.
